A

This letter is modified from the Hebrew (aleph = an ox), which was meant to indicate the outline of an ox's head.

A

among the Egyptians is denoted by the hieroglyphic which represents the ibis. Among the Greeks it was the symbol of a bad augury in the sacrifices.

A

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

in logic is the symbol of a universal affirmative. A asserts, E denies. Thus, syllogisms in bArbArA contain three universal affirmative propositions.

means first—rate — the very best. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the character of the ship's hull is designated by letters, and that of the anchors, cables, and stores by figures. A1 means hull first—rate, and also anchors, cables, and stores; A2, hull first—rate, but furniture second—rate. Vessels of an inferior character are classified under the letters Æ, E, and I.

“She is a prime girl, she is; she is A1.”— Sam Slick.

A.B

(See Able.)

A.B.C

= Aerated Bread Company.

A B C Book

A primer, a book in which articles are set in alphabetical order, as the A B C Railway Guide. The old Primers contained the Catechism, as is evident from the lines: —

“That is question now;

And then comes answer like an Absey book.” Shakespeare: King John, i, 1.

A.B.C. Process

(The) of making artificial manure. An acrostic of Alum, Blood, Clay, the three chief ingredients.

A.E.I.O.U

The device adopted by Frederick V, Archduke of Austria (the Emperor Frederick III. — 1440—1493).

Austria Est Imperare Orbi Universo.

Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan.

Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.

To which wags added after the war of 1866,

Austria's Emperor Is Ousted Utterly.

Frederick II of Prussia is said to have translated the motto thus: — “Austria Erit In Orbe Ultima” (Austria will one day be lowest in the world).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A.U.C

Anno urbis conditæ (Latin), "from the foundation of the city" — i.e., Rome.

Aaron

An Aaron's serpent. Something so powerful as to swallow up minor powers. — Exodus vii. 10—12.

Ab

Ab ovo. From the very beginning. Stasinus, in the epic poem called the Little Iliad, does not rush in medias res, but begins with the eggs of Leda, from one of which Helen was born. If Leda had not laid this egg, Helen would never have been born. If Helen had not been born, Paris could not have eloped with her. If Paris had not eloped with Helen, there would have been no Trojan War, etc.

Ab ovo usque ad mala.

From the first dish to the last. A Roman coena (dinner) consisted of three parts. The first course was the appetiser, and consisted chiefly of eggs, with stimulants; the second was the "dinner proper;" and the third the dessert, at which mala (i.e., all sorts of apples, pears, quinces, pomegranates, and so on) formed the most conspicuous part. — Hor. Sat. I. iii. 5.

Aback

I was taken aback — I was greatly astonished — taken by surprise — startled. It is a sea term. A ship is "taken aback" when the sails are suddenly carried by the wind back against the mast, instantly staying the ship's progress — very dangerous in a strong gale.

Abacus

A small frame with wires stretched across it. Each wire contains ten movable balls, which can be shifted backwards or forwards, so as to vary ad libitum the number in two or more blocks. It is used to teach children addition and subtraction. The ancient Greeks and Romans employed it for calculations, and so do the Chinese. The word is derived from the Phoen. abak (dust); the Orientals used tables covered with dust for ciphering and diagrams. In Turkish schools this method is still used for teaching writing. The multiplication table invented by Pythagoras is called Abacus Pythagoricus. (Latin, abacus)

Abaddon

The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11). The Hebrew abad means "he perished."

"The angell of the bottomlesse pytt, whose name in the hebrew tonge is Abadon." — Tindale.

Abambou

The evil spirit of the Camma tribes in Africa. A fire is kept always burning in his house. He is supposed to have the power of causing sickness and death.

Abandon

means put at anyone's orders; hence, to give up. (Latin, ad, to; bann—um, late Latin for "a decree.")

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Abandon fait larron

As opportunity makes the thief, the person who neglects to take proper care of his goods, leads into temptation, hence the proverb, "Neglect leads to theft."

Abaris

The dart of Abaris. Abaris, the Scythian, was a priest of Apollo; and the god gave him a golden arrow on which to ride through the air. This dart rendered him invisible; it also cured diseases, and gave oracles. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras.

"The dart of Abaris carried the philosopher wheresoever he desired it." — Willmott.

Abate

(2 syl.) means properly to knock down. (French, abattre, whence a battue, i.e., wholesale destruction of game; O.E. a beátan.)

Abate,

in horsemanship, is to perform well the downward motion. A horse is said to abate when, working upon curvets, he puts or beats down both his hind legs to the ground at once, and keeps exact time.

Abatement in heraldry, is a mark of dishonour annexed to coat armour, whereby the honour of it is abated.

Abaton

As inaccessible as Abaton. Artemisia, to commemorate her conquest of Rhodes, erected two statues in the island, one representing herself, and the other emblematical of Rhodes. When the Rhodians recovered their liberty they looked upon this monument as a kind of palladium, and to prevent its destruction surrounded it with a fortified enclosure which they called Abaton, or the inaccessible place. (Lucan speaks of an island difficult of access in the fens of Memphis, called Abaton.)

Abbassides

(3 syl.). A dynasty of caliphs who reigned from 750—1258. The name is derived from Abbas, uncle of Mahomet. The most celebrated of them was Haroun—al—Raschid (born 765, reigned 786—808).

Abbey Laird

(An). An insolvent debtor sheltered by the precincts of Holyrood Abbey.

"As diligence cannot be proceeded with on Sunday, the Abbey Lairds (as they were jocularly called) were enabled to come forth on that day to mingle in our society." — R. Chambers.

Abbey—lubber

(An). An idle, well—fed dependent or loafer.

"It came into a common proverbe to call him an Abbay—lubber, that was idle, wel fed, a long, lewd, lither loiterer, that might worke and would not." — The Burnynge of Paules Church, 1563.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

It is used also of religions in contempt; see Dryden's Spanish Friar.

Abbot of Misrule

or Lord of Misrule. A person who used to superintend the Christmas diversions. In France the "Abbot of Misrule" was called L'abbé de Liesse (jollity). In Scotland the master of revels was called the "Master of Unreason."

Abbotsford

A name given by Sir Walter Scott to Clarty Hole, on the south bank of the Tweed, after it became his residence. Sir Walter devised the name from a fancy he loved to indulge in, that the abbots of Melrose Abbey, in ancient times, passed over the fords of the Tweed.

abd

in Arabic = slave or servant, as Abd—Allah (servant of God), Abd—el—Kader (servant of the Mighty One), Abdul—Latif (servant of the Gracious One), etc.

Abdael

(2 syl.). George Monk, third Duke of Albemarle.

"Brave Abdael o'r the prophets' school was placed;

Abdael, with all his father's virtues graced ...;

Without one Hebrew's blood, restored the crown." Dryden and Tait: Absalom and Achitopel, Part ii.

Tate's blunder for Abdiel (q.v.).

Abdallah

the father of Mahomet, was so beautiful, that when he married Amina, 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointed love. — Washington Irving: Life of Mahomet.

Abdallah

Brother and predecessor of Giaffir, pacha of Abydos. He was murdered by Giaffir (2 syl.). — Byron: Bride of Abydos.

Abdals

Persian fanatics, who think it a merit to kill anyone of a different religion; and if slain in the attempt, are accounted martyrs.

Abdera

A maritime town of Thrace, said in fable to have been founded by Abdera, sister of Diomedes. It was so overrun with rats that it was abandoned, and the Abderitans migrated to Macedonia.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Abderitan

A native of Abdera, a maritime city of Thrace. The Abderitans were proverbial for stupidity, hence the phrase, "You have no more mind than an Abderite." Yet the city gave birth to some of the wisest men of Greece: as Democritus (the laughing philosopher), Protagoras (the great sophist), Anaxarchos (the philosopher and friend of Alexander), Hecatæos (the historian), etc.

Abderitan Laughter

Scoffing laughter, incessant laughter. So called from Abdera, the birthplace of Democritus, the laughing philosopher.

Abderite

(3 syl.) A scoffer, so called from Democritus.

Abderus

One of Herakles's friends, devoured by the horses of Diomedes. Diomedes gave him his horses to hold, and they devoured him.

Abdiel

The faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt. (See Paradise Lost, Bk. v., lines 896, etc.)

"[He] adheres, with the faith of Abdiel, to the ancient form of adoration." — Sir W. Scott.

Abecedarian One who teaches or is learning his A B C.

Abecedarian hymns.

Hymns which began with the letter A, and each verse or clause following took up the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. (See Acrostic.)

Abel and Cain

The Mahometan tradition of the death of Abel is this: Cain was born with a twin sister who was named Aclima, and Abel with a twin sister named Jumella. Adam wished Cain to marry Abel's twin sister, and Abel to marry Cain's. Cain would not consent to this arrangement, and Adam proposed to refer the question to God by means of a sacrifice. God rejected Cain's sacrifice to signify his disapproval of his marriage with Aclima, his twin sister, and Cain slew his brother in a fit of jealousy.

Abel Keene

A village schoolmaster, afterwards a merchant's clerk. He was led astray, lost his place, and hanged himself. — Crabbe: Borough, Letter xxi.

Abelites

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.) Abelians, or Abelonians. A Christian sect of the fourth century, chiefly found in Hippo (N. Africa). They married, but lived in continence, as they affirm Abel did. The sect was maintained by adopting the children of others. No children of Abel being mentioned in Scripture, the Abelites assume that he had none.

Abessa

The impersonation of Abbeys and Convents, represented by Spenser as a damsel. When Una asked if she had seen the Red Cross Knight, Abessa, frightened at the lion, ran to the cottage of blind Superstition, and shut the door. Una arrived, and the lion burst the door open. The meaning is, that at the Reformation, when Truth came, the abbeys and convents got alarmed, and would not let Truth enter, but England (the lion) broke down the door. — Faërie Queen, i. 3.

Abesta

A book said to have been written by Abraham as a commentary on the Zend and the Pazend. It is furthermore said that Abraham read these three books in the midst of the furnace into which he was cast by Nimrod. — Persian Mythology.

Abeyance

really means something gaped after (French, bayer, to gape). The allusion is to men standing with their mouths open, in expectation of some sight about to appear.

Abhigit

The propitiatory sacrifice made by an Indian rajah who has slain a priest without premeditation.

Abhor

(Latin, ab, away from, and horreo, to shrink; originally, to shudder have the hair on end). To abhor is to have a natural antipathy, and to show it by shuddering with disgust.

Abiala

Wife of Makambi; African deities. She holds a pistol in her hand, and is greatly feared. Her aid is implored in sickness.

Abida

A god of the Kalmucks, who receives the souls of the dead at the moment of decease, and gives them permission to enter a new body, either human or not, and have another spell of life on earth. If the spirit is spotless it may, if it likes, rise and live in the air.

Abidharma

The book of metaphysics in the Tripitaka (q.v.).

Abigail

A lady's maid, or ladymaid. Abigail, wife of Nabal, who introduced herself to David and afterwards married him, is a well-known Scripture heroine (1 Sam. xxv 3). Abigail was a popular middle class Christian name in the seventeenth century. Beaumont and Fletcher, in The Scornful Lady, call the “waiting gentlewoman” Abigail, a name employed by Swift, Fielding, and others, in their novels. Probably “Abigail Hill” the original name of Mrs. Masham, waiting—woman to Queen Anne, popularised the name.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Abimelech is no proper name, but a regal title of the Philistines, meaning Father—King.

Able

An able seaman is a skilled seaman. Such a man is termed an A.B. (Able—Bodied); unskilled seamen are called “boys” without regard to age.

Able—bodied Seaman

A sailor of the first class. A crew is divided into three classes: (1) able seamen, or skilled sailors, termed A.B.; (2) ordinary seamen; and (3) boys, which include green—hands, or inexperienced men, without regard to age or size.

Aboard

He fell aboard of me — met me; abused me. A ship is said to fall aboard another when, being in motion it runs against the other.

To go aboard

is to embark, to go on the board or deck.

Aboard main tack is to draw one of the lower corners of the main—sail down to the chess—tree. Figuratively, it means “to keep to the point.”

Abolla

An ancient military garment worn by the Greeks and Romans, opposed to the toga or robe of peace. The abolla being worn by the lower orders, was affected by philosophers in the vanity of humility.

Abominate

(abominor, I pray that the omen may be averted; used on mentioning anything unlucky). As ill—omened things are disliked, so, by a simple figure of speech, what we dislike we consider ill—omened.

Abomination of Desolation

(The). The Roman standard is so called (Matt. xxiv. 15). As it was set up in the holy temple, it was an abomination; and, as it brought destruction, it was the “abomination of desolation.”

Abon Hassan

A rich merchant, transferred during sleep to the bed and palace of the Caliph

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Haroun—al—Raschid. Next morning he was treated as the caliph, and every effort was made to make him forget his identity. Arabian Nights ("The Sleeper Awakened"). The same trick was played on Christopher Sly, in the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy of Taming of the Shrew; and, according to Burton (Anatomy of Melancholy, ii. 2, 4), by Philippe the Good, Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleonora.

"Were I caliph for a day, as honest Abon Hassan, I would scourge me these jugglers out of the Commonwealth." — Sir Walter Scott.

Abonde

(Dame) The French Santa Claus, the good fairy who comes at night to bring toys to children while they sleep, especially on New Year's Day.

Abortive Flowers are those which have stamens but no pistils.

Abou ebn Sina

commonly called Avicenna. A great Persian physician, born at Shiraz, whose canons of medicine were those adopted by Hippocrates and Aristotle. Died 1037.

Abou—Bekr

called Father of the Virgin, i.e., Mahomet's favourite wife. He was the first caliph, and was founder of the sect called the Sunnites. (571—634.)

Abou Jahia

The angel of death in Mohammedan mythology. Called Azrael by the Arabs, and Mordad by the Persians.

Aboulomri

(in Mohammedan mythology). A fabulous bird of the vulture sort which lives 1,000 years. Called by the Persians Kerkes, and by the Turks Ak—Baba. — Herbelot.

Above properly applies only to matter on the same page, but has been extended to any previous part of the book, as See above, p. *.

Above—board

In a straightforward manner. Conjurers place their hands under the table when they are preparing their tricks, but above when they show them. "Let all be above—board" means "let there be no under—hand work, but let us see everything."

Above par

A commercial term meaning that the article referred to is more than its nominal value. Thus, if you must give more than #100, for a #100 share in a bank company, a railway share, or other stock, we say the stock is "above par."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

If, on the other hand, a nominal #100 worth can be bought for less than #100, we say the stock is “below par.”

Figuratively, a person in low spirits or ill health says he is “below par.”

Above your hook

— i.e., beyond your comprehension; beyond your mark. The allusion is to hat—pegs placed in rows; the higher rows are above the reach of small statures.

Abracadabra

A charm. It is said that Abracadabra was the supreme deity of the Assyrians. Q. Severus Sammonicus recommended the use of the word as a powerful antidote against ague, flux, and toothache. The word was to be written on parchment, and suspended round the neck by a linen thread, in the form given below: —

A B R A C A D A B R A

A B R A C A D A B R

A B R A C A D A B

A B R A C A D A

A B R A C A D

A B R A C A

A B R A C

A B R A

Abracax

also written Abraxas or Abrasax, in Persian mythology denotes the Supreme Being. In Greek notation it stands for 365. In Persian mythology Abracax presides over 365 impersonated virtues, one of which is supposed to prevail on each day of the year. In the second century the word was employed by the Basilidians for the deity; it was also the principle of the Gnostic hierarchy, and that from which sprang their numerous Æons. (See Abraxas Stones.)

Abraham

His parents. According to Mohammedan mythology, the parents of Abraham were Prince Azar and his wife, Adna.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

His infancy. As King Nimrod had been told that one shortly to be born would dethrone him, he commanded the death of all such; so Adna retired to a cave where Abraham was born. He was nourished by sucking two of her fingers, one of which supplied milk and the other honey.

His boyhood.

At the age of fifteen months he was equal in size to a lad of fifteen, and very wise; so his father introduced him to the court of King Nimrod. — Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale.

His offering.

According to Mohammedan tradition, the mountain on which Abraham offered up his son was Arfaday; but is more generally thought to have been Moriah.

His death.

The Ghebers say that Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod's order, but the flame turned into a bed of roses, on which the child Abraham went to sleep. — Tavernier.

“Sweet and welcome as the bed

For their own infant prophet spread,

When pitying Heaven to roses turned

The death—flames that beneath him burned.” T. Moore: Fire Worshippers.

To Sham Abraham.

To pretend illness or distress, in order to get off work. (See Abram—Man.)

“I have heard people say Sham Abram you may,

But must not Sham Abraham Newland.”

T. Dibdin

or Upton

Abraham Newland was cashier of the Bank of England, and signed the notes.

Abraham's Bosom

The repose of the happy in death (Luke xvi.22). The figure is taken from the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline at dinner on your bosom. Thus the beloved John reclined on the bosom of Jesus.

There is no leaping from Delilah's lap into Abraham's bosom — i.e.

, those who live and die in notorious sin must not expect to go to heaven at death. — Boston: Crook in the Lot.

Abraham Newland

(An). A banknote. So called because, in the early part of the nineteenth century, none were genuine but those signed by this name.

Abrahamic Covenant

The covenant made by God with Abraham, that Messiah should spring from his seed. This promise was given to Abraham, because he left his country and father's house to live in a strange land, as God told him.

Abrahamites

(4 syl.) Certain Bohemian deists, so called because they professed to believe what Abraham believed before he was circumcised. The sect was forbidden by the Emperor Joseph II. in 1783.

Abram—colour

Probably a corruption of Abron, meaning auburn. Halliwell quotes the following from Coriolanus, ii. 3: "Our heads are some brown, some black, some Abram, some bald." And again, "Where is the eldest son of Priam, the Abram—coloured Trojan?" "A goodly, long, thick Abram—coloured beard." — Blurt, Master Constable.

Hall, in his Satires, iii. 5, uses abron for auburn. "A lusty courtier ... with abron locks was fairly furnishèd."

Abram—Man or Abraham Cove. A Tom o' Bedlam; a naked vagabond; a begging impostor.

The Abraham Ward, in Bedlam, had for its inmates begging lunatics, who used to array themselves "with party—coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox—tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers," and beg alms; but "for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along." — Canting Academy.

See King Lear, ii. 3.

In Beaumont and Fletcher we have several synonyms: —

"And these, what name or title e'er they bear,

Jackman or Patrico, Cranke or Clapper—dudgeon

, Fraier or Abram—man, I speak to all." Beggar's Bush, ii. 1.

Abraxas Stones

Stones with the word Abraxas engraved on them, and used as talismans. They were cut into symbolic forms combining a fowl's head, a serpent's body, and human limbs. (See Abracax.)

Abreast

Side by side, the breasts being all in a line.

The ships were all abreast — i.e.

, their heads were all equally advanced, as soldiers marching abreast.

Abridge

is not formed from the word bridge; but comes from the Latin abbreviare, to shorten, from brevis (short), through the French abrégé (to shorten).

Abroach

To set mischief abroach is to set it afoot. The figure is from a cask of liquor, which is broached that the liquor may be drawn from it. (Fr., brocher, to prick, abrocher.)

Abroad

You are all abroad. Wide of the mark; not at home with the subject. Abroad, in all directions.

“An elm displays her dusky arms abroad.” Dryden.

Abrogate

When the Roman senate wanted a law to be passed, they asked the people to give their votes in its favour. The Latin for this is rogare legem (to solicit or propose a law). If they wanted a law repealed, they asked the people to vote against it; this was abrogare legem (to solicit against the law).

Absalom

James, Duke of Monmouth, the handsome but rebellious son of Charles II. in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1649—1685).

Absalom and Achitophel

A political satire by Dryden (1649—1685). David is meant for Charles II.; Absalom for his natural son James, Duke of Monmouth, handsome like Absalom, and, like him, rebellious. Achitophel is meant for Lord Shaftesbury, Zimri for the Duke of Buckingham, and Abdael for Monk. The selections are so skilfully made that the history of David seems repeated. Of Absalom, Dryden says (Part i.): —

“Whatever he did was done with so much ease,

In him alone 'twas natural to please;

His motions all accompanied with grace,

And paradise was opened in his face.”

Abscond

means properly to hide; but we generally use the word in the sense of stealing off secretly from an employer. (Latin, abscondo.)

Absent “Out of mind as soon as out of sight.” Generally misquoted “Out of sight, out of mind.” — Lord Brooke.

The absent are always wrong.

The translation of the French proverb, Les absents ont toujours tort.

Absent Man

(The). The character of Bruyère's Absent Man, translated in the Spectator and exhibited on the stage, is a caricature of Comte de Brancas.

Absolute

A Captain Absolute, a bold, despotic man, determined to have his own way. The character is in Sheridan's play called The Rivals.

Sir Anthony Absolute

, a warm—hearted, testy, overbearing country squire, in the same play. William Dowton (1764—1851) was nick—named “Sir Anthony Absolute.”

Absquatulate

To run away or abscond. A comic American word, from ab and squat (to go away from your squatting). A squatting is a tenement taken in some unclaimed part, without purchase or permission. The persons who take up their squatting are termed squatters.

Abstemious

according to Fabius and Aulus Gellius, is compounded of abs and temetum. “Temetum” was a strong, intoxicating drink, allied to the Greek methu (strong drink).

Vinum prisca lingua temetum appellabant.” — Aulus Gellius, x. 23.

Abstract Numbers

are numbers considered abstractly — 1, 2, 3; but if we say 1 year, 2 feet, 3 men, etc., the numbers are no longer abstract, but concrete.

Taken in the abstract.

Things are said to be taken in the abstract when they are considered absolutely, that is, without reference to other matters or persons. Thus, in the abstract, one man is as good as another, but not so socially and politically.

Abstraction

An empty Abstraction, a mere ideality, of no practical use. Every noun is an abstraction, but the narrower genera may be raised to higher ones, till the common thread is so fine that hardly anything is left. These high abstractions, from which everything but one common cord is taken, are called empty abstractions.

For example, man is a genus, but may be raised to the genus animal, thence to organised being, thence to created being, thence to matter in the abstract, and so on, till everything but one is emptied out.

Absurd

means strictly, quite deaf. (Latin, ab, intensive, and surdus, deaf.)

Reduction ad absurdum.

Proving a proposition to be right by showing that every supposable deviation from it would involve an absurdity.

Abudah

A merchant of Bagdad, haunted every night by an old hag; he finds at last that the way to rid himself of this torment is to “fear God, and keep his commandments.” — Tales of the Genii.

“Like Abudah, he is always looking out for the Fury, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable hag with it.” — Thackeray.

Abundant Number

(An). A number such that the sum of all its divisors (except itself) is greater than the number itself. Thus 12 is an abundant number, because its divisors, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 = 16, which is greater than 12.

A Deficient number is one of which the sum of all its divisors is less than itself, as 10, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 5 = 8, which is less than 10.

A Perfect number is one of which the sum of all its divisors exactly measures itself, as 6, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 3 = 6.

Abus the river Humber.

“For by the river that whylome was hight

The ancien Abus ... [was from]

Their chieftain, Humber, named aright.”

And Drayton, in his Polyolbion, 28, says: —

“For my princely name.

From Humber, king of Huns, as anciently it came.” See Geoffrey's Chronicles, Bk. ii. 2.

Abyla

A mountain in Africa, opposite Gibraltar. This, with Calpe in Spain, 16 m. distant, forms the pillars of Hercules.

Heaves up huge Abyla on Afric's sand,

Crowns with high Calpe Europe's salient strand.”

Darwin: Economy of Vegetation.

Abyssinians

A sect of Christians in Abyssinia, who admit only one nature in Jesus Christ, and reject the Council of Chalcedon.

Acacetus

One who does nothing badly. It was a name given to Mercury or Hermes for his eloquence. (Greek, a, not, kakos, bad.)

Academics

The followers of Plato were so called, because they attended his lectures in the Academy, a garden planted by Academos.

“See there the olive grove of Academus, Plato's retreat.” Milton: Paradise Lost, Book iv.

Academy

Divided into — Old, the philosophic teaching of Plato and his immediate followers; Middle, a modification of the Platonic system, taught by Arcesilaos; New, the half—sceptical school of Carneades.

Plato taught that matter is eternal and infinite, but without form or order; and that there is an intelligent cause, the author of everything. He maintained that we could grasp truth only so far as we had elevated our mind by thought to its divine essence.

Arcesilaos was the great antagonist of the Stoics, and wholly denied man's capacity for grasping truth.

Carneades maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding could supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

The talent of the Academy, so Plato called Aristotle (B.C. 384—322).

Academy Figures

Drawings in black and white chalk, on tinted paper, from living models, used by artists. So called from the Royal Academy of Artists.

Acadia

— i.e., Nova Scotia, so called by the French from the river Shubenacadie. The name was changed in 1621. In 1755 the old French inhabitants were driven into exile by order of George II.

“Thus dwelt together in love those simple Acadian farmers.” Longfellow: Evangeline.

Acadine A fountain of Sicily which revealed if writings were authentic and genuine or not. The writings to be tested were thrown into the fountain, and if spurious they sank to the bottom. Oaths and promises were tried in the same way, after being written down. — Diodorus Siculus.

Acanthus

The leafy ornament used in the capitals of Corinthian and composite columns. It is said that Callimachos lost his daughter, and set a basket of flowers on her grave, with a tile to keep the wind from blowing it away. The next time he went to visit the grave an acanthus had sprung up around the basket, which so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design in his buildings.

Acceptance

A bill or note accepted. This is done by the drawee writing on it “accepted,” and signing his name. The person who accepts it is called the “acceptor.”

Accessory

Accessory before the fact is one who is aware that another intends to commit an offence, but is himself absent when the offence is perpetrated.

Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon, aids him in eluding justice, or helps him in any way to profit by his crime. Thus, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Accident

A logical accident is some property or quality which a thing possesses, but which does not essentially belong to it, as the tint of our skin, the height of our body, the redness of a brick, or the whiteness of paper. If any of these were changed, the substance would remain intact.

Accidental or Subjective Colours

Those which depend on the state of our eye, and not those which the object really possesses. Thus, after looking at the bright sun, all objects appear dark; that dark colour is the accidental colour of the bright sun. When, again, we come from a dark room, all objects at first have a yellow tinge. This is especially the case if we wear blue glasses, for a minute or two after we have taken them off.

The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, of black white; and the converse.

Accidentals

in music are those sharps and flats, etc., which do not properly belong to the key in which the music is set, but which the composer arbitrarily introduces.

Accidente!

(4 syl.) An Italian curse or oath: “Ce qui veut dire en bon francais, “Puisses—tu mourir d'accident, sans confession,” damné.” — E. About: Tolla.

Accidents

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

in theology. After consecration, say the Catholics, the substance of the bread and wine is changed into that of the body and blood of Christ, but their accidents (flavour, appearance, and so on) remain the same as before.

Accius Navius

A Roman augur in the reign of Tarquin the Elder. When he forbade the king to increase the number of the tribes without consulting the augurs, Tarquin asked him if the thought then in his mind was feasible. "Undoubtedly," said Accius. "Then cut through this whetstone with the razor in your hand." The priest gave a bold cut, and the block fell in two. This story (from Livy, Bk. i., chap. 36) is humorously retold in Bon Gaultier's Ballads.

Accolade

(3 syl.) The touch of a sword on the shoulder in the ceremony of conferring knighthood; originally an embrace or touch by the hand on the neck. (Latin, ad collum, on the neck.)

Accommodation

A loan of money, which accommodates us, or fits a want.

Accommodation Note or Bill. An acceptance given on a Bill of Exchange for which value has not been received by the acceptor from the drawer, and which, not representing a commercial transaction, is so far fictitious.

Accommodation Ladder.

The light ladder hung over the side of a ship at the gangway.

Accord

means "heart to heart." (Latin, ad corda.) If two persons like and dislike the same things, they are heart to heart with each other.

Similarly, "con—cord" heart with heart; "dis—cord," heart divided from heart; "re—cord" properly means to recollect — i.e., re—cordare, to bring again to the mind or heart; then to set down in writing for the purpose of recollecting.

Accost

means to "come to the side" of a person for the purpose of speaking to him. (Latin, ad costam, to the side.)

Account

To open an account, to enter a customer's name on your ledger for the first time. (Latin, accomputare, to reckon with.)

To keep open account is when merchants agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

A current account

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or account current, a/c. A commercial term, meaning that the customer is entered by name in the creditor's ledger for goods purchased but not paid for at the time. The account runs on for a month or more, according to agreement.

To cast accounts.

To give the results of the debits and credits entered, balancing the two, and carrying over the surplus.

A sale for the account in the Stock Exchange means: the sale of stock not for immediate payment, but for the fortnightly settlement. Generally this is speculative, and the broker or customer pays the difference of price between the time of purchase and time of settlement.

We will give a good account of them

— i.e. we will give them a thorough good drubbing

Accurate

means well and carefully done. (Latin, ad—curare, accuratus.)

Accusative

(The) Calvin was so called by his college companions. We speak of an “accusative age,” meaning searching, one eliminating error by accusing it.

“This hath been a very accusative age.” — Sir E. Dering.

Ace

(1 syl.) The unit of cards or dice, from as, the Latin unit of weight. (Italian, asso; French and Spanish, as.)

Within an ace.

Within a shave. An ace is the lowest numeral, and he who wins within an ace, wins within a single mark. (See Ambes—As.)

To bate an ace

is to make an abatement, or to give a competitor some start or other advantage, in order to render the combatants more equal. It said that the expression originated in the reign of Henry VIII., when one of the courtiers named Bolton, in order to flatter the king, used to say at cards, “Your Majesty must bate me an ace, or I shall have no chance at all.” Taylor, the water poet (1580—1654), speaking of certain women, says —

“Though bad they be, they will not bate an ace

To be cald Prudence, Temprance, Faith, and Grace.”

Acelanda A battle—field a place where much blood has been shed. To the south of Jerusalem there was a field so called; it was purchased by the priests with the blood—money thrown down by Judas, and appropriated as a cemetery for strangers (Matt. XXVII. 8; Acts 1. 19). (Aramaic, okel—dama.)

Accephalites

(4 syl.) properly means men without a head. (1) A fraction among the Eutychians in the fifth century after the submission of Mongus their chief, by which they were “deprived of their head.” (2) Certain bishops exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. (3) A sect of levellers in the reign of Henry I., who acknowledged no leader. (4) The fabulous Blemmyes of Africa, who are described as having no head, their eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere. (Greek, a—kephale, without a head.)

Acestes

(3 syl.) The Arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestes, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire. (Æ. 5, line 525.)

“Like Acestes' shaft of old,

The swift thought kindles as it flies.”

Longfellow.

Achæan League

A confederacy of the twelve towns of Achæa. It was broken up by Alexander the Great, but was again reorganised B.C. 280, and dissolved by the Romans in 147 B.C.

Achar

in Indian philosophy means the All—in—All. The world is spun out of Achar as a web from a spider, and will ultimately return to him, as a spider sometimes takes back into itself its own thread. Phenomena are not independent realities, but merely partial and individual manifestations of the All—in—All.

Achates

(3 syl.) A fidus Achates. A faithful companion, a bosom friend. Achates in Virgil's Æneid is the chosen companion of the hero in adventures of all kinds.

“He has chosen this fellow for his fidus Achates.” — Sir Walter Scott or Achmon, and his brother Basalas were two Cercopes for ever quarrelling. One day they saw Hercules asleep under a tree and insulted him, but Hercules tied them by their feet to his club and walked off with them, heads downwards, like a brace of hares. Everyone laughed at the sight, and it became a proverbial cry among the Greeks, when two men were seen quarelling — “Look out for Melampygos!” (i.e. Hercules).

Achemon

“Ne insidas in Melampygum.”

According to Greek fable, monkeys are degraded men. The Cercopes were changed into monkeys for attempting to deceive Zeus.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Acheron

The “River of Sorrows” (Greek, achos roös); one of the five rivers of the infernal regions.

“Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep.” Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 578.

Pabulum Acherontis.

Food for the churchyard; said of a dead body.

Acherontian Books

The most celebrated books of augury in the world. They are the books which the Etruscans received from Tages, grandson of Jupiter.

Acherusia

A cavern on the borders of Pontus, said to lead down to the infernal regions. It was through this cavern that Hercules dragged Cerberus to earth.

Achillea The Yarrow, called by the French the herbe aux charpentiers — i.e., carpenter's wort, because it was supposed to heal wounds made by carpenters' tools. Called Achillea from Achilles, who was taught the uses and virtues of plants by Chiron the centaur. The tale is, that when the Greeks invaded Troy, Telephus, a son—in—law of King Priam, attempted to stop their landing; but Bacchus —caused him to stumble over a vine, and, when he had fallen, Achilles wounded him with his spear. The young Trojan was told by an oracle that “Achilles (meaning milfoil or yarrow) would cure the wound;” but, instead of seeking the plant, he applied to the Grecian chief, and promised to conduct the host to Troy if he would cure the wound. Achilles consented to do so, scraped some rust from his spear, and from the filings rose the plant milfoil, which, being applied to the wound, had the desired effect.

Achilles

(3 syl.) King of the Myrmidons (in Thessaly), the hero of Homer's epic poem called the Iliad. He is represented as brave and relentless. The poem begins with a quarrel between him and Agamemnon, the commander in chief of the allied Greeks: in consequence of which Achilles refused to go to battle. The Trojans prevail, and Achilles sends forth his friend Patroclos to oppose them. Patroclos fell; and Achilles, in anger, rushing into the battle killed Hector, the commander of the Trojans. He himself, according to later poems, fell in battle a few days afterwards, before Troy was taken.

Achilles

Army: The Myrmidons followed him to Troy.

Death of:

It was Paris who wounded Achilles in the heel with an arrow (a post—Homericstory).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Hippodamia, surnamed Briseis (2 syl.). Mother: Thetis, a sea goddess.

Son:

Pyrrhos, surnamed Neoptolemos (= the new warrior). Tomb: In Sigoeum, over which no bird ever flies. — Pliny. x. 29. Tutors: First, Phoenix, who taught him the elements; then Chiron the centaur. Wife: Deidamia. (5 syl.) De—i—da—my'—ah.

Achilles

(pronounce A—kil—leez). The English, John Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury (1373—1453).

Achilles

of England, the Duke of Wellington (1769—1852).

Of Germany,

Albert, Elector of Brandenburg (1414—1486).

Of Lombardy,

brother of Sforza and Palamedes. All the three brothers were in the allied army of Godfrey (Jerusalem Delivered). Achilles of Lombardy was slain by Corinna. This was not a complimentary title, but a proper name.

Of Rome,

Lucius Sicinius Dentatus, the Roman tribune; also called the Second Achilles. Put to death B.C. 450.

Achilles of the West

Roland the Paladin; also called “The Christian Theseus” (2 syl.).

Achilles' Spear

(See Achillea.)

Achilles' Tendon

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. The tale is that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel covered with his mother's hand. It was on this vulnerable point the hero was slain; and the sinew of the heel is called, in consequence, tendo Achillis. A post—Homeric story

The Heel of Achilles.

The vulnerable or weak point in a man's character or of a nation. (See above.)

Aching Void

(An). That desolation of heart which arises from the recollection of some cherished endearment no longer possessed.

“What peaceful hours I once enjoyed!

How sweet their memory still!

But they have left an aching void

The world can never fill.”

Cowper: Walking with God.

Achitophel

(See Absalom and Achitophel.) Achitophel was David's traitorous counsellor, who deserted to Absalom; but his advice being disregarded, he hanged himself (2 Sam. xv.). The Achitophel of Dryden's satire was the Earl of Shaftesbury: —

Of these (the rebels) the false Achitophel was first;

A name to all succeeding ages curst;

For close designs and crooked counsels fit;

Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;

Restless, unfixed in principles and place;

In power displeas'd, impatient in disgrace.”

Part i. 150—5.

Achor

God of flies, worshipp'd by the Cyreneans, that they might not be annoy'd with these tiny tormentors. (See Flies, God of.)

Acis

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Acre

“God's acre,” a cemetery or churchyard. The word “acre,” Old English, æccer, is akin to the Latin ager and German acker (a field).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Acre—fight

A duel in the open field. The combats of the Scotch and English borderers were so called.

Acre—shot A land tax. “Acre” is Old English, æcer (land), and “shot” is scot or sceat (a tax).

Acres

A Bob Acres — i.e., a coward. From Sheridan's comedy called The Rivals. His courage always “oozed out at his fingers' ends.”

Acroamatics

Esoteric lectures; the lectures of Aristotle, which none but his chosen disciples were allowed to attend. Those given to the public generally were called exoteric. (Acroamatic is a Greek word, meaning delivered to an audience, to attend lectures.)

Acroatic

Same as esoteric. (See Acroamatics.)

Acrobat means one who goes on his extremities, or uses only the tips of his fingers and toes in moving about. (It is from the two Greek words, akros baino, to go on the extremities of one's limbs.)

Acropolis

The citadel of ancient Athens.

Of course, the word is compounded of akros and polis = the city on the height, i.e., the high rock

Acrostic

(Greek, akros stichos) The term was first applied to the verses of the Erythræan sibyl, written on leaves. These prophecies were excessively obscure, but were so contrived that when the leaves were sorted and laid in order, their initial letters always made a word. — Dionys., iv. 62.

Acrostic poetry

among the Hebrews consisted of twenty—two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession, as Psalm cxix., etc.

Acrostics

Puzzles, generally in verse, consisting of two words of equal length The initial letters of the several lines constitute one of the secret words, and the final letters constitute the other word.

Also words re—arranged so as to make other words of similar significance, as “Horatio Nelson” re—arranged into Honor est a Nilo. Another form of acrostic is to find a sentence which reads the same backwards and forwards, as E.T.L.N.L.T.E., the initial letters of “Eat To Live, Never Live To Eat;” which in Latin would be,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

E.U.V.N.V.U.E. (Ede Ut Vivas, Ne Vivas Ut Edas).

Act

and Opponency An “Act,” in our University language, consists of a thesis and “disputation” thereon, covering continuous parts of three hours. The person “disputing” with the “keeper of the Act” is called the “opponent,” and his function is called an “opponency.” In some degrees the student is required to keep his Act, and then to be the opponent of another disputant. Much alteration in these matters has been introduced of late, with other college reforms.

Act of Faith

(auto da fé) in Spain, is a day set apart by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of those who renounce their heretical doctrines. The sentence of the Inquisition is also so called; and so is the ceremony of burning, or otherwise torturing the condemned.

Act of God

(An) “Damnum fatale,” such as loss by lightning, shipwreck, fire, etc.; loss arising from fatality, and not from one's own fault, theft, and so on. A Devonshire jury once found a verdict — “That deceased died by the act of God, brought about by the flooded condition of the river.”

Actæon

A hunter. In Grecian mythology Actæon was a huntsman, who surprised Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag, and torn to pieces by his own hounds. Hence, a man whose wife is unfaithful. (See Horns.)

“Go thou, like Sir Actæon, with Ringwood at thy heel.” Shakespeare: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Action Years

Years in which the Action games were celebrated. Augustus instituted games at Actium to celebrate his naval victory over Antony. They were held every five years.

Action Sermon

A sacramental sermon (in the Scots Presbyterian Church).

“I returned home about seven, and addressed myself towards my Action Sermon, Mrs. Olivant.” — E. Irving.

Active

Active verbs, verbs which act on the noun governed.

Active capital.

Property in actual employment in a given concern.

Active Commerce.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Exports and imports carried to and fro in our own ships. Passive commerce is when they are carried in foreign vessels. The commerce of England is active, of China passive.

Activity

The sphere of activity, the whole field through which the influence of an object or person extends.

Acton

A taffeta, or leather—quilted dress, worn under the habergeon to keep the body from being chafed or bruised. (French, hocqueton.)

Actresses

Female characters used to be played by boys. Coryat, in his Crudities (1611), says, “When I went to a theatre (in Venice) I observed certain things that I never saw before; for I saw women acte. ... I have heard that it hath sometimes been used in London” (Vol. ii.).

“Whereas, women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men in the habits of women ... we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women's parts be acted by women, 1662.” — Charles II.

The first female actress on the English stage was Mrs. Coleman (1656), who played Ianthe in the Siege of Rhodes.

The last male actor that took the part of a woman on the English stage, in serious drama, was Edward Kynaston, noted for his beauty (1619—1687).

Acu tetigisti

You have hit the nail on the head. (Lit., you have touched it with a needle.) Plautus (Rudens, v 2, 19) says, “Rem acu tetigisti;” and Cicero (Pro Milone, 24) has “Vulnus acu punctum,” evidently referring to a surgeon's probe.

Acutiator

A person in the Middle Ages who attended armies and knights to sharpen their instruments of war. (Latin, acuo, to sharpen.)

Ad Græcas Calendas.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Ad rem (Latin) To the point in hand; to the purpose. (Acu rem tetigisti.) (See above, Acu.)

Ad unum omnes

All to a man (Latin).

Ad valorem

According to the price charged. Some custom — duties vary according to the different values of the goods imported. Thus, at one time teas paid duty ad valorem, the high—priced tea paying more duty than that of a lower price.

Ad vitam aut culpam

A Latin phrase, used in Scotch law, to indicate the legal permanency of an appointment, unless forfeited by misconduct.

Adam

The Talmudists say that Adam lived in Paradise only twelve hours, and account for the time thus: —

The first hour, God collected the dust and animated it.

The second hour, Adam stood on his feet.

The fourth hour, he named the animals.

The sixth hour, he slept and Eve was created.

The seventh hour, he married the woman.

The tenth hour, he fell.

The twelfth hour, he was thrust out of Paradise.

The Mohammedans tell us he fell on Mount Serendib, in Ceylon, where there is a curious impression in the granite resembling a human foot, above 5 feet long and 2.5; feet broad. They tell us it was made by Adam, who stood there on one foot for 200 years to expiate his crime; when Gabriel took him to Mount Arafath, where he found Eve. (See Adam's Peak.)

Adam was buried

, according to Arabian tradition, on Aboucais, a mountain of Arabia.

Adam

The old Adam; beat the offending Adam out of thee; the first Adam. Adam, as the head of unredeemed man, stands for “original sin” or “man without regenerating grace.”

The second Adam; the new Adam, etc.; I will give you the new Adam

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

. Jesus Christ, as the covenant head, is so called; also the “new birth unto righteousness.”

When Adam delved and Eve span

“Au temps passé, Berthe filait.” This Bertha was the wife of King Pepin.

When Adam delved and Eve span

Who was then the gentleman?”

Adam.

A sergeant, bailiff, or any one clad in buff, or a skin—coat, like Adam.

“Not that Adam that kept Paradise, but that Adam that keeps the prison.” — Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iv. 3.

A faithful Adam.

A faithful old servant. The character is taken from Shakespeare's comedy of As you like it, where a retainer of that name, who had served the family sixty—three years, offer to accompany Orlando in his flight and to share with him his thrifty savings of 500 crowns.

Adam Bell A northern outlaw, whose name has become a synonym for a good archer. (See Clym of the Clough)

Adam Cupid

— i.e., Archer Cupid, perhaps with allusion to Adam Bell, the celebrated archer. (See Percy's Reliques, vol. i., p. 7.)

Adam's Ale

Water as a beverage; from the supposition that Adam had nothing but water to drink. In Scotland water for a beverage is called Adam's Wine.

Adam's Apple

The protuberance in the fore—part of a man's throat; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit which Adam ate stuck in his throat, and occasioned the swelling.

Adam's Needle.

The yucca, so called because it is sharp—pointed like a needle.

Adam's Peak

in Ceylon, is where the Arabs say Adam bewailed his expulsion from Paradise, and stood on one foot till God forgave him. It was the Portuguese who first called it “Pico de Adam.” (See Kaaba)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In the granite is the mark of a human foot, above 5 feet long by 2.5; broad, said to have been made by Adam, who, we are told, stood there on one foot for 200 years, to expiate his crime. After his penance he was restored to Eve. The Hindus assert that the footprint is that made by Buddha when he ascended to heaven.

Adam's Profession

Gardening, agriculture. Adam was appointed by God to dress the garden of Eden, and to keep it (Gen. ii. 15); and after the fall he was sent out of the garden "to till the ground" (Gen. iii. 23).

"There is no ancient gentlemen, but gardeners, ditchers, and grave—makers; they hold up Adam's profession." — The Clown in "Hamlet," v. 1.

Adams

Parson Adams, the ideal of a benevolent, simple—minded, eccentric country clergyman; ignorant of the world, bold as a lion for the truth, and modest as a girl. The character is in Fielding's novel of Joseph Andrews.

Adamant

is really the mineral corundum; but the word is indifferently used for rock crystal, diamond, or any hard substance, and also for the magnet or loadstone. It is often used by poet for no specific substance, but as hardness or firmness in the abstract. Thus, Virgil, in his Æneid vi. 552, speaks of "adamantine pillars" merely to express solid and strong ones; and Milton frequently uses the word in the same way. Thus, in Paradise Lost, ii. 436, he says the gates of hell were made of burning adamant:

"This huge convex of fire

Outrageous to devour, immures us round

Ninefold, and gates of burning adamant

Barred over us prohibit all egress."

Satan, he tells us, wore adamantine armour (Book vi. 110):

"Satan, with vast and haughty strides advanced,

Came towering, armed in adamant and gold."

And a little further on he tells us his shield was made of adamant (vi. 255):

"He [Satan] hasted, and opposed the rocky orb

Of ten—fold adamant, his ample shield

A vast circumference."

Tasso (canto vii. 82) speaks of Scudo di lucidissimo diamante (a shield of clearest diamond).

Other poets make adamant to mean the magnet. Thus, in Troilus and Cresida, iii. 2:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

As true as steel, as plantage to the moon,

As sun to day, as turtle to her mate,

As iron to adamant.”

(“Plantage to the moon,” from the notion that plants grew best with the increasing moon.)

And Green says:

As true to thee as steel to adamant.”

So, in the Arabian Nights, the “Third Calendar,” we read:

To—morrow about noon we shall be near the black mountain, or mine of adamant, which at this very minute draws all your fleet towards it, by virtue of the iron in your ships.”

Adamant is a (negative) and damao (to conquer). Pliny tells us there are six unbreakable stones (xxxvii. 15), but the classical adamas (gen. adamant—is) is generally supposed to mean the diamond. Diamond and adamant are originally the same word.

Adamastor

The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope), described by Camoëns in the Lusiad as a hideous phantom. According to Barreto, he was one of the giants who invaded heaven.

Adamic Covenant

The covenant made with God to Adam, that “the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head” (Gen. iii. 15).

Adamites

(3 syl.) A sect of fanatics who spread themselves over Bohemia and Moravia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. One Picard, of Bohemia, was the founder in 1400, and styled himself “Adam, son of God.” He professed to recall his followers to the state of primitive innocence. No clothes were worn, wives were in common, and there was no such thing as good and evil, but all actions were indifferent.

Adaran

according to the Parsee superstition, is a sacred fire less holy than that called Behram (q.v.).

Adays

Nowadays, at the present time (or day). So in Latin, Nunc dierum and Nunc temporis. The prefix “a”= at, of, or on. Similarly, anights, of late, on Sundays. All used adverbially.

Addison of the North

— i.e., Henry Mackenzie, the author of the Man of Feeling (1745—1831).

Addixit

or Addixerunt (Latin). All right. The word uttered by the augurs when the “birds” were favourable.

Addle

is the Old English adela (filth), hence rotten, putrid, worthless.

Addled egg, better “addle—egg,” a worthless egg. An egg which has not the vital principle.

Addle—headed, addle—pate, empty headed. As an addle—egg produces no living bird, so an addle—pate lack brains.

Addle Parliament (The)

— 5th April to 7th June, 1614. So called because it did not pass one single measure. (See Parliament.)

Adelantado

A big—wig, the great boss of the place. It is a Spanish word for “his excellency” (adelantar, to excel), and is given to the governor of a province.

“Open no door. If the adelantado of Spain were here he should not enter.” — Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour, v. 4.

Ademar

or Ademaro (in Jerusalem Delivered). Archbishop of Poggio, an ecclesiastical warrior, who with William, Archbishop of Orange, besought Pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent on the crusade. He took 400 armed men from Poggio, but they sneaked off during a drought, and left the crusade (Book xiii.). Ademar was not alive at the time, he had been slain at the attack on Antioch by Clorinda (Book xi.); but in the final attack on Jerusalem, his spirit came with three squadrons of angels to aid the besiegers (Book xviii.).

Adept

properly means one who has attained (from the Latin, adeptus, participle of adipiscor). The alchemists applied the term vere adeptus, to those persons who professed to have “attained to the knowledge of” the elixir of life or of the philosopher's stone.

Alchemists tell us there are always 11 adepts, neither more nor less. Like the sacred chickens of Compostella, of which there are only 2 and always 2 — a cock and a hen.

In Rosicrucian lore as learn'd

As he that vere adeptus earn'd.”

S. Butler: Hudibras.

Adessenarians

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A term applied to those who hold the real presence of Christ's body in the eucharist, but do not maintain that the bread and wine lose any of their original properties. (The word is from the Latin adesse, to be present.)

Adeste Fideles

Composed by John Reading, who wrote "Dulcè Domum." It is called the "Portuguese Hymn," from being heard at the Portuguese Chapel by the Duke of Leeds, who supposed it to be a part of the usual Portuguese service.

Adfiliate, Adfiliation

The ancient Goths adopted the children of a former marriage, and put them on the same footing as those of the new family. (Latin, ad—filius, equal to a real son.)

Adha

al (the slit—eared). The swiftest of Mahomet's camels.

Adhab—al—Cabre

The first purgatory of the Mahometans.

Adiaphorists

Followers of Melancthon; moderate Lutherans, who hold that some of the dogmas of Luther are matters of indifference. (Greek, adiaphoros, indifferent.)

Macaulay:

Essay, Burleigh.

Adieu

good—bye. A Dieu, an elliptical form for I commend you to God. Good—bye is God be with ye.

Adissechen

The serpent with a thousand heads which sustains the universe. (Indian mythology.)

Adjective Colours

are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Adjourn

Once written ajorn. French, à—journer, to put off to another day.

"He ajorned tham to relie in the North of Garlele." — Longtoft: Chronicle, p.309.

Adjournment of the House

(See Moving the Adjournment.)

Admirable

(The) Aben—Ezra, a Spanish rabbi born at Toledo (1119—1174).

Admirable Crichton

(The) James Crichton (kry—ton). (1551—1573.)

Admirable Doctor

(Doctor admirabilis). Roger Bacon (1214—1292).

Admiral

corruption of Amir—al. Milton, speaking of Satan, says: —

“His spear (to equal which the tallest pine

Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast

Of some tall amiral, were but a wand)

He walked with.”

Paradise Lost

, i. 292.

The word was introduced by the Turks or Genoese in the twelfth century, and is the Arabic Amir with the article al (lord or commander); as Amir—al—ma (commander of the water), Amir—al—Omra (commander of the forces), Amir—al—Muminim (commander of the faithful).

English admirals used to be of three classes, according to the colour of their flag —

Admiral of the Red,

used to hold the centre in an engagement. Admiral of the White, used to hold the van.

Admiral of the Blue,

used to hold the rear.

The distinction was abolished in 1864; now all admirals carry the white flag.

Admirals are called Flag Officers.

Admiral of the Blue

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A butcher who dresses in blue to conceal blood—stains. A tapster also is so called, from his blue apron. A play on the rear—admiral of the British navy, called “Admiral of the Blue (Flag).”

“As soon as customers begin to stir

The Admiral of the Blue cries, “Coming, Sir.”

Poor Robin, 1731

Admiral of the Red

A punning term applied to a wine—bibber whose face and nose are very red.

Admittance

Licence. Shakespeare says. “Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance” — i.e., to whom great freedom is allowed (Merry Wives, ii.2). The allusion is to an obsolete custom called admission, by which a prince avowed another prince to be under his protection. Maximilian, Emperor of Mexico, was the “admittant” of the Emperor Napoleon III.

Admonitionists

or Admonitioners Certain Puritans who in 1571 sent an admonition to the Parliament condemning everything in the Church of England which was not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Adolpha

Daughter of General Kleiner, governor of Prague and wife of Idenstein.

Her only fault was “excess of too sweet nature, which ever made another's grief her own.” — Knowles: Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Adonai

Son of the star—beam and god of light among the Rosicrucians. One of the names given by the Jews to Jehovah, for fear of breaking the command, “Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord [Jehovah] thy God in vain.”

Adonais

(4 syl.) The song about Adonis; Shelley's elegy on Keats is so called. See Bion's Lament for Adonis.

Adonies

Feasts of Adonis, celebrated in Assyria, Alexandria, Egypt, Judea, Persia, Cyprus, and all Greece, for eight days. Lucian gives a long description of them. In these feasts wheat, flowers, herbs, fruits, and branches of trees were carried in procession, and thrown into the sea or some fountain.

Adonis

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A beautiful boy. The allusion is to Adonis, who was beloved by Venus, and was killed by a boar while hunting.

“Rose—cheeked Adonis hied him to the chase;

Hunting he loved; but love he laughed to scorn.

Sick—thoughted Venus makes amain unto him,

And, like a bold—faced suitor, gins to woo him.”

Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

Adonis of 50

Leigh Hunt was sent to prison for applying this term to George IV when Regent.

Adonis Flower

(The) according to Blon, is the rose; Pliny (i. 23) says it is the anemone; others say it is the field, poppy, certainly the prince of weeds; but what we now generally mean by the Adonis flower is pheasant's eye, called in French goute—de—sang, because in fable it sprang from the blood of the gored hunter.

“(Blood brings forth roses, tears anemone.) — Bion: Elegy on Adonis. See also Ovid: Metamorphoses, Bk. x., Fable 15.)

Adonis Garden

or A garden of Adonis (Greek). A worthless toy; a very perishable good. The allusion is to the fennel and lettuce jars of the ancient Greeks, called “Adonis gardens,” because these herbs were planted in them for the annual festival of the young huntsman, and thrown away the next morning. (1 Henry VI., i. 6.)

Adonis River

A river in Phoenicia, which always runs red at the season of the year when the feast of Adonis is held. The legend ascribes this redness to sympathy with the young hunter; others ascribe it to a sort of minimum, or red earth, which mixes with the water.

Thammuz came next behind,

Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured

The Syrian damsels to lament his fate

In amorous ditties all a summer's day,

While smooth Adonis from his native rock

Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood

Of Thammuz yearly wounded.”

Milton: Paradise Lost

, Book 1, line 445, etc.

Adonists

Those Jews who maintain that the proper vowels of the word Jehovah are unknown, and that the word is never to be pronounced Adonai. (Hebrew, adon, lord.)

Adoption

Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which laid him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism.

Being godfather or godmother to a child. The child by baptism is your godchild.

Adoption by hair.

Cutting off your hair, and giving it to a person in proof that you receive him as your adopted father. Thus Boson, King of Arles, cut off his hair and gave it to Pope John VIII., who adopted him.

Adoption Controversy

Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel, maintained that Jesus Christ in his human nature was the son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii. 29), though in his pre—existing state he was the “begotten Son of God” in the ordinary catholic acceptance. Duns Scotus, Durandus, Calixtus, and others supported this view.

Adoptionist

A disciple of Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel (in Spain), is so called.

Adore

(2 syl.) means to “carry to one's mouth” “to kiss” (ad—os, ad—orare). The Romans performed adoration by placing their right hand on their mouth and bowing. The Greeks paid adoration to kings by putting the royal robe to their lips. The Jews kissed in homage: thus God said to Elijah he had 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed unto Baal, “every mouth which hath not kissed him” (1 Kings xix. 18; see also Hos. xiii.

2). “Kiss the Son lest He be angry” (Psalm ii. 12), means worship, reverence the Son. Even in England we do homage by kissing the hand of the sovereign.

Adrammelech

God of the people of Sepharvaim, to whom infants were burnt in sacrifice (Kings xvii, 31). Probably the sun.

Adrastus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An Indian prince from the banks of the Ganges, who aided the King of Egypt against the crusaders. He wore a serpent's skin, and rode on an elephant. Adrastus was slain by Rinaldo. — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered. Book xx.

Adrian

(St.) represented, in Christian art, with an anvil, and a sword or axe close by it. He had his limbs cut off on a smith's anvil, and was afterwards beheaded. St. Adrian is the patron saint of the Flemish brewers.

Adriel

in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the Earl of Mulgrave.

“Sharp—judging Adriel, the muses' friend,

Himself a muse: in Sanbedrim's debate

True to his prince, but not a slave of state;

Whom David's love with honours did adorn,

That from his disobedient son were torn.”

Part I.

Adrift

I am all adrift. He is quite adrift. To turn one adrift. Sea phrases. A ship is said to be adrift when it has broken from its moorings, and is driven at random by the winds. To be adrift is to be wide of the mark, or not in the right course. To turn one adrift is to turn him from house and home to go his own way.

Adroit

properly means “to the right” (French, à droite). The French call a person who is not adroit gauche (left-handed), meaning awkward, boorish.

Adsdelta

The table at which the flamens sat during sacrifice.

Adullamites

(4 syl.) The adherents of Lowe and Horsman, seceders in 1866 from the Reform Party. John Bright said of these members that they retired to the cave of Adullam, and tried to gather round them all the discontented. The allusion is to David in his flight from Saul, who “escaped to the cave Adullam; and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him” (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2).

Advauncer

The second branches of a stag's horn.

“In a hart the main horne itself they call the beame. The lowest antlier is called the brow—antlier; the next, roial; the next that, surroial; and then the top.

“In a buck, they say bur, beame, braunch, advauncers, palme, and speilers.” — Marwood: Forest Lawes.

Advent

Four weeks to commemorate the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world. The season begins on St. Andrew's Day, or the Sunday nearest to it. (Latin, ad—ventus, the coming to.)

Adversary

(The). Satan. (1 Pet. v. 8.)

Advocate (An) means one called to assist clients in a court of law. (Latin, advocare.)

The Devil's Advocate

. One who brings forward malicious accusations. When any name is proposed for canonisation in the Roman Catholic Church, two advocates are appointed, one to oppose the motion and one to defend it. The former, called Advocatus Diaboli (the Devil's Advocate), advances all he can against the person in question, the latter, called Advocatus Dei (God's Advocate), says all he can in support of the proposal.

Advocates' Library

in Edinburgh, founded 1682, is one of the five libraries to which copyright books are sent. (See Copyright.) means the right of appointing the incumbent of a church or ecclesiastical benefice. In mediæval times the “advocacy” or patronage of bishoprics and abbeys was frequently in the hands of powerful nobles, who often claimed the right to appoint in the event of a vacancy; hence the word (from Latin, advocatio, the office of a patron).

Advowson

A presentative advowson is when the patron presents to the bishop a person to whom he is willing to give the place of preferment.

A collative advowson is when the bishop himself is patron, and collates his client without any intermediate person.

A donative advowson is where the Crown gives a living to a clergyman without presentation, institution, or induction. This is done when a church or chapel has been founded by the Crown, and is not subject to the ordinary.

Advowson in gross

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is an advowson separated from the manor, and belonging wholly to the owner. While attached to the manor it is an advowson appendant. "Gross" (French) means absolute, entire; thus gross weight is the entire weight without deductions. A villain in gross was a villain the entire property of his master, and not attached to the land. A common in gross is one which is entirely your own, and which belongs to the manor.

Sale of Advowsons.

When lords of manors built churches upon their own demesnes, and endowed them, they became private property, which the lord might give away or even sell, under certain limitations. These livings are called Advowsons appendant, being appended to the manor. After a time they became regular "commercial property," and we still see the sale of some of them in the public journals.

Adytum

The Holy of Holies in the Greek and Roman temples, into which the general public were not admitted. (Greek, a—duton = not to be entered; duo, to go.)

Ædiles

(2 syl.) Those who, in ancient Rome, had charge of the public buildings (ædes), such as the temples, theatres, baths, aqueducts, sewers, including roads and streets also.

Ægeus

(2 syl.) A fabulous king of Athens who gave name to the Ægean Sea. His son, Theseus, went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute exacted by Minos. Theseus said, if he succeeded he would hoist a white sail on his home—voyage, as a signal of his safety. This he neglected to do; and Ægeus, who watched the ship from a rock, thinking his son had perished, threw himself into the sea.

This incident has been copied in the tale of Sir Tristram and Ysolde. Sir Tristram being severely wounded in Brittany, sent for Ysolde to come and see him before he died. He told his messenger, if Ysolde consented to come to hoist a white flag. Sir Tristram's wife told him the ship was in sight with a black flag at the helm, whereupon Sir Tristram bowed his head and died. [TRISTRAM.]

Æginetan Sculptures

Sculptures excavated by a company of Germans, Danes, and English (1811), in the little island of Ægina. They were purchased by Ludwig, Crown Prince of Bavaria, and are now the most remarkable ornaments of the Glyptothek, at München.

Ægir

God of the ocean, whose wife is Rana. They had nine daughters, who wore white robes and veils (Scandinavian mythology). These daughters are the billows, etc. The word means "to flow."

Ægis

The shield of Jupiter made by Vulcan was so called, and symbolised "Divine protection." The shield of Minerva was called an ægis also. The shield of Jupiter was covered with the skin of the goat Amalthea, and the Greek for goat is, in the genitive case, aigos. The ægis made by Vulcan was of brass.

I throw my ægis over you

, I give you my protection.

Ægrotat

To sport an ægrotat. In university parlance, an ægrotat is a medical certificate of indisposition to exempt the bearer from attending chapel and college lectures.

A E I

(A — i), a common motto on jewellery, means “for ever and for aye.” (Greek.)

Ælurus

The cat. An Egyptian deity held in the greatest veneration. Herodotus (ii. 66) tells us that Diana, to avoid being molested by the giants, changed herself into a cat. The deity used to be represented with a cat's head on a human body. (Greek, ailouros. a cat.)

Æmillian Law

Made by Æmilius Mamercus the prætor. It enjoined that the oldest priest should drive a nail every year into the capitol on the ides of September (September 5).

Æmonia Æmonian

(HÆMONIA HÆMONIAN).

Æneas

The hero of Virgil's epic. He carried his father Anchises on his shoulders from the flames of Troy. After roaming about for many years, he came to Italy, where he founded a colony which the Romans claim as their origin. The epithet applied to him is pious = pious, dutiful.

Æneid

The epic poem of Virgil, (in twelve books). So called from Æneas and the suffix —is, plur. ides (belonging to).

“The story of Sinon,” says Macrobius, “and the taking of Troy is borrowed from Pisander “The loves of Dido and Æneas are taken from those of Medea and Jason, in Apollonius of Rhodes.

“The story of the Wooden Horse and burning of Troy is from Arctinus of Miletus.”

Æolic Digamma

An ancient Greek letter (F), sounded like our w. Thus oinos with the digamma was sounded woinos; whence the Latin vinum, our wine. Gamma, or g, hence digamma = double g.

Æolic Mode

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

in music, noted for its simplicity, fit for ballads and songs. The Phrygian Mode was for religious music, as hymns and anthems.

Æolus

in Roman mythology, was “god of the winds.”

Æolian harp.

The wind—harp. A box on which strings are stretched. Being placed where a draught gets to the strings, they utter musical sounds.

Æon (Greek, aion), eternity, an immeasurable length of time; any being that is eternal. Basilides reckons there have been 365 such æons, or gods; but Valentinius restricts the number to 30. Sometimes written “eon.”

In geology each series of rocks covers an æon, or an indefinite and immeasurable period of time.

Æra

[ERA.]

Aërated Bread

Bread made light by means of carbonic acid gas instead of leaven.

Aërated Water

Water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, called fixed air.

Aerians

Followers of Aerius, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Æschylus

the most sublime of the Greek tragic poets. He wrote 90 plays, only 7 of which are now extant. Æschylus was killed by a tortoise thrown by an eagle (to break the shell) against his bald head, which it mistook for a stone (B.C. 535—456). See Horace, Ars Poetica, 278.

Pronounce Ees—ke—lus.

Æschylus of France

Prosper Jolyot de Cr billon. (1674—1762.)

Æsculapius

The Latin form of the Greek word Asklepios, the god of medicine and of healing. Now used for “a medical practitioner.”

Æsir

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

plural of As or Asa, the celestial gods of Scandinavia, who lived in Asgard (god's ward), situate on the heavenly hills between earth and the rainbow. The chief was Odin. We are told that there were twelve, but it would be hard to determine who the twelve are, for, like Arthur's knights, the number seems variable. The following may be mentioned: — (1) Odin; (2) Thor (his eldest son, the god of thunder); (3) Tyr (another son, the god of wisdom); (4) Baldur (another son, the Scandinavian Apollo); (5) Bragi (the god of eloquence); (6) Vidar (god of silence); (7) Hödur the blind (Baldur's twin brother); (8) Hermod (Odin's son and messenger);

(9) Hoenir (divine intelligence); (10) Odur (husband of Freyja, the Scandinavian Venus); (11) Loki (the god of mischief, though not an asa, lived in Asgard); (12) Vali (Odin's youngest son); another of Odin's sons was Kvasir the keen—sighted. Then there were the Vanir, or gods of air, ocean, and water; the gods of fire; the gods of the Lower World; and the Mysterious Three, who sat on three thrones above the rainbow. Their names were Har (the perfect), the Like—perfect, and the Third person.

Wives of the Æsir:

Odin's wife was Frigga; Thor's wife was Sif (beauty); Baldur's wife was Nanna (daring); Bragi's wife was Iduna; Odur's wife was Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); Loki's wife was Siguna.

The Æsir built Asgard themselves, but each god had his own private mansion. That of Odin was Gladsheim; but his wife Frigga had also her private abode, named Fensalir; the mansion of Thor was Bilskirnir; that of Baldur was Broadblink; that of Odur's wife was Folkbang; of Vidar was Landvidi (wide land); the private abode of the goddesses generally was Vingolf.

The refectory or banquet hall of the Æsir was called Valhalla.

Njörd, the water—god, was not one of the Æsir, but chief of the Vanir; his son was Frey; his daughter, Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); his wife was Skadi; and his home, Noatun.

Æson's Bath

Sir Thomas Browne (Religio Medici, p. 67) rationalises this into “hair—dye.” The reference is to Medea renovating Æson, father of Jason, with the juices of a concoction made of sundry articles. After Æson had imbibed these juices, Ovid says: —

“Barba comæque,

Canitie posita, nigrum rapuere, colorem.”

Metamorphoses, vii. 288.

Æsonian Hero

(The). Jason, who was the son of Æson.

Æsop's Fables

were compiled by Babrios, a Greek, who lived in the Alexandrian age.

Æsop,

a Phrygian slave, very deformed, and the writer of fables. He was contemporary with Pythagoras, about

B.C. 570.

Almost all Greek and Latin fables are ascribed to Æsop, as all our Psalms are ascribed to David. The Latin fables of Phædrus are supposed to be translations of Æsopian fables.

Æsop of Arabia.

Lokman (?). Nasser, who lived in the fifth century, is generally called the “Arabian Æsop.”

Æsop of England.

John Gay. (1688—1732.)

Æsop of France.

Jean de la Fontaine. (1621—1695.)

Æsop of Germany,

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. (1729—1781.)

Æsop of India.

Bidpay or Pilpay. (About three centuries before the Christian era.)

Aetites

(3 syl.) Eagle — stones. (Greek, aetos, an eagle.) Hollow stones composed of several crusts, one within another. Supposed at one time to form part of an eagle's nest. Pliny mentions them. Kirwan applies the name to clay ironstones having a globular crust of oxide investing an ochreous kernel. Mythically, they are supposed to have the property of detecting theft.

Ætolian Hero

(The).Diomedes, who was king of Ætolia. Ovid.

Affable means “one easy to be spoken to.” (Latin, ad fari, to speak to.)

Affect

To love, to desire. (Latin, affecto.)

“Some affect the light, and some the shade.” Blair: Grave.

l'Affection aveugle raison

(French).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cassius says to Brutus, "A friendly eye could never see such faults." "L'esprit est presque toujours la dupe du coeur." (La Rochefoucauld: Maximes.)

Again, "a mother thinks all her geese are swans."

Italian:

A ogni grolla paion belli i suoi grollatini. Ad ogni uccello, suo nido è bello.

French:

A chaque oiseau son nid parait beau.

Latin:

Asinus asino, sus sui, pulcher. Sua cuique res est carissima.

Affront

properly means to stand front to front. In savage nations opposing armies draw up front to front before they begin hostilities, and by grimaces, sounds, words, and all conceivable means, try to provoke and terrify their vis—à—vis. When this "affronting" is over, the adversaries rush against each other, and the fight begins in earnest.

Affront.

A salute; a coming in front of another to salute.

"Only, sir, this I must caution you of, in your affront, or salute, never to move your hat." — Green: Tu Quoque, vii. 95.

Afraid

He who trembles to hear a leaf fall should keep out of the wood. This is a French proverb: "Qui a peur de feuilles, ne doit aller au bois." Our corresponding English proverb is, "He who fears scars shouldn't go the wars." The timid should not voluntarily expose themselves to danger.

"Little boats should keep near shore,

Larger ones may venture more."

Africa

Teneo te, Africa (I take possession of thee, O Africa). When Cæsar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he tripped and fell — a bad omen; but, with wonderful presence of mind, he pretended that he had done so intentionally, and kissing the soil, exclaimed, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa." Told also of Scipio. (See Don Quixote, Pt. II. Bk. vi. ch.6.)

Africa semper aliquid novi affert.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Africa is always producing some novelty.” A Greek proverb quoted (in Latin) by Pliny, in allusion to the ancient belief that Africa abounded in strange monsters.

African Sisters

(The) The Hesperides (4 syl.) who lived in Africa. They were the daughters of Atlas.

Afriet

or “Afrit.” The beau ideal of what is terrible and monstrous in Arabian superstition. A sort of ghoul or demon. Solomon, we are told, once tamed an Afrit, and made it submissive to his will.

Aft

The hinder part of a ship.

Fore and Aft.

The entire length (of a ship), from stem to stern.

After—cast

A throw of dice after the game is ended; anything done too late.

“Ever he playeth an after—cast

Of all that he shall say or do.”

Gower.

After—clap

Beware of after—claps. An after—clap is a catastrophe or threat after an affair is supposed to be over. It is very common in thunderstorms to hear a “clap” after the rain subsides, and the clouds break.

“What plaguy mischief and mishaps

Do dog him still with after—claps.”

Butler: Hudibras, Pt. i. 3.

After Meat, Mustard

In Latin, “Post bellum, auxilium.” We have also, “After death, the doctor,” which is the German, “Wann der kranke ist todt, so kommt der arztnet” (when the patient's dead, comes the physic). To the same effect is “When the steed is stolen, lock the stable door.” Meaning, doing a thing, or offering service when it is too late, or when there is no longer need thereof.

After us, the Deluge

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“I care not what happens when I am dead and gone.” So said Mdme. de Pompadour, the mistress of Louis XV. (1722—1764). Metternich, the Austrian statesman (1773—1859), is credited with the same: but probably he simply quoted the words of the French marchioness.

Aft—meal

An extra meal; a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

Agag

in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Oates made his declaration, and was afterwards found barbarously murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill.

Agag was hewed to pieces by Samuel (1 Sam. xv.).

“And Corah (Titus Oates) might for Agag's murder call

In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.”

1.675—6.

Agamarshana

A passage of the Veda, the repetition of which will purify the soul like absolution after confession.

Agamemnon

King of Argos, in Greece, and commander—in—chief of the allied Greeks who went to the siege of Troy. The fleet being delayed by adverse winds at Aulis, Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to Diana, and the winds became at once favourable. — Homer's Iliad.

“Till Agamemnon's daughter's blood.

Appeased the gods that them withstood.”

Earl of Surrey.

His brother was Menelaos.

His Daughters were Iphigenia, Electra, Iphianassa, and Chrysothemis (Sophocles). He was Grandson of Pelops.

He was killed in a bath by his wife Clytemnestra, after his return from Troy.

His son was Orestes, who slew his mother for murdering his father, and was called Agamemnonides.

His wife was Clytemnestra, who lived in adultery with Egistheus. At Troy he fell in love with Cassandra, a daughter of King Priam.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona

("there are hills beyond Pentland, and fields beyond Forth"), i.e., we are not to suppose that our own age or locality monopolises all that is good. — Hor. Od. iv. 9, 25. We might add, et post Agamemnona vivent.

"Great men there lived ere Agamemnon came,

And after him will others rise to fame."

E.C.B.

Aganice

(4 syl.) or Aglaonice, the Thessalian, being able to calculate eclipses, she pretended to have the moon under her command, and to be able when she chose to draw it from heaven. Her secret being found out, her vaunting became a laughing—stock, and gave birth to the Greek proverb cast at braggarts, "Yes, as the Moon obeys Aganice."

Aganippe

(4 syl.) A fountain of Boeotia at the foot of Mount Helicon, dedicated to the Muses, because it had the virtue of imparting poetic inspiration. From this fountain the Muses are called Aganippedes (5 syl.) or Aganippides (5 syl.).

Agape

(3 syl.) A love—feast. The early Christians held a love—feast before or after communion, when contributions were made for the poor. These feasts became a scandal, and were condemned at the Council of Carthage, 397. (Greek, agape, love.)

Agapemone

(5 syl.). A somewhat disreputable association of men and women living promiscuously on a common fund, which existed for a time at Charlyrch, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. (Greek, agape, love.)

Agape tæ

Women under vows of virginity, who undertook to attend the monks. (The word is Greek, and means beloved.)

Agate

(2 syl.) So called, says Pliny (xxxvii. 10), from Achates or Gagates, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance.

"These, these are they, if we consider well,

That saphirs and the diamonds doe excell,

The pearle, the emerauld, and the turkesse bleu,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The sanguine corral, amber's golden hiew,

The christall, jacinth, achate, ruby red.”

Taylor: The Waterspout (1630).

Agate is supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

Agate

A very diminutive person. Shakespeare speaks of Queen Mab as no bigger than an agate—stone on the forefinger of an alderman.

“I was never manned with an agate till now.” Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV.i.2.

Agatha

Daughter of Cuno, the ranger, in love with Max, to whom she is to be married, provided he carries off the prize in the annual trial—shot. She is in danger of being shot by Max unwittingly, but is rescued by a hermit, and becomes the bride of the young huntsman. — Weber's Opera of Der Freischiütz.

Agatha

(St.) Represented in Christian art with a pair of shears, and holding in her hand a salver, on which her breasts are placed. The reference is to her martyrdom, when her breasts were cut off by a pair of shears.

Agave

(3 syl.) or “American aloe,” from the Greek, agauos, admirable. The Mexicans plant fences of Agave round their wigwams, as a defence against wild beasts. The Mahometans of Egypt regard it as a charm and religious symbol; and pilgrims to Mecca indicate their exploit by hanging over the door of their dwelling a leaf of Agave, which has the further charm of warding off evil spirits. The Jews in Cairo attribute a similar virtue to the plant, every part of which is utilised.

Agdistes

(self—indulgence). The god who kept the porch of the “Bower of Bliss.” He united in his own person the two sexes, and sprang from the stone Agdus, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to cast over their shoulders, after the flood, for re—peopling the world. (Spenser: Faëric Queene, book ii, 12.)

Ag—dis—tes in 3 syl.

Age as accords

(To). To do what is fit and right (Scotch law term). Here “Age” is from the Latin agere, to do.

“To set about the matter in a regular manner, or, as he termed it ... to “age as accords.”” — Sir

W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. 2.

Age of Animals.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An old Celtic rhyme, put into modern English, says:

“Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse;

Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man;

Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer;

Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle.”

Age of Women

(The). Though many women are mentioned in the Bible, the age of only one (Sarah, Abraham's wife) is recorded, and that to show at her advanced age she would become the mother of Isaac.

“Elizabeth, the mother of the Baptist,” we are told by St. Luke, “was well—stricken in age.”

Age of the Bishops

(The). The ninth century. (Hallam: Middle Ages.)

Age of the Popes

(The). The twelfth century. (Hallam: Middle Ages.)

Age hoc

“Attend to this.” In sacrifice the Roman crier perpetually repeated these words to arouse attention. In the “Common Prayer Book” the attention of the congregation is frequently aroused by the exhortation, “Let us pray,” though nearly the whole service is that of prayer.

Ages

Varro (Fragments, p. 219, Scaliger's edition, 1623) recognises three ages: —

- (1) From the beginning of mankind to the Deluge, a time wholly unknown.
- (2) From the Deluge to the First Olympiad, called the mythical period.
- (3) From the first olympiad to the present time, called the historic period.

Titian symbolised the three ages of man thus: —

- (1) An infant in a cradle.
- (2) A shepherd playing a flute.
- (3) An old man meditating on two skulls.

According to Lucretius also, there are three ages, distinguished by the materials employed in implements (v. 1282), viz.:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(1) The age of stone, when celts or implements of stone were employed.

(2) The age of bronze, when implements were made of copper or brass.

(3) The age of iron, when implements were made of iron, as at present.

Hesiod names five ages, viz.: —

The Golden or patriarchal, under the care of Saturn.

The Silver or voluptuous, under the care of Jupiter.

The Brazen or warlike, under the care of Neptune.

The Heroic or renaissant, under the care of Mars.

The Iron or present, under the care of Pluto.

The present is sometimes called the wire age, from its telegraphs, by means of which well—nigh the whole earth is in intercommunication.

Fichte names five ages also: the ante—diluvian, post—diluvian, Christian, satanic, and millennial.

Agelasta The stone on which Ceres rested when worn down by fatigue in searching for her daughter. (Greek, joyless.)

Agenorides

(5 syl.) Cadmos, who was the son of Agenor.

Agent

Is man a free agent ? This is a question of theology, which has long been mooted. The point is this: If God fore—ordains all our actions, they must take place as he fore—ordains them, and man acts as a watch or clock; but if, on the other hand, man is responsible for his actions, he must be free to act as his inclination leads him. Those who hold the former view are called necessitarians; those who hold the latter, libertarians.

Agglutinate Languages

The Turanian family of languages are so called because every syllable is a word, and these are glued together to form other words, and may be unglued so as to leave the roots distinct, as “inkstand.”

Aghast

Frightened, as by a ghost; from Anglo—Saxon gást, a ghost.

Agio

The percentage of charge made for the exchange of paper money into cash. (Italian).

“The profit is called by the Italians aggio.”—Scarlett.

Agis

King of Sparta, who tried to deliver Greece from the Macedonian yoke, and was slain in the attempt.

“To save a rotten state, Agis, who saw E'en Sparta's self to servile avarice sink.”

Thompson: Winter, 488—9.

Agist

To take the cattle of another to graze at a certain sum. The feeding of these beasts is called agistment. The words are from the Norman agiser (to be levant and couchant, rise up and lie down), because, says Coke, beasts are levant and couchant whilst they are on the land.

Agla

A cabalistic name of God, formed from the initial letters of Attâh, Gibbor, Leholâm, Adonâi (Thou art strong for ever, O Lord !). (See Notarica.)

Aglaos

The poorest man in Arcadia, pronounced by Apollo to be far happier than Gyges, because he was “contented with his lot.”

“Poor and content is rich and rich enough;

But riches endless are as poor as winter

To him who ever fears he shall be poor.”

Shakespeare: Othello iii. 3.

Agnes

She is an Agnes (elle fait l'Agnès) — i.e., she is a sort of female “Verdant Green,” who is so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means. It is a character in Molière's L'école des Femmes.

Agnes

(St.) is represented by Domenichino as kneeling on a pile of fagots, the fire extinguished, and the executioner about to slay her with the sword. The introduction of a lamb (agnus) is a modern innovation, and play on the name. St. Agnes is the patron of young virgins.

“St. Agnes was first tied to a stake, but the fire of the stakes went out; whereupon Aspasius, set to watch the martyrdom, drew his sword, and cut off her head.”

Agnes' Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(St.), 21st January. Upon St. Agnes' night, you take a row of pins, and pull out every one, one after another. Saying a pater—noster, stick a pin in your sleeve, and you will dream of him or her you shall marry. — Aubrey: Miscellany, p. 136.

Agnoiites

(3 syl.) Ag—no—ites, or Ag—no—i—tæ (4 syl.).

(1) Certain heretics in the fourth century who said “God did not know everything.”

(2) Another sect, in the sixth century, who maintained that Christ “did not know the time of the day of judgment.”

Agnostic

(An). A term invented by Prof. Huxley in 1885 to indicate the mental attitude of those who withhold their assent to whatever is incapable of proof, such as the absolute. In regard to miracles and revelation, agnostics neither dogmatically accept nor reject such matters, but simply say Agnosco — I do not know — they are not capable of proof.

Agnus—castus A shrub of the Vitex tribe, called agnos (chaste) by the Greeks, because the Athenian ladies, at the feast of Ceres, used to strew their couches with vitex leaves, as a palladium of chastity. The monks, mistaking agnos (chaste) for agnus (a lamb), but knowing the use made of the plant, added castus to explain its character, making it chaste—lamb. (For another similar blunder, see I.H.S.)

Agnus Dei

A cake of wax or dough stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the Cross, and distributed by the Pope on the Sunday after Easter as an amulet. Our Lord is called Agnus Dei (the Lamb of God). There is also a prayer so called, because it begins with the words, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi

(O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world).

Agog

He is all agog, in nervous anxiety; on the qui vive, like a horse in clover. (French, à gogo, or vivre à gogo, to live in clover.)

Agonistes

(4 syl.). Samson Agonistes (the title of Milton's drama) means Samson wrestling with adversity — Samson combating with trouble. (Greek, agonizomai, to combat, to struggle.)

Agonistics

A branch of the Donatists of Africa who roamed from town to town affirming they were ministers of justice. The Greek agon (an assembly) = the Latin nundinæ, days when the law—courts were opened, that country people might go and get their law—suits settled.

Agony

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

properly means contention in the athletic games; and to agonise is the act of contending. (Greek, agon, a game of contest, as well as a “place of assembly”).

Agony, meaning “great pain,” is the wrestle with pain or struggle with suffering.

Agony Column

of a newspaper. A column containing advertisements of missing relatives and friends; indicating great distress of mind in the advertiser.

Agrarian Law

from the Latin ager (land), is a law for making land the common property of a nation, and not the particular property of individuals. In a modified form, it means a redistribution of land, giving to each citizen a portion.

Agrimony

The older spelling was Argemony, and Pliny calls it argemonia, from the Greek argemos, a white speck on the eye, which this plant was supposed to cure.

Ague

(A cure for) (See Homer.)

Ague—cheek

Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a straight—haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self—conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Agur's Wish

(Prov. xxx. 8). “Give me neither riches nor poverty.”

Ahasuerus

or Ahashverosh. A title common to several Persian kings. The three mentioned in the Bible are supposed to be Cyaxares (Dan. xi. 1); Xerxes (Esther); and Cambyses (Ezra iv. 6).

An alabaster vase found at Halicarnassus gives four renderings of the name Xerxes, viz., Persian, Khshayarsha; and the Greek, Xerxes; the Sanskrit root Kshi means “to rule,” Kshathra (Zend Ksathra), a king.

Ahead The wind's ahead — i.e., blows in the direction towards which the ship's head points; in front. If the wind blows in the opposite direction (i.e., towards the stern) it is said to be astern. When one ship is ahead of another, it is before it, or further advanced. “Ahead of his class,” means at the head. Ahead in a race, means before the rest of the runners.

To go ahead

is to go on without hesitation, as a ship runs ahead of another.

Ahithophel

or Achitophel A treacherous friend and adviser. Ahithophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt, and advised him "like the oracle of God" (2 Sam. xvi. 20—23). In Dryden's political satire, Achitophel stands for the Earl of Shaftesbury. (See Achitophel.)

Ahmed

(Prince). Noted for the tent given him by the fairy Pari—banou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Samarcand, which would cure all diseases. — Arabian Nights, Prince Ahmed, etc.

This tent coincides in a marvellous manner with the Norse ship called Skidbladnir (q.v.). (See Solomon's Carpet.)

Aholibah

(Ezek. xxiii. 4, 11, etc.). The personification of prostitution. Used by the prophet to signify religious adultery or harlotry. (See Harlot.)

"The great difficulty in exposing the immoralities of this Aholibah is that her [acts] are so revolting." — Papers on the Social Evil, 1885.

Aholibamah

A granddaughter of Cain, loved by the seraph Samiasa. She is a proud, ambitious, queen—like beauty, a female type of Cain. When the flood came, her angel—lover carried her under his wings to some other planet. — Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Ahriman

or Ahrimanes The principle or angel of darkness and evil in the Magian system. (See Ormusd.)

"I recognise the evil spirit, sir, and do honour to Ahrimanes in this young man." — Thackeray.

Aide toi et le Ciel taidera

(God will help those who help themselves). The party—motto of a political society of France, established in 1824. The object of the society was, by agitation and the press, to induce the middle classes to resist the Government. Guizot was at one time its president, and Le Globe and Le National its organs. This society which doubtless aided in bringing about the Revolution of 1830, was dissolved in 1832.

Aigrette

(2 syl.) A lady's headdress, consisting of feathers or flowers. The French call the down of thistles and dandelions, as well as the tuft of birds, aigrette.

Aim

To give aim, to stand aloof. A term in archery, meaning to stand within a convenient distance from the butts, to give the archers information how near their arrows fall to the mark aimed at.

“But, gentle people, give me aim a while.

For nature puts me to a heavy task;

Stand all aloof.” Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 3.

To cry aim.

To applaud, encourage. In archery it was customary to appoint certain persons to cry aim, for the sake of encouraging those who were about to shoot.

“All my neighbours shall cry aim.”

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor

, iii. 2.

Aim—crier

An abettor, one who encourages. In archery, the person employed to “cry aim.” (See above.)

“Thou smiling aim—crier at princes' fall.” English Arcadia.

Air

an element. Anaxagoras held air to be the primary form of matter.

Aristotle gives Fire, Air, Earth, and Water as the four elements.

Air

a manner, as “the air of the court,” the “air of gentility;” “a good air” (manner, deportment) means the pervading habit.

Air

in music, is that melody which predominates and gives its character to the piece.

Air one's opinions

(To). To state opinions without having firmly based them on proper data. To let them fly loose, like a caged bird.

To ventilate

an opinion means to suggest for the purpose of having it duly tested. A conceited man airs his opinions, a discreet one ventilates them, as corn when it is winnowed; and the chaff is blown off.

Air—brained

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Giddy, heedless. This word is now generally spelt “hare—brained;” but, by ancient authors, hair—brained. In C. Thomson's Autobiography it is spelt “Air—brained,” which seems plausible.

Air—line signifies (in the United States) the most direct and shortest possible route between two given places, as the Eastern and Western Air—line Railway.

Air—ship

(An) A balloon.

“Presently a north—easterly current of wind struck the air—ship, and it began to move with great velocity upon a horizontal line.” — Max Adeler: The Captain's MS.

Air—throne

Odin's throne in Gladsheim. His palace was in Asgard.

Airs

To give oneself mighty airs: to assume, in manner, appearance, and tone, a superiority to which you have no claim. The same as Air, manner (q.v.).

The plural is essential in this case to take it out of the category of mere eccentricity, or to distinguish it from “air” in the sense of deportment, as “he had a fine, manly air,” “in air was that of a gentleman.” Air, in the singular, being generally complimentary, but “airs” in the plural always conveying censure. In Italian, we find the phrase, Si da dell'arie.

Airapadam

The white elephant, one of the eight which, according to Indian mythology, sustain the earth.

Aisle

(pronounce ile) The north and south wings of a church. Latin, ala (axilla, ascella), through the French, aile, a wing. In German the nave of a church is schiff, and the aisle flügel (a wing). In some church documents the aisles are called alleys (walks), and hence the nave is still sometimes called the “middle aisle” or alley. The choir of Lincoln Cathedral used to be called the “Chanters' alley;” and Olden tells us that when he came to be churchwarden, in 1638, he made the Puritans “come up the middle alley on their knees to the raile.”

Aitch—bone of beef. Corruption of “Naitch—bone,” i.e. the haunch—bone (Latin, nates, a haunch or buttock).

Similarly, “an apron” is a corruption of a napperon; “an adder” is a corruption of a nadder (Old Eng., næddre). In other words, we have reversed the order; thus “a net” is an ewt, “a nag” is an ög (Danish). Latin, eq [uus], a horse.

Ajax

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

the Greater. King of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring, and self—confident. Generally called Telamon Ajax, because he was the son of Telamon. When the armour of Hector was awarded to Ulysses instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself. — Homer's Iliad, and later poets.

Ajax the Less Son of Oïleus (3 syl.), King of Locris, in Greece. The night Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, the prophetic daughter of Priam; in consequence of which his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea. — Homer's Iliad, and later poets.

“Ipsa (Juno), Jovis rapidum jaculata e nubibus ignem,

Disjecitque rates, evertitque æquora ventis;

Illum (Ajax) expirantem transfixo pectore flammas

Turbine corripuit, scopuloque infixit acuto.”

Virgil: Æneid, i. 42, etc.

Akbar

An Arabic word, meaning “Very Great.” Akbar—Khan, the “very great Khan,” is applied especially to the Khan of Hindûstan who reigned 1556—1605.

Akuan

the giant whom Rustan slew. (Persian mythology).

Akuman

The most malevolent of all the Persian gods.

Alabama

U. S. America. The name of an Indian tribe of the Mississippi Valley, meaning “here we rest.”

Alabaster

A stone of great purity and whiteness used for ornaments. So called from “Alabastron,” in Upper Egypt, where it abounds.

Aladdin

in the Arabian Nights' Tales, obtains a magic lamp, and a has splendid palace built by the genius of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the sultan of China, loses his lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa. Sir Walter Scott says, somewhat incorrectly. —

“Vanished into air like the palace of Aladdin.”

The palace did not vanish into air, but was transported to another place.

Aladdin's Lamp

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The source of wealth and good fortune. After Aladdin came to his wealth and was married, he suffered his lamp to hang up and get rusty.

“It was impossible that a family, holding a document which gave them access to the most powerful noblemen in Scotland, should have suffered it to remain unemployed, like Aladdin's rusty lamp.” — Senior.

Aladdin's Ring given him by the African magician, was a “preservative against every evil.” — Arabian Nights: Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp.

Aladdin's Window

To finish Aladdin's Window — i.e. to attempt to complete something begun by a great genius, but left imperfect. The genius of the lamp built a palace with twenty—four windows, all but one being set in frames of precious stones; the last was left for the sultan to finish; but after exhausting his treasures, the sultan was obliged to abandon the task as hopeless.

Tait's second part of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel is an Aladdin's Window.

Aladine

(3 syl.) The sagacious but cruel old king of Jerusalem in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, book xx. This is a fictitious character, inasmuch as the Holy Land was at the time under the dominion of the caliph of Egypt. Aladine was slain by Raymond.

Alako Son of Baro—Devel, the great god of the gipsies. The gipsies say that he will ultimately restore them to Assas in Assyria, their native country. The image of Alako has a pen in his left hand and a sword in his right.

Alans

Large dogs, of various species, used for hunting deer.

“Skins of animals slain in the chase were stretched on the ground ... and upon a heap of these lay 3 alans, as they were called, i.e. wolf greyhounds of the largest size.” — Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. vi.

Alarcon

King of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the Crusaders. His men were only half armed. — Jerusalem Delivered.

Alarm

An outcry made to give notice of danger. (Italian, all' arme, “to arms;” French, alarme.)

Alarum Bell

In feudal times a larum bell was rung in the castle in times of danger to summon the retainers to arms. A variant of alarm (q.v.).

“Awake! awake!

Ring the alarum bell! Murder and treason!”

Shakespeare: Macbeth, ii. 3.

Alasnam

Alasnam's lady. In the Arabian Nights' Tales Alasnam has eight diamond statues, but had to go in quest of a ninth more precious still, to fill the vacant pedestal. The prize was found in the lady who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and the most perfect of her race.

“There is wanting one pure and perfect model, and that one, wherever it is to be found, is like Alasnam's lady, worth them all.” — Sir Walter Scott.

Alasnam's Mirror

The “touch—stone of virtue,” given to Alasnam by one of the Genii. If he looked in this mirror it informed him whether a damsel would remain to him faithful or not. If the mirror remained unsullied so would the maiden; if it clouded, the maiden would prove faithless. — Arabian Nights: Prince Zeyn Alasnam.

Alastor

The evil genius of a house: a Nemesis. Cicero says: “Who meditated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated.” Shelley has a poem entitled “Alastor, or The Spirit of Solitude”. The word is Greek (alastor, the avenging god, a title applied to Zeus); the Romans had their Jupiter Vindex; and we read in the Bible, “Vengeance is mine. I will repay, saith the Lord” (Rom. xii. 19).

Alauda

A Roman legion raised by Julius Cæsar in Gaul, and so called because they carried a lark's tuft on the top of their helmets.

Alawy

The Nile is so called by the Abyssinians. The word means “the giant.”

Alb

The long white tunic (Latin, albus, white) bound round the waist with a girdle. The dress is emblematical of purity and continence, and worn by priests when saying Mass.

Albadara

A bone which the Arabs say defies destruction, and which; at the resurrection, will be the germ of the new body. The Jews called it Luz (q.v.); and the “Os sacrum” (q.v.) refers probably to the same superstition.

Alban (St.), like St. Denis is represented as carrying his head between his hands. His attributes are a sword and a crown.

St. Aphrodisius, St. Aventine, St. Desiderius. St. Chrysolius, St. Hilarian, St. Leo, St. Lucanus. St. Lucian, St. Proba, St. Solangia, and several other martyrs, are represented as carrying their heads in their hands. An artist's bungling way of identifying a headless trunk.

Albania

Turkey, or rather the region about the Caucasus. The word means the “mountainous region.”

Albanian Hat

(An). “Un chapeau à l'Albanaise.” A sugar—loaf hat, such as was worn by the Albanians in the sixteenth century.

Albano Stone

or Peperino used by the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Albano.

Albany

Scotland. (See Albin .)

Albati

The white brethren. Certain Christian fanatics of the fourteenth century, so called because they dressed in white. Also the recently baptised. (Latin.)

Albatross

The largest of webfooted birds, called by sailors the Cape Sheep, from its frequenting the Cape of Good Hope. It gorges itself, and then sits motionless upon the waves. It is said to sleep in the air, because its flight is a gliding without any apparent motion of its long wings. Sailors say it is fatal to shoot an albatross. Coleridge's Ancient Mariner is founded on this superstition.

Albert

(An) A chain from the waistcoat pocket to a button in front of the waistcoat. So called from Prince Albert, the consort of Queen Victoria. When he went to Birmingham, in 1849, he was presented by the jewellers of the town with such a chain, and the fashion took the public fancy.

Albertazzo

(in Orlando Furioso) married Alda, daughter of Otho, Duke of Saxony. His sons were Hugh or Ugo, and Fulke or Fulco. From this family springs the Royal Family of England.

Albiazar

(in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the leaders of the Arab host which joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. “A chief in rapine, not in knighthood bred.” (Book xvii.)

Albigenses

(4 syl.) A common name for heretics prior to the Reformation; so called from the Albigeois, inhabitants of the district which now is the department of the Tarn, the capital of which was Albi. It was here the persecution of the Reformers began, under the direction of Pope Innocent III, in 1209. The Waldenses rose after them, but are not unfrequently confounded with them.

Albin

A name at one time applied to the northern part of Scotland, called by the Romans "Caledonia." This was the part inhabited by the Picts. The Scots migrated from Scotia in the North of Ireland, and acquired mastery under Kenneth M'Alpin in 843. In poetry Scotland is called Albin.

Gaelic, ailp; Keltic, alp, our Alps. Alpin is either Ailp—ben son of the hills, i.e., the hill country, or Alp—inn (hilly island), Albania means the "hilly country."

"Woe to his kindred, and woe to his cause,

When Albin her claymore indignantly draws."

Campbell: Lochiel's Warning.

Albino

A term originally applied by the Portuguese to those negroes who were mottled with white spots; but now applied to those who are born with red eyes and white hair. Albinos are found among white people as well as among negroes. The term is also applied to beasts and plants. (Latin, albus, white.)

Albino—poets

Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (chap. viii.), speaks of Kirke White as one of the "sweet Albino poets," whose "plaintive song" he admires. It implies some deficiency of virility, as albinism suggests weakness, and possibly is meant as a play upon the name in this particular instance.

Albion

England, so named from the ancient inhabitants called Albiones. The usual etymology of albus (white), said to have been given by Julius Cæsar in allusion to the "white cliffs," is quite untenable, as an old Greek treatise, the De Mundo, formerly ascribed to Aristotle, mentions the islands of Albion and Ierne three hundred years before the invasion of Cæsar. Probably "Albion" or Albany was the Celtic name of all Great Britain, subsequently restricted to Scotland, and then to the Highlands of Scotland. Certainly the inhabitants of the whole island are implied in the word Albiones in Festus Avienus's account of the voyage of Hamilcar in the fifth century B.C. (See Albin.)

"Beyond the Pillars of Hercules is the ocean which flows round the earth, and in it are 2 very large islands called Britannia, viz., Albion and Ierne." — De Mundo, Sec. iii.

Albion

Son of the king of this island when Oberon held his court in what we call Kensington Gardens. He was stolen by the elfin Milkah, and brought up in fairyland. When nineteen years of age, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of King Oberon, but was driven from the empire by the indignant monarch. Albion invaded the territory, but was slain in the battle. When Kenna knew this, she poured the juice of moly over the dead body, and it changed into a snow—drop. — T. Tickell.

Albion the Giant

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Fourth son of Neptune, sixth son of Osiris, and brother of Hercules, his mother being Amphitrita. Albion the Giant was put by his father in possession of the isle of Britain, where he speedily subdued the Samotheans, the first inhabitants. His brother Bergion ruled over Ireland and the Orkneys. Another of his brothers was Lestrigo, who subjected Italy. (See “W. Harrison's Introduction to Holinshed's Chronicle.”)

Albracca's Damsel

(in Orlando Furioso) is Angelica. Albracca is the capital of Cathay (q.v.).

Album

A blank book for scraps. The Romans applied the word to certain tables overlaid with gypsum, on which were inscribed the annals of the chief priests, the edicts of the prætors, and rules relating to civil matters. In the Middle Ages, “album” was the general name of a register or list; so called from being kept either on a white (albus) board with black letters, or on a black board with white letters. For the same reason the boards in churches for notices, and the boards in universities containing the names of the college men, are called albums.

Alcade

(3 syl.) A magistrate is so called in Spain and Portugal. The word is the Arabic al cadi (the judge).

Alcaic Verse

Alcaics. A Greek and Latin metre, so called from Alcoes, a lyric poet, who invented it. Each line is divided into two parts. The first two lines of each stanza of the ninth ode of Horace are in Alcaics. The first two lines of the ode run thus, and in the same metre:

“See how Soracté groans with its wintry snow,

And weary woodlands bend with the toilsome weight.”

Alcantara

(Order of) A military and religious order instituted in 1214 by Alfonso IX., King of Castile, to commemorate the taking of Alcantara from the Moors. The sovereign of Spain is ex-officio, head of the Order. A resuscitation of the order of St. Julian of the Pear—tree, instituted by Fernando Gomez in 1176, better known by the French title St. Julien du Poirier. The badge of the order was a pear—tree.

Alcastus

(in Jerusalem Delivered). The Capaneus of the Crusaders, leader of 6,000 foot soldiers from Helvetia.

Alce

(2 syl.). One of the dogs of Actæon. The word means “strength.”

Alceste

(2 syl.) The hero of Molière's Misanthrope. Not unlike Shakespeare's character of Timon.

Alchemilla

or Lady's Mantle. The alchemist's plant; so called because alchemists collected the dew of its leaves for their operations. Lady means the Virgin Mary, to whom the plant was dedicated.

Alchemy (Al—ki—me) is the Arabic al kimia (the secret art); so called not only because it was carried on in secret, but because its main objects were the three great secrets of science — the transmutation of baser metals into gold, the universal solvent, and the elixir of life.

Alcimedon

A generic name for a first—rate carver in wood.

Pocula ponam

Fagina, coelatum divini opus Alcimedontis.”

Virgil: Eclogue, iii.36.

Alcina

The personification of carnal pleasure in Orlando Furioso; the Circe of classic fable, and Labè of the Arabians. She enjoyed her lovers for a time, and then changed them into trees, stones, fountains, or beasts, as her fancy dictated.

Alcinoo poma dare

(to give apples to Alcinous). To carry coals to Newcastle; sending cider to Herefordshire. The orchards of Alcinous, King of Corcyra (Corfu), were famous for their fruits.

Alcofribas

The pseudonym of Rabelais in his Gargantua and Pantagruel. Alcofribas Nasier is an anagram of “François Rabelais.” The introduction runs thus: “The inestimable life of the great Gargantua, father of Pantagruel, heretofore composed by M. Alcofribas, abstractor of the quintessence, a book full of pantagruelism.”

Alcuith

mentioned by the Venerable Bede, is Dumbarton.

Aldabella

or Aldabelle (in Orlando Furioso). Sister of Oliviero and Brandimarte, daughter of Monodantes, and wife of Orlando.

Aldabella.

A marchioness of Florence, who gave entertainment to the magnates of the city. She was very handsome, heartless, and arrogant. When Fazio became rich with Bartoldo's money, Aldabella inveigled him from his wife, and his wife, out of jealousy, accused her husband of being privy to Bartoldo's death. Fazio being condemned for murder and robbery, his wife Bianca accused Aldabella of inveigling him, and the marchioness was condemned by the Duke of Florence to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery. — Dean Milman: Fazio.

Aldebaran

The sun in Arabian mythology. In astronomy, the star called the Bull's eye in the constellation Taurus. (Arabic al the, debaran.)

Alderman

One of the seniors or elders. Now applied to a class of magistrates in corporate towns. In London an alderman is the chief magistrate in a ward appointed by election. There are also aldermen of the Country Council.

A turkey is called an alderman, both from its presence in aldermanic feast, and also because of its red and purple colours about the head and neck, which make it a sort of poultry alderman.

An alderman in chains, by a similar effort of wit, is a turkey hung with sausages.

Alderman

(An) A burglar's tool; a crowbar for forcing safes. So called from the high rank it holds with burglars.

Alderman

(An) A cant term for half—a—crown. An alderman as chief magistrate is half a king in his own ward; and half a crown is half a king.

Aldgate Pump

A draught on Aldgate Pump. A cheque with no effects. A worthless bill. The pun is on the word draught, which means either an order on a bank for money or a sup of liquor.

Aldibo—ronte—phosco—phornio

A courtier in Henry Carey's farce called Chronon—hoton—thologos.

Aldiger

(in Orlando Furioso). Buovo's son, of the house of Clarmont, who lived in Agrismont Castle. He was brother of Malgigi and Vivian; all Christians.

Aldine

(2 syl.) Leader of the second squadron of Arabs who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.

Aldine Editions

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Editions of the Greek and Latin classics, published and printed under the superintendence of Aldo Manuzio, his father—in—law Andrea of Asolo, and his son Paolo (1490—1597); most of them in small octavo, and all noted for their accuracy. The father invented the type called italics, once called Aldine, and first used in printing Virgil, 1501.

Aldingar

(Sir) Steward of Queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached her fidelity, and submitted to a combat to substantiate his charge; but an angel, in the shape of a child, established the queen's innocence. — Percy's Reliques.

Ale

is the Scandinavian öl, called ealo in our island. Beer, written bere, even in the reign of James I, is the Anglo—Saxon beor, from bere (barley). A beverage made from barley is mentioned by Tacitus and even Herodotus. Hops were introduced from Holland and used for brewing in 1524, but their use was prohibited by Act of Parliament in 1528 — a prohibition which soon fell into disuse. Ale is made from pale malt, whence its light colour; porter and stout from malt more highly dried. Beer is the general word, and in many parts of England includes ale, porter, and stout. The word ale was introduced by the Danes, and the word beer by the Teutons. Among London brewers beer means the dark form, called also stout or porter.

“Called ale among men; but by the gods called beer.” — The Alvismal.

Aleberry

a corruption of ale—bree. A drink made of hot ale, spice, sugar, and toast. Burns speaks of the barley bree (Anglo—Saxon brin, broth).

“Cause an aleberry to be made for her, and put into it powder of camphor.” — The Pathway to Health.

Ale—dagger

(An) A dagger used in self—defence in ale—house brawls.

“He that drinkes with cutlers must not be without his ale—dagger.” (1589). (See N.E.D.) Pierce Pennilesse says: — “All that will not ... weare ale—house daggers at your backes [should abstain from taverns].”

See Shakespeare Society, p.55.

Ale—draper

a tapster. Ale—drapery, the selling of ale, etc.

“No other occupation have I but to be an ale—draper.” — H.Chettle: Kind—harts' Dreame, 1592.

Ale Knight

(An) A knight of the ale—tub, a tippler, a sot.

Ale—silver

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A yearly tribute paid to the corporation of London, as a licence for selling ale.

Ale—stake

The pole set up before ale—houses by way of “sign.” A bush was very often fixed to its top. A tavern.

“A garland had he set upon his head

As great as it werein for an ale—stake.”

Chaucer.

“I know many an ale—stake.”

Hawkins: English Drama

, i.100.

Ale—wife

The landlady of an alehouse or ale—stand.

Alecto

One of the Furies, whose head was covered with snakes.

“Then like Alecto, terrible to view,

Or like Medusa, the Circassian grew.”

Hoole: Jerusalem Delivered, b. vi.

Alectorian Stone

(An). A stone said to be of talismanic power, found in the stomach of cocks. Those who possess it are strong, brave, and wealthy. Milo of Crotona owed his strength to this talisman. As a philtre it has the power of preventing thirst or of assuaging it. (Greek, alector, a cock.)

Alectromancy Divination by a cock. Draw a circle, and write in succession round it the letters of the alphabet, on each of which lay a grain of corn. Then put a cock in the centre of the circle, and watch what grains he eats. The letters will prognosticate the answer. Libanius and Jamblicus thus discovered who was to succeed the emperor Valens. The cock ate the grains over the letters t, h, e, o, d = Theod [orus]. Greek alector, cock; martheia, divination.

Aleria

(in Orlando Furioso). One of the Amazons, and the best beloved of the ten wives of Guido the Savage.

Alert

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To be on the watch. From the Latin erectus, part. of erigere, to set upright; Italian, erto, French, erte, a watch—tower. Hence the Italian starè allerta, the Spanish estar alerta, and the French être à l'erte, to be on the watch.

Alessio

The lover of Liza, in Bellini's opera of La Sonnambula (Scribe's libretto).

Alethes

(3 syl.) An ambassador from Egypt to King Aladine. He is represented as a man of low birth raised to the highest rank, subtle, false, deceitful, and wily. — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.

Alexander and the Robber

The robber's name was Diomedes. — Gesta Romanorum, cxlvi.

You are thinking of Parmenio, and I of Alexander — i.e.

, you are thinking what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those castigated, rewarded, or gifted; but I of my own position, and what punishment, reward, or gift is consistent with my rank. The allusion is to the tale about Parmenio and Alexander, when the king said, "I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give."

Only two Alexanders

. Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders — the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apelles."

The continence of Alexander

. Having gained the battle of Issus (B.C. 333) the family of King Darius fell into his hand; but he treated the ladies as queens, and observed the greatest decorum towards them. A eunuch, having escaped, told Darius of this noble continence, and Darius could not but admire such nobility in a rival. — Arrian Anabasis of Alexander, iv. 20. (See Continence)

Alexander

so Paris, son of Priam, was called by the shepherds who brought him up.

Alexander of the North

Charles XII of Sweden, so called from his military achievements. He was conquered at Pultowa, in Russia (1709), by Czar Peter the Great (1682—1718).

Repressing here

The frantic Alexander of the North."

Thomson: Winter.

The Persian Alexander

. Sandjar (1117.1158).

Alexander the Corrector.

Alexander Cruden, author of the “Concordance to the Bible,” who petitioned Parliament to constitute him “Corrector of the People,” and went about constantly with a sponge to wipe out the licentious, coarse, and profane chalk scrawls which met his eye. (1701—1770)

Alexander's Beard

A smooth chin, no beard at all. An Amazonian chin.

“Disgracèd yet with Alexander's bearde.” Gascoigne: The Steele Glas.

Alexandra

(in Orlando Furioso). Oronthea's daughter; the Amazon queen.

Alexandra

so Cassandra, daughter of Priam, is called. The two names are mere variants of each other.

Alexandrian

Anything from the East was so called by the old chroniclers and romancers, because Alexandria was the depôt from which Eastern stores reached Europe.

<Alexandrian Codex A manuscript of the Scriptures in Greek, which belonged to the library of the patriarchs of Alexandria, in Africa, A.D. 1098. In 1628 it was sent as a present to Charles I, and (in 1753) was placed in the British Museum. It is on parchment, in uncial letters, and contains the Septuagint version (except the Psalms), a part of the New Testament, and the Epistles of Clemens Romanus.

Alexandrian Library

Founded by Ptolemy Soter, in Alexandria, in Egypt. The tale is that it was burnt and partly consumed in 391; but when the city fell into the hands of the calif Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to “heat the baths of the city for six months.” It is said that it contained 700,000 volumes.

Alexandrian School

An academy of literature by Ptolemy, son of Lagos, especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians. Of its grammarians the most noted are Aristarchos, Harpocration, and Eratosthenes; and of its mathematicians, Ptolemy and Euclid, the former an astronomer, and the latter the geometer whose Elements are still very generally used.

Alexandrine Age

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

From A.D. 323 to 640, when Alexandria, in Egypt, was the centre of science and literature.

Alexandrine Philosophy

The system of the Gnostics, or Platonised form of Christianity.

Alexandrines

(4 syl.) Iambic verses of 12 or 13 syllables, divided into two parts between the sixth and seventh syllable; so called because they were first employed in a metrical romance of Alexander the Great, commenced by Lambert—li—Cors, and continued by Alexandre de Bernay, also called Alexandre de Paris. The final line of the Spenserian stanza is an Alexandrine.

“A needless Alexandrine ends the song,

Which, like a wounded snake | drags its slow length along.” Pope: Essay on Criticism, Part ii., lines 356—7.

Alexandrite

(4 syl.) A variety of chrysobery found in the mica—slate of the Urals. So named from Czar Alexander II (1818, 1855—1881), because it shows the Russian colours, green and red.

Alexis

(St.) Patron saint of hermits and beggars. The story goes that he lived on his father's estate as a hermit till death, but was never recognised.

He is represented, in Christian art, with a pilgrim's habit and staff. Sometimes he is drawn as if extended on a mat, with a letter in his hand, dying.

Alfader

(father of all) The most ancient and chief of the Scandinavian gods. Odin, father of the Æsir, or gods.

Alfana

(See Horse .)

Alfar

The good and bad genii of the Scandinavians.

Alfheim

(home of the good genii). A celestial city inhabited by the elves and fairies. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Alfonsin

An instrument for extracting balls. So called from Alfonse Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it. (1552.)

Alfonsine Tables

Astronomical tables constructed in 1252, by Isaac Hazan, a Jewish rabbi, who named them in honour of his patron, Alfonso X., King of Castile, surnamed "The Wise."

Alfonso

to whom Tasso dedicated his Jerusalem Delivered, was Alfonso d'Este, Duke of Ferrara.

Alfonso XI of Castile, whose "favourite" was Leonora de Guzman. Being threatened with excommunication unless he put her away (as Leonora was in love with Ferdinando, a brave officer), the king created Ferdinando Marquis of Montreal, and gave him the hand of his mistress in marriage. As soon as Ferdinando discovered who Leonora was, he restored her to the king, and retired to a monastery. — Donizetti's Opera, La Favorita.

Alfred's Scholars

Werfrith, Bishop of Worcester; Ethelstan and Werwulf, two Mercian priests; Plegmund (a Mercian), afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Asser a Welshman; Grimbald, a great French scholar, etc., invited over to England by King Alfred.

Algarsife

(3 syl.) Son of Cambuscan, and brother of Cambalo, who "won Theodora to wife." It was in the "Squire's Tale," by Chaucer, but was never finished. (See Canace.)

"Call him up that left half told

The story of Cambuscan bold,

Of Camball, and of Algarsife,

And who had Canace to wife."

Milton: Il Penseroso.

Algebra

is the Arabic al gebr (the equalisation), "the supplementing and equalising (process);" so called because the problems are solved by equations, and the equations are made by supplementary terms. Fancifully identified with the Arabian chemist Gebir.

Algrind

of Spenser, is meant for Grindal, Bishop of London in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign. He was a Marian exile, and not a very cordial co—operator with Bishop Parker.

"The hills where dwelled holy saints

I reverence and adore;

Not for themselves, but for the saints.

Which had been dead of yore.

And now they been to heaven for went.

Their good is with them go;

Their sample to us only lent,

That als we mought do so.

“Shepherds they weren of the best,

And lived in lowly leas,

And sith their souls be now at rest.

Why done we them disease?

Such one he was (as I have heard)

Old Algrind often saine,

That whilome was the first shepherd,

And lived with little gain.”

Eclogue

vii.

Alhambra

The palace of the ancient Moors in Granada. The word is the Arabic al—hamra (the red castle).

Ali

Cousin and son—in—law of Mahomet, the beauty of whose eyes is with the Persians proverbial; insomuch that the highest term they employ to express beauty is Ayn Hali (eyes of Ali). — Chardin.

Alias

“You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot,” one of Macheath's gang: he was Robin of Bagshot, alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty. — Gay: The Beggar's Opera.

Alibi (elsewhere). A plea of having been at another place at the time that an offence is alleged to have been committed.

“Never mind the character, and stick to the alley bi. Nothing like an alley bi, Sammy, nothing.” — Dickens Pickwick Papers.

Alibi Clock

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(An), 1887. A clock which strikes one hour, while the hands point to a different time, the real time being neither one nor the other.

Aliboron

Maitre Aliboron Mr. Jackass. Aliboron is the name of a jackass in La Fontaine's Fables. (See Gonin.)

Alice

The foster—sister of Robert le Diable, and bride of Rambaldo, the Norman troubadour. She came to Palermo to place in the duke's hand her mother's will, which he was enjoined not to read till he was a virtuous man. When Bertram, his fiend—father, tempted his son to evil, Alice proved his good genius; and when, at last, Bertram claimed his soul as the price of his ill deeds, Alice read the “will,” and won him from the evil one. — Meyerbeer's Opera, Roberto il Diavolo.

Alice Brand

Wife of Lord Richard, cursed with the “sleepless eye.” Alice signed Urgan the dwarf thrice with the sign of the cross, and he became “the fairest knight in all Scotland;” when Alice recognised in him her own brother. — Sir Walter Scott: The Lady of the Lake, iv. 12.

Alichino

(wing—drooped) A devil, in The Inferno of Dante.

Alick

and Sandie. Contractions of Alexander; the one being Alex' and the other 'xander.

Alicon

The seventh heaven, to which Azrael conveys the spirits of the just. (Mohometan mythology.)

Alien Priory

(An). A priory which owes allegiance to another priory. A sub—priory, like Rufford Abbey, Notts, which was under the prior of Rievaulx in Yorkshire.

Alifanfaron

the giant. Don Quixote attacked a flock of sheep, which he declared to be the army of the giant Alifanfaron. Similarly Ajax, in a fit of madness, fell upon a flock of sheep, which he mistook for Grecian princes.

Alilat

The name by which the Arabs adore nature, which they represent by a crescent moon.

Aliprando

(in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the Christian knights. Having discovered the armour of Rinaldo cast on one side, he took it to Godfrey, who very naturally inferred that Rinaldo had been slain. (See Gen.) xxxvii. 31—35.)

Aliris

Sultan of Lower Bucharia. Under the disguised name of Feramorz, he accompanied Lalla Rookh, his betrothed, from Delhi, and won her heart by his ways, and the tales he told on the journey. The lady fell in love with the poet, and was delighted to find, on the morning of the wedding, that Feramorz was, in fact, the sultan, her intended husband. — T. Moore: Lalla Rookh.

Al Kader

(the Divine decree). A particular night in the month Ramadhan, when the Arabs say that angels descend to earth, and Gabriel reveals to man the decrees of God. — Al Koran, ch. xcvi.

Alkahest

The hypothetical universal solvent. The word was invented by Paracelsus.

Al Rakim (pronounce Rah—keem) The dog in the legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus.

Al—Sirat

(Arabian, the path) The bridge over hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which every one who enters heaven must pass. (Mahometan theology.)

All

Everything. “Our all,” everything we possess.

“Our all is at stake.” Addison: State of War.

All and Some

“One and all.” (Old English, ealle æt somme, all at once, altogether.)

“Now stop your noses, readers, all and some.” Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel.

All and Sundry

All without exception.

“He invited all kind and sundry to partake freely of the oaten cake and ale.” — Hall Caine.

All cannot do all

Horace says, “Non omnia possumus omnes.” German proverb, “Ein jeder kann nicht alles.” All are not equally clever. Or rather, “Be not surprised that I cannot do what you can do, for we are not all exactly alike.”

All Fools' Day

(April 1st). (See April Fool .)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

All Fours

A game of cards; so called from the four points that are at stake, viz. High, Low, Jack, and Game.

To go on all fours

is to crawl about on knees and hands like a little child.

It does not go on all fours means it does not suit in every minute particular; it does not fully satisfy the demand. It limps as a quadruped which does not go on all its four legs. Omnis comparatio claudicat (all similes limp).

“No simile can go on all—fours.” Macaulay.

All—hallown Summer

The second summer, or the summerly time which sets in about All—Hallows—tide. Called by the French, L'été de St. Martin (from October 9th to November 11th). Also called St. Luke's Summer (St. Luke's Day is October 18th). The Indian summer. Shakespeare uses the term —

“Farewell, thou latter spring; farewell, All—hallown Summer!” 1 Henry IV.i.2.

All Hallow's Day

(November 1st). The French call it. Toussaint, which we have translated All Saints' Day. Hallow—mas is All—Saints' festival. (Anglo—Saxon, hálig, but Hálig—mónáth was september, and Hálig—doeg was simply a Holy—day)

All Hallows' Eve

The Scotch tradition is, that those born on All Hallows' Eve have the gift of double sight, and commanding powers over spirits. Mary Avenel, on this supposition, is made to see the White Lady, invisible to less gifted visions.

“Being born on All—hallows' Eve, she (Mary Avenel) was supposed to be invested with power over the invisible world.” (See Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery, chap. xiv.)

All in all

He is all in all to me, that is, the dearest object of my affection. God shall be all in all means all creation shall be absorbed or gathered into God. The phrase is also used adverbially, meaning altogether, as: —

“Take him for all in all,

I shall not look upon his like again.” Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

All in the Wrong

A drama, by Murphy, borrowed from Destouches, the French dramatist.

All is lost that is put in a riven dish. In Latin, “Pertusum quiequid infunditur in dolium, perit.” (It is no use helping the insolvent.)

All is not gold that glitters or glisters Trust not to appearances. In Latin, “Nulla fides fronti.”

“Not all that tempts your wandering eyes

And heedless hearts is lawful prize,

Nor all that glisters gold.”

Gray: The Cat and the Gold Fish

All my Eye

(and) Betty Martin All nonsense. Joe Miller says that a Jack Tar went into a foreign church, where he heard some one uttering these words — Ah! mihi, beate Martine (Ah! [grant] me, Blessed Martin). On giving an account of his adventure, Jack said he could not make much out of it, but it seemed to him very like “All my eye and Betty Martin.” Grose has “Mihi beatæ Martinis” [sic]. The shortened phrase, “All my eye,” is very common.

All one

The same in effect. Answers the same purpose.

All—overish

A familiar expression meaning, all over ill at ease. “I feel all—overish,” not exactly ill, but uncomfortable all over. The precursor of a fever, influenza, ague, etc.

All Saints

or All Hallows. In 610 the Pope of Rome ordered that the heathen Pantheon should be converted into a Christian church, and dedicated to the honour of all martyrs. The festival of All Saints was first held on May 1st, but in the year 834 it was changed to November 1st. “Hallows” is from the Anglo—Saxon hālig (holy).

All Serene

derived from the Spanish word seréna. In Cuba the word is used as a countersign by sentinels, and is about equivalent to our “All right,” or “All's well.”

All Souls' Day

The 2nd of November, so called because the Roman Catholics on that day seek by prayer and almsgiving to alleviate the sufferings of souls in purgatory. It was first instituted in the monastery of Clugny, in 993.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

According to tradition, a pilgrim, returning from the Holy Land, was compelled by a storm to land on a rocky island, where he found a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs of the island was an opening into the infernal regions through which huge flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odilo, abbot of Clugny, of this; and the abbot appointed the day following, which was November 2nd, to be set apart for the benefit of souls in purgatory.

All the go

All the fashion. Drapers will tell you that certain goods “go off well.” They are in great demand, all the mode, quite in vogue.

“Her carte is hung in the West—end shops,

With her name in full on the white below;

And all day long there's a big crowd stops

To look at the lady who's all the go.”

Sims: Ballads of Babylon (“Beauty and the Beast”).

All there

Said of a sharp—witted person. Not all there, said of one of weak intellect. The one has all his wits about him, the other has not.

All for a Song!

The exclamation of Burleigh, when Queen Elizabeth ordered him to give #100 to Spencer for a royal gratuity.

All to break (Judges ix. 53). “A certain woman cast a piece of millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to brake his skull” does not mean for the sake of breaking his skull, but that she wholly smashed his skull. A spurious form, owing its existence to a typographical mistake. The to really belongs to the verb; and in the last passage quoted it should be read “all to—brake.” The to is a Teutonic particle, meaning asunder, in pieces. It is very common in Old English, where we have “To—bite,” i.e. bite in pieces, to—rend, to—tear. All is the adverb = entirely, wholly. So “all to be battered” = wholly battered to pieces. All—to—frozen. Here to—frozen is intensitive. So in Latin dis—crucior = valde crucior. Plautus (in his Menoechmi, ii. line 24) uses the phrase “dis—caveas malo,” i.e. be fully on your guard, etc., be very much beware of.

“Mercutio's icy hand had all—to—frozen mine” i.e. wholly frozen up mine). — Romeo and Juliet (1362).

“Her wings were al—to—ruffled and sometimes impaired.” — Milton: Comus.

All waters

(I am for). I am a Jack of all trades, can turn my hand to anything, a good all—round man. Like a fish which can live in salt or fresh water.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“I am for all waters.” Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iv. 2.

All—work

A maid of all work. A general servant who does all the work of a house; at once nurse—maid, house—maid, and cook.

Alla

or Allah (that is, al—ilah). “The adorable.” The Arabic name of the Supreme Being.

“The city won for Allah from the Giaour.” Byron: Childe Harold, ii, 77.

Alla Akbar

Allah is most mighty. The cry of the Arabs. — Ockley.

Allan—a—Dale

The minstrel of Robin Hood's yeomen. He was assisted by Robin Hood in carrying off his bride, when on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Allemand

“Une querelle d'Allemand,” a quarrel about nothing. We call pot valour “Dutch courage.”

Allen

(See Allworthy .)

Allestree

Richard Allestree, of Derby, was a noted almanac maker in Ben Jonson's time.

“A little more

Would fetch all his astronomy from Allestree.” Ben Jonson: Magnetic Lady, iv. 2 (1632).

Alley

(The) The Stock Exchange Alley.

“John Rive, after many active years in the Alley, retired to the Continent, and died at the age of 118.” — Old and New London, p. 476.

Alliensis

(Dies) (June 16th, B.C. 390), when the Romans were cut to pieces by the Gauls near the banks of the river Allia; and ever after held to be a dies nefastus , or unlucky day.

Alligator

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). Sir Walter Raleigh called these creatures lagartos, and Ben Jonson alligartas.

“To the present day the Europeans in Ceylon apply the term alligator to what are in reality crocodiles.” — J. E. Tennent: Ceylon (vol. I. part 2, chap. iii. p. 186.

Alligator Pears

(the fruit of Persea gratissima) is a curious corruption. The aboriginal Carib word for the tree is “aouacate,” which the Spanish discoverers pronounced “avocado,” and English sailors called “alligator,” as the nearest approach which occurred to them.

Alliteration

DR. BETHEL OF ETON.

CARDINAL WOLSEY.

“Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred,

How high his Honour holds his haughty head.”

Hucbald composed an alliterative poem on Charles the Bald, every word of which begins with c.

Henry Harder composed a poem of 100 lines, in Latin hexameters, on cats, every word of which begins with c. The title is Canum cum Catis certamen carmine compositum currents calamo C Catulli Caninii. The first line is —

“Cattorum canimus certamina clara canumqua.”

Hamonius wrote the Certamen catholicum cum Calvinistis, every word of which begins with c.

It is a curious coincidence that the names of these three men all begin with H.

In the Materia more Magistralis every word begins with m.

Placentius, the Dominican, who died 1548, wrote a poem of 258 Latin hexameters, called Pugna Porcorum, every word of which begins with p. It begins thus: —

“Plaudite, Porcelli, porcorum pigra propago.”

Which may be translated —

“Praise, Paul, prize pig's prolific progeny.”

Tusser, who died 1580, has a rhyming poem of twelve lines, every word of which begins with t.

The Rev. B. Poulter, prebendary of Winchester, composed in 1828 the famous alliterative alphabetic poem in rhymes. Each word of each line begins with the letter of the alphabet which it represents. It begins thus: —

“An Austrian army awfully arrayed,
Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade;
Cussack commanders, cannonading come,
Dealing destruction's devastating doom; ...”

Some ascribe this alliterative poem to Alaric A. Watts (1820). (See H. Southgate, Many Thoughts on Many Things.)

Another attempt of the same kind begins thus: —

“About an age ago, as all agree,
Beauteous Belinda, brewing best Bohea
Carelessly chattered, controverting clean,
Dublin's derisive, disputatious dean ...”

Allodials

Lands which are held by an absolute right, without even the burden of homage or fidelity; opposed to feudal. The word is Teutonic — all—od all (property).

Allopathy

is in opposition to Homoeopathy. The latter word is from the Greek, homoeon pathos, similar disease; and the former is allo pathos, a different disease. In one case, “like is to cure like”; and in the latter, the disease is cured by its “antidote.”

Alls

The five Alls. A public—house sign. It has five human figures, with a motto to each:

Number Figure Motto

- (1) A king in his regalia I govern all.
- (2) A bishop, in his pontificals I pray for all.
- (3) A lawyer, in his gown I plead for all.
- (4) A soldier in regimentals I fight for all.

(5) A labourer, with his tools I pay for all.

Several of these signs still exist.

Alls.

Tap—droppings. The refuse of all sorts of spirits drained from the glasses, or spilt in drawing. The mixture is sold in gin—houses at a cheap rate.

Allworth

In A New Way to Pay Old Debts, by Massinger.

Allworthy

in Fielding's Tom Jones, is designed for the author's friend, Ralph Allen, of Bristol.

“Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,

Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.”

Pope: Epilogue to Sat. i. 135, 136.

Alma

(the human soul), queen of “Body Castle,” beset by enemies for seven years (the Seven Ages of Man). The besiegers are a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations, and silly conceits. Alma conducted Arthur and Sir Guyon over her castle. “The divine part of a man,” says Spenser, “is circular, a circle being the emblem of eternity; but the mortal part triangular, as it consists of three things — blood, flesh, and bones.” — Prior's Poem.

Alma Mater

A collegian so calls the university of which he is a member. The words are Latin for “fostering mother.”

“Expulsion from his Alma Mater.” — The Collegian and the Porter.

Almack's

A suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (London), built in 1765 by a Scotchman named Macall, who inverted his name to obviate all prejudice and hide his origin. Balls, presided over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, used to be given at these rooms; and to be admitted to them was as great a distinction as to be presented at Court. The rooms were afterwards known as Willis's, from the name of the next proprietor, and used chiefly for large dinners. They were closed in 1890

Almagest

The Syntaxis—megiste of Ptolemy, translated by the Arabians in 800, by order of the calif Al Maimon, and then called Al—maghesti, i.e. “the megiste.” It contains numerous observations and problems of geometry and astronomy: It is very rare, and more precious than gold.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Alman

a German. The French Allemand, a German, which, of course, is the classic Alamani or Alamanni. Similarly, Albany = Germany, French, Allemagne.

“Chonodomarius and Vestralpus, Aleman kings, ... sat them downe neere unto Argentoratum.” Holland: Ammianus Marcellius.

“Now Fulko comes ... And dwelt in Amany.” — Harrington: Orlando Furioso, iii. 30.

Almanac

is the Arabic al manac (the diary). Verstegen says it is the Saxon al—mon—aght (all moon heed), and that it refers to the tallies of the full and new moons kept by our Saxon ancestors. One of these tallies may still be seen at St. John's College, Cambridge.

The Man i' the Almanac stuck with pins

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Nat. Lee), is a man marked with points referring to signs of the zodiac, and intended to indicate the favourable and unfavourable times of letting blood.

I shan't consult your almanac

(French), I shall not come to you to know what weather to expect. The reference is to the prognostications of weather in almanacs.

Almesbury

It was in a sanctuary at Almesbury that Queen Guenever took refuge, after her adulterous passion for Lancelot was revealed to the king (Arthur). Here she died; but her body was buried at Glastonbury.

Almighty Dollar

Washington Irving first made use of this expression, in his sketch of a "Creole Village" (1837).

"The almighty dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land. ..." — W. Irving: Wolfert's Roost, Creole Village, p. 40.

Ben Jonson speaks of "almighty gold."

Almond Tree

Grey hairs. The Preacher thus describes old age: —

"In the day when the keepers of the house (the hands) shall tremble, and the strong men (the legs) bow themselves, and the grinders (the teeth) cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows (the eyes) be darkened ... and the almond—tree shall flourish (grey hairs on a bald pate), and the grasshopper be a burden, and desire shall fail ... when the silver cord (the spinal marrow) shall be loosed, the golden bowl (intellect) broken, and the pitcher broken at the cistern (the pulse of the heart stopped)." — Eccles. xii: 3—6.

Almonry

The place where the almoner resides, or where alms are distributed. An almoner is a person whose duty it is to distribute alms, which, in ancient times, consisted of one—tenth of the entire income of monastery. (See Ambry.)

Alms

Gifts to the poor.

Dr. Johnson says the word has no singular; whereas Todd says it has no plural. Like riches, it is wholly singular in construction, but is used both as a noun singular and noun plural. Of course, it is Almos—ine, almos—ie, Almoose, almesse, almes, alms, the s is not the plural suffix. Riches is the French richesse. Both words are singular, but, as nouns of multitude, prefer the plural construction. (Latin alimosina, Greek eleemosyne, from the verb eleo, I pity.)

Alms Basket

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To live on the alms basket. To live on charity.

Alms—drink

Another's leavings; for alms consists of broken bread and the residue of drink. It is also applied to the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another.

Alms—fee

Peter's pence, or Rome scot. Abolished in England by Henry VIII.

Alms—house

A house where paupers are supported at the public expense; a poor—house. Also a house set apart for the aged poor free of rent.

“Only, alas! the poor who had neither friends nor attendants. Crept away to die in the alms—house, home of the homeless.” Longfellow: Evangeline, part ii. 5, 2.

Alms—man

One who lives on alms.

Alnaschar Dream (An)

Counting your chickens before they are hatched. Alnaschar, the barber's fifth brother, invested all his money in a basket of glass—ware, on which he was to make a certain profit. The profit, being invested, was to make more, and this was to go on till he grew rich enough to marry the vizier's daughter. Being angry with his imaginary wife he gave a kick, overturned his basket, and broke all his wares.

“To indulge in Alnaschar—like dreams of compound interest ad infinitum.” — The Times.

Alnaschar of Modern Literature

Coleridge has been so called because he “dreamt” his Kubla Khan, and wrote it out next morning. (1772—1834.)

Probably he had been reading Purchas's Pilgrimage, for none can doubt the resemblance of the two pieces.

Aloe

A Hebrew word, Greek aloe. A very bitter plant; hence the proverb, Plus aloes quam mellis habet, “(Life) has more bitters than sweets.” The French say, “La côte d'Adam contient plus d'aloès que de miel,” where côte d'Adam, of course, means woman or one's wife.

Socotrine Aloes came originally from the island called Socotra, in the Indian Ocean.

Along—shore Men or Longshoremen, that is stevedores (2 syl.), or men employed to load and unload vessels.

Alonzo of Aguilar

When Fernando, King of Aragon, was laying siege to Granada, after chasing Zagal from the gates, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonzo, “the lowmost of the dons,” undertook the task, but was cut down by the Moors. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijera, and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpuxarra.

Aloof

Stand aloof, away. A sea term, meaning originally to bear to windward, or luff. (Norwegian, German, etc., luft, wind, breeze.)

Alorus

so the Chaldeans called their first king, who, they say, came from Babylon.

A l'outrance

To the uttermost. (Anglo—French for à outrance.)

“A champion has started up to maintain à l'outrance her innocence of the great offence.” — Standard.

Alp

The Adrian renegade, a Venetian by extraction, who forswore the Christian faith to become a commander in the Turkish army. He led the host to the siege of Corinth, while that country was under the dominion of the Doge. He loved Francesca, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth, but she died of a broken heart because he deserted his country and was an apostate. The renegade was shot in the siege. — Byron: Siege of Corinth.

Alph

A mythical “sacred river in Xanadu,” which ran “through caverns measureless to man.” — Coleridge: Kubla Khan.

Alpha

“I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last” (Rev. i. 8). “Alpha” is the first, and “O—mega” the last letter of the Greek alphabet. A &hgr;.

Alphabet

This is the only word compounded of letters only. The Greek alpha (a) beta (b); our A B C (book), etc.

The number of letters in an alphabet varies in different languages. Thus there are:

The Chinese have no alphabet, but about 20,000 syllabic characters.

Ezra vii. 21 contains all the letters of the English language, presuming I and J to be identical. Even the Italian alphabet is capable of more than seventeen trillion combinations; that is, 17 followed by eighteen other figures, as —

17,000,000,000,000,000,000;

while the English alphabet will combine into more than twenty—nine thousand quatrillion combinations; that is, 29 followed by twenty—seven other figures, as —

29,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000.

Yet we have no means of marking the several sounds of our different vowels; nor can we show how to pronounce such simple words as foot (pull and dull), sugar (father and rather), (gin and be—gin), calm, Bourges, Boeuf in “Boeuf—gras,” oeufs, and thousands of other words.

We want the restoration of th to distinguish between this and thin; a Greek ch to distinguish between Church and Christ, two g's (one soft and one hard), two c's, two o's, half a dozen a's, and so on.

Take a, we have fate, fat, Thames (e), war (o), salt (au), etc. So with e, we have prey (a), met (e), England (i), sew (o), herb (u), etc. The other vowels are equally indefinite.

Alpheos and Arethu sa

The Greek fable says that Alpheos, the river—god, fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, who fled from him in affright. The god pursued under the sea, but the nymph was changed into a spring, which comes up in the harbour of Syracuse.

“We have seen a moustachioed Alpheos, at Ramsgate, pursue an affrighted Arethusa.” — London Review.

Alpheus

(in Orlando Furioso). A magician and prophet in the army of Charlemagne, slain in sleep by Cloridano.

Alphesibea

or “Arsinöe,” wife of Alcmeon. She gave her spouse the fatal collar, the source of numberless evils.

So was the necklace of Harmonia, and so were the collar and veil of Eriphle, wife of Amphiaraos.

Alphonso

etc. (See Alfonso, etc.)

Alpleich

or “Elfenreigen” (the weird spirit—song), that music which some hear before death. Faber refers to it in his Pilgrims of the Night.

“Hark, hark, my soul! Angelic songs are swelling.”

Pope also says, in the Dying Christian —

Hark! they whisper; angels say,

Sister spirit, come away.”

Alpue, Alpieu

(Alpu), in the game of Basset, doubling the stake on a winning card.

“What pity 'tis those conquering eyes

Which all the world subdue,

Should, while the lover gazing dies,

Be only on alpue.”

Etherege: Basset

Alquife

(al—kefy). A famous enchanter, introduced into the romances of ancient times, especially those relating to Amadis of Gaul.

Alrinach The demon who presides over floods and earthquakes, rain and hail. It is this demon who causes shipwrecks. When visible, it is in a female form. (Eastern mythology.)

Alruna—wife

(An) The Alrunes were the lares or penates of the ancient Germans. An Alruna—wife was the household goddess of a German family. An Alruna—maiden is a household maiden goddess.

“She (Hypatia) looked as fair as the sun, and talked like an Alruna—wife.” — Kingsley: Hypatia , chap. xii.

Alsatia

The Whitefriars sanctuary for debtors and law—breakers. Cunningham thinks the name is borrowed from Alsace, in France, which being a frontier of the Rhine, was everlastingly the seat of war and the refuge of the disaffected. Sir Walter Scott, in his Fortunes of Nigel, has described the life and state of this rookery. He has borrowed largely from Shadwell's comedy, The Squire of Alsatia. (See Petand.)

Alsvitur

(See Horse .)

Altamorus

(in Jerusalem Delivered). King of Samarcand, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. “He was supreme in courage as in might.” (Book xvii.) He surrendered himself to Godfrey. (Book xx.)

Altan Kol

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Gold River (Thibet). So called from the gold which abounds in its sands.

Altar

(An), in Christian art. St. Stephen (the Pope), and Thomas Becket are represented as immolated before an altar. St. Canute is represented as lying before an altar. St. Charles Borromeo is represented as kneeling before an altar. St. Gregory (the Pope) is represented as offering sacrifice before an altar. And the attribute of Victor is an altar overthrown, in allusion to his throwing down a Roman altar in the presence of the Emperor Maximian.

Led to the altar, i.e.

married. Said of a lady. The altar is the communion—table railed off from the body of the church, where marriages are solemnised. The bride is led up the aside to the rail.

Alter ego

My double or counterpart. In The Corsican Brothers, the same actor performs the two brothers, the one being the alter ego of the other. (Latin, "a second I"). One who has full powers to act for another.

Althæa's Brand

a fatal contingency. Althæa's son was to live so long as a log of wood, then on the fire, remained unconsumed. She contrived to keep the log unconsumed for many years, but being angry one day with Meleager, she pushed it into the midst of the fire, and it was consumed in a few minutes. Meleager died at the same time. — Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii. 4.

"The fatal brand Althæa burned." Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, Act i. 1.

Althea

(Divine). The divine Althea of Richard Lovelace was Lucy Sacheverell, called by the poet, "Lucretia."

"When love with unconfined wings

Hovers within my gates,

And my divine Althea brings

To whisper at my gates."

The "grates" referred to were the prison grates. Lovelace was thrown into prison by the Long Parliament for his petition from Kent in favour of the king.

Altisidora (in the "Curious Impertinent"), an episode in Don Quixote.

Altis

The plot of ground on which the Greeks held their public games.

Alto relieveo

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Italian for “high relief.” A term used in sculpture for figures in wood, stone, marble, etc., so cut as to project at least one—half from the tablet. It should be rilievo (3 syl.).

Alumbrado

a perfectionist; so called from a Spanish sect which arose in 1575, and claimed special illumination. (Spanish, meaning “illuminated,” “enlightened”).

Alvina Weeps

or “Hark! Alvina weeps,” i.e. the wind howls loudly, a Flemish saying. Alvina was the daughter of a king, who was cursed by her parents because she married unsuitably. From that day she roamed about the air invisible to the eye of man, but her moans are audible.

Alyface

(Annot) servant of Dame Christian Custance, the gay widow, in Udall's comedy Ralph Roister Doister.

Alzirdo

(in Orlando Furioso). King of Tremizen, in Africa. He was overthrown by Orlando on his way to join the allied army of Agramant.

A.M.

or M.A. When the Latin form is intended the A comes first, as Artium Magister; but where the English form is meant the M precedes, as Master of Arts.

Amadis of Gaul

The hero of a romance in prose of the same title, originally written in Portuguese in four books. These four were translated into Spanish by Montalvo, who added a fifth. Subsequent romancers added the exploits and adventures of other knights, so as to swell the romance to fourteen books. The French version is much larger still, one containing twenty—four books, and another running through seven volumes. The original author was Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403.

The hero, called the “Lion—knight,” from the device on his shield, and “Beltenebros” (darkly beautiful), from his personal appearance, was a love—child of Perion, King of Gaul, and Elizena, Princess of Brittany. He is represented as a poet and musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight—errant and a king, the very model of chivalry.

Other names by which Amadis was called were the Lovely Obscure, the Knight of the Burning Sword, the Knight of the Dwarf, etc. Bernardo, in 1560, wrote “Amadigi di Gaula.”

Amadis of Greece

A supplemental part of the romance called Amadis of Gaul, added by Feliciano de Silva.

Amaimon

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.) One of the chief devils whose dominion is on the north side of the infernal gulf. He might be bound or restrained from doing hurt from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening.

“Amaimon sounds well; Lucifer well.”

, ii. 2.

<Amalfitan Code A compilation of maritime laws, compiled in the eleventh century at Amalfi, then an important trading town.

Amalivaca

An American spirit, who had seven daughters. He broke their legs to prevent their running away, and left them to people the forests.

Amalthea

(See Sibyline Books.)

Amalthea's Horn The cornucopia or horn of plenty. The infant Zeus was fed with goats' milk by Amalthea, one of the daughters of Melisseus, King of Crete. Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat's horns, and gave it to Amalthea, promising that the possessor should always have in abundance everything desired. (See Aegis.)

Amanda

the impersonation of love in Thomson's Spring, is Miss Young, afterwards married to Admiral Campbell.

Amarant

A cruel giant slain by Guy of Warwick. — Guy and Amarant, Percy's Reliques.

Amaranth

Clement of Alexandria says — Amarantus flos, symbolum est immortalitatis. The word is from the Greek amarantos (everlasting). So called because its flowers never fade like other flowers, but retain to the last much of their deep blood—red colour.

“Immortal amarant — a flower which once

In Paradise, fast by the tree of life,

Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence, To heaven removed, where first it grew, there grows And flowers aloft, shading the fount of life...

With these, that never fade, the spirits elect

Bind their resplendent locks.” Milton: Paradise Lost iii. 353—61.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In 1653 Christina, Queen of Sweden, instituted the Order of the “Knights of the Amaranth,” but it ceased to exist at the death of the Queen. Among the ancients it was the symbol of immortality.

The best known species are “Love lies bleeding” (amarantus caudatus), and “Prince's feather” (amarantus hypochondriacus). “Cock's comb” is now ranked under the genus Celosia.

Amaryllis

A pastoral sweetheart. The name is borrowed from the pastorals of Theocritus and Virgil.

“To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.” Milton: Lycidas, 68.

Amasis

(Ring of) same as Polycrates' Ring. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Amasis, King of Egypt, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea an engraved ring of extraordinary value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which the ring was found. Amasis now renounced all friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards, a satrap, having entrapped the too fortunate despot, put him to death by crucifixion. — Herodotus, iii. 40.

Amati

A first-rate violin; properly, one made by Amati of Cremona (c. 1600). (See Cremona.)

Amaurot

(Greek, the shadowy or unknown place), the chief city in Utopia (no—place), a political novel by Sir Thomas More. Rabelais, in his Pantagruel, had previously introduced the word, and tells us that the Amaurots conquered the Dipsodes (or Duplicians).

Amaurote

a bridge in Utopia. Sir Thomas More says he could not recollect whether Raphael Hyghloday told him it was 500 paces or 300 paces long; and he requested his friend Peter Giles, of Antwerp, to put the question to the adventurer.

“I cannot recollect whether the reception room of the Spaniard's Castle in the Air is 200 or 300 feet long. I will get the next aeronaut who journeys to the moon to take the exact dimensions for me, and will memorialise the learned society of Laputa.” — Dean Swift: Gulliver's Travels.

Amazement

Not afraid with any amazement (1 Peter iii. 6), introduced at the close of the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer. The meaning is, you will be God's children so long as you do his bidding, and are not drawn aside by any distraction. No doubt St. Peter meant “by any terror of persecution.” Cranmer, being so afraid, was drawn aside from the path of duty.

Amazia

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable meant for Charles II, in Pordage's poem of Azaria and Hushai. We are told by the poet, "his father's murtherers he destroyed;" and then he preposterously adds —

"Beloved of all for merciful was he,

Like God, in the superlative degree."

To say that such a selfish, promise—breaking, impious libertine was "like God, in the superlative degree," is an outrage against even poetical licence and court flattery.

Amazon

A horsewoman, a fighting or masculine woman. The word means without breast, or rather, "deprived of a pap." According to Grecian story, there was a nation of women in Africa of a very warlike character. There were no men in the nation; and if a boy was born, it was either killed or sent to his father, who lived in some neighbouring state. The girls had their right breasts burnt off, that they might the better draw the bow.

"These dreadful Amazons, gallant viragoes who ... carried victorious arms ... into Syria and Asia Minor." — J. E. Chambliss: David Livingstone (Introduction, p. 24).

Amazonia

In South America, originally called Maranon. The Spaniards first called it Orellana; but after the women joined their husbands in attacking the invaders, the Spaniards called the people Amazons and the country Amazonia.

Amazonian Chin

(An) A beardless chin, like that of a woman warrior.

"When with his Amazonian chin he drove

The bristled lips before him."

Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 2.

Ambassador

a practical joke played on greenhorns aboard ship. A tub full of water is placed between two stools, and the whole being covered with a green cloth, a sailor sits on each stool, to keep the cloth tight. The two sailors represent Neptune and Amphitrite, and the greenhorn, as ambassador, is introduced to their majesties. He is given the seat of honour between them; but no sooner does he take his seat than the two sailors rise, and the greenhorn falls into the tub, amidst the laughter of the whole crew.

Amber

This fossilised vegetable resin is, according to legend, a concretion of birds' tears. The birds were the sisters of Meleager, who never ceased weeping for the death of their brother. — Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii. line 270, etc.

"Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber

That ever the sorrowing sea—bird hath wept.”

T. Moore: Fire Worshippers.

Amber,

a repository. So called because insects and small leaves are preserved in amber.

“You may be disposed to preserve it in your amber.” — Notes and Querries. — W. Dowe. “Pretty! in amber, to observe the forms

Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms,

The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,

But wonder how the devil they got there.”

Pope: Ep. to Arbuthnot

, 169—72.

Amberabad

Amber—city, one of the towns of Jinnistan, or Fairy Land.

Ambes—as or Ambes—ace Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck. (Latin, ambo—asses, both or two aces.)

“I had rather be in this choice than throw ames—ace for my life.” — All's Well, etc., ii. 3.

Ambi—dexter properly means both hands right hands; a double dealer; a juror who takes money from both parties for his verdict; one who can use his left hand as deftly as his right.

Ambition

strictly speaking, means “the going from house to house” (Latin, ambitio, going about canvassing). In Rome it was customary, some time before an election came on, for the candidates to go round to the different dwellings to solicit votes, and those who did so were ambitious of office.

Ambree

(Mary) An English heroine, who has immortalised her name by her valour at the siege of Ghent, in 1584. Her name is a proverbial one for a woman of heroic spirit.

“My daughter will be valiant,

And prove a very Mary Ambry i' the business.” Ben Jonson: Tale of a Tub, i. 4.

Ambrose

(St.) represented in Christian art in the costume of a bishop. His attributes are (1) a bee—hive, in allusion to the legend that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth when lying in his cradle; (2) a Scourge, by which he expelled the Arians from Italy.

The penance he inflicted on the Emperor Theodosius has been represented by Rubens, a copy of which, by Vandyck, is in the National Gallery

Ambrosia

The food of the gods (Greek, a privative, brotos, mortal); so called because it made them not mortal, i.e. it made them immortal. Anything delicious to the taste or fragrant in perfume is so called from the notion that whatever is used by the celestials must be excellent.

“A table where the heaped ambrosia lay.”

Homer, by Bryant: Odyssey

, v. line 141.

“Husband and wife must drink from the cup of conjugal life; but they must both taste the same ambrosia, or the same gall.”

R. C. Houghton: Women of the Orient

, part iii.

Ambrosian Chant

The choral music introduced from the Eastern to the Western Church by St. Ambrose, the Bishop of Milan, in the fourth century. It was used till Gregory the Great changed it for the Gregorian.

Ambrosian Library

A library in Milan, so called in compliment of St. Ambrose, the patron saint.

Ambrosio

the hero of Lewis's romance, called The Monk. Abbot of the Capuchins at Madrid. The temptations of Matilda overcome his virtue, and he proceeds from crime to crime, till at last he sells his soul to the devil. Ambrosio, being condemned to death by the Inquisition, is released by Lucifer; but no sooner is he out of prison than he is dashed to pieces on a rock.

Ambry a cupboard, locker, or recess. In church, for keeping vestments, books, or other articles. Used by a confusion for almonry, or niche in the wall where alms, etc., were deposited. Now used for holding the sacramental plate, consecrated oil, and so on. The secret drawers of an escritoire are called ambries. (Archaic English almary, Latin armarium, French armoire.)

“Ther avarice hath almaries,

And yren—bouden cofres.”

Piers Ploughman, p. 288.

Almonry

is from the Latin eleemosynarium, a place for alms.

“The place wherein this Chapel or Almshouse stands was called the “Eleemosinary” or Almonry, now corrupted into Ambrey, for that the alms of the Abbey are there distributed to the poor.” — Stow: Survey.

Ambuscade

(3 syl.) is the Italian imboscata (concealed in a wood).

Amedamnée

(French), a scape—goat.

“He is the ame damnée of everyone about the court — the scapegoat, who is to carry away all their iniquities.” — Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. 48.

Amedieu

(3 syl.) “Friends of God;” a religious body in the Church of Rome, founded in 1400. They wore no breeches, but a grey cloak girded with a cord, and were shod with wooden shoes.

Amelia

A model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called. It is said that the character is intended for his own wife.

Amelon

A Chaldean hero, who reigned thirteen sares. A sare = 3,600 years. — Banier: Mythology, vol. i.

Amenon is another hero of Chaldea, who reigned 12 sares. Amphis reigned 6 sares.

Amen Corner

London, the end of Paternoster Row, where the monks finished their Pater Noster, on Corpus Christi Day, as they went in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral. They began in Paternoster Row with the Lord's prayer in Latin, which was continued to the end of the street; then said Amen, at the corner or bottom of the Row; then turning down Ave—Maria Lane, commenced chanting the “Hail, Mary!” then crossing Ludgate, they chanted the Credo. Amen Lane no longer exists.

Amende honorable in France, was a degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons, who were brought into court with a rope round their neck, and made to beg pardon of God, the king, and the court.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Now the public acknowledgment of the offence is all that is required.

Amenthes

(3 syl.) The Egyptian Hades. The word means hiding—place.

American Flag

The American Congress resolved (June 14, 1777), that the flag of the United States should have thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, to represent the thirteen States of the Union, together with thirteen white stars, on a blue ground. General Washington's escutcheon contained two stripes, each alternated with red and white, and, like the American stars, those of the General had only five points instead of six. A new star is now added for each new State, but the stripes remain the same.

However, before the separation the flag contained thirteen stripes of alternate red and white to indicate the thirteen colonies: and the East India Company flag, as far back as 1704, had thirteen stripes. The Company flag was cantoned with St. George's Cross, the British American flag with the Union Jack.

American Peculiarities

American States

The Americans are rich in nicknames. Every state has, or has had, its sobriquet. The people of:

American States

The eight states which retain the Indian names of the chief rivers, as: Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

Amethea

(See Horse .)

Amethyst

A species of rock—crystal supposed to prevent intoxication (Greek, a—methusta, the antidote of intoxication). Drinking—cups made of amethyst were supposed to be a charm against inebriety.

It was the most cherished of all precious stones by Roman matrons, from the superstition that it would preserve inviolate the affection of their husbands.

Amiable Numbers

(See Amicable , etc.)

Amicable Numbers

Numbers which are mutually equal to the sum of all their aliquot parts: as 220, 284. The aliquot parts of 220 are 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 20, 22, 44, 55, 110, the sum of which is 284. Again, the aliquot parts of 284 are 1, 2, 4, 71, 142, the sum of which is 220.

Amicus curiae

(Latin, a friend to the court). One in the court who informs the judge of some error he has detected, or makes some suggestion to assist the court.

Amicus Plato, sed magis amica Veritas

(Plato I love, but I love Truth more) A noble dictum attributed to Aristotle, but certainly a very free translation of a phrase in the Nicomachean Ethics ("Where both are friends, it is right to prefer Truth")

Amiel

(3 syl.) A form of the name of Eliam (friend of God). In Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel it is meant for Sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons. (2 Sam. xxii. 34.)

"Who can Amiel's praise refuse?

Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet In his own worth, and without title great. The Sanhedrim long time as chief he ruled, Their reason guided and their passion cooled." Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 99—903.

Amiens

(3 syl.) The Peace of Amiens, March 27, 1802, a treaty signed by Joseph Bonaparte, the Marquis of Cornwallis, Azara, and Schimmelpenninck, to settle the disputed points between France, England, Spain, and Holland. It was dissolved in 1803.

Amina

An orphan adopted by a miller, and beloved by Elvino, a rich farmer. The night before her espousals she is found in the bed of Count Rodolpho, and is renounced by her betrothed husband. The Count explains to the young farmer and his friends that Amina is innocent, and has wandered in her sleep. While he is still talking, the orphan is seen getting out of the window of the mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of the roof under which the mill—wheel is rapidly revolving. She crosses a crazy bridge, and comes among the spectators. In a few minutes she awakes, flies to Elvino, and is claimed by him as his beloved and innocent bride. — Bellini's best opera, La Sonnambula.

Aminadab

A Quaker. The Scripture name has a double m, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah is used, also, to signify a Quaker, and Rachel a Quakeress.

Amine

(3 syl.) Wife of Sidi Nouman, who ate her rice with a bodkin, and was in fact a ghoul. "She was so hard—hearted that she led about her three sisters like a leash of greyhounds." — Arabian Nights.

Aminte

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(2 syl.) The name assumed by Cathos as more aristocratic than her own. She is courted by a gentleman, but discards him because his manners are too simple and easy for “bon ton;” he then sends his valet, who pretends to be a marquis, and Aminte is charmed with his “distinguished style of manners and talk.” When the game has gone far enough, the trick is exposed, and Aminte is saved from a mésalliance. — Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules.

It was a prevailing fashion in the Middle Ages to change names; Voltaire's proper name was Arouet (1694—1778); Melancthon's was Schwarzerde (1497—1560). The real names of Desiderius Erasmus were Gheraerd Gheraerd (1467—1336); Anacharsis Cloutz was Jean Baptiste Cloutz, etc.

Amiral

or Ammiral An early form of the word “admiral.” (French, amiral; Italian, ammiraglio.) (See Admiral.)

Amlet

(Richard) The gamester in Vanbrugh's drama called The Confederacy.

Ammon

The Libyan Jupiter; so called from the Greek ammos (sand), because his temple was in the desert. Herodotus calls it an Egyptian word (ii. 42).

Son of Jupiter Ammon.

Alexander the Great. His father, Philip, claimed to be a descendant of Hercules, and therefore of Jupiter; and the son was saluted by the priests of the Libyan temple as son of Ammon. Hence was he called the son or descendant both of Jupiter and of Ammon.

Ammonian Horn

(The) the cornucopia. It was in reality a tract of very fertile land, in the shape of a ram's horn, given by Ammon, King of Libya, to his mistress Amalthea (q:v.) (the mother of Bacchus).

Ammonites

(3 syl.) Fossil molluscs allied to the nautilus and cuttlefish. So called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon. (See above.)

Amon's Son

(in Orlando Furioso) is Rinaldo. He was the eldest son of Amon or Aymon, Marquis d'Este, and nephew of Charlemagne.

Amoret brought up by Venus in the courts of love. She is the type of female loveliness — young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and by all beloved. She is no Diana to make “gods and men fear her stern frown”; no Minerva to “freeze her foes into congealed stone with rigid looks of chaste austerity”; but a living, breathing virgin, with a warm heart, and beaming eye, and passions strong, and all that man can wish and woman want. She becomes the loving, tender wife of Sir Scudamore. Timias finds her in the arms of Corflambo (sensual passion); combats the monster unsuccessfully, but wounds the lady. — Spencer: Faëry Queen, book iii.

Amoret

a love—song, love—knot, love—affair, love personified. A pretty word, which might be reintroduced.

“He will be in his amorets, and his canzonets, his pastorals, and his madrigals.” — Heywood: Love's Mistress.

“For not icladde in silke was he,

But all in flouris and flourettes,

I—paintid all with amorettes.”

Romance of the Rose, 892.

Amorous

(The) Philippe I of France; so called because he divorced his wife Berthe to espouse Bertrade, who was already married to Foulques, count of Anjou. (1061—1108.)

Amour propre

One's self—love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to self. To make an appeal to one's amour propre, is to put a person on his metal. To wound one's amour propre, is to gall his good opinion of himself — to wound his vanity. (French.)

Amparo de Pobres

A book exposing the begging impostors of Madrid, written by Herrera, physician to Felipe III

Ampersand

the character made thus, “&” = and. In the old Hornbooks, after giving the twenty—six letters, the character & was added, and was called “Ampersand,” a corruption of “and per—se &” (and by itself, and). A B C D. ... X Y Z &.

“Any odd shape folks understand

To mean my Protean amperzand.”

Punch (17 April, 1869, p. 153, col. 2).

The martyr Bradford, says Lord Russell, was “A per se A” with them, “to their comfort,” etc. — i.e. stood alone in their defence.

Amphialus

son of Cecropia, in love with Philoclea, but he ultimately married Queen Helen of Corinth. — Sir Philip Sidney: The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia.

Amphictyonic Council

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A council of confederate Greeks from twelve of their tribes, each of which had two deputies. The council met twice a year — in the spring at Delphi, and in the autumn at Thermopylæ. According to fable, it was so called from Amphictyon, son of Deucalion, its supposed founder. (Greek, amphiction&ebreves;s, dwellers round about.)

Amphigons

Words strung together without any real connection. The two pleaders in Pantagruel by Rabelais (book ii. c. 11—13) give an excellent example.

Amphigouri

nonsense verse, rigmarole.

“A kind of overgrown amphigouri, a heterogeneous combination.” — Quarterly Review, i. 50, 1809.

Porson's “Three Children sliding on the Ice” is a good specimen of amphigouri.

Amphion

is said to have built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord. Tennyson has a rhyming jeu d'esprit.

Amphitrite

(either 3 or 4 syl.) The sea. In classic mythology, the wife of Neptune (Greek, amphi—trio for tribo, rubbing or wearing away [the shore] on all sides).

“His weary chariot sought the bowers

Of Amphitritë and her tending nymphs.” Thomson: Summer. (1625—6).

Amphitryon

Le véritable Amphitryon est l'Amphitryon où l'on dine (Molière). That is, the person who provides the feast (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that Jupiter assumed the likeness of Amphitryon, and gave a banquet; but Amphitryon himself came home, and claimed the honour of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and guests were concerned, the dispute was soon decided — “he who gave the feast was to them the host.”

Amphrysian Prophetess

(Amphrysia Vates) The Cumæan sibyl; so called from Amphrysos, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetos; consequently Amphrysian means Apollonian.

Ampouille

(Sainte). The jug or bottle containing oil used in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. Louis. It was preserved at Rheims till the first Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram's Son

Moses. (Exodus vi. 20.)

As when the potent rod

Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,

Waved round the coast.”

Milton: Paradise Lost

, i. 338—40.

Amri

in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

“Our list of nobles next let Amri grace,

Whose merits claimed the Abethdin's (Lord Chancellor's) high place — To whom the double blessing does belong,

With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue.”

Part ii.

Amrita

The elixir of immortality, made by churning the milk—sea (Hindu mythology). Sir William Jones speaks of an apple so called, because it bestows immortality on those who partake of it. The word means immortal. (See Ambrosia.)

Amsanctus

A lake in Italy, in the territory of Hirpinum, said to lead down to the infernal regions. The word means sacred water.

Amuck To run amuck. To talk or write on a subject of which you are wholly ignorant; to run foul of. The Malays, under the influence of opium, become so excited that they sometimes rush forth with daggers, yelling “Amoq! amoq!” (Kill! kill!), and fall foul of any one they chance to meet.

“Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet

To run amuck and tilt at all I meet.”

Pope: Satires, i. 69—70.

Amulet

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Something worn, generally round the neck, as a charm. (Arabic, hamulet, that which is suspended.)

The early Christians used to wear amulets called Ichthus, fish; the word is composed of the initial letters of Iesos CHristos THEou Uios Soter (Jesus Christ, Son of God, our Saviour). (See Notarica.)

Amundeville

Lady Adeline Amundeville, a lady who “had a twilight tinge of blue,” could make epigrams, give delightful soirées, and was fond of making matches. — Bryon: Don Juan, xv., xvi.

Amyclæan Brothers

(The) Castor and Pollux, who were born at Amyclæ.

Amyclæan Silence

More silent than Amyclæ. The inhabitants of Amyclæ were so often alarmed by false rumours of the approach of the Spartans, that they made a decree no one should ever again mention the subject. When the Spartans actually came against the town, no one durst mention it, and the town was taken.

Amyris plays the fool

i.e. a person assumes a false character with an ulterior object, like Junius Brutus. Amyris was a Sybarite (3 syl.) sent to Delphi to consult the Oracle, who informed him of the approaching destruction of his nation. Amyris fled to Peloponnesus and his countrymen called him a fool; but, like the madness of David, his “folly” was true wisdom, for thereby he saved his life.

Amys

and Amylion The Pylades and Orestes of mediæval story. — Ellis's Specimens.

Anabaptists

A nickname of the Baptist Dissenters; so called because, in the first instances, they had been baptised in infancy, and were again baptised on a confession of faith in adult age. The word means the twice—baptised.

Anabaptists

A sect which arose in Germany in 1521.

Anacharsis

Anarcharsis among the Scythians. A wise man amongst fools; “Good out of Nazareth”; “A Sir Sidney Smith on Salisbury Plain.” The opposite proverb is “Saul amongst the Prophets,” i.e. a fool amongst wise men. Anacharsis was a Scythian by birth, and the Scythians were proverbial for their uncultivated state and great ignorance.

Anacharsis Cloutz.

Baron Jean Baptiste Cloutz, a Prussian by birth, but brought up in Paris, where he adopted the revolutionary principles, and called himself The Orator of the Human Race. (1755—1794.)

Anaclethra

The stone on which Ceres rested after searching in vain for her daughter. It was kept as a sacred deposit in the Prytaneum of Athens.

Anacreon

A Greek poet, who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine, (B.C. 563—478.)

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century.

Walter Mapes, also called “The Jovial Toper.” (1150—1196). His best—known piece is the famous drinking—song, “Meum est propositum in taberna mori,” translated by Leigh Hunt.

Anacreon Moore.

Thomas Moore, who not only translated Anacreon into English, but also wrote original poems in the same style. (1779—1852.)

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuxac, president of the National Convention; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests used by him towards his miserable victims. (1755—1841.)

Anacreon of the Temple.

Guillaume Amfrye, abbé de Chalieu; the “Tom Moore” of France. (1639—1720.)

The French Anacreon.

Pontus de Tyard, one of the Pleiad poets (1521—1605). P. Laujon. (1727—1811.)

The Persian Anacreon.

Mohammed Hafiz. (Fourteenth century.)

The Scotch Anacreon.

Alexander Scot, who flourished about 1550.

The Sicilian Anacreon.

Giovanni Meli. (1740—1815.)

Anacreon of Painters.

Francesco Albano, a famous painter of lovely females. (1578—1660.)

Anacreontic

In imitation of Anacreon (q.v.).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Anachronism

An event placed at a wrong date; as when Shakespeare, in Troilus and Cressida, makes Nestor quote Aristotle. (Greek, ana chronos, out of time.)

Anagnostes

(Greek) A domestic servant employed by the wealthy Romans to read to them at meals. Charlemagne had his reader; and monks and nuns were read to at meals. (Greek, anaginosko, to read.)

Anagrams

Dame Eleanor Davies (prophetess in the reign of Charles I) = Never so mad a lady. Gustavus = Augustus.

Horatio Nelson = Honor est a Nilo (made by Dr. Burney).

Queen Victoria's Jubilee Year = I require love in a subject. Quid est Veritas (John xviii. 38)? = Vir est qui adest. Marie Touchet (mistress of Charles IX of France = Je charme tout (made by Henri IV). Voltaire is an anagram of Arouet l(e) j(eune).

These are interchangeable words

Alcuinus and Calvinus; Amor and Roma; Eros and Rose; Evil and Live; and many more.

Anah

a tender—hearted, pious, meek, and loving creature, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Aholibamah. Japhet loved her, but she had set her heart on the seraph Azazel, who carried her off to some other planet when the flood came. — Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Anana

The pine—apple (the Brazilian ananas).

“Witness thou, best Anana! thou the pride

Of vegetable life.” Thompson: Summer, 685, 686.

Anastasia

(St.) Her attributes are a stake and faggots, with a palm branch in her hand. The allusion is, of course, to her martyrdom at the stake.

Anathema

A denunciation or curse. The word is Greek, and means to place, or set up, in allusion to the mythological custom of hanging in the temple of a patron god something devoted to him. Thus Gordius hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; workmen retired from business hung up their tools, etc. Hence anything set apart for destruction; and so, set apart from the Church as under a curse.

“Me tabula sacer

Votiva paries indicat uvida

Suspendisse potenti

Vestimenta maris deo.”

Horace: Odes (v. 13—16).

Horace, having escaped the love—snares of Pyrrha, hangs up his votive tablet, as one who has escaped the dangers of the sea.

Anatomy

He was like an anatomy — i.e. a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh had been anatomised or cut off. Shakespeare uses atomy as a synonym. Thus the hostess Quickly says to the Beadle : “Thou atomy, thou!” and Doll Tearsheet caps the phrase with, “Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal.” — 2 Henry IV, v. 4.

Anaxarete

(5 syl.) of Salamis was changed into stone for despising the love of Iphis, who hung himself. — Ovid: Metamorphoses, xiv. 750.

Anaxarte

(4 syl.) A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance called Amadis of Gaul. This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Ancaeos

Helmsman of the ship Argo, after the death of Tiphys. He was told by a slave that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards. When a bottle made from his own grapes was set before him, he sent for the slave to laugh at his prognostications; but the slave made answer, “There’s many a slip ‘twixt the cup and the lip.” At this instant a messenger came in, and told Ancaeos that a wild boar was laying his vineyard waste, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was killed in the encounter.

Ancalites

(4 syl.) Inhabitants of parts of Berkshire and Wiltshire, referred to by Cæsar in his Commentaries.

Anchor

That was my sheet anchor — i.e. my best hope, my last refuge. The sheet anchor is the largest anchor of a ship, which, in stress of weather, is the sailor’s chief dependence. The word sheet is a corruption of the word shote (thrown out), meaning the anchor “thrown out” in foul weather. The Greeks and Romans said, “my sacred anchor,” because the sheet anchor was always dedicated to some god.

Anchor

(The) in Christian art, is given to Clement of Rome and Nicolas of Bari. Pope Clement, in A.D. 80, was bound to an anchor and cast into the sea. Nicolas of Bari is the patron saint of sailors.

The anchor is apeak

— that is, the cable of the anchor is so tight that the ship is drawn completely over it. (See Bower Anchor, Sheet Anchor.)

The Anchor comes home

, the anchor has been dragged from its hold. Figuratively, the enterprise has failed, notwithstanding the precautions employed.

To weigh anchor

, to haul in the anchor, that the ship may sail away from its mooring. Figuratively, to begin an enterprise which has hung on hand.

Anchor Watch

(An) A watch of one or two men, while the vessel rides at anchor, in port.

Ancien Régime

An antiquated system of government. This phrase, in the French Revolution, meant the monarchical form of government, or the system of government, with all its evils, which existed prior to that great change.

Ancient

A corruption of ensign — a flag and the officer who bore it. Pistol was Falstaff's "ancient."

"Ten times more dishonourably ragged than an old—faced ancient." — Shakespeare: I Henry IV, iv. 21.

"My whole charge consists of ancients, corporals, lieutenants, gentlemen of companies..." — Shakespeare: I Henry IV, iv. 2.

Ancient Mariner

Having shot an albatross, he and his companions were subjected to fearful penalties. On repentance he was forgiven, and on reaching land told his story to a hermit. At times, however, distress of mind drove him from land to land, and wherever he abode he told his tale of woe, to warn from cruelty and persuade men to love God's creatures. — Coleridge.

Ancient of Days

(Daniel iii. 9). Jehovah.

Ancile

(3 syl.) The Palladium of Rome. It was the sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven. To prevent its being stolen, he caused eleven others to be made precisely like it, and confided them to twelve priests called Salii, who bore them in procession through the city every year at the beginning of March.

“Idque ancile vocat, quod ab omni parte recisum est, Quemque notes oculis, angulus omnis abest.” Ovid: Fasti, iii. 377.

And

The character “&” is a monogram of et (and), made in Italian type, &

Andirons

or Hand—irons a corruption of anderia, andera, andela, or andena. Ducange says, “Andena est ferrum, quo appodiantur ligna in foco, ut melius luceant, et melius comburantur.” Farther on he gives anderia, andierus, andellus, etc., as variants. Called “dogs” because they were often made in the resemblance of dogs. The derivation of andirons is not clear; Ducange says, “dicitur andena, quasi ante vaporem, i.e. calorem,” but this probably will satisfy no one. The modern French word is landier, old French andier, Low Latin andæus.

Andrea Ferrara

A sword. So called from a famous sword—maker of the name. (Sixteenth century.)

“We'll put in bail, my boy; old Andrea Ferrara shall lodge his security.” — Scott: Waverley, ch.

50.

Andrew

a name commonly used in old plays for a valet or man—servant. Probably a Merry Andrew is simply the mirth—making Andrew or domestic jester. (See Merry Andrew.)

Similarly, Abigail is used in old plays for a waiting gentlewoman. (See Abigail.)

Andrew

(An) A merchant vessel, probably so called from Andrew Doria, the famous Genoese admiral.

“I should think of shallows and of flats,

And see my wealthy Andrew docked in sand.” Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

Andrew

(St) depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a cross like the letter X, termed St. Andrew's cross. The great pictures of St. Andrew are his Flagellation by Domenichino, and the Adoration of the Cross by Guido, which has also been depicted by Andrea Sacchi, in the Vatican at Rome. Both the Flagellation and the Adoration form the subjects of frescoes in the chapel of St. Andrea, in the church of San Gregorio, at Rome. His day is November 30th. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Patræ (A.D. 70). (See St. Rule.)

The “adoration of the cross” means his fervent address to the cross on which he was about to suffer. “Hail, precious cross, consecrated by the body of Christ! I come to thee exulting and full of joy. Receive me into thy dear arms.” The “flagellation” means the scourging which always preceded capital punishments, according to Roman custom.

is represented in the form of an X (white on a blue field). The cross, however, on which the apostle suffered was of the ordinary shape, if we may believe the relic in the convent of St. Victor, near Marseilles. The error rose from the way in which that cross is exhibited, resting on the end of the cross—beam and point of the foot.

According to J. Leslie (History of Scotland), this sort of cross appeared in the heavens to Achaius, King of the Scots, and Hungus, King of the Picts, the night before their engagement with Athelstane. As they were the victors, they went barefoot to the kirk of St. Andrew, and vowed to adopt his cross as their national emblem.

(See Constatine's Cross.)

Andrew Macs

(The) The crew of H.M.S. Andromache. Similarly, the Bellerophon was called by English sailors “Billy ruffian,” and the Achilles the “Ash heels.” (See Beefeater etc.)

Androcles and the Lion

Androcles was a runaway slave who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered, and instead of tearing him to pieces, lifted up his front paw that Androcles might extract from it a thorn. The slave being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena. It so happened that the same lion was let out against him, and, recognising his benefactor, showed towards him every demonstration of love and gratitude.

In the Gesta Romanorum (Tale civ.) the same story is told, and there is a similar one in Æsop's Fables. The original tale, however, is from Aulus Gellius, on the authority of Plistonices, who asserts that he was himself an eyewitness of the encounter.

Android

An automaton figure of a human being (Greek, andros—eidōs, a man's likeness). One of the most famous of these machines is that by M. Vaucanson, called the flute—player. The chess—player by Kempelen is also celebrated. (See Automaton.)

Andromeda

Daughter of Cepheus (2 syl.) and Cassiopeia. Her mother boasted that the beauty of Andromeda surpassed that of the Nereids; so the Nereids induced Neptune to send a seamonster on the country, and an oracle declared that Andromeda must be given up to it. She was accordingly chained to a rock, but was delivered by Perseus (2 syl.). After death she was placed among the stars. (See Angelica.) Ovid: Metamorphoses, v. 1, etc.

Andronica

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her beauty. She was sent with Sophrosyne to conduct Astolpho from India to Arabia.

Anent

Over against; concerning. (Old English, on—cmn; later forms, on—efen, on—efent, an—'ent.)

Ange de Grève

(French), a hangman or executioner. The "Place de Grève" was at one time the Tyburn of Paris.

Angel

Half a sovereign in gold; so called because, at one time, it bore the figure of the archangel Michael slaying the dragon. When the Rev. Mr. Patten, vicar of Whitstable, was dying, the Archbishop of Canterbury sent him #10. The wit said, "Tell his Grace that now I am sure he is a man of God, for I have seen his angels."

Angel (a public—house sign), in compliment to Richard II, who placed an angel above his shield, holding it up in his hands.

To write like an angel

(French). The angel referred to was Angelo Vergece [Vergezio], a Cretan of the sixteenth century. He was employed both by Henri II and by François I, and was noted for his caligraphy. (Didot: Nouvelle Biographie Universelle [1852—66]).

Angel of the Schools.

St. Thomas Aquinas. (See Angelic Doctor.)

Angels,

say the Arabs, were created from pure, bright gems; the gems, of fire; and man, of clay.

Angels,

according to Dionysius the Areopagite, were divided into nine orders: —

Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones, in the first circle.

Dominions, Virtues, and Powers, in the second circle.

2.

Principalities, Archangels, and Angels, in the third circle.

3.

St. Gregory the Great: Homily

34.

“In heaven above,

The effulgent bands in triple circles move.” Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. 13.

Angels.

The seven holy angels are — Abdiel, Gabriel, Michael, Raguel, Raphael, Simiel, and Uriel. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible, Raphael in the Apocrypha. Milton (Paradise Lost, book i., from 392) gives a list of the fallen angels.

Angel—beast

A favourite round game of cards, which enabled gentlemen to let the ladies win small stakes. Five cards are dealt to each player, and three heaps formed — one for the king, one for play, and the third for Triolet. The name of the game was la bête (beast). Angel was the stake. Thus we say, Shilling—whist.

“This gentleman offers to play at Angel—beast, though he scarce knows the cards.” — Mulberry Garden.

Angel Visits

Delightful intercourse of short duration and rare occurrence.

“(Visits) Like those of angels, short and far between.” Blair: Grave, pt. ii. 586.

“Like angel—visits, few and far between.” Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, line 375.

Angel—water

a Spanish cosmetic, made of roses, trefoil, and lavender. Short for Angelica—water, because originally it was chiefly made of the plant Angelica.

“Angel—water was the worst scent about her.” — Sedley: Bellam.

Angelic Doctor

Thomas Aquinas was so called, because he discussed the knotty points in connection with the being and nature of angels. An example is, “Utrum Angelus moveatur de loco ad locum transeundo per medium?” The Doctor says that it depends upon circumstances.

It is said, by way of a quiz, that one of his questions was: “How many angels can dance on the point of a pin?”

Angelic Hymn The hymn beginning with Glory be to God on high, etc. (Luke ii. 14); so called because the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angelica

Daughter of Galaphron, king of Cathay, the capital of which was Albracca. She was sent to sow discord among the Christians. Charlemagne sent her to the Duke of Bavaria, but she made her escape from the duke's castle. Being captured in her flight, she was bound to a rock, and exposed to sea—monsters. Rogero delivered her, but she escaped out of his hands by a magic ring. Orlando greatly loved her, but she married Medoro, a young Moor, and returned to India, where Medoro succeeded to the crown in right of his wife.

(Orlando Furioso.) (See Andromeda)

Angelica's Draught

something which completely changes affection. The tale is that Angelica was passionately in love with Rinaldo, who hated her, whereas Orlando, whom she hated, actually adored her shadow. Angelica and Rinaldo drink from a certain fountain, when a complete change takes place; Rinaldo is drunk with love, and Angelica's passion changes to abhorrence. Angelica ultimately married Medoro, and Orlando went mad. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Angelical Stone

The speculum of Dr. Dee. He asserted that it was given him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. It passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough, thence to Lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the Duke of Argyll, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It was sold in 1842, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill.

Angelici

Certain heretics of the second century, who advocated the worship of angels.

Angelites

(3 syl.) A branch of the Sabellian heretics; so called from Angelius, in Alexandria, where they used to meet. (Dr. Hook: Church Dictionary.)

Angelo

(See Michael Angelo.)

Angelo and Raffaele

Michael Angelo criticised Raffaele very severely.

“Such was the language of this false Italian [Angelo]:

One time he christened Raphael a Pygmalion, Swore that his maidens were composed of stone: Swore his expressions were like owls, so tame,

His drawings, like the lamest cripple, lame;

And as for composition, he had none.” Peter Pindar: Lyric Odes, viii.

(See Michael Angelo.)

Angelus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The) A Roman Catholic devotion in honour of the Incarnation, instituted by Urban II. It consists of three texts, each said as versicle and response, and followed by the salutation of Gabriel. The name is derived from the first words, Angelus Domini (The angel of the Lord, etc.).

The prayer is recited three times a day, generally about 6 a.m., at noon, and about 6 p.m., at the sound of a bell called the Angelus.

The Angelus bell (often wrongly called the Curfew) is still rung at 8 P.M. in some country churches.

Longfellow: Evangeline

Anger

Athenodorus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger was to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it. (See Danger.)

“The sacred line he did but once repeat,

And laid the storm, and cooled the raging heat.” Tickell: The Horn Book.

Angevin

adjective of Anjou.

John was not the last of the Angevin kings of England, though he was the last king of England who reigned over Anjou.

Angiolina

(4 syl.) The young wife of Marino Faliero, the doge. She was the daughter of Loredano. (Byron: Marino Falero.)

Anglantes Lord

Orlando, who was Lord of Anglant and knight of Brava.

Angle

A dead angle. A term in fortification applied to the plot of earth before an angle in a wall which can neither be seen nor defended from the parapet.

Angle with a Silver Hook

(To) To buy fish at market.

Angling

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The father of angling, Izaak Walton (1593—1683). Angling is called “the gentle craft”; shoemaking was also so called. Probably there is a pun concealed in the first of these; a common bait of anglers being a “gentle.” In the second case, St. Crispin was a Roman gentleman of high birth, and his craftsmen took from him their title of “gentle” (generosi).

Angoulaffre

of the Broken Teeth, a giant “12 cubits in height.” His face measured 3 feet across; his nose was 9 inches long; his arms and legs were each 6 feet; his fingers 6 inches and 2 lines; his enormous mouth was armed with sharp pointed yellow tusks. He was descended from Goliath, and assumed the title of “Governor of Jerusalem.” Angoulaffre had the strength of 30 men, and his mace was the trunk of an oak—tree 300 years old. Some say the Tower of Pisa lost its perpendicularity by the weight of this giant, who one day leaned against it to rest himself. He was slain by Roland, the paladin; in single combat at the Fronsac.

(Croquemitaine.)

Angry

(The). Christian II, of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, was so called on account of his ungovernable temper. (1513—1559.)

Angular

Cross—grained; of a patchy temper; one full of angles, whose temper is not smooth.

Angurvadel

Frithiof's sword, inscribed with Runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace. (See Sword.)

Anima Mundi

[the soul of the world], with the oldest of the ancient philosophers, meant “the source of life”; with Plato, it meant “the animating principle of matter,” inferior to pure spirit: with the Stoics, it meant “the whole vital force of the universe.”

Stahl (1710) taught that the phenomena of animal life are due to an immortal animal, or vital principle distinct from matter.

Animal

To go the entire animal, a facetious euphuism for “To go the whole hog.” (See Hog.)

Animal Spirits

Liveliness and animation arising from physical vigour.

Animals admitted into Heaven

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The) They are ten: (1) Jonah's whale; (2) Solomon's ant; (3) the ram caught by Abraham and sacrificed instead of Isaac; (4) the cuckoo of Belkis; (5) the camel of the prophet Saleh; (6) Balaam's ass; (7) the ox of Moses; (8) the dog Kratim of the Seven Sleepers; (9) Mahomet's ass, called Al Borak; and (10) Noah's dove.

Animals in Christian Art

The ant symbolises prudence; the ape, malice, lust, and cunning; the ass, sobriety, or the Jewish nation; the asp, Christ, or Christian faith; the bee, industry; the camel, submission; the cock, vigilance; the dog, fidelity; the fox, fraud and cunning; the hog, impurity; the lamb, innocence; the leopard, sin; the ox, pride; the wolf, cruelty.

Some animals are appropriated to certain saints: as the calf or ox to Luke; the cock to Peter; the eagle to John the Divine; the lion to Mark; the raven to Benedict, etc.

The lamb, the pelican, and the unicorn, are symbols of Christ.

The dragon, serpent, and swine, symbolise Satan and his crew.

Animals sacred to special Deities

To Apollo, the wolf, the griffon, and the crow; to Bacchus, the dragon and the panther; to Diana, the stag; to Æsculapius, the serpent; to Hercules, the deer; to Isis, the heifer; to Jupiter, the eagle; to Juno, the peacock and the lamb; to the Lares, the dog; to Mars, the horse and the vulture; to Mercury, the cock; to Minerva, the owl; to Neptune, the bull; to Tethys, the halycon; to Venus, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow; to Vulcan, the lion, etc.

Animosity

means animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equi animositas. Its present exclusive use in a bad sense is an instance of the tendency which words originally neutral have to assume a bad meaning. (Compare churl, villain.)

Animula

“Animula, vagula, blandula,

Hospes, comesque, corporis;

Quæ nunc abibis in loca,

Pallidula, rigida, nudula?”

The Emperor Hadrian to his Soul.

Sorry—lived, blithe—little, fluttering Sprite

Comrade and guest in this body of clay,

Whither, ah! whither, departing in flight, Rigid, half—naked, pale minion, away?

E.C.B.

Anna

(Donna). A lady beloved by Don Ottavio, but seduced by Don Giovanni, who also killed her father, the “Commandant of the City,” in a duel. (Mozart's opera of Don Giovanni.)

Annabel

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel is designed for the Duchess of Monmouth. Her maiden name and title were Anne Scott, Countess of Buccleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The duke was faithless to her, and after his death, the widow, still handsome, married again.

“To all his [Monmouth's] wishes, nothing he [David] denied; And made the charming Annabel his bride.”

Part i. lines 33, 34.

Anna Matilda

(An), an ultra—sentimental girl. Mrs. Hannah Cowley used this pen—name in her responses in the World to Della Crusca (R. Merry). (See the Baviad by Gifford.)

Annates

(2 syl.). One entire year's income claimed by the Pope on the appointment of a bishop or other ecclesiastic in the Catholic Church. This is called the first fruits (Latin, annus, a year). By the Statute of Recusants (25 Hen. VIII. c. 20, and the Confirming Act), the right to English Annates and Tenths was transferred to the Crown; but, in the reign of Queen Anne, annates were given up to form a fund for the augmentation of poor livings. (See Bounty, Queen Anne's.)

Anne

Sister Anne. Sister of Fatima, the seventh and last of Bluebeard's wives.

Anne's Fan (Queen). Your thumb to your nose and your fingers spread.

Anne's Great Captain

The Duke of Marlborough (1650—1722).

Annie Laurie

was eldest of the three daughters of Sir Robert Laurie of Maxwellton, born December 16, 1682. William Douglas, of Fingland (Kirkcudbright), wrote the popular song, but Annie married, in 1709, James Fergusson, of Craighdarroch, and was the mother of Alexander Fergusson, the hero of Burns's song called The Whistle.

William Douglas was the hero of the song “Willie was a wanton wag.”

Annulo Dei figuram ne gestato

(In). Wear not God's image in a ring (or inscribe....), the 24th symbol of the Protretics. Jamblicus tells us that Pythagoras wished to teach by this prohibition that God had an “incorporeal subsistence.” In fact, that it meant “thou shalt not liken God to any of His works.”

Probably the ring, symbolising eternity, bore upon the special prohibition.

Annunciation

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Day of the Annunciation. The 25th of March, also called Lady Day, on which the angel announced to the Virgin Mary that she would be the mother of the Messiah.

Annus Luctus

the period during which a widow is morally supposed to remain chaste. If she marries within about nine months from the death of her late husband and a child is born, a doubt might arise as to the paternity of the child. Such a marriage is not illegal, but it is inexpedient.

Annus Mirabilis

The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the great fire of London and the successes of our arms over the Dutch. Dryden has written a poem with this title, in which he describes both these events.

Anodyne Necklace

(An), a halter. An anodyne is a medicine to relieve pain. Probably a pun on nodus, a knot, is intended also. George Primrose says: "May I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under—turnkey than an usher in boarding—school."

Anomoeans

or Unlikists. A sect in the fourth century, which maintained that the essence of the Son is wholly unlike that of the Father. (Greek, anmoios, unlike.)

Anon

immediately, at once. The Old English an—on or an—ane = at once. Variants, on one, anone.

"They knewye hym in brekyng of brede, and onone he vanyste away fro hem." — MS. Lincoln, A 1, 17.

"Spek the lion ...

To the fox anone his wille."

Wright's Political Songs.

"For the nonce" is a corrupt form of "For the—n once," where the—n is the accusative case, meaning "For the once" or "For this once."

Anon—rightes

Right quickly.

"He had in town five hundred knightes,

He hem [them] of [off] sent anon—rightes." Arthur and Merkin, p. 88.

Ansarian The Moslems of Medina were called Ansarians (auxiliaries) by Mahomet, because they received him and took his part when he was driven from house and home by the Koreishites (Kore—ish—ites).

Answer is the Old English and—swaru, verb and swar—ian or swerian, where And is the preposition = the Latin re in re—spond—eo. (See Swear.)

To answer like a Norman

, that is, evasively.

“We say, in France. “Answering like a Norman,” which means to give an evasive answer, neither yes nor no.” — Max O'Rell; Friend M'Donald, ch. v.

To answer its purpose, to carry out what was expected or what was intended. Celsus says, “Medicina sæpius respondet, interdum tamen fallit.”

To answer the bell is to go and see what it was rung for.

To answer the door

is to go and open it when a knock or ring has been given.

In both the last two instances the word is “answering to a summons.”

To swear means literally “to affirm something,” and to an—swear is to “say something” by way of rejoinder; but figuratively both the “swer” and the “answer” may be made without words.

“... My story being done, ...

She [Desdemona] swore [affirmed] 'twas strange,... 'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful.”

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Answer more Scotico

(To). To divert the direct question by starting another question or subject.

““Hark you, sirrah,” said the doctor, “I trust you remember you are owing to the laird 4 stone of barleymeal and a bow of oats. ...”

““I was thinking,” replied the man more Scotico, that is, returning no direct answer on the subject on which he was addressed, “I was thinking my best way would be to come down to your honour, and take your advice, in case my trouble should come back.”” — Sir Walter Scott: The Abbot, ch. xxvi.

Antaeos

in Greek mythology, was a gigantic wrestler, whose strength was invincible so long as he touched the earth; and every time he was lifted from it, was renewed by touching it again. (See Maleger.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“As once Antæos, on the Libyan strand,

More fierce recovered when he reached the sand.” Hoole's Ariosto, book iv.

It was Hercules who succeeded in killing this charmed giant. He Lifts proud Antæos from his mother's plains,

And with strong grasp the struggling giant strains; Back falls his panting head and clammy hair, Writhe his weak limbs and flits his life in air.” Darwin: Economy of Vegetation.

Antecedents I know nothing of his antecedents — his previous life, character, or conduct. (Latin, antecedens, foregoing.)

Antediluvian

Before the Deluge, meaning the Scripture Deluge.

Anthia

The lady—love of Abrocomas in Xenophon's romance, called Ephesiaca. Shakespeare has borrowed from this Greek novel the leading incidents of his Romeo and Juliet, especially that of the potion and mock entombment. N.B. This is not the historian, but a Xenophon who lived in the fourth Christian century.

Anthony

Anthony (St.). Patron saint of swineherds, because he always lived in woods and forests.

St. Anthony's Cross.

The taucross, T, called a lace.

St. Anthony's Fire.

Erysipelas is so called from the tradition that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from the pestilential erysipelas called the sacred fire, which proved extremely fatal in 1089.

St. Anthony's Pig

A pet pig, the smallest of the whole litter. St. Anthony was originally a swineherd, and, therefore, the patron saint of pigs.

Anthroposophus

The nickname of Dr. Vaughan, rector of St. Bride's, in Bedfordshire. So called from his Anthroposophia Teomagica, to show the condition of man after death.

Anti—Christ

or the Man of Sin, expected by some to precede the second coming of Christ. St. John so calls every one who denies the incarnation of the eternal Son of God.

Antigone

The Modern Antigone. Marie Thérèse Charlotte, Duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.; so called for her attachment to Louis XVIII., whose companion she was. (1778—1851.)

Antimony

Said to be derived from the Greek antimonachos (bad for monks). The tale is that Valentine once gave some of this mineral to his convent pigs, who thrived upon it, and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects; so Valentine said, "tho' good for pigs, it was bad for monks." This fable is given by Furetière.

Another derivation is anti—monos, (averse to being alone), because it is found in combination with sulphur, silver, or some other substance.

Littré suggests isthimmit, and connects it with stibium.

Antinomian

[Greek, anti—nomos, exempt from the law.] One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the "law of God," but "may continue in sin that grace may abound." The term was first applied to John Agricola by Martin Luther.

Antinous

(4 syl.). A model of manly beauty. He was the page of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

"The polished grace of Antinöus." — Daily Telegraph.

Antipathy

(of human beings)

To Animals: Henri III. and the Duke of Schoenberg felt faint at the sight of a cat: Vanghelm felt the same at the sight of a pig, and abhorred pork; Marshal Brézé sickened at the sight of a rabbit; the Duc d'Epéron always swooned at the sight of a leveret, though he was not affected at the sight of a hare.

To Fish: Erasmus felt grievous nausea at the smell of fresh fish.

To Flowers and Fruits: Queen Anne, Grétry the composer, Favorite the Italian poet, and Vincent the painter, all abhorred the smell of roses; Scaliger had the same aversion to watercresses; and King Vladislav sickened at the smell of apples.

To Music: Le Mothe de Nayer felt faint at the sound of any musical instrument; Nicano had a strong aversion to the sound of a flute.

To Thunder: Augustus trembled at the noise of thunder, and retired to a vault when a thunderstorm was apprehended.

Witches have an antipathy to running water.

“Some men there are love not a gaping pig,

Some that are mad if they behold a cat.”

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. L

Antipathy

(of animals). According to tradition, wolves have a mortal antipathy to scillaroots; geese to the soil of Whitby; snakes to soil of Ireland; cats to dogs; all animals dislike the castor oil plant; camphor keeps off insects; Russian leather is disliked by bookworms; paraffin by flies; cedar—wood is used for wardrobes, because its odour is disliked by moths. Ants dislike green sage.

Anti—pope is a pope elected by a King in opposition to the pope elected by the cardinals; or one who usurps the popedom in opposition to the rightful pope. Geddes give a list of twenty—four anti—popes, three of whom were deposed by the Council of Constance.

Antisthenes

Founder of the Cynic School in Athens. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. Socrates wittily said he could “see rank pride peering, through the holes of Antisthenes rags.”

Antoninus

The Wall of Antonine. A turf entrenchment raised by the Romans from Dunglass Castle, on the Clyde, to Caer Ridden Kirk, near the Firth of Forth under the direction of Lollius Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140.

Antony

(See Anthony .)

Antrustions

The chief followers of the Frankish kings, who were specially trusty to them. (Old German, tröst, trust, fidelity.)

“None but the king could have antrustions.” — Stubbs: Constitutional History.

Ants

“Go to the ant, thou sluggard, ... which provideth her meat in the summer” (Proverbs vi. 6—8; and xxx.

25). The notion that ants in general gather food in harvest for a winter's store is quite an error; in the first place, they do not live on grain, but chiefly on animal food; and in the next place they are torpid in winter, and do not require food. Colonel Sykes, however, says there is in Poonah a grain—feeding species, which stores up millet—seed; and according to Lubbock and Moggridge, ants in the south of Europe and in Texas make stores.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

What are called “ant eggs” are not eggs, but the pupæ of ants.

Anubis

In Egyptian mythology, similar to the Hermès of Greece, whose office it was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. Anubis is represented with a human body and jackal's head.

Anvil

It is on the anvil, under deliberation; the project is in hand. Of course, the reference is to a smithy.

“She had another arrangement on the anvil.” — Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard.

Any—how i.e. in an irregular manner. “He did it any—how,” in a careless, slovenly manner. “He went on any—how,” in a wild, reckless manner. Any—how, you must manage it for me; by hook or crook; at all events. (Old English, oenig—hú.)

Aonian

Poetical, pertaining to the Muses. The Muses, according to Grecian mythology, dwelt in Aonia, that part of Boetia which contains Mount Helicon and the Muses' Fountain. Thomson calls the fraternity of poets

“The Aonian hive

Who praised are, and starve right merrily.” Castle of Indolence, ii. 2.

A outrance

(French.) To the farthest point. The correct form of the phrase.

Ape

The buf foon ape, in Dryden's poem called The Hind and the Panther, means the Free—thinkers.

“Next her [the bear] the buffoonape, as atheists use, Mimicked all sects, and had his own to choose.” Part i. 39, 40.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed (Hamlet iv. 2). Most of the Old World monkeys have cheek pouches, used as receptacles for food.

To lead apes

or To lead apes in hell. It is said of old maids. Hence, to die an old maid.

“I will even take sixpence in earnest of the bear—ward, and lead his apes into hell.” — Shakespeare: Much ado about Nothing, ii. 1.

Fadladinda says to Tatlanthe (3 syl):

“Pity that you who've served so long and well

Should die a virgin, and lead apes in hell.”

H. Carey: Chrononhotonthologos

“Women, dying maids, lead apes in hell.” — The London Prodigal, 1. 2.

To play the ape,

to play practical jokes; to play silly tricks; to make facial imitations, like an ape.

To put an ape into your hood (or) cap — i.e.

to make a fool of you. Apes were formely carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's paternoster, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape.

Apelles

A famous Grecian painter, contemporary with Alexander the Great.

“There comelier forms embroidered rose to view

Than e'er Apelles' wondrous pencil drew.” Aristo: Orlando Furioso, book xxiv.

Apemantus

A churlish philosopher, in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens.

“The cynicism of Apemantus contrasted with the misanthropy of Timon.” — Sir Walter Scott.

A—per—se An A 1; a person or thing of unusual merit. “A” all alone with no one who can follow, nemo proximus aut secundus.

Chaucer calls Cresseide “the floure and A—per—se of Troi and Greek.”

“London, thou art of townes A—per—se.” — Lansdowne MSS.

Apex

the topmost height, really means the pointed olive—wood spike on the top of the cap of a Roman priest. The cap fitted close to the head and was fastened under the chin by a fillet. It was applied also to the crest or spike of a helmet. The word now means the summit or tiptop.

Aphrodite

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(4 syl.). The Greek Venus; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea, (Greek, aphros , foam.)

Aphrodite's Girdle.

Whoever wore Aphrodite's magic girdle, immediately became the object of love. (Greek mythology.)

Apicius

A gourmand. Apicius was a Roman gourmand, whose income being reduced by his luxurious living to £80,000, put an end to his life, to avoid the misery of being obliged to live on plain diet.

A—pigga—back

(See Pig—Back .)

Apis

in Egyptian mythology, is the bull symbolical of the god Apis. It was not suffered to live more than twenty—five years, when it was sacrificed and buried in great pomp. The madness of Cambysës is said to have been in retribution for his killing a sacred bull.

Aplomb

means true to the plumbline, but is generally used to express that self—possession which arises from perfect self—confidence. We also talk of a dancer's aplomb, meaning that he is a perfect master of his art.

(French. à plomb.)

“Here exists the best stock in the world men of aplomb and reserve, of great range and many moods, of strong instincts, yet apt for culture.” — Emerson: English Traits, p. 130.

Apocalyptic Number

The mystic number 666. (Rev. xiii. 18.) (See Number of the Beast.)

Apocrypha

Those books included in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the Old Testament, but not considered to be parts of the original canon. They are accepted as canonical by Catholics, but not by Protestants, and are not printed in Protestant Bibles in ordinary circulation. The word means hidden (Greek, apokrupto), “because they were wont to be read not openly. ... but, as it were, in secret and apart” (Bible, 1539, Preface to the Apocrypha). As the reason why these books are not received as canonical is because either their genuineness or their authenticity is doubtful, therefore the word “apocryphal” means not genuine or not authentic.

Apollinarians

An ancient sect founded in the middle of the fourth century by Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea. They denied that Christ had a human soul, and asserted that the Logos supplied its place. The Athanasian creed condemns this heresy.

Apollo

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The sun, the god of music. (Roman mythology.)

“Apollo's angry, and the heavens themselves

Do strike at my injustice.”

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale

, iii. 2.

A perfect Apollo.

A model of manly beauty, referring to the Apollo Belvidere (q.v.).

The Apollo of Portugal.

Luis Camoëns, author of the Lusiad, so called, not for his beauty, but for his poetry. He was god of poetry in Portugal, but was allowed to die in the streets of Lisbon like a dog, literally of starvation. Our own Otway suffered a similar fate. (1527—1579.)

Apollo Belvidere

[Bel—ve—dear]. A marble statue, supposed to be from the chisel of the Greek sculptor Calamis, who flourished in the fifth ante—Christian era. It represents the god holding a bow in his left hand, and is called Belvidere from the Belvidere Gallery of the Vatican, in Rome, where it stands. It was discovered in 1503, amidst the ruins of Antium, and was purchased by Pope Julius II.

Apollodoros Plato says: “Who would not rather be a man of sorrows than Apollodoros, envied by all for his enormous wealth, yet nourishing in his heart the scorpions of a guilty conscience?” (The Republic). This Apollodoros was the tyrant of Cassandrea (formerly Potideia). He obtained the supreme power B.C. 379, exercised it with the utmost cruelty, and was put to death by Antigonos Gonatas.

Apollonius

Master of the Rosicrucians. He is said to have had the power of raising the dead, of making himself invisible, and of being in two places at the same time.

Apollyon

King of the bottomless pit. (Rev. ix. 11.) His contest with Christian, in Bunyan's allegory, has made his name familiar. (Greek, the destroyer.)

Apostate

(The). Julian, the Roman emperor. So called because he forsook the Christian faith and returned to Paganism again. (331, 361—363.)

A posteriori

[Latin, from the latter]. An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus, if we see a watch, we conclude there was a watchmaker. Robinson Crusoe inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw a human footprint in the wet sand. It is thus the existence and character of Deity is inferred from his works. (See A Priori.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Apostles

The badges or symbols of fourteen apostles.

Andrew, a cross, because he was crucified on a cross shaped like the letter x. Bartholomew, a knife, because he was flayed with a knife.

James the Greater, a scallop—shell, a pilgrim's staff, or a gourd bottle, because he is the patron saint of pilgrims. (See Scallop Shell.)

James the Less, a fuller's pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dealt him by Simeon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent flying out of it, in allusion to the tradition about Aristodemos, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of a cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the cup, which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a bag, because he had the bag and “bare what was put therein” (John xii. 6). Jude, a club, because he was martyred with a club.

Matthew, a hatchet or halbert, because he was slain at Nadabar with a halbert. Matthias, a battle—axe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battle—axe. Paul, a sword, because his head was cut off with a sword. The convent of La Lisha, in Spain, boasts of possessing the very instrument.

Peter, a bunch of keys, because Christ gave him the “keys of the kingdom of heaven.” A cock, because he went out and wept bitterly when he heard the cock crow. (Matt. xxvi. 75.)

Philip, a long staff surmounted with a cross, because he suffered death by being suspended by the neck to a tall pillar.

Simon, a saw, because he was sawn to death, according to tradition. Thomas, a lance because he was pierced through the body, at Meliapour, with a lance.

(See Evangelists.)

Apostles, where buried

According to Catholic legend, seven of the Apostles are buried at Rome. These seven are distinguished by a star (*).

ANDREW lies buried at Amalfi (Naples).

BARTHOLOMEW,* at Rome, in the church of Bartholomew Island, on the Tiber. JAMES THE GREATER was buried at St.Jago de Compostella, in Spain.

JAMES THE LESS,* at Rome, in the church of the Holy Apostles. JOHN, at Ephesus.

JUDE,* at Rome.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

MATTHEW, at Salerno (Naples).

MATTHIAS,* at Rome, under the altar of the Basilica. PAUL, somewhere in Italy.

PETER,* at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.

PHILIP,* at Rome.

SIMON or SIMEON,* at Rome.

THOMAS, at Ortona (Naples). (? Madras.)

MARK THE EVANGELIST is said to have been buried at Venice. LUKE THE EVANGELIST is said to have been buried at Padua.

N.B. — Italy claims thirteen of these apostles or evangelists — Rome seven; Naples three, Paul somewhere in Italy, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua.

Apostles of

Abyssinians,

St. Frumentius. (Fourth century.) Alps, Felix Neff. (1798—1829.)

Ardennes,

St. Hubert. (656—730.) Armenians, Gregory of Armenia. (256—331.) English, St. Augustine. (Died 607.) St. George. Ethiopia. (See Abyssinians.)

Free Trade,

Richard Cobden. (1804—1865.) French, St. Denis. (Third century.) Frisians, St. Wilbrod. (657—738.)

Gauls,

St. Irenæus (130—200); St. Martin. (316—397.) Génilles, St. Paul.

Germany,

St. Boniface. (680—755.) Highlanders, St. Columb. (521—597.) Hungary, St. Anastatus. (954—1044.) Indians (American), Bartolomé de Las Casas (1474—1500); Rev. John Eliot. (1603—1690.) Indies (East), St. Francis Xavier. (1506—1552.)

Infidelity,

Voltaire. (1694—1778.) Ireland, St. Patrick. (372—493.) Netherlands, St. Armand, Bishop of Maestricht. (589—679.) North, St. Ansgar or Anscarius (801—864); Bernard Gilpin. (1517—1583.) Picts, St. Ninian.

Scottish Reformers,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

John Knox. (1505—1572.) Slavs, St. Cyril. (Died 868.)

Spain,

St. James the Greater. (Died 44.) Temperance, Father Mathew. (1790—1856.) Yorkshire, Paulinus, bishop of York and Rochester. (597—644). Wales, St. David. (480—544.)

The Twelve Apostles.

The last twelve names on the poll or list of ordinary degrees were so called, when the list was arranged in order of merit, and not alphabetically, as now; they were also called the Chosen Twelve. The last of the twelve was designated St. Paul from a play on the verse 1 Cor. xv. 9. The same term is now applied to the last twelve in the Mathematical Tripos.

Apostle of the Sword. So Mahomet was called, because he enforced his creed at the point of the sword. (570—632.)

Prince of the Apostles.

St. Peter. (Matt. xvi. 18, 19.)

Apostle Spoons

Spoons formerly given at christenings; so called because one of the apostles figured at the top of the handle. Sometimes twelve spoons, representing the twelve apostles; sometimes four, representing the four evangelists; and sometimes only one, was presented. Sometimes, but very rarely, a set occurs containing in addition the “Master Spoon” and the “Lady Spoon.” We still give at christenings a silver spoon, though the apostolic handle is no longer retained.

Apostles' Creed

(The). A church creed supposed to be an epitome of Scripture doctrines, or doctrines taught by the apostles. It was received into the Latin Church, in its present form, in the eleventh century; but a formula somewhat like it existed in the second century. Items were added in the fourth and fifth centuries, and verbal alterations much later.

It is said that Tullo, Bishop of Antioch, introduced the Creed as part of the daily service in 471.

Apostolic Fathers

Christian authors born in the first century, when the apostles lived. John is supposed to have died about A.D. 99, and Polycarp, the last of the Apostolic Fathers, born about 80, was his disciple. These three are tolerably certain: Clement of Rome (30—100), Ignatius (died 115), and Polycarp (80—169). Three others are Barnabas, Hermas; and Papias. Barnabas was the companion of Paul, Hermas is a very doubtful name, and Papias (Bp. of Hierapolis) is mentioned by Eusebius.

Polycarp could hardly have been a disciple of John, although he might have received Christian instruction from the old “beloved one.”

Apostolic Majesty

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A title borne by the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary. It was conferred by Pope Sylvester II. on the King of Hungary in 1000.

Apparel

Dress. The ornamental parts of the alb, at the lower edge and at the wrists. Catechumens used to talk of putting on their apparels, or fine white surplices, for the feast of Pentecost.

Pugin says: "The albe should be made with apparels worked in silk or gold, embroidered with ornaments."

Rock tells us — "That apparels were stitched on the upper part of the amice, like a collar to it."

Appeal to the Country

(An). Asking electors by their choice of representatives to express their opinion of some moot question. In order to obtain the public opinion Parliament is dissolved, and a new election must be made.

Appiades

(4 syl.). Five divinities whose temple stood near the fountains of Appius, in Rome. Their names are Venus, Pallas, Concord, Peace, and Vesta. They were represented on horse—back, like Amazons.

Appian Way

The oldest and best of all the Roman roads, leading from the Porta Capena of Rome to Capua. This "queen of roads" was commenced by Appius Claudius, the decemvir, B.C. 313.

Apple

(Newton and the). Voltaire tells us that Mrs. Conduit, Newton's niece, told him that Newton was at Woolsthorpe, when, seeing an apple fall, he was led into a train of thought which resulted in his discovery of gravitation (1666).

His mother had married a Rev. B. Smith, and in 1656 had returned to Woolsthorpe. Her granddaughter was the wife of Mr. Conduit, who succeeded Newton in the Mint. Newton was on a visit to his mother.

The apple of discord.

A cause of dispute; something to contend about. At the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses met together, Discord threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful." Juno, Minerva, and Venus put in their separate claims; and not being able to settle the point, referred the question to Paris, who gave judgment in favour of Venus. This brought upon him the vengeance of Juno and Minerva, to whose spite the fall of Troy is attributed.

The "apple" plays a large part in Greek story. Besides the "Apple of Discord," related above, we have the three apples thrown down by Hippomenes when he raced with Atalanta. The story says that Atalanta stopped to pick up the apples, whereby Hippomenes won the race, and according to the terms obtained her for wife.

Then there are the golden apples of the Hesperides, guarded by a sleepless dragon with a hundred heads; but Hercules slew the dragon and carried some of the apples to Eurystheus. This was the twelfth and last of his “labours.”

Of course, the Bible story of Eve and the Apple will be familiar to every reader of this dictionary.

Apples of Istakhar are “all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other.”

Apples of Paradise

, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the bite given by Eve.

Apples of Pyban

, says Sir John Mandeville, fed the pigmies with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom. Thevenot says — “There are apple—trees on the sides of the Dead Sea which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes.” Josephus speaks of these apples. Witman says the same is asserted of the oranges there. (See Tacitus, Hist., v. 7.)

“Like to the apples on the Dead Sea's shore,

All ashes to the taste.”

Byron: Childe Harold

, iii. 34.

The apple of perpetual youth.

This is the apple of Idun, daughter of the dwarf Svald, and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting this apple that the gods preserve their perpetual youth. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The singing apple had the power of persuading any one to anything. (Chery and Fairstar: Countess D'Anois.)

Prince Ahmed's apple

— a cure for every disorder. This apple the prince purchased at Samarcand. (Arabian Nights, Prince Ahmed, etc.)

The apple of the eye.

The pupil, of which perhaps it is a corruption. If not, it is from an erroneous notion that the little black spot of the eye is a little round solid ball like an apple. Anything extremely dear or extremely sensitive.

“He kept him as the apple of his eye.” — Deut. xxxii. 3.

Apple—john

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(An). An apple so called from its being at maturity about St. John's Day (May 6th). We are told that apple—johns will keep for two years, and are best when shrivelled.

“I am withered like an old apple—john.” Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. iii. 3.

Sometimes called the Apples of King John, which, if correct, would militate against the notion about “St. John's Day.”

“There were some things, for instance, the Apples of King John, ... I should be tempted to buy.” — Bigelow: Life of B. Franklin.

In the United States there is a drink called “Apple—Jack,” which is apple or cider brandy.

Apple—pie Bed

A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down; from the apple turnover; or, more probably, a corruption of “a nap—pe—pli bed.” (French, nappe pliée, a folded sheet.)

Apple—pie Order

Prim and precise order.

The origin of this phrase is still doubtful. Some suggest cap—à—pie, like a knight in complete armour. Some tell us that apples made into a pie are quartered and methodically arranged when the cores have been taken out. Perhaps the suggestion made above of nap—pe—pli (French, nappes pliées, folded linen, neat as folded linen, Latin, plico, to fold) is nearer the mark.

It has also been suggested that “Apple—pie order” may be a corruption of alpha, beta, meaning as orderly as the letters of the alphabet.

“Everything being in apple—pie order, ... Dr. Johnson ... proposed that we should accompany him ... to M'Tassa's kraal.” — Adventures in Mashonaland, p. 294 (1803).

April

The opening month, when the trees unfold, and the womb of nature opens with young life. (Latin, aperire, to open.)

April Fool Called in France un poisson d'Avril (q.v.), and in Scotland a gowk (cuckoo). In Hindustan similar tricks are played at the Huli Festival (March 31st). So that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to the mockery trial of our Redeemer, the two most popular explanations. A better solution is this: As March 25th used to be New Year's Day, April 1st was its octave, when its festivities culminated and ended.

For the same reason that the “Mockery of Jesus” is rejected as a solution of this custom, the tradition that it arose from Noah sending out the dove on the first month may be set aside. Perhaps it may be a relic of the Roman “Cerealia,” held at the beginning of April. The tale is that Proserpina was sporting in the Elysian meadows, and had just filled her lap with daffodils, when Pluto carried her off to the lower world. Her mother, Ceres, heard the echo of her screams, and went in search of “the voice;” but her search was a fool's errand, it was hunting the gowk, or looking for the “echo of a scream.”

Of course this fable is an allegory of seedtime.

My April morn — i.e.

my wedding day; the day when I was made a fool of. The allusion is to the custom of making fools of each other on the 1st of April.

April Gentleman

(An). A man newly married, who has made himself thus “an April fool.”

April Squire

(An). Anovus homo, A man who has accumulated money, and has retired into the country, where his money may give him the position of a squire.

A priori

[Latin, from an antecedent]. An a priori argument is when we deduce a fact from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. All mathematical proofs are of the a priori kind, whereas judgments in the law courts are of the a posteriori evidence; we infer the animus from the act. (See A Posteriori.)

Apron

This is a strange blunder. A napperon, converted into An apperon. “Napperon” is French for a napkin, from nappe (cloth in general). Halliwell, in his Archaic Dictionary, p. 571, gives Nappern (an apron) North.

Other examples of n attached to the following noun, or detached from it, are an adder for a nadder (Old English, noeddre); a newt for an ewt; a nag (Danish, ög); nuncle (Shakespeare), mine uncle; For the nonce (this once), where n is transferred from the preceding pronoun tha—n or the—n, i.e. this—n (accusative case after “for”).

Apron—string Tenure

(An). tenure held in virtue of one's wife.

Tied to his mother's apron—string

, completely under his mother's thumb. Applied to a big boy or young man who is still under mother rule.

A propos de bottes

(French). Turning to quite another subject; à propos de rien.

Aqua Regia

[royal water]. So called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. It consists of one part of nitric acid, with from two to four of hydrochloric acid.

Aqua Tofana

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Acqua Tofanica. A poisonous liquid much used in Italy in the seventeenth century by young wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. It was invented by a woman named Tofana, who called it the Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari, from the widespread notion that an oil of miraculous efficacy flowed from the tomb of that saint. In Italian called also Aquella di Napoli.

Aqua Vitæ [water of life]. Certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson terms a seller of ardent spirits an “aqua—vitæ man” (Alchemist, i. 1). The “elixir of life” was made from distilled spirits, which were thought to have the power of prolonging life. (See Eau de Vie.)

Aquarians

A sect in the early Christian Church which insisted on the use of water instead of wine in the Lord's Supper.

Aquarius

[the water—bearer]. One of the signs of the zodiac (January 20th to February 18th). So called because it appears when the Nile begins to overflow.

Aqueous Rocks

Rocks produced by the agency of water, such as bedded limestones, sandstones, and clays; in short, all the geological rocks which are arranged in layers or strata.

Aquilant

(in Orlando Furioso). A knight in Charlemagne's army, son of Olivero and Sigismunda. He was called black from his armour, and his brother Gryphon white. While Aquilant was searching for his brother he met Martano in Gryphon's armour, and took him bound to Damascus, where his brother was.

Aquiline

(3 syl.). Raymond's matchless steed, bred on the banks of the Tagus. (Georgics, iii. 271—277; and Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, book vii.) (See Horse.)

Aquinian Sage

(The). Juvenal is so called because he was born at Aquinum, a town of the Volscians.

Arabesque

[Arrabesk]. The gorgeous Moorish patterns, like those in the Alhambra, especially employed in architectural decoration. During the Spanish wars, in the reign of Louis XIV., arabesque decorations were profusely introduced into France. (French, “Arab—like.”)

Arabian Bird

(The). The phoenix; a marvellous man, quite sui generis.

“O Antony! thou Arabian bird!” Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

Arabian Nights

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). First made known in Europe by Antoine Galland, a French Oriental scholar, who translated them and called them The Thousand and One Nights (from the number of nights occupied in their recital). They are of Indian, Persian, Egyptian, and Arabian origin. Common English translations —

4 vols. 12mo, 1792, by R. Heron, published in Edinburgh and London. 3 vols. 12mo, 1794, by Mr. Beloe, London.

3 vols. 12mo, 1798, by Richard Gough, enlarged. Paris edition.

5 vols. 8vo, 1802, by Rev. Edward Foster.

5 vols. 8vo, 1830, by Edw. Wm. Lane.

The Tales of the Genii

, by Sir Charles Morell (i.e. Rev. James Ridley), are excellent imitations.

Arabians

A class of Arabian heretics of the third century, who maintained that the soul dies with the body.

Arabic Figures

The figures 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. So called because they were introduced into Europe (Spain) by the Moors or Arabs, who learnt them from the Hindus. Far more important than the characters, is the decimalism of these figures: 1 figure = units, 2 figures = tens, 3 figures = hundreds, and so on ad infinitum.

The figures i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x, etc., are called Roman figures. The Greeks arranged their figures under three columns of nine figures, units, tens, and hundreds, and employed the letters of the alphabet. As there are but twenty—four letters, a sansculotte letter had to be introduced into each column. In the units column it represented 6, and was called episemon. In the tens column it represented 90, and was called koppos. And: in the third column it represented 900, and was called sanpi. Thousands were represented by a dash under some letter of the first three columns.

Arabs

Street Arabs. The houseless poor; street children. So called because, like the Arabs, they are nomads or wanderers with no settled home.

Arachne's Labours

Spinning and weaving. Arachne was so skilful a needlewoman that she challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, and hanged herself because the goddess beat her. Minerva then changed her into a spider.

“Arachne's labours ne'er her hours divide,

Her noble hands nor looms nor spindles guide.” Hoole's Jerusalem Delivered, book ii.

Araf, Al

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[the partition]. A region, according to the Koran, between Paradise and Jehennam, for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics, and idiots. The inmates of Al Araf will be allowed to converse with the blessed and the cursed; to the former this region will appear a hell, to the latter a heaven.

(See Limbo.)

Araspes

(in Jerusalem Delivered), King of Alexandria, more famed for devices than courage. He joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders.

Aratos

of Achæa, in Greece, murdered Nicocles, the tyrant, in order to restore his country to liberty, and would not allow even a picture of a king to exist. He was poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

“Aratus, who awhile relumed the soul

Of fondly—lingering liberty in Greece.”

Thomson: Winter, 491, 492.

Arbaces

(3 syl.). A Mede and Assyrian satrap, who conspired against Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media on the ruins of the Assyrian kingdom. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Arbor Day

A day set apart in Canada and the United States for planting trees. (See Historic Note Book, p.

42.)

Arbor Judæ

Said to be so called because Judas Iscariot hanged himself thereon. This is one of those word—resemblances so delusive to etymologists. Judæ is the Spanish judia (a French bean), and Arbor Judæ is a corruption of Arbol Judia (the bean—tree), so called from its bean—like pods.

Arcades Ambo

[Arcades 3 syl.], both sweet innocents or simpletons, both Verdant Greens. From Virgil's Eclogue, vii. v. 4. (See below, Arcadian Youth.) Byron's translation was “blackguards both.”

Arcadian

A shepherd, a fancy farmer; so called because the Arcadians were a pastoral people, and hence pastoral poetry is called Arcadic.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An Arcadian youth. A dunce or blockhead; so called because the Arcadians were the least intellectual of all the Greeks. Juneval (vii. 160) uses the phrase Arcadicus juvenis for a stupid fool.

Arcadian Nightingales

Asses.

“April is the month of love; and the country of Chastelleraud abounds with Arcadian nightingales.” —

Rabelais: Pantagruel

. v. 7 (note).

Archangels

According to the Koran, there are four archangels. Gabriel, the angel of revelations, who writes down the divine decrees; Michael, the champion, who fights the battles of faith; Azrael, the angel of death; and Azrafil, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.

Arch—monarch of the World

Napoleon III. of France. (1808, 1852—1870, died 1873.)

Archers

The best archers in British history and story are Robin Hood and his two comrades Little John and Will Scarlet.

The famous archers of Henry II. were Tepus his bowman of the Guards, Gilbert of the white hind, Hubert of Suffolk, and Clifton of Hampshire.

Nearly equal to these were Egbert of Kent and William of Southampton.

Domitian, the Roman emperor, we are told, could shoot four arrows between the spread fingers of a man's hand.

Tell, who shot an apple set on the head of his son, is a replica of the Scandinavian tale of Egil, who, at the command of King Nidung, performed a precisely similar feat.

Robin Hood, we are told, could shoot an arrow a mile or more.

Arches

(The Court of). The most ancient consistory court of England, the dean of which anciently held his court under the arches of Bow church. Of course we refer to the old church, the steeple of which was supported on arches. The present structure was the work of Sir Christopher Wren.

Archeus

(3 syl.) according to the Paracelsians, is that immaterial principle which energises all living substances. There were supposed to be numerous archei, but the chief one was said to reside in the stomach.

Archilochian Bitterness

Ill-natured satire, so named from Archilochos, the Grecian satirist (B.C. 714—676).

Archimage

(3 syl.). The name given by Thomson to the “demon Indolence.” Archimagus is the title borne by the High Priest of the Persian Magi.

““I will,” he cried, “so help me God! destroy

That villain Archimage.””

Thomson: Castle of Indolence

, c. ii.

Archimago

[Hypocrisy]. In Spenser's Faëric Queene (ii. 1). He assumes the guise of the Red Cross Knight, and deceives Una; but Sansloy sets upon him, and reveals his true character. When the Red Cross Knight is about to be married to Una, he presents himself before the King of Eden, and tells him that the Knight is betrothed to Duessa. The falsehood being exposed, Archimago is cast into a vile dungeon (book i.). In book ii. the arch—hypocrite is loosed again for a season, and employs Bragga—docchio to attack the Red Cross Knight. These allegories are pretty obvious: thus the first incident means that Truth (Una), when Piety (the Red Cross Knight) is absent, is in danger of being led astray by Hypocrisy; but any Infidel (Sansloy) can lay bare religious hypocrisy.

“Such whenas Archimago them did view

He weened well to worke some uncouth wyle.” Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 1, st. 8.

Sometimes Spenser employs the shortened form “Archimage.”

Archimedes Principle

The quantity of water removed by any body immersed therein will equal in bulk the bulk of the body immersed. This scientific fact was noted by the philosopher Archimedes. (See Eureka.)

Archimedes Screw

An endless screw, used for raising water, propelling ships, etc., invented by Archimedes of Syracuse.

Architect of his own Fortune

Appius says, “Fabrun suoe esse quemque fortunoe.” Longfellow says, “All are architects of Fate.” (The Builders.)

Archontics

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Heretics of the second century, who held a number of idle stories about creation, which they attributed to a number of agents called “archons.” (Greek, archon, a prince or ruler.)

Arcite

(2 syl.). A young Theban knight, made captive by Duke Theseus, and shut up with Palamon in a prison at Athens. Here both the captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister—in—law. After a time both captives gained their liberty, and Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite was the victor, but, as he was riding to receive the prize of his prowess, he was thrown from his horse, and died. So Emily became the bride of Palamon. (Chaucer: The Knight Tale.)

The story is perhaps better known through Dryden's version, Palamon and Arcite.

Arcos Barbs

War steeds of Arcos, in Andalusia, very famous in Spanish ballads. (See Barbed Steeds.)

Arctic Region

means the region of Arcturos (the Bear stars). Ark in Sanskrit means “to be bright,” applied to stars or anything bright. The Greeks translated ark into arkt(os), “a bear”; hence Arcturus (the Bear Stars), and Arctic region, the region where the north star is found.

Arden

(Enoch). Mr. G. R. Emerson, in a letter to the Athenæum (August 18th, 1866), points out the resemblance of this tale by Tennyson to one entitled Homeward Bound, by Adelaide Anne Procter, in a volume of Legends and Lyrics, 1858. Mr. Emerson concludes his letter thus: “At this point (i.e when the hero sees his wife “seated by the fire, whispering baby words and smiling on the father of her child”) Tennyson departs from the story. Enoch goes away broken—hearted to die, without revealing his secret; but Miss Procter makes the three recognise each other, and the hero having blessed his wife, leaves her, to roam “over the restless ocean.””

Mrs. Gaskell's Manchester Marriage is a similar tale. In this tale “Frank” is made to drown himself; and his wife (then Mrs. Openshaw) never knows of his return.

Area—sneak

A boy or girl who sneaks about areas to commit petty thefts.

Areopagus

or Mars' Hill. The seat of a famous tribunal in Athens; so called because the first cause tried there was that of Mars or Ares, accused by Neptune of the death of his son Halirrhothius.

“Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' Hill.” — Acts xvii. 22.

Aretine (3 syl.) or rather Pietro Aretino, patronised by François I. of France. A poet noted for his disreputable life and licentious verses. (1492—1557.)

“[Shakespeare] tried his hand with Aretine on a licentious subject.” — Steevens.

Aretinian Syllables

Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, used by Guido d'Arezzo in the eleventh century for his system of hexachords. Hexachord means a scale of six notes. They are the first syllables of some words in the opening stanza of a hymn for St. John's Day. "Ut queant laxis re —sonare fibris," etc. Si, the seventh note, was not introduced till the seventeenth century. Originally the scale consisted of six notes only. (See Do.)

"Auparavant on ne se servait que de six notes; et on remplaçait le si au moyen de combinaisons appelées nuances." — Bouillet: Dictionnaire des Sciences, p. 1523, col. 2.)

a miserly hypochondriac. He reduced himself to this dilemma: if his apothecary would not charge less, he could not afford to be sick; but if he swallowed fewer drugs, he would suffer in health. (Molière's Le Malade Imaginaire.)

Argand Lamp

A lamp with a circular wick, through which a current of air flows, to supply oxygen to the flame, and increase its brilliancy. Invented by Aimé Argand, 1789.

Argante

(3 syl.) A giantess of unbridled licentiousness, in Spenser's Faërie Queene, iii. 7.

"That geauntesse Argantè is behight,

A daughter of the Titans ...

Her sire Typhoeus was. ..."

Book iii, 7, st. 47.

Argantes

(3 syl.). A Circassian of high rank and matchless courage, but fierce to brutality, and an ultra—despiser of the sect of the Nazarenes. He was sent as an ambassador from Egypt to King Aladine. He and Solyman were by far the most doughty of the Pagan knights. The former was slain by Rinaldo, and the other by Tancred. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

"Bonaparte stood before the deputies like the Argantès of Italy's heroic poet and gave them the choice of peace and war, with the air of a superior being, capable at once of dictating their fate." — Sir Walter Scott.

Argenis

A political allegory by John Barclay, containing allusions to the state of Europe, and more especially to France, during the time of the league. (1582—1621.) (See Utopia.)

Argentile

and Curan Argentile was the daughter of King Adelbright, who, on his deathbed, committed her in charge to King Edel. Edel kept her a close prisoner, under hope of getting into his possession her lands and dominion. Curan, the son of a Danske King, in order to woo her, became a kitchen drudge in Edel's household, and Edel resolved to marry Argentile to this drudge, but she fled away. Curan now turned shepherd, and fell in love with a neatherd's maid, who turned out to be Argentile. The two were married, and Curan claiming his wife's dominions, became King of Northumberland, and put Edel to death. (Percy's Reliques.)

Argentine Republic

The Republic of the Argentine, or Silver River; in other words, the Confederation of the Rio de la Plata.

Argeo (in Orlando Furioso). Baron of Servia, and husband of Gabrina. He is a sort of Potiphar. His wife tried to seduce Philander, a young Dutch knight, and failing in her effort, she accused him to her husband of adultery; whereupon Argeo threw the "faithless guest" into durance. In the course of time Gabrina implored the young captive to defend her against a wicked knight who had assailed her virtue. He consented to be her champion, and was placed in concealment. Presently a knight drew near, and Philander, rushing on him, dispatched him; but the supposed "adulterer" was, in reality, Argeo himself, and Gabrina, being now a widow, was free to marry her Dutch "Joseph."

Argillan

(in Jerusalem Delivered). A haughty, turbulent knight, born on the banks of the Trent. Accusing Godfrey and his brother of having murdered Rinaldo, he induced the Latians to revolt. The revolt spread to the Swiss and English, but Godfrey succeeded in restoring order. Argillan was arrested, but made his escape, and was slain in battle by Solyman. (Books viii. ix.)

Argo

A ship sailing on an adventure. The galley of Jason that went in search of the Golden Fleece was so called, from the Greek argos (swift).

Argonauts

The sailors of the ship Argo. Apollonios of Rhodes wrote an epic poem on the subject. (Greek, argonaus.)

Argosy

A merchant ship. A corruption of "ragusea." Ships of the largest size were built at Ragusa in Dalmatia and Venice.

"He hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies ... a third to Mexico, a fourth to England." — Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

Argot

[Argo]. Slang or flash language (French).

"Sans le (le mot d'argot) faire venir du grec argos, e.g. comme l'on a prétendu avant nous, nous y verrions logiquement undiminute du vieux mot argu qui signifiait injure, reproche, et aussi ruse, finesse, subtilité." — Larchey: Dictionnaire d'Argot.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Francisque—Michel, however, in his Philologie Comparée, says, “L'ancienne langue Française avait le mot argu, mais dans un sens bien différent, que l'on peut établir par les passages suivant ...” He then gives five examples.

Argus—eyed

Jealously watchful. According to Grecian fable, Argos had 100 eyes, and Juno set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous.

Argyle

(2 syl.) — of whom Thompson says, in his Autumn (928—30) —

“On thee, Argyle,

Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her boast, Thy fond, imploring country turns her eye — “ was John, the great duke, who lived only two years after he succeeded to the dukedom. Pope (Ep. Sat. ii. 86, 87) says —

“Argyle the state's whole thunder born to wield,

And shake alike the senate and the field.”

Arians

The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the fourth century. He maintained

(1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh.

Arideus

[A—ree—de—us] in Jerusalem Delivered, herald in the Christian army. The other herald is Pindorus.

Ariel

A spirit of the air and guardian of innocence. He was enslaved to the witch Sycorax, who overtasked him; and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, shut him up in a pine—rift for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of Caliban, who tortured him most cruelly. Prospero liberated him from the pine—rift, and the grateful fairy served him for sixteen years, when he was set free.

(Shakespeare. Tempest.)

Ariel.

The sylph that watched over Belinda. (Pope: Rape of the Lock, i.)

Ariel.

One of the angels cast out of heaven. The word means lion of God. (Milton: Paradise Lost, book vi. 371.)

Aries

The Ram. The sign of the Zodiac in which the sun is from March 21st to April 20th.

“At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun.” Thomson: Spring, 20.

Arimanes

(4 syl.). “The prince of earth and air,” and the fountain—head of evil. It is a personage in Persian mythology, introduced into Grecian fable under the name of Arimannis. Byron introduces him in his drama called Manfred.

Arimaspian

A one-eyed people of Scythia, who adorned their hair with gold. They were constantly at war with the gryphons who guarded the gold mines.

“As when a gryphon, through the wilderness ...

Pursues the Arimasian, who by stealth

Had from his wakeful custody purloined

The guarded gold.”

Milton: Paradise Lost

, ii. 943.6)

Arioch

One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means a fierce lion. (Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371.)

Arion

A Greek musician, cast into the sea by mariners, but carried to Tænaros on the back of a dolphin.

Arion.

The wonderful horse which Hercules gave to Adrastus. It sprang from Ceres and Neptune, had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were the feet of a man. (See Horse.)

Ariosto

was privately married to Alessandra Benucci, widow of Tito Strozzi; she is generally called his mistress.

Ariosto of the North.

So Lord Byron calls Sir Walter Scott. (Childe Harold, iv. 40.)

Aristeas

The wandering Jew of Grecian fable. (See Jew.)

Aristides

(4 syl.). Surnamed The Just. An Athenian statesman.

“Then Aristides lifts his honest front,

Spotless of heart; to whom the unflattering voice
Of Freedom gave the noblest name of “just.”” Thomson: Winter, 459—61.

The British Aristides.

Andrew Marvell (1620—1678).

The French Aristides.

Mons. Grévy, born 1813, president of the Third Republic 1879—1887, died 1891. He was a barrister by profession.

Aristippos

(See Hedonism .)

Aristocracy

The cold shade of the aristocracy — i.e. the unsympathising patronage of the great. The expression first occurs in Sir W. F. P. Napier's History of the Peninsular War.

The word “aristocracy” is the Greek aristo—cratia (rule of the best—born).

Aristophanes

The English or modern Aristophanes. Samuel Foote (1722—1777). The French Aristophanes. J. Baptiste Poquelin de Molière (1622—1673).

Aristotle

Aristotle of China. Tehuhe, who died A.D. 1200, called the “Prince of Science.” Aristotle of the nineteenth century. Baron Cuvier, the great naturalist (1769—1832).

Aristotelian Philosophy

Aristotle maintained that four separate causes are necessary before anything exists: the material cause, the formal, the final, and the moving cause. The first is the antecedents from which the thing comes into existence; the second, that which gives it its individuality; the moving or efficient cause is that which causes matter to assume its individual forms; and the final cause is that for which the thing exists. According to Aristotle, matter is eternal.

Aristotelian Unities

Aristotle, the Greek philosopher, laid it down as a rule that every tragedy, properly constructed, should contain but one catastrophe; should be limited to one denouement; and be circumscribed to the action of one single day. These are called the Aristotelic or Dramatic unities. To these the French have added a fourth, the unity of uniformity, i.e. in tragedy all the “dramatis personæ” should be tragic in style, in comedy comic, and in farce farcical.

Ark

You must have come out of the ark, or you were born in the ark, because you are so old—fashioned, and ignorant of current events.

Armada

The Spanish Armada. The fleet assembled by Philip II of Spain, in 1588, for the conquest of England. Used for any fleet.

Armenians

A religious sect so called from Armenia, where Christianity was introduced in the second century. They attribute only one nature to Christ and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only. They enjoin the adoration of saints, have some peculiar ways of administering baptism and the Lord's Supper, but do not maintain the doctrine of purgatory.

Armi da

One of the prominent female characters in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. She was a beautiful sorceress, with whom Rinaldo fell in love, and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. Two messengers were sent from the Christian army with a talisman to disenchant him. After his escape, Armida followed him in distraction, but not being able to allure him back, set fire to her palace, rushed into the midst of a combat, and was slain.

In 1806, Frederick William of Prussia declared war against Napoleon, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse the enthusiasm of the people. When Napoleon was told of it, he wittily said of her: “She is Armida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace.”

Arminians

(Anti ——— Calvinists), so called from James Harmensen, of Holland, whose name, Latinised, is Jacobus Arminius. He asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that He wills all men to be saved; and that His predestination is founded on His foreknowledge.

Armory Heraldry is so called, because it first found its special use in direct connection with military equipments, knightly exercises, and the mêlée of actual battle.

“Some great man's badge of war or armory.” Morris: Earthly Paradise, ii. 167.

Armoury

The place where armour is kept.

“But the sword

Of Michael from the armoury of God

Was given him.”

Milton: Paradise Lost

, vi. 320. See also vii. 200.

Arms

In the Bayeux tapestry, the Saxons fight on foot with javelin and battle—axe, and bear shields with the British characteristic of a boss in the centre. The men were moustached.

The Normans are on horseback, with long shields and pennoned lances. The men are not only shaven, but most of them have a complete tonsure on the back of the head, whence the spies said to Harold, “There are more priests in the Norman army than men in Harold's.”

Arms of England

(The Royal). The three lions leopardised were the cognisance of William the Conqueror; the lion rampant in the second quarter is from the arms of Scotland; and the harp in the fourth quarter represents Ireland. The lion supporter is in honour of England, and the unicorn in honour of Scotland. These two supporters were introduced by James I.

William I. had only two lions passant gardant; the third was introduced by Henry II. The lion rampant first appeared on Scotch seals in the reign of Alexander II. (1214—1249). The harp was assigned to Ireland in the time of Henry VII.; before that time the arms of Ireland were three crowns. The unicorn was not a supporter of the royal arms of Scotland before the reign of Mary Stuart.

Which arm of the service.

Military or naval?

The secular arm.

Civil, in contradistinction to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

“The relapsed arm delivered to the secular arm.” — Priestley. Corruptions of Christianity.

To arm a magnet.

To put an armature on a loadstone. A coat of arms. An heraldic device.

A passage of arms.

A literary controversy; a battle of words. An assault at arms (or of arms). An attack by fencers; a hand—to—hand military exercise. At arm's length. At a distance. To keep one at arm's length is to repel familiarity.

In arms.

A child in arms is an infant carried about in one's arms. A city in arms is one in which the people are armed for war. King of arms. A chief herald in the College of Heralds. Here arms means heraldic devices. Small arms. Those which do not, like artillery, require carriages.

To appeal to arms.

To determine to decide a litigation by war. To arms! Make ready for battle.

“To arms! cried Mortimer,

And couched his quivering lance.”

Gray: The Bard.

Come to my arms. Come, and let me embrace you. To lay down their arms. To cease from armed hostility; to surrender. Under arms. Prepared for battle; in battle array.

Up in arms.

In open rebellion; roused to anger, as the clergy were up in arms against Colenso for publishing his Lectures on the Pentateuch. The latter is a figure of speech.

With open arms.

Cordially; as persons receive a dear friend when they open their arms for an embrace.

Arnauts

[brave men]. Albanian mountaineers.

“Stained with the best of Arnaut's blood.” Byron: The Giaour.

Arn—monat

Anglo—Saxon, ærn—monath, barn month. The Anglo—Saxon name for August, because it was the month for garnering the corn.

Arnold

of Melchthal, patriarch of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Matilda, a sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the people into rebellion, Arnold gave up Matilda and joined the insurgents; but when Gessler was shot by William Tell, he became united to her in marriage. (Rossini's opera of Guglielmo Tell.)

Arnoldists

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The partisans of Arnold of Brescia, who raised his voice against the abuses and vices of the papacy in the twelfth century. He was burnt alive by Pope Adrian IV.

Arod

in the satire of Absalom and Achitopel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir William Waller.

But in the sacred annals of our plot

Industrious Arod never be forgot,

The labours of this midnight magistrate

May vie with Corah [Titus Oates] to preserve the state." Part ii.

Aroint thee

Get ye gone, be off. In Cheshire they say, rynt ye, witch ; and milk—maids say to their cows when they have done milking them, rynt ye. (or 'roint) my beauties; but it is doubtful whether this is connected with the word in question.

Aronteus

(4 syl.) in Jerusalem Delivered. An Asiatic king, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders, "not by virtue fired, but vain of his titles and ambitious of fame."

Aroundight

The sword of Sir Launcelot of the Lake. (See Sword.)

"It is the sword of a good knight,

Though homespun was his mail,

What matter if it be not hight,

Joyeuse, Colada, Durindale,

Excalibar, or Aroundight?"

Longfellow.

Arras

tapestry. So called from Arras, in Artois, famed for its manufacture. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was a common thing for persons to hide behind it, especially the arras curtain before the door. Hubert concealed the two villains who were to put out Arthur's eyes behind the arras. Polonius was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras. Falstaff proposed to hide behind the arras at Windsor, etc.

Arria

a Roman lady, the wife of Cæcina Pætus. Pætus being accused of conspiring against the Emperor Claudius was condemned to death and sent by sea to Rome. Arria accompanied him, and stabbed herself in the boat, then presenting the dagger to her husband, she said: "Pætus, it gives no pain" (non dolet). (Pliny, vii.) Her daughter Arria, wife of Thraseas, when her husband was condemned to death by Nero, opened her veins; but Thraseas entreated her to live, for the sake of her children.

Arrière Pensée

(plural arrières pensées), a hidden or reserved motive, not apparent on the surface.

Arrot

the weasel, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Arrow

The broad arrow, thus =17=. A mark used by the British Board of Ordnance, and placed on their stores. (See Broad Arrow.)

Arowroot

is araruta, the Indian word ara is the name of the plant. There is no evidence of its being used to absorb the poison of poisoned arrows in fleshy wounds.

Arsetes

(in Jerusalem Delivered). The aged eunuch who brought up Clorinda, and attended her steps.

Artaxerxes

called by the Persians Kai—Ardeshir, and surnamed diraz—dest (long—handed), because his right hand was longer than his left. The Romans translated diraz—dest into longi—manus; the Greek Arta into Arde ("noble").

Artegal

(Sir) (in Spenser's Faërie Queene), is the hero of the fifth book, and impersonates Justice, the foster child of Astræa. In the previous books he occasionally appears, and is called Sir Arthegal. It is said that Arthur, Lord Grey of Wilton, was the prototype of this character. He was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant in 1580, and the poet was his secretary. In book iv., canto 6, Sir Artegal is married to Britomart, and proceeds to succour Irena (Ireland), whose heritage had been withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. (See Arthegal.)

Artemus Ward

A showman, very cute, and very American The hypothetical writer of the essays or papers so called, the real author being Charles F. Browne.

Being asked if his name was Artemus or Artemus, he wrote on his address card: —

Don't bother me with your etas and short e's,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Nor ask me for more than you have on my card; Oh! spare me from etymological sorties,

And simply accept me as Artemus Ward; Which, however, leaves the pronunciation of "Ward" doubtful.

Artesian Wells

So called from Artesium (the Latin for Artois), in France, where they were first bored.

Artful Dodger

A young thief, a most perfect adept in villainy, up to every sort of wicked dodge. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Arthegal

Uterine brother of Prince Arthur. Spenser, in his Faerie Queene (book iii.), makes Britomart see his person and name in the magic glass. She falls in love with the looking—glass hero, and is told by Merlin that she will marry him, and become the mother of a line of kings that would supersede both of the Saxons and Normans. He referred, of course, to the Tudors, who were descendants of Cadwallader. (See Artegal.)

Arthur

King of the Silures, a tribe of ancient Britons, was mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, raised by the revolt of his nephew, Modred. He was taken to Glastonbury, where he died. His wife was Guinever, who committed adultery with Sir Launcelot of the Lake, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

He was the natural son of Uther and Igera (wife of Gorlois, duke of Cornwall), and was brought up by Sir Ector.

He was born at Tintadgel or Tintagel a castle in Cornwall.

His habitual residence was Caerleon, in Wales; and he was buried at Avalon. His sword was called Excalibar or Excalibor; his spear, Rome (1 syl.), and his shield, Pridwin. His dog was named Cavall. (See Round Table Knights.)

Arthurian Romances

These may be divided into six parts:

(1) The romance of the San Graal. By Robert Borron.

(2) The Merlin, which celebrates the birth and exploits of King Arthur. By Sr Thomas Malory.

(3) The Launcelot. Perhaps by Ulrich.

(4) The search or Quest of the San Graal. It is found by Sir Galahad, a knight of pure heart and great courage; but no sooner does he find it than he is taken up to heaven. By (?) Walter Mapes.

(5) The Mort d'Arthur, or Death of Arthur. By (?) Walter Mapes.

Arundelian Marbles

A collection of ancient sculptures collected at great expense by Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667 by his grandson, Henry Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk. They contain tables of ancient chronology, especially that of Athens, from B.C. 1582 to 264, engraved in old Greek capitals. Date of the tables, B.C. 263.

Arvakur

(See Horse .)

Aryans

The parent stock of what is called the Indo—European family of nations. They lived probably in Bactria, i.e. between the river Oxus and the Hindu—koosh mountains. The Aryan family of languages include the Persian and Hindû with all the European except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, and Finnic. Sometimes called the IndoEuropean, sometimes the Indo—Germanic, and sometimes the Japetic.

Sanskrit, Zend, Latin, Greek, and Celtic are, of course, included.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Arzina A river that flows into the North Sea, near Wardhus, where Sir Willoughby's three ships were frozen, and the whole crew perished of starvation.

“In these fell regions, in Arzina caught,

And to the stony deep his idle ship

Immediate sealed, he with his hapless crew ... Froze into statues.”

Thomson: Winter

934.

As you were in military drilling, means, Return to the position in which you were before the last exercise. As you were before.

Asa

was a term of address to all the gods of Gladsheim; as Asa Odin, Asa Thor, Asa Loki, Asa Tyr, etc.

““That's all very well, Asa Odin,” answered Frey; “but who, let me ask, is to undertake the feeding of the human animal?”” — Keary: Heroes of Asgard, p.73.

Asa Loki

Descended from the giants and received among the celestials. He is represented as a treacherous malignant power, fond of assuming disguises, and plotting evil. One of his progeny is Hela (q.v.).

Ascapart

A giant conquered by Sir Bevis of Southampton. He was thirty feet high, and the space between his eyes was twelve inches. This mighty giant, whose effigy figures on the city gates of Southampton, could carry under his arm without feeling distressed Sir Bevis with his wife and horse. (See Giants.)

“As Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapart.” Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., act ii. 3.

Ascendant In casting a horoscope the easternmost star, representing the house of life, is called the ascendant, because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and so long as it is above the horizon his fortune is said to be in the ascendant. When a man's circumstances begin to improve, and things look brighter, we say his star is in the ascendant. (See Houses, Stars.)

House of the Ascendant includes five degrees of the zodiac above the point just rising, and twenty—five below it. Usually, the point of birth is referred to.

The lord of the Ascendant is any planet within the “house of the Ascendant.” The house and lord of the Ascendant at birth were said by astrologers to exercises great influence on the future life of the child. Perhaps Deborah referred to the influence of the stars when she said “the stars in their courses fought against Sisera.”

(Judges v. 20.)

Ascension Day

or Holy Thursday. The day set apart by the Catholic and Anglican Church to commemorate the ascent of our Lord from earth to heaven.

Formerly it was customary to beat the bounds of each respective parish on this day, and many practical jokes were played even during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, to make the boys remember the delimitations: such as “bumping them,” pouring water clandestinely on them from house windows, beating them with thin rods, etc. Beating the bounds was called in Scotland Riding the marches (bounds).

Asclepiadics

or Asclepiadic Metre. A Greek and Latin verse, so called from Asclepiades, the inventor. Each line is divided into two parts.

The first ode of Horace is Asclepiadic. The first and last two lines run thus, and in the same metre: —

Dear friend patron of song, sprung from the race of kings;

Thy name ever a grace and a protection brings ...

My name, if to the lyre haply you chance to wed,

Pride would high as the stars lift my exalted head.

E. C. B.

Ascodrogites

(4 syl.). Certain heretics who said “they were vessels full of new wine” (Greek, askos). By new wine they meant the Gospel. (Matt. ix. 17.)

Ascot Races

A very fashionable “meet,” run on Ascot Heath, Berkshire (6 miles from Windsor). The best horses of all England compete, and at a somewhat more advanced age than at the “great classic races” (q.v.).

or Sage. Hesiod, the Greek didactic poet, born at Ascra, in Boeotia. Virgil calls him the “Old Ascræon.” (Eclogues, vii. 70.)

Asgard

The fortress of the Asir or the Northern gods, the Olympos of Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situated in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow—bridge (Bifrost). The word As means a “god,” and gard an “enclosure,” our “yard.” Odin was priest of Asgard before he migrated to the Lake Logur or Moelar Sea

Ash Tree

or “Tree of the Universe.” (See Yggdrasil.)

Ash Wednesday

The first Wednesday in Lent, so called from an ancient Roman Catholic custom of sprinkling ashes on the heads of those condemned to do penance on this day.

The ashes were those of the palms burnt on Palm Sunday. The pessimi were sprinkled with ashes, the less offending were signed on the forehead with the sign of the cross, the officiating minister saying, “Memento, homo, quia pulvis es, et in pulverem reverteris.” The custom, it is said, was introduced by Gregory the Great.

Ashmolean Museum

Presented to the University of Oxford in 1682 by Elias Ashmole. Sometimes called the Tradescant, because it belonged to the Tradescant family.

Ashtaroth

The goddess—moon in Syrian mythology, called by Jeremiah (vii. 18, xliv. 17, 25) “the queen of heaven.” Goddess of the Zidonians.

“Mooned Ashtaroth,

Heaven's queen and mother both.”

Milton: The Hymn.

Ashur

The highest god of the Assyrians. It had the head of an eagle and four wings, but the body of a man.

“Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh.” — Gen. x. II.

Asinus

Asinus asinum fricat (Latin, “one ass rubs another”), that is, we fraternise with persons like ourselves; or, in other words, “Birds of a feather flock together.” The allusion needs no explanation.

Asir

[See Æsir .]

Ask

The vulgar Ax is the more correct (Saxon, axian, to ask). In assenting to Bills, the king used to reply, “Be it as it is axed.” Chaucer says in the Doctor of Medicine's Tale, “For my werke nothing will I axe.” Launfal, 1027, has, “Ho that wyll there axsy justus.” Other quotations could easily be added.

Ask

and Embla. The Adam and Eve made by Odin, one from ash—wood and the other from elm.

Aslo

(See Horse .)

Asmodeus

[the destroyer]. The demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud “the king of devils.”

The Asmodeus of domestic peace

(in the Book of Tobit). Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the death of seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. After her marriage to Tobit, he was driven into Egypt by a charm, made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, and being pursued was taken prisoner and bound.

“Better pleased

Than Asmodeus with the fishy fume

That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent

From Media post to Egypt, there fast bound.” Milton: Paradise Lost , iv. 167—71.

Asmodeus

The companion of Don Cléofas, in The Devil on Two Sticks. (Chap. iii.)

Asmodeus flight.

Don Cléofas, catching hold of his companion's cloak, is perched on the steeple of St. Salvador. Here the foul fiend stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

“Could the reader take an Asmodeus—flight, and, waving open all roofs and privacies, look down from the roof of Notre Dame, what a Paris were it!” — Carlyle: French Revolution II.,

vi. chap. vi.

Asoka

of Magadha. In the third century the “nursing father” of Buddhism, as Constantine was of Christianity. He is called “the king beloved of the gods.”

Asoors

Evil genii of the Indians.

Aspasia

a courtesan. She was the most celebrated of the Greek Hetærae, to whom Pericles attached himself. On the death of Pericles she lived with Lysicles, a cattle—dealer. The Hetærae of Athens were, many of them, distinguished for talents and accomplishments. Those of Corinth were connected with the worship of Aphrodite (Venus).

Aspatia

in the Maid's Tragedy, of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation, and the pathos of her speeches. Amyntor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and bye—word of every one, but she bears it all with patience.

Aspen

The aspen leaf is said to tremble, from shame and horror, because our Lord's cross was made of this wood. The fact is this: the leaf is broad, and placed on a long leaf—stalk so flexible as scarcely to be able to support it in an upright position. The upper part of the stalk, on which the play mainly depends, is flattened; and, being at right angles with the leaf, is peculiarly liable to be acted on by the least breath of air.

Aspen leaf.

Metaphorically, a chattering tongue, never quiet.

“Those aspen leaves of theirs never leave wagging.” — Sir T. More.

Aspersions

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

properly means “sprinklings” or “scatterings.” Its present meaning is base insinuations or slanders.

“No sweet aspersion [rain] shall the heavens let fall

To make this contract grow.”

Shakespeare: The Tempest

, iv. 1.

Casting aspersions on one, i.e.

sprinkling with calumnies, slandering or insinuating misconduct.

“I defy all the world to cast a just aspersion on my character.” — Fielding: Tom Jones.

Asphaltic Lake

The Dead Sea, where asphalt abounds both on the surface of the water and on the banks. Asphalt is a bitumen. (From the Greek asphaltos.)

Asrael

(See Azrael .)

Ass

(See Golden Ass .)

Ass

The ass on which Mahomet went to heaven to learn the will of God was called Al Borak (the lightning).

Ass.

There is a dark stripe running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders. The tradition is that this cross was communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem. (See Christian Traditions.)

Ass, deaf to music.

This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by “Sir Balaam” in braying. Because Midas had no power to appreciate music, Apollo gave him the ears of an ass. (See Ass—eared.)

“Avarice is as deaf to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo.” — Orlando Furioso , xvii.

An ass in a lion's skin.

A coward who hectors, a fool that apes the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on a lion's hide, but was betrayed when he began to bray.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An ass with two panniers.

A man walking the streets with a lady on each arm. This occupies the whole pavement, and is therefore bad manners well meriting the reproach. In Italy they call such a simpleton a pitcher with two handles, his two arms akimbo forming the two handles. In London we call it walking bodkin, because the man is sheathed like a bodkin and powerless. Our expression is probably a corruption of the French Faire le panier à deux anses ("put your arms akimbo" or "make yourself a basket with two handles").

The ass waggeth his ears. This proverb is applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise; men wise in their own conceit. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music," will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concord of sweet sounds," just as if it could well appreciate it.

Till the ass ascends the ladder — i.e.

never. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, Cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (when the ass climbs to the tiles). And Buxtorf has Si ascenderit asinus per scalas.

Sell your ass.

Get rid of your foolish ways.

That which thou knowest not perchance thine ass can tell thee:

An allusion to Balaam's ass.

To make an ass of oneself.

To do something very foolish. To expose oneself to ridicule.

To mount the ass

(French). To become bankrupt. The allusion is to a custom very common in the sixteenth century of mounting a bankrupt on an ass, with his face to its tail. Thus mounted, the defaulter was made to ride through the principal thoroughfares of the town.

Asses have ears as well as pitchers.

Children, and even the densest minds, hear and understand many a word and hint which the speaker supposed would pass unheeded.

Asses that carry the mysteries (asinus portat mysteria).

A classical knock at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets. (Warburton: Divine Legaton, ii. 4.)

Well, well! honey is not for the ass's mouth.

Persuasion will not persuade fools. The gentlest words will not divert the anger of the unreasonable.

Wrangle for an ass's shadow.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To contend about trifles. The tale told by Demosthenes is, that a man hired an ass to take him to Megara; and at noon, the sun being very hot, the traveller dismounted, and sat himself down in the shadow of the ass. Just then the owner came up and claimed the right of sitting in this shady spot, saying that he let out the ass for hire, but there was no bargain made about the ass's shade. The two men then fell to blows to settle the point in dispute. A passer—by told the traveller to move on, and leave the owner of the beast to walk in the ass's shadow as long as he thought proper.

Ass's Bridge

(The). Prop. 5, book i. of Euclid. This is the first difficult proposition in geometry, and stupid boys rarely get over it the first time without tripping.

It is the ass's pitfall, not his bridge.

If this be rightly called the “Bridge of Asses,”

He's not the fool who sticks, but he that passes.

E.C.B.

Asses

(Feast of). (See Fools .)

Ass—eared

Midas had the ears of an ass. The tale says Apollo and Pan had a contest, and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan; and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Assassins A band of Carmathians, collected by Hassan, subah of Nishapour, called the Old Man of the Mountains, because he made Mount Lebanon his stronghold. This band was the terror of the world for two centuries, when it was put down by Sultan Bibaris. The assassins indulged in haschisch (bang), an intoxicating drink, and from this liquor received their name. (A.D. 1090.)

“The Assassins ... before they attacked the enemy, Would intoxicate themselves with a powder made of hemp—leaves ... called hashish.” — J. Wolff.

Assay

or Essay. To take the assay is to taste wine to prove it is not poisoned. Hence, to try, to taste; a savour, trial, or sample. Holinshed says, “Wolsey made dukes and earls serve him of wine with a say taken” (p. 847).

Edmund, in King Lear (v. 5), says to Edgar, “Thy tongue, some say of breeding breathes;” i.e. thy speech gives indication of good breeding — it savours of it. Hence the expression, I make my first assay (trial).

“[He] makes vow before his uncle never more

To give the assay of arms against your majesty.” Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

A cup of assay.

A cup for the assay of wine.

To put it in assay.

To put it to the test.

Assaye Regiment

The 74th Foot, so called because they first distinguished themselves in the battle of Assaye, where 2,000 British and 2,500 Sepoy troops under Wellington defeated 50,000 Mahrattas, commanded by French officers, in 1803. This regiment is now called "the 2nd Battalion of the Highland Light Infantry." The first battalion was the old No. 71.

Assiento Treaties

[Spanish, agreement treaties.] Contracts entered into by Spain with Portugal, France, and England, to supply her South American colonies with negro slaves. England joined in 1713, after the peace of Utrecht.

Assinego

A young ass, a simpleton (a Portuguese word).

"Thou hast no more brain than I have in mine elbows; an assinego may tutor thee." — Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 1.

Assumption

(Feast of the). The 15th of August, so called in honour of the Virgin Mary, who (according to the Roman and Greek Churches) was taken to heaven that day (A.D. 45), in her corporeal form, being at the time seventy—five years of age.

This seems very improbable, if Christ was crucified A.D. 33. It would make Mary survive her son twelve years, and to have been thirty years old at his birth instead of about fifteen.

Assurance

Audacity, brazen self—confidence. "His assurance is quite unbearable."

To make assurance double sure.

To make security doubly secure.

"But yet I'll make assurance double sure,

And take a bond of fate."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, iv. 1.

Astogoras (in Jerusalem Delivered). A female fiend, who had the power of raising storms, and whose partners were the three Furies: Tisiphone, Megara, and Alecto.

Astarte

(3 syl.). Goddess of the Moon, in Phoenician mythology.

“With these in troop

Came Astoreth, whom the Phoenicians called Astartë, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.” Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 437—9.

Astarte

(3 syl.). The lady beloved by Manfred. In order to see and speak to her, the magician entered the hall of Arimanes, and the spirits called up the phantom of the young lady, which told the count that “to—morrow would end his earthly ills.” When Manfred asked her if she loved him, she sighed “Manfred,” and vanished.

(Byron: Manfred.)

“Astarte, my beloved, speak to me.” Manfred. ii.

Astolat

By some identified with Guildford, in Surrey.

Astolpho

(in Orlando Furioso). An English duke (son of Otho), who joined Charlemagne against the Saracens. He was carried on the back of a whale to Alcina's isle; but when Alcina tired of him, she turned him into a myrtle. He was disenchanted by Melissa. Astolpho descended into the infernal regions, and his flight to the moon (book xviii.) is one of the best parts of the whole poem. (See Inferno.)

It came upon them like a blast from Astolpho's horn — i.e.

it produced a panic. Logistilla gave Astolpho a magic horn, and whatever man or beast heard its blast was seized with panic, and became an easy captive. (Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Like Astolpho's book, it told you everything

. The same fairy gave Astolpho a book, which would not only direct him aright in his journeys, but would tell him anything he desired to know. (Ariosto Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Astoreth

(See Ashtaroth .)

Astræa

Equity, innocence. During the Golden Age this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation Virgo.

“When hard—hearted interest first began

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, canto 1.

Astral Body

(The). The noumenon of a phenomenal body. This “spirit body” survives after the death of the material body, and is the “ghost” or “double.” Macbeth’s dagger was an astral body; so, in theosophy, is the “kama—rupa” or mind body; and in transubstantiation the veritable “blood and flesh” of Christ is the astral body of the accidents “bread and wine.”

Man is supposed to consist of body, soul, and spirit. The last is the astral body of man.

Astral Spirits

The spirits of the stars. According to the mythology of the Persians, Greeks, Jews, etc., each star has its special spirit. Paracelsus maintained that every man had his attendant star, which received him at death, and took charge of him till the great resurrection.

Astrea

A poetical name of Mrs. Aphra Behn, born of good family in the reign of Charles I. Her works are very numerous and very indecent, including seventeen dramatic pieces. She died 1689, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

“The stage how loosely does Astrea tread.” Pope: Satires, v. 290.

Astrology

(See Diapason, Microcosm.)

Astronomer of Dublin

(The). The head of the chief rebel of Dublin, set on a tall white—painted stake on the highest point of Dublin Castle, where it remains till it falls to decay or is replaced by the head of a greater rebel. The Irish say: “God send to Dublin many more astronomers.”

“His head is poled high

Upon the castle here,

Beholding stars as though he were

A great astronomer.”

Derrick

Astronomer Royal:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(1) Flamsteed, 1675; (2) Halley, 1719; (3) Bradley, 1742; (4) Bliss, 1762; (5) Maskelyne, who originated the Nautical Almanack, 1765; (6) Pond, 1811; (7) Airy, 1835, (8) Christie, 1881.

Astrophel

Sir Philip Sidney. "Phil. Sid." being a contraction of Philos Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron—philos (star—lover). The "star" that he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella (star), and to whom he was betrothed. Edmund Spenser wrote a pastoral called Astrophel, to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at the battle of Zutphen. (1554—1586.)

Asylum

means, literally, a place where pillage is forbidden (Greek, a (negative), sulon, right of pillage). The ancients set apart certain places of refuge, where the vilest criminals were protected, both from private and public assaults.

Asyniur

The goddesses of Asgard. The gods were called the Æsir, the singular of which is Asa.

At

Strain at a gnat (Matt. xxiii. 24) Greek, di—aulizo, to strain off. Here "at" is an error, probably in the first instance typographical, for "out." "Out" is given in the Bible of 1603, and has been restored by the Revisers.

Ate

(2 syl.). Goddess of vengeance and mischief. This goddess was driven out of heaven, and took refuge among the sons of men.

"With Atë by his side come not from hell,

Cry "Havoc," and let slip the dogs of war." Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

Atellanæ

or Atellan Fables. Interludes in the Roman theatres, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macchus and Bucco are the foundations of our Punch and Clown. (See Punch.)

Atergata

A deity with the upper part like a woman and the lower part like a fish. She had a temple at Ascalon. (See Dagon.)

Athanasian Creed

so called because it embodies the opinions of Athanasius respecting the Trinity. It was compiled in the fifth century by Hilary, Bishop of Arles.

In the Episcopal Prayer Book of America this creed is omitted.

Athelstane

(3 syl.) surnamed “The Unready” (i.e. impolitic, unwise), thane of Conningsburgh. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Athenæum (the review so called) was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1829. It was named after the institution founded by Hadrian, where works of art and learning were dedicated to Athene.

Athenian Bee

Plato, a native of Athens, was so called because his words flowed with the sweetness of honey.

Athens

The Modern Athens, i.e. Edinburgh. Willis says that its singular resemblance to Athens, approached from the Piræus, is very striking.

“An imitation Acropolis is commenced on the Calton Hill, and has the effect of the Parthenon. Hymettus is rather more lofty than the Pentland hills, and Pentelicus is farther off and grander than Arthur's Seat; but the old Castle of Edinburgh is a noble feature, superbly magnificent.” — Pencilings.

Athens of Ireland.

Belfast.

Athens of the New World.

Boston, noted for its literary merit and institutions.

Athens of the West.

Cordova, in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

Athole Brose

(Scotch). A compound of oatmeal, honey, and whisky.

At Home

(An). A notification sent to friends that the lady who sends it will be at home on the day and at the hour specified, and will be glad to see the persons mentioned in the card of invitation. These “At homes” are generally held in an afternoon before dinner. Light refreshments are provided, and generally some popular games are introduced, occasionally music and dancing.

Not at Home.

Not disengaged, or prepared for the reception of visitors; not in the house.

Atin

Strife. The squire of Pyrochles, and stirrer up of contention. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book ii.)

Atkins

(See Tommy Atkins .)

Atlantean Shoulders

Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of Atlas, which, according to heathen mythology, supported the whole world.

“Sage he stood,

With Atlantean shoulders fit to bear

The weight of mightiest monarchies.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, book ii. 305—7.

Atlantes

Figures of men, used in architecture instead of pillars. So called from Atlas, who in Greek mythology supported the world on his shoulders. Female figures are called Caryatides (q.v.). (See Telamones.)

Atlantes

(3 syl.) (in Orlando Furioso). A sage and a magician who lived in an enchanted palace, and brought up Rogero to all manly virtues.

Atlantic Ocean

An ocean, so called from the Atlas mountains.

Atlantis

A mythic island which contained the Elysian Fields.

The New Atlantis. An island imagined by Lord Bacon, where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. (See Utopia, City of the Sun.)

Atlas

King of Mauritania in Africa, fabled to have supported the world upon his shoulders. Of course, the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that the Atlas mountains prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty. We call a book of maps an “Atlas,” because it contains or holds the world. The word was first employed in this sense by Mercator, and the title—page of his collection of maps had the figure of Atlas with the world on his back.

“Bid Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign,

His subterranean wonders spread!”

Thomsom: Autumn, 797—8.

Atman

in Buddhist philosophy, is the noumenon of one's own self. Not the Ego, but the ego divested of all that is objective; the "spark of heavenly flame."

“The unseen and unperceivable, which was formerly called the soul, was now called the self, Atman. Nothing could be predicated of it except that it was, that it perceived and thought, and that it must be blessed.” — Max Muller: Nineteenth Century, May, 1893, p.777.

Atomic Philosophy

The hypothesis of Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, that the world is composed of a congeries of atoms, or particles of matter so minute as to be incapable of further diminution.

Of course it is quite impossible even to think of a portion of matter which has not an upper and under side, with some breadth and thickness.

“According to Democritus, the expounder of the Atomic Theory of matter, images composed of the finest atoms floated from the object to the mind.” — McCosh: Psychological Cognitive Powers, p. 23.

Atomic Theory

That all elemental bodies consist of aggregations of atoms, not united fortuitously, but according to fixed proportions. The four laws of Dalton are — constant proportion, reciprocal proportion, multiple proportion, and compound proportion.

This has nothing to do with the atomic theory of Leucippus. It merely means that gases and other elements always combine in certain known ratios or units.

Atomic Volume

The space occupied by a quantity, compared with, or in proportion to atomic weight.

Atomic Weight

The weight of an atom of an element, compared with an atom of hydrogen, the standard of unity.

Atossa

Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, so called by Pope, because she was the friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montague, whom he calls Sappho. Herodotus says that Atossa, the mother of Xerxes, was a follower of Sappho.

Atrip

The anchor is atrip when it has just been drawn from the ground in a perpendicular direction. A sail is atrip when it has been hoisted from the cap, and is ready for trimming. The word is from the Norwegian and Danish trip, a short step.

Attaint

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A term in chivalry, meaning to strike the helmet and shield of an antagonist so firstly with the lance, held in a direct line, as either to break the lance or overthrow the person struck. Hence to “attaint of treason,” etc.

“Attaint was a term of tilting, used to express the champion's having attained his mark, or in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the helmet or breast of his adversary.” — Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery (note).

Attercop

An ill—tempered. person, who mars all sociability. Strictly speaking, the attercop is the poison—spider. (Anglo—Saxon, atter, poison; cop, spider. Our cob—web should be cop—web, i.e. spider—web.)

Attic Bee

(The). Sophocles, the tragic poet, a native of Athens; so called from the great sweetness of his compositions. (B.C. 495—405.)

Attic Bird

(The). The nightingale; so called because Philomel was the daughter of the King of Athens.

“Where the Attic bird Trills her thick—warbled notes the summer long.” Milton: Paradise Regained, iv. 245—6.

Attic Boy (The). Cephalos, beloved by Aurora or Morn; passionately fond of hunting.

Till civil—suited Morn appear,

Not tricked and frowned, as she was wont

With the Attic boy to hunt,

But kerchiefed in a comely cloud.”

Milton: Il Penseroso.

Attic Faith

Inviolable faith, the very opposite of “Punic Faith.”

Attic Muse

(The). Xenophon, the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance. (B.C. 444—359.)

Attic Order

in architecture, a square column of any of the five orders. (See Orders.)

Attic Salt

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed: thus Cicero says, "Scipio omnes sale superabat" (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant turns of thought, and hence Attic salt means wit as pointed and delicately expressed as by the Athenians. "Attic point," wit.

Attic Science

A knowledge of Attic Greek.

Attics, Attic Storey

Attics are the rooms in the attic storey, and the attic storey generally is an extra storey made in the roof. In the Roman and Renaissance styles of architecture the low storey above the cornice or entablature is called the "Attic." Professor Goldstücker derives the word from the Sanskrit attaka (a room on the top of a house). (See The Transactions of the Philological Society, 1854.)

Attic Storey.

The head; the body being compared to a house, the head is the highest, or attic storey.

"Here a gentleman present, who had in his attic More pepper than brains, shrieked: "The man's a fanatic.'"
Lowell: Fable for Critics (stanza 50).

Furnished in the attic storey.

Not clever, dull.

Queer in the attic storey.

Fuddled, partially intoxicated.

Atticus

The most elegant and finished scholar of the Romans. His admirable taste and sound judgment were so highly thought of that even Cicero submitted to him several of his treatises.

The English Atticus.

Joseph Addison; so called by Pope, on account of his refined taste and philosophical mind. 1672—1719.)

The Christian Atticus.

Reginald Heber, Bishop of Calcutta. (1783—1826.)

The Irish Atticus.

George Faulkner; so called by Lord Chesterfield. (1700—1775.)

Attingians

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Heretics of the eighth century, who solemnised baptism with the words, "I am the living water." (Attin, a name of Neptune.)

Attock

The forbidden river, beyond which no pure Hindoo can pass.

Attorney, Solicitor (French, atourner, to attorn, or turn over to another). One legally qualified to manage matters in law for others, and to prosecute or defend others, as the case may be. A solicitor is one who solicits or petitions in Courts of Equity on behalf of his clients. At one time solicitors belonged to Courts of Equity, and attorneys to the other courts.

From and after Act 36, 37 Vict. 1xvi. 87, "all persons admitted as solicitors, attorneys, or proctors. ... empowered to practise in any court, the jurisdiction of which is hereby transferred to the High Court of Justice, or the Court of Appeal, shall be called Solicitors of the Supreme Court." (1873.)

Power of Attorney.

Legal authority given to another to collect rents, pay wages, invest money, or to act in matters stated in the instrument on your behalf, according to his own judgment. In such cases quod aliquis facit per aliquem, facit per se.

Warrant of Attorney.

The legal instrument which confers on another the "Power of Attorney."

Atys

Metamorphosed into a fir—tree by Cybele. See the poem by Catullus, translated by Leigh Hunt.

Au Courant

(French), "acquainted with" (lit. = in the current [[of events]]). To keep one au courant of everything that passes, is to keep one familiar with, or informed of, passing events.

Au Fait

(French). Skilful, thorough master of; as, He is quite au fait in those matters, i.e. quite master of them or conversant with them.

Au Grand Sérieux

(French) In sober earnest.

"We are not asked to take these narratives au grand sérieux. They are rather sketches of the past, illustrating what could have been done, and may be done again by women. ..." — Notes and Queries (Notes on Books, June 10, 1893, p. 459).

Au Pied de la Lettre

(French). Literatim et verbatim; according to the strict letter of the text.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“In reading au pied de la lettre the story of his [Buddha's] fatal illness supervened on a meal of dried boar's flesh, served to him by a certain Kunda.” — Nineteenth Century (June, 1893, p. 1020).

Au Revoir

(French). “Good bye for the present.” Literally, till seeing you again.

Aubry's Dog

(See Dog .)

Audeanism

The doctrine of Audeus of Mesopotamia, who lived in the fourth century. He maintained that the Old Testament justifies the belief that God has a sensible form (Gen. i. 26).

Audhumla

[the nourishing power], in Scandinavian mythology, is the cow created by Surt to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking the rocks. (See Ymir.)

Bör, the first man, was made by Audhumla licking salt from the snow. Odin was the son of Bör.

The breath of Audhumla was very sweet, but her milk was bitter.

Audley We will John Audley it, i.e. abridge it. A theatrical phrase. In the eighteenth century one Shuter had a travelling company which visited different fairs. It was his custom to lengthen out his performance till a goodly number of newcomers had collected on the open stage of his theatre, when a boy called out John Audley, and the play which was going on inside was brought to an end as soon as possible. (1759.)

Audrey

A country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Augean Stables

The stables of Augeas, King of Elis, in Greece. In these stables he had kept 3,000 oxen, and the stalls had not been cleansed for thirty years. When Hercules was appointed to cleanse these stables, he caused two rivers to run through them.

To cleanse the Augean stables.

To clear away an accumulated mass of corruption, moral, religious, physical, or legal. To reform wrongs almost past the power of man to tackle.

Augsburg Confession

The chief standard of faith in the Lutheran church. So called because, while the Diet of the German Empire was sitting at Augsburg, in 1530, the confession of faith drawn up by Melancthon and Luther was presented to Charles V.

Augury

means properly the function of an augur (perhaps from avium garritus). St. Pierre says: “The first navigators, when out of sight of land, watched the flight of birds, as indications of the shore, and with no other guidance discovered many new islands.” From this custom (he says) arose the practice of consulting birds before entering on any important enterprise. (Studies.)

August

The sixth month (beginning from March) was once called sextilis, but was changed to Augustus in compliment to Augustus Cæsar of Rome, whose “lucky month” it was, in which occurred many of his most fortunate events.

The preceding month (July), originally called Quintilis, had already been changed to Julius in honour of Julius Cæsar.

Augusta

London; so called by the Romans.

“Oft let me wander o'er the dewy fields,

.....or ascend

Some eminence, Augusta, in thy plains,

And see the country far diffused around.”

Thomson: Spring, 102, 107—9.

Augustan Age

The best literary period of a nation; so called from Augustus, the Emperor of Rome, the most palmy time of Latin literature. Horace, Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus, Virgil, etc., flourished in this reign.

Augustan Age of English Literature.

Beginning in the reign of Elizabeth and ending in that of James I. For list of authors, see Historic Note—book, p. 59.

Augustan Age of China, France, Germany, Hindustan, Portugal

, etc., see ditto.

Augustan History

A series of histories of the Roman Empire from 157 to 285, ascribed to the six following authors: Delius Spartianus, Julius Capitolinus, Ælius Lampridius, Vulcatius Gallicanus, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus.

Augustine

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The Second). Thomas Aquinas, also called the Angelic Doctor. (1224—1275.)

Augustinians

Friars or nuns of the Augustine Order, established in the eleventh century in commemoration of St. Augustine, and in imitation of the ancient order founded by him in the fourth century.

Those who believe, on the authority of St. Augustine, in absolute predestination and effectual grace. That is, that predestination is quite independent of man, and that grace has no reference to preceding piety and moral conduct, but is vouchsafed by God's own absolute will. Whom He would He did predestinate, and "whom He did predestinate, them He also called" (Romans viii. 30).

Augustus

No proper name, but a mere title given to Octavian, because he was head of the priesthood. In the reign of Diocletian the two emperors were each styled Augustus (sacred majesty), and the two viceroys Cæsar. Prior to that time Hadrian limited the title of Cæsar to the heir presumptive.

Augustus.

Philippe II of France; so called because he was born in the month of August. (1165, 1180—1223.)

Sigismund II of Poland. (1520, 1548—1572.)

Aulay

in Indian mythology, is the horse with a huge trunk, on which Baly the giant rode.

"Through these wide portals oft had Baly rode Triumphant from his proud abode,

When, in his greatness, he bestrode

The Aulay, hugest of four-footed kind.

The Aulay—horse, that in his force

With elephantine trunk, could bind

And lift the elephant, and on the wind

Whirl him away, with sway and swing,

E'en like a pebble from the practised sling." Southey: Curse of Kehama, xvi. 2.

Auld Brig

and New Brig, of Robert Burns, refers to the bridges over the river Ayr, in Scotland.

Auld Hornie

After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels; and Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat's beard, pointed ears, and goats' feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horny.

“O thou, whatever title suit thee,

Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie.”

Burns.

Auld Reekie

Edinburgh old town; so called because it generally appears to be capped by a cloud of “reek” or smoke.

Aulic Council

The council of the Kaiser in the old German Empire, from which there was no appeal (1495—1806) (Latin, aula, a court). The name is now given in Austria to a council of Vienna which manages the war department of the Austrian Empire.

Aunt Sally

A game in which a wooden head is mounted on a pole. The fun of the game is to knock the nose of the figure, or break the pipe stuck in its mouth. This is to be done by throwing at it, from a stated distance, a short club. The word aunt was anciently applied to any old woman: thus, in Shakespeare, Puck speaks of “The wisest aunt telling the saddest tale.” — Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 1.

Aureola

A circle of light, emblematical of glory, placed by the old painters round the heads of martyrs and saints. The notion was derived from Exod. xxv. 25. Facies coronam aureolam (“Thou shalt by thine own merits make for thyself a crown, besides that of gold which God has promised to the faithful”) (Donne: Sermons). Strictly speaking, the glory confined to the head alone is a nimbus, and only when it envelops the entire body is it called an aureola.

Du Cange informs us that the aureola of nuns is white, of martyrs red, and of doctors green. The nimbus of a Christ should contain a cross; of the Virgin Mary, a circlet of stars: of God the Father, a triangle with rays; of a living saint, a square without rays.

“They say, who know the life divine,

And upward gaze with eagle eyne,

That by each golden crown on high,

Rich with celestial jewelry,

Which for our Lord's redeemed is set,
There hangs a radiant coronet,
All gemmed with pure and living light
Too dazzling for a sinner's sight,
Prepared for virgin souls, and them
Who seek the martyr's diadem.”

Keble: Christian Year

Auri

Auri sacra fames (the cursed hunger for wealth), applied to that restless craving for money which is almost a monomania.

Aurora

Early morning. According to Grecian mythology, the goddess Aurora, called by Homer “rosy—fingered,” sets out before the sun, and is the pioneer of his rising.

“You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her brightening face.”

Thomson: Castle of Indolence

, canto ii. 3.

Aurora's tears.

The morning dew.

Aurora Australis

The Southern lights, a similar phenomenon to the “Aurora Borealis.”

Aurora Borealis

(Latin). The electrical lights occasionally seen in the northern part of the sky; also called “Northern Lights,” and “Merry Dancers.” (See Derwentwater.)

Aurora Raby

A rich, noble English orphan; left to the care of guardians; a Catholic in religion; and in person.

“A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded.”

Byron: Don Juan

. xv 43.

Aurora Septentrionalis

Same as Aurora Australis (q.v.).

Ausonia

An ancient name of Italy; so called from Auson, son of Ulysses, and father of the Ausones.

“All the green delights Ausonia pours.”

Thomson: Summer

, 956.

Auspices Under your good auspices, i.e. through your influence, or the influence of your good name. In Rome only the Commander—in—Chief was allowed to take the auspices of war. If a legate gained a victory, he was said to win it under the good auspices of his superior in command.

“Auspex” is from *avis*pex (avis and spicio), one who observes the flight, etc., of birds.

Auster

A wind pernicious to flowers and health. In Italy one of the South winds was so called; its modern name is the Siroco. (Greek, austeros, hot, dry). In England it is a damp wind, generally bringing wet weather.

“Nought but putrid streams and noisome fogs.

For ever hung on drizzly Auster's beard.”

Thomson: Castle of Indolence

, ii. 78.

Austin Friars

Friars of the Order of St. Augustine. (See Begging.)

Austrian Lip

The thick under—lip, characteristic of the house of Hapsburg. Derived from Cymburgis, daughter of Ziemovitz, Duke of Masovia, and niece of the then King of Poland. Cymburgis was noted for her beauty and unusual strength.

Aut Cæsar aut nullus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[Latin, Either Cæsar or no one], everything or nothing; all or not at all. Cæsar used to say, “he would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome.” Milton makes Satan say,

“Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven.”

Milton. Par. Lost

. i. 263. (See Six.)

Authentic Doctor

Gregory of Rimini. (Fourteenth century.)

Auto da Fe

[An act of faith.] A day set apart by the Inquisition for the examination of “heretics.” Those not acquitted were burnt. The reason why inquisitors burnt their victims was, because they are forbidden to “shed blood”; an axiom of the Roman Catholic Church being, “Ecclesia non novit sanguinem” (the church is untainted with blood).

Autolycus

The craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Sisyphos out—witted him by marking his sheep under their feet, a device which so tickled the rogue that he instantly

“cottoned” to him. Shakespeare introduces him in The Winter's Tale as a pedlar, and says he was called the son of Mercury, because he was born under that “thieving planet.”

“Autolycus is no lapidary, though he drives a roaring trade in flash jewellery.” — Pall Mall Gazette.

Automaton

— plural, automatons or automata. Machines which imitate the actions, etc., of living creatures. The most famous are the following: — (1) The pigeon that could fly, made, B.C. 400, by Archytas, of Tarentum; (2) the wooden eagle of Regiomontanus, the German, which flew from the city of Koenigsberg to meet the emperor, saluted him, and returned, 1436—1476; (3) the duck of Vaucanson of Grenoble, which could eat and drink, and even in a way digest food; its wings, viscera, bones, etc., minutely resembled those of a living animal. Vaucanson also made an image of Pan, which, at the beck of Syrinx, rose from his seat, played on his pipe, bowed when applauded, and sat down again. He also made an asp which, on being touched by an actress, in the character of Cleopatra, flew at her breast with a malignant hiss. Louis XV set him to make a human figure, but he died before he had completed it. (Greek, autos—mao , I self—move.) (See Android.)

Pierre Droz and his son Louis were noted for their automatons; so was Frederick of Knause (Vienna). The chess—player of Wolfgang, baron of Kempelen, in 1784, created quite a furor in Paris. Napoleon on one occasion played chess with this automaton. (See Brazen Heads.)

Automedon

A coachman. He was the charioteer of Achilles.

Autumn

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

He is come to his autumn, i.e. to be hanged, to his “fall.” A pun on the plan of “turning a man off” by dropping the plank on which he stands. The drop is the “leaf,” and autumn is called the “fall,” or “fall of the leaf.”

Ava

in Burmah, has marble quarries of which idols are made, and only priests are allowed to trade there. (Symes, vol. ii. p. 376.)

“As on Ava's snore,

Where none but priests are privileged to trade In that best marble of which gods are made.” T. Moore: Lulla Rookh, part I.

Avalanche

(3 syl.) means properly something which goes downwards (French, à val). The word is applied to a mass of snow mixed with earth, ice, and stones, which slips down a mountain side to the lower ground.

Metaphorically, we speak of an “avalanche of applause,” an “avalanche of bouquets” showered on the stage, etc.

Avalon

An ocean island, where King Arthur resided and was buried. The word means “Apple island” (aval, apple; yn, island); and it is generally thought to mean Glastonbury, a name derived from the Saxon glastn (green like glass).

Avant Courier

(French, avant courrier.) A “messenger sent before” to get things ready for a party of travellers, or to announce their approach. Anything said or done to prepare the way for something more important to follow, a feeler, a harbinger.

Avant Garde

(French.) The van or advanced guard of an army.

Avatar

The advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The ten avataras of Vishnu, in Hindû mythology, are by far the most celebrated. 1st advent, in the form of a fish, 2nd, in that of a tortoise; 3rd, of a hog; 4th, of a monster, half man and half lion, to destroy the giant Iranian; 5th, in the form of a dwarf (this Avatar is called Varumna); 6th, in human form, under the name of Râma, 7th, under the same figure and name, to slay the thousand—armed giant Cartasuciriargunan; 8th, as a child named Krishna, who performed numerous miracles (this is the most memorable of all the advents); 9th, under the form of Buddha. These are all past. The 10th advent will be in the form of a white horse (Kalki) with wings, to destroy the earth.

“In Vishnu land what avatar?

Or who in Moscow, towards the czar?"

Browning.

Ave Maria

[Hail, Mary!] [Ave, 2 syl.). The first two words of the angel's salutation to the Virgin Mary. (Luke i. 28.) In the Roman Catholic Church the phrase is applied to an invocation to the Virgin beginning with those words; and also to the smaller beads of a rosary, the larger ones being termed pater—nosters.

Avenel

(2 syl.) White Lady of Avenel. A tutelary spirit in Scott's Monastery.

Avenger of Blood

(The) The man who, in the Jewish polity, had the right of taking vengeance on him who had slain one of his kinsmen. The Avenger in Hebrew is called goël.

Cities of refuge were appointed for the protection of homicides, and of those who had caused another's death by accident. The Koran sanctions the Jewish custom. Family feuds have been a common hunting ground of poets and novelists.

Avernus

(Greek, a—ornis, "without a bird"). A lake in Campania, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours killed any bird that happened to inhale them. Poets call it the entrance to the infernal regions; hence the proverb, The descent to Avernus is easy, but coming back again is quite another matter, meaning that all bad habits are easily acquired, but very hard to be abandoned.

Avertin

(St.) The patron saint of lunatics; so called from the French avertineux (lunatics).

Avesta

The sacred Scriptures of the Magians, composed by Zoroaster. Better known as the Zend—Avesta or "living word in the Zend language."

Aveugle

Son of Erebus and Nox. (Spenser: Faërie Queene.)

Avienus

A writer of fables in the decline of the Roman empire. In the Middle Ages, a collection of fables used to be called Avynet, or Esopet.

A. vinculo matrimonii

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Latin) Divorced from marriage ties. A total divorce. A divorce a mensa et thoro is a partial divorce. The divorce a vinculo matrimonii is because the marriage was never legal, as in the case of bigamy, or marriage within the prohibited degrees; but a divorce a mensa et thoro is because the parties cannot live together from incompatibility of temper, in which case they may, if they choose, come together again.

Aviz An order of knighthood in Portugal, founded by Sancho I, and having for its object the subjugation of the Moors.

Avoid Extremes

The wise saw of Pittacos of Mitylene. (B.C. 652—569.)

Avoir

Avoir Martel en tête (French). To be distracted. Martel is a hammer, hence distraction, torment, torture.

Avoirdupois

French, avoir, aver or avier, goods in general, and poise = poids (weight). Not the verb, but the noun avoir. Properly avoir de poids (goods having weight), goods sold by weight. We have the word aver, meaning goods in general, hence also cattle; whence such compounds as aver—corn, aver—penny, aver—silver, aver—land, and so on. We have also the noun “having, havings” = possessions.

There is a common French phrase avoir du poids (to be weight), with which our word avoir dupois has been muddled up.

“Pared my present havings [property] to bestow

My bounties upon you.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII

, iii. 2.

“One of your having, and yet cark and care.”

Muses' Looking Glass

Even medicines, as wholesale goods, are bought and sold by avoirdupois weight.

A—weather

The reverse of a—lee. “A—weather” is towards the weather, or the side on which the wind strikes. “A—lee” is in the lee or shelter, and therefore opposite to the wind side; as helm a—weather.

Awkward

French, gauche, not dexterous. Awk means the left hand. Hence in Holland's Plutarch we have “The awke or left hand”; and again, “They receive her awkly when she presenteth ... the right hand.” (See Sinister.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Awkward Squad

In military language means recruits not yet fitted to take their place in the regimental line.

A squad is a troop or company of soldiers under a sergeant. It is a contraction of squadron. A squadron of cavalry is the unit of a regiment. Three or four squadrons make a regiment, and a certain number of regiments constitute an army. In naval affairs a squadron is a section of a fleet.

Awl

"I'll pack up my awls and be gone," i.e. all my goods. The play is on awl and all.

Axe

"To hang up one's axe." To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the ancient battle—axe, hung up to the gods when the fight was done. All classical scholars will call to mind the allusion of Horace to a similar Roman custom. Being snubbed by Pyrrha, he says, "He will hang up his axe upon her wall," or more literally, his "drenched garments on the temple—walls of Neptune." (1 Odes, V. 14—17.) (See Ask.)

To put the axe on the helve.

To solve a difficulty. To hit the right nail on the head.

To send the axe after the helve.

To spend good money after bad, or under the hope of recovering bad debts.

He has an axe to grind. Some selfish motive in the background: some personal interest to answer. Franklin tells of a man who wanted to grind his axe, but had no one to turn the grindstone. Going to the yard where he saw young Franklin, he asked the boy to show him how the machine worked, and kept praising him till his axe was ground, and then laughed at him for his pains.

Axinomancy

Divination by an axe; much practised by the ancient Greeks with a view of discovering crime. An agate was placed on a red—hot axe, and indicated the guilty person by its motion. (Greek, axine manteia.)

Ayah

(Anglo—Indian) A native Hindû nurse or lady's maid.

"The ayahs, or nurses, are said to be the best in the world." — B. Taylor: Visit to India, chap.

ii. p. 37.

Ayeshah

(3 syl.) Mahomet's second and favourite wife. He married her when she was only nine years old, and died in her arms.

Ayrshire Poet

Robert Burns, born near the town of Ayr. (1759—1796.)

Azazel

The scape—goat; so called by the Jews, because the high priest cast lots on two goats; one lot was for the Lord, and the other lot Azazel or Satan, and the goat on which the latter lot fell was the scape—goat.

Azazel

A seraph who fell in love with Anah, a granddaughter of Cain. When the flood came, he carried her under his wing to some other planet. (Byron: Heaven and Earth.)

Azazel

In Milton's Paradise Lost, Azazel is the standard—bearer of the infernal host. According to the Koran, when God commanded the angels to worship Adam, Azazel replied, "Why should the son of fire fall down before a son of clay?" and God cast him out of heaven. His name was then changed to Eblis, which means

"despair."

"Then straight commands that at the warlike sound

Of trumpets loud, and clarions, be upreared

His mighty standard; that proud honour claimed Azazel, as his right, a cherub tall."

Milton: Paradise Lost

, book i. 531—4.

Azim

The young convert who joined "the creed and standard" of the veiled prophet of Khorassan, in Moore's Lalla Rookh. When he was witness of the prophet's infamy, he joined the caliph's army, and was mainly instrumental in defeating that of the veiled prophet.

Azo

Marquis of Este, married Parisina, who fell in love with Hugo, a natural son of Azo. The marquis ordered Hugo to be beheaded; but no one knows what the fate of Parisina was. Azo, at any rate, married again, and had a family. This Azo was in reality Niccolo of Ferrara. (Byron: Parisina.)

Azor's Mirror

Zemira is the name of the lady, and Azor that of the bear, in Marmontel's tale of Beauty and the Beast. Zemira entreats the kind monster to let her see her father, if only for a few moments; so drawing aside a curtain, he shows him to her in a magic mirror. This mirror was a sort of telescope, which rendered objects otherwise too far off distinctly visible.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Azoth The panacea of Paracelsus, regarded by his followers as “the tincture of life.”

Azrael

(3 syl.) The angel that watches over the dying, and takes the soul from the body. The angel of death. He will be the last to die, but will do so at the second trump of the archangel.

“The Mohammedan doctors say that Azrael was commissioned to inflict the penalty of death on all mankind.” — H. Christmas.

The wings of Azrael

. The approach of death; the signs of death coming on the dying.

“Those who listen in the ... watches of the night for the wings of Azrael.” — Besamt.

Azrafil

The archangel commissioned to blow the trumpet of the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Aztecs

An indigenous people of Mexico who, in 1325, founded Tenochtitlán. They were in the zenith of their power in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. When the Spaniards arrived, their king was Montezuma; their supreme god was Taoti; and Huitzilopochtli was the divine protector of their nation, to whom they offered human victims.

Azucena

An old gipsy who stole Manrico, infant son of Garzia, the Conte di Luna's brother. (Verdi: Il Trovatore.)

Azure

Sky blue. Represented in royal arms by the planet Jupiter, in noblemen's by the sapphire. The ground of the old shield of France was azure. Emblem of fidelity and truth. Represented in heraldic devices by horizontal lines.

Azuriel

The fairy who owned what we call Holland Park. King O'beron gave him his daughter Kenna in marriage when he drove Albion from his empire. Albion invaded Kensington, the territory of King Oberon, but was slain in battle by Azuriel. (Tickell.)

Azymites

(3 syl). The Roman Catholics are so called by the Greek Church, because the holy wafers used by them in the eucharist are made of unleavened bread. (Greek, azumos, unleavened.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

B

B This letter is the outline of a house. It is called in Hebrew beth (a house). In Egyptian hierology this letter is a sheep.

B

stands for 300. Scit B. trecentum sibi cognatum retinère. And, again, Et B. trecentum per se retinere videtur. But with a line above, it denotes 3,000.

For Beccarre and Bemol (French for B sharp and B flat), see Beccarre.

Marked with a B

(French), i.e. a poor thing. In the French language almost all personal defects begin with the letter B; e.g. bigle (squint—eyed), borgne (one—eyed), bossu (humpty), boiteux (lame), etc.

Not to know B from a battledoor.

To be quite illiterate, not to know even his letters. Miego tells us that hornbooks used to be called battledoors. The phrase might therefore originally mean not to know the B of, from, or out of, your hornbook. But its more general meaning is “not able to distinguish one letter from another.”

“He knoweth not a B from a battledoore.” — Howell; English Proverbs.

“Distinguish a B from a battledore.” — Dekker: Guls Hornebook.

I know B from a Bull's foot.

Similar to the proverb, “I know a hawk from a hernshaw.” (See Hawk.) The bull's parted hoof somewhat resembles a B.

“There were members who scarcely knew B from a bull's foot.” — Brackenbridge: Modern Chivalry.

B. C.

Marked with B.C. (bad character). When a soldier disgraced himself by insubordination he was formerly marked with “B. C.” before he was drummed out of the regiment.

B. and S

Brandy and soda—water.

B. K. S

The name of “residence” given by officers in mufti, who do not wish to give up their address. The word stands for BarracKS.

B Flats

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bugs. The pun is “B” (the initial letter), and “flat,” from the flatness of the obnoxious insect. Also called Norfolk Howards, from Mr. Bugg, who advertised in the Times that he should in future change his name into “Norfolk Howard.” (See F Sharp.)

B.'s

Four B.'s essential for social success. Blood, brains, brass, brads (money). (American.)

Beware of the B.'s, i.e.

the British. A Carlow caution.

B. of B. K

Some mysterious initials applied to himself in his diary by Arthur Orton, “the Tichborne Claimant.” Supposed to denote “Baronet of British Kingdom.”

Baal—Peor

or Belphegor. The Priapus of the Moabites and Midianites.

Baal Samin

The god of celestial places.

Baal Shemesh

The Sun—god.

Baal Zeboub

[Beelzebub], god of corruption or of flies. (See Flies.)

Ba ba

Same as papa (Turkish). Alibaba is “father Ali.”

Babau

The bogie with which nurses in Languedoc terrify unruly children.

Babes in the Wood

(1) Simple trustful folks, never suspicious, and easily gulled.

(2) Insurrectionary hordes that infested the mountains of Wicklow and the woods of Enniscorthy towards the close of the eighteenth century. (See Children.)

(3) Men in the stocks or in the pillory.

Babes

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Deities of), in Rome. VATICAN, or, more correctly, VAGITAN—US (q.v.), the god who caused infants to utter their first cry. FABULIN—US (q.v.), the god to whom Roman parents made an offering when an infant uttered its first word. CUBA (q.v.), the goddess who kept infants quiet in their cots. DOMIDUCA, the goddess who brought young children safe home, and kept guard over them when out of their parents' sight.

Babies in the Eyes That is, love in the expression of the eyes. Love is the little babe Cupid, and hence the conceit, originating from the reflection of the onlooker in the pupil of another's eyes.

“In each of her two crystal eyes

Smileth a naked boy [Cupid].” Lord Surrey.

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses,

Toyed with his locks, looked babies in his eyes.”

Heywood: Love's Mistress

Babel

A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. “A Babel of sounds.” A confused uproar, in which nothing can be heard but hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel. (Genesis xi.)

“God ... comes down to see their city,

... .. and in derision sets

Upon their tongues a various spirit, to raze

Quite out their native language, and instead

To sow a jangling noise of words unknown. Forthwith a hideous gabble rises loud

Among the builders; each to other calls

Not understood. ... Thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work Confusion named.”

Milton: Paradise Lost

, xii, 48—63.

Babouc

(See Bacbuc .)

Babouin

Taisez—vous, petite babouin; laissez parler votre mère, qui est plus sage que vous. The tale or fable is this: A girl one day went to make an offering to Venus, and prayed the goddess to give her for husband a young man on whom she had fixed her affections. A young fellow happened at the time to be behind the image of Cupid, and hearing the petition, replied, "So fine a gentleman is not for such as you." The voice seemed to proceed from the image, and the girl replied, "Hold your tongue, you little monkey; let your mother speak, for she is wiser than you."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Baby Charles

So James I used to call his son Charles, afterwards Charles I.

Babylon

The modern Babylon. So London is sometimes called, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation.

Babylonian Numbers

Ne Babylonios tentaris numeros. Do not pry into futurity by astrological calculations and horoscopes. Do not consult fortunetellers. The Chaldæans were the most noted of astrologers. (Horace: Odes, book i. xi. 2.)

Babylonish Captivity

The seventy years that the Jews were captives in Babylon. They were made captives by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus (B.C. 538).

Babylonish Garment

(A) Babylonica vestis, a garment woven with divers colours. (Pliny, viii. 74.)

"I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment." — Joshua vii. 21.

Baca

The Valley of Baca, also called the Valley of Tears, translated in the New Version "the Valley of Weeping," apparently a dry sterile valley, the type of this earth spoiled by sorrow and sin. "Blessed is the man

... in whose heart are the ways of them. Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well ..." (Psalm lxxxiv. 6). That man is blessed whose trust in God converts adverse circumstances into proofs of divine love. "Whom He loveth He chasteneth." They "go from strength to strength."

In the mountains of Lebanon is a valley called Baca, but it is described as fertile and very delicious. The Valley of Lebanon (Joshua xi. 17) is encompassed by mountains, one of which is very barren, and abounds in thorns, rocks, and flints, but another is called a terrestrial paradise. Baca means "mulberry trees," but Bekah means a "plain." Perowne says Bacah is from a Hebrew root which means "weeping."

"Our sources of common pleasure dry up as we journey on through the vale of Bacha." — Sir Walter Scott: The Antiquary.

Bacbus The Holy Bottle, and also the priestess of the Holy Bottle, the oracle of Lantern—land consulted by Panurge on the momentous question whether or not he ought to marry. The Holy Bottle answered with a click like the noise made by a glass snapping. Bacbus told Panurge the noise meant trinc (drink), and that was the response, the most direct and positive ever given by the oracle. Panurge might interpret it as he liked, the obscurity would always save the oracle.

So Pic or Glück (say I) or neither,

Or both, for aught I care, or either;

Here's heads for Pic, and tails for Glück. E.C.B.

Bacchanalia

Festivals in honour of Bacchus, distinguished for their licentiousness and debauchery. Plato says he has seen the whole population of Athens drunk at these festivals.

Bacchanalian

Drunken, rollicksome, devoted or pertaining to Bacchus (q.v.).

Bacchant

A person given to habits of drinking; so called from the “bacchants,” or men admitted to the feasts of Bacchus. Bacchants wore fillets of ivy.

Bacchante

(2 syl.) A female winebibber; so called from the “bacchantes,” or female priestesses of Bacchus. They wore fillets of ivy.

Bacchis

A sacred bull which changed its colour every hour of the day. (Egyptian mythology.)

Bacchus

[wine]. In Roman mythology the god of wine. He is represented as a beautiful youth with black eyes, golden locks, flowing with curls about his shoulders and filleted with ivy. In peace his robe was purple, in war he was covered with a panther's skin. His chariot was drawn by panthers.

The famous statue of Bacchus in the palace of Borghese (3 syl.) is represented with a bunch of grapes in his hand and a panther at his feet. Pliny tells us that, after his conquest of India, Bacchus entered Thebes in a chariot drawn by elephants.

The Etruscan Bacchus was called Esar or Nesar , the Umbrian Desar, the Assyrian Issus; the Greek Dion—ysus; the Galatian Nyssus; the Hebrew Nizziz; a Greek form was Iacchus (from Iache, a shout); the Latin Bacchus; other forms of the word are the Norse Eis; the Indian Ies; the Persian Yez; the Gaulish Hes; the German Hist; and the Chinese Jos.

“As jolly Bacchus, god of pleasure,

Charmed the wide world with drink and dances, And all his thousand airy fancies,

Alas! he quite forgot the while

His favourite vines in Lesbos isle." Parnell.

Bacchus,

in the Lusiad, is the evil demon or antagonist of Jupiter, the lord of destiny. As Mars is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mohammedanism.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus.

The tale is that Semele asked Zeus to appear before her in all his glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Zeus saved the child which was prematurely born by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity. The Arabian tradition is that the infant Bacchus was nourished during infancy in a cave of Mount Meros. As "Meros" is Greek for a thigh, the Greek fable is readily explained.

What has that to do with Bacchus? i.e. what has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of Bacchus; but when, for variety sake, he wandered to other subjects, the Greeks pulled him up with the exclamation, "What has that to do with Bacchus?" (See Hecuba, Moutons.)

Bacchus a noyé plus d'hommes que Neptune.

The ale—house wrecks more men than the ocean.

Priest of Bacchus.

A toper.

"The jolly old priests of Bacchus in the parlour make their libations of claret." — J. S. Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard, p. 113.

A son of Bacchus.

A toper.

Baccoch

The travelling cripple of Ireland. Generally, a talkative, facetious fellow, prompt at repartee, and not unlike the ancient jester.

Bachelor

A man who has not been married. Probably from baccalaris, "a man employed on a grazing—farm" (Low Latin, bacca, for vacca, a cow). French, bachelier, bachelette (a damsel).

A Bachelor of Arts.

The student who has passed his examination, but is not yet of standing to be a master. Formerly the bachelor was the candidate for examination. The word used to be spelt bachiller; thus in the Proceedings of the Privy Council, vol. i. p. 72, we read: — "The king ordered that the bachillers should have reasonable pay for their trouble.”

Froissart styles Richard II le jeune damoiseil Richart. The Italian is donzella.

Bachelor of Salamanca

(The). Don Cherubim. He is placed in different situations of life, and is made to associate with all classes of society. (Le Sage: The Bachelor of Salamanca (a novel.)

Bachelor's Buttons

Several flowers are so called. Red Bachelor's Buttons, the double red campion; yellow Bachelor's Buttons, the “upright crowfoot”; white Bachelor's Buttons, the white ranunculus and white campion.

“The similitude these flowers have to the jagged cloath buttons anciently worn ... gave occasion ... to call them Bachelour's Buttons.” — Gerard: Herbal.

Or else from a custom still sometimes observed by rustics of carrying the flower in their pockets to know how they stand with their sweethearts. If the flower dies, it is a bad omen; but if it does not fade, they may hope for the best.

To wear bachelor's buttons.

To remain a bachelor. (See above.)

Bachelor's Fare

Bread and cheese and kisses.

Bachelor's Porch

The north door used to be so called. The menservants and other poor men used to sit on benches down the north aisle, and the maidservants, with other poor women, on the south side. Even when married the custom was not discontinued. After service the men formed one line and the women another, down which the clergy and gentry passed amidst salutations, and the two lines filed off. In some country churches these arrangements are still observed.

Bachelor's Wife (A). A hypothetical wife. A bachelor has only an imaginary wife.

“Bachelors' wives and old maids' children be well taught.” — Heywood: Proverbs.

Back

(To) To support with money, influence, or encouragement: as to “back a friend.” A commercial term meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill, he guarantees its value.

Falstaff says to the Prince: —

“You care not who sees your back. Call you that backing of your friends? A plague upon such backing!” — Shakespeare: I Henry IV, ii.4.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Englishmen will fight now as well as ever they did; and there is ample power to back them.” — W. Robertson: John Bright, Chap. xxxi. p. 293.

Back and Edge

Entirely, heartily, tooth and nail, with might and main. The reference is to a wedge driven home to split wood.

“They were working back and edge for me.” — Boldrewood: Robbery under Arms, ch. ii.

To back and fill.

A mode of tacking, when the tide is with the vessel and the wind against it. Metaphorically, to be irresolute.

To back out.

To draw back from an engagement, bargain, etc., because it does not seem so plausible as you once thought it. Many horses are unwilling to go out of a stable head foremost, and are backed out.

“Octavius backs out; his caution and reserve come to her rescue.” — C. Clarke: Shakespeare.

To back the field.

To bet on all the horses bar one. A sporting term used in betting.

To back the sails.

So to arrange them that the ship's way may be checked.

To back up.

To uphold, to support. As one who stands at your back to support you.

At the back of.

Behind, following close after. Figure from following a leader.

“With half the city at his back.” Byron: Don Juan.

To see his back; to see the back of anything.

To get rid of a person or thing; to see it leave

Back the oars

or back water is to row backwards, that the boat may move the reverse of its ordinary direction.

On the back of.

Immediately after. Figure from soldiers on the march.

To the back,

that is, to the backbone, entirely.

To break the back of a thing.

To surmount the hardest part.

His back is up.

He is angry, he shows that he is annoyed. The allusion is to a cat, which sets its back up when attacked by a dog or other animal.

To get one's back up.

To be irritated (See above).

To have his back at the wall. To act on the defensive against odds. One beset with foes tries to get his back against a wall that he may not be attacked by foes behind.

“He planted his back against a wall, in a skilful attitude of fence ready with his bright glancing rapier to do battle with all the heavy fierce unarmed men, some six or seven in number.” — Mrs. Gaskell: The Poor Clare, iii.

To set one's back up. (See above.)

“That word set my back up.” Dame Huddle's Letter (1710).

To turn one's back on another.

To leave, forsake, or neglect him. To leave one by going away.

“At length we ... turn our backs on the outskirts of civilisation.” — Tristram: Moab, ii. 19.

Behind my back.

When I was not present. When my back was turned.

Laid on one's back.

Laid up with chronic ill—health; helpless. Figure from persons extremely ill.

Thrown on his back.

Completely worsted. A figure taken from wrestlers.

Backbite

(To) To slander behind one's back.

“The only thing in which all parties agreed was to backbite the manager.” — p. 193. W. Irving: Traveller, Buckthorn,

Backbone

(The) The main stay.

“Sober ...practical men ... constitute the moral backbone of the country.” — W Booth: In Darkest England (Part i. 2, p. 17).

To the backbone.

Thoroughly, as true to the backbone.

“A union man, and a nationalist to the backbone.” — T. Roosevelt: T. H. Benton, chap. v. p. 113.

Backgammon

is the Anglo—Saxon bac gamen (back game), so called because the pieces (in certain circumstances) are taken up and obliged to go back to enter at the table again.

<Background Placed in the background, i.e. made of no consequence. Pictures have three distances, called grounds: the foreground, where the artist is supposed to be; the middle ground, where the most salient part of the picture is placed, and the background or distance, beyond which the eye cannot penetrate.

Back—hander

A blow on the face with the back of the hand. Also one who takes back the decanter in order to hand himself another glass before the decanter is passed on.

“I’ll take a back—hander, as Clive don’t seem to drink.” — Thackeray: The Newcomes.

Back—speer

(To) To cross—examine. (Scotch.)

“He has the wit to lay the scene in such a remote ... country that nobody should be able to back—speer him.” — Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (Introduction).

Back—stair Influence Private or unrecognised influence. It was customary to build royal palaces with a staircase for state visitors, and another for those who sought the sovereign upon private matters. If any one wanted a private interview with royalty, it was highly desirable to conciliate those appointed to guard the back stairs, as they could admit or exclude a visitor.

“Once, we confess, beneath the patriot’s cloak,

From the cracked bag the dropping guineas broke, And, jingling down the back stairs, told the crew Old Cato is as great a rogue as you.” Pope: Epistle to Lord Bathurst, 35—8.

Backwardation

(Stockbrokers’ term). The sum paid by a speculator on a “bear account” (i.e. a speculation on a fall in the price of certain stock), in order to postpone the completion of the transaction till the next settling day. (See Contango.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Backward Blessing

(Muttering a). Muttering a curse. To say the Lord's Prayer backwards was to invoke the devil.

Backwater

(1) Water at the lower end of a millrace to check the speed of the wheel. (2) A current of water from the inland, which clears off the deposit of sand and silt left by the action of the sea; as the Backwater of Weymouth.

Bacon

The Bacon of Theology. Bishop Butler, author of the Analogy. (1692—1752.)

Bacon's brazen head.

(See Brazen.)

To baste your bacon.

To strike or scourge one. The Saxons were called "hogs" by their Norman lords. Henry VIII spoke of the common people as the "swinish multitude"; and Falstaff says to the travellers at Gadshill,

"On, bacons, on!" (1*Henry IV*, ii. 2). Bacon is the outside portion of the sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow.

To save one's bacon.

To save oneself from injury.

"But as he rose to save his bacon,

By hat and wig he was forsaken." Coombe: Dr. Syntax, canto vi. line 240.

There seems to be another sense in which the term is used — viz. to escape loss; and in this sense the allusion is to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the numerous dogs that frequented their houses the bacon which was laid up for winter store, the loss of which would have been a very serious calamity.

A Chaw—bacon.

A rustic. Till comparatively modern times the only meat which rustics had to eat was bacon. I myself know several farm labourers who never taste any meat but bacon, except on club and feast days.

He may fetch a flich of bacon from Dunmow,

i.e. he is so amiable and good tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. The allusion is to a custom founded by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244; which was, that "any person from any part of England going to Dunmow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two stones at the church door, may claim a gammon of bacon, if he can swear that for twelve months and a day he has never had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Baconian Philosophy

A system of philosophy based on principles laid down by Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, in the 2nd book of his Novum Organum. It is also called inductive philosophy.

Baconian Theory The theory that Lord Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

Bactrian Sage

Zoroaster, a native of Bactria (Balkh), about 500 years before the birth of Christ.

Bad

Charles le mauvais. Charles II of Navarre (1332—1387).

He is gone to the bad.

Has become a ruined man, or a depraved character. He has gone amongst bad people, in bad ways, or to bad circumstances.

To the bad.

On the wrong side of the account; in arrears.

Bad Blood

Vindictiveness, ill—feeling.

“If there is any bad blood in the fellow he will be sure to show it.” — Brother Jonathan.

To make bad blood, to stir up bad blood.

To create or renew ill—feeling and a vindictive spirit.

Bad Books

You are in my bad books. Under disgrace. Also In my black books. (See Black Books.)

Bad Debts

Debts not likely to be paid.

Bad Form

not comme il faut. Not in good taste.

Bad Lot

(A). A person of bad moral character, or one commercially unsound. Also a commercial project or stock of worthless value. The allusion is to auctioneering slang, meaning a lot which no one will bid for. So an inefficient soldier is called one of the Queen's bad bargains.

Bad Shot

(A). A wrong guess. A sporting phrase; a bad shot is one which does not bring down the bird shot at, one that misses the mark.

Badaud

A booby. C'est un franc badaud, he is a regular booby. Le badaud de Paris, a French cockney. From the Italian, badare, to gaze in the air, to stare about one.

Badge of Poverty

In former times those who received parish relief had to wear a badge. It was the letter P, with the initial of the parish to which they belonged, in red or blue cloth, on the shoulder of the right sleeve. (See Dyvour.)

Badge—men

Alms—house men; so called because they wear some special dress, or other badge, to indicate that they belong to a particular foundation.

“He quits the gay and rich, the young and free,

Among the badge—men with a badge to be.” Crabbe: Borough.

Badger

(A) A licensed huckster, who was obliged to wear a badge. By 5 Eliz., c. 12, it was enacted that “Badgers were to be licensed annually, under a penalty of #5.”

“Under Dec. 17, 1565, we read of “Certain persons upon Humber side who ... by great quantities of corn two of whom were authorised badgers.”” — State Papers (Domestic Series).

Badger

(To) To tease or annoy by superior numbers. In allusion to the ancient custom of badger—baiting. A badger was kennelled in a tub, where dogs were set upon him to worry him out. When dragged from his tub the poor beast was allowed to retire to it till he recovered from the attack. This process was repeated several times.

Badger.

It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other.

“I think that Titus Oates was as uneven as a badger.” — Lord Macaulay.

Drawing a badger is drawing him out of his tub by means of dogs.

Badinage

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Playful raillery, banter (French), from the verb badiner, to joke or jest. The noun badine means a switch, and in France they catch wild ducks by covering a boat with switches, in which the ducks seek protection. A person quizzed is like these wild ducks.

Badinguet

A nickname given to Napoleon III. It was the name of the workman whose clothes he wore when he contrived to escape from the fort of Ham, in 1846.

“If Badinguet and Bismarck have a row together let them settle it between them with their fists, instead of troubling hundreds of thousands of men who ... have no wish to fight.” — Zola: The Downfall, chap. ii. (1892).

Badingueux The party of the Emperor Napoleon III. The party of the Empress were called “Montijoyeux” and “Montijocrisses,” from Montijo in Spain. She was the second daughter of the Count of Montijo.

Badminton

is properly a “copus cup,” made of claret spiced and sweetened, a favourite with the Duke of Beaufort of Badminton. As the duke used to be a great patron of the prize ring, Badminton was used as equivalent to claret as the synonym of blood.

Also a game similar to lawn tennis only played with shuttlecocks instead of balls.

Baffle

To erase the cognisance of a recreant knight. To degrade a knight from his rank. To be knocked about by the winds.

“I am disgraced, impeached, and baffled here.” Shakespeare: Richard II, act i. 1.

Bag

Bag and Baggage, as “Get away with you, bag and baggage,” i.e. get away, and carry with you all your belongings. The bag or sack is the pouch in which a soldier packs his few articles when he moves from place to place. Baggage is a contemptuous term for a woman, either because soldiers send their wives in the baggage wagons, or from the Italian bagascia (a harlot), French bagasse, Spanish bagazo, Persian, baga.

Bag and baggage policy.

In 1876 Mr. Gladstone, speaking on the Eastern question, said, “Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely, by carrying away themselves. ... One and all, bag and baggage, shall, I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned.” This was termed by the Conservatives the bag and baggage policy.

A bag of bones.

Very emaciated; generally “A mere bag of bones.”

A bag of game.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A large battue. From the custom of carrying game home in “bags.”

A bag of tricks

or A whole bag of tricks. Numerous expedients. In allusion to the fable of the Fox and the Cat. The fox was commiserating the cat because she had only one shift in the case of danger, while he had a thousand tricks to evade it. Being set upon by a pack of hounds, the fox was soon caught, while puss ran up a tree and was quite secure.

A good bag.

A large catch of game, fish, or other animals sought after by sportsmen.

Got the bag.

Got his dismissal. (See Sack.)

The bottom of the bag.

The last expedient, having emptied every other one out of his bag.

To empty the bag.

To tell the whole matter and conceal nothing. (French, vider le sac, to expose all to view.)

To let the cat out of the bag.

(See under Cat.)

Bag

(To) To steal, or slip into one's bag, as a poacher or pilferer who slyly slips into his bag what he has contrived to purloin.

Bags

A slang word for trousers, which are the bags of the body. When the pattern was very staring and “loud,” they once were called howling—bags.

Bag—man

(A) A commercial traveller, who carries a bag with specimens to show to those whose custom he solicits. In former times commercial travellers used to ride a horse with saddle—bags sometimes so large as almost to conceal the rider.

Bag o' Nails

Some hundreds of years ago there stood in the Tyburn Road, Oxford Street, a public—house called The Bacchanals: the sign was Pan and the Satyrs. The jolly god, with his cloven hoof and his horns, was called “The devil;” and the word Bacchanals soon got corrupted into “Bag o' Nails.” The Devil and the Bag o' Nails is a sign not uncommon even now in the midland counties.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Baga de Secretis

Records in the Record Office of trials for high treason and other State offences from the reign of Edward IV. to the close of the reign of George III. These records contain the proceedings in the trials of Anne Boleyn, Sir Walter Raleigh, Guy Fawkes, the regicides, and of the risings of 1715 and 1745. (Baga = Bag.)

Bagatelle

(A). A trifle; a thing of no consideration. "Oh! nothing. A mere bagatelle." In French, "Il dépense tout son argent en bagatelles" means, he squanders his money on trash. "Il ne s'amuse qu'à des bagatelles," he finds no pleasure except in frivolities. Bagatelle! as an exclamation, means Nonsense! as "Vous dites qu'il me fera un procès. Bagatelle!" (fiddlesticks!)

"He considered his wife a bagatelle, to be shut up at pleasure" [i.e. a toy to be put away at pleasure]. — The Depraved Husband.

Baguette d'Armide

(La) The sorcerer's wand. Armida is a sorceress in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. Baguette is a rod or wand.

Bahagnia

Bohemia; Bahaignons, Bohemians. (1330.)

Bahr Geist

(A). A banshee or grey—spectre.

"Know then (said Eveline) it [the Bahr Geist] is a spectre, usually the image of the departed person, who, either for wrong suffered sustained during life, or through treasure hidden, haunts the spot from time to time, becomes familiar to those who dwell there, and takes an interest in their fate." — Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 15.

Bail

(French, bailler). To deliver up.

Common bail

or bail below. A bail given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, to guarantee that the defendant will appear in court at any day and time the court demands. Special bail or bail above, consists of persons who undertake to satisfy all claims made on the defendant, and to guarantee his rendering himself up to justice when required.

Bail.

(See Leg—bail)

To bail up.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To disarm before robbing, to force to throw up the arms. (Australian.)

Bailey

The space enclosed within the external walls of a castle, not including the "Keep." The entrance was over a drawbridge, and through the embattled gate (Middle—age Latin balium or ballium, a corruption of vallum, a rampart).

When there were two courts to a castle, they were distinguished as the outer and inner bailey (rampart). Subsequently the word included the court and all its buildings; and when the court was abolished, the term was attached to the castle, as the Old Bailey (London) and the Bailey (Oxford).

Bailiff At Constantinople, the person who had charge of the imperial children used to be called the bajulus, from baios, a child. The word was subsequently attached to the Venetian consul at Constantinople, and the Venetian ambassador was called the balio, a word afterwards extended to any superintendent or magistrate. In France the bailli was a superintendent of the royal domains and commander of the troops. In time, any superintendent of even a private estate was so called, whence our farmer's bailiff. The sheriff is the king's bailiff — a title now applied almost exclusively to his deputies or officers. (See Bumbailiff.)

Bailleur

Un bon bâilleur en fait bâiller deux (French). Yawning is catching.

Baillif

(Herry) Mine host in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. When the poet began the second "Fit" of the Rime of Sir Thopas, Herry Baillif interrupts him with unmitigated contempt: —

"No mor of this, for Goddes dignitie!"

Quod our host, "for thou makest me

So wery ... that

Mine eerës asken for thy nasty speche." Verse 15327.

Bain Marie

A saucepan containing hot water into which a smaller saucepan is plunged, either to keep it hot, or that it may boil without burning. A glue pot is a good example. Mons. Bouillet says, "Ainsi appelé du nom de l'inventeur" (Balneum Mariæ). But derivations from proper names require authentication.

Bairam

(3 syl.) The name given to two movable Moslem feasts. The first, which begins on the first day of the moon which follows that of Ramadan, and lasts three days, is a kind of Paschal feast. The second, seventy days later, lasts four days, and is not unlike the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles.

As the Mohammedan year is a lunar one, in 33 years these feasts will have occurred at all the four seasons.

Baisser

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Il semble qu'il n'y a qu'à se baisser et en prendre (French). One would think he has only to pick and choose. Said of a person who fancies that fortune will fall into his lap, without his stirring. Literally, "to stoop down and pick up what he wants."

Bait

Food to entice or allure, as bait for fish. Bait for travellers is a "feed" by way of refreshment taken en passant. (Anglo—Saxon, bætan, to bait or feed.)

Bajaderes

Indian dancing girls. A corruption of the Portuguese bailadeira, whence baiadera, bajadere.

Bajulus

A pedagogue. A Grand Bajulus, a "big" pedagogue. In the Greek court, the preceptor of the Emperor was called the Grand Bajulus. Originally "porter." (Cf. Bailiff.)

Bajura

Mahomet's standard.

Baked

Half—baked. Imbecile, of weak mind. The metaphor from half—baked food.

Baked Meat

means meat—pie "The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage table" (Hamlet);

i.e. the hot meat—pies (venison pasties) served at the funeral and not eaten, were served cold at the marriage banquet.

Baker

(The) Louis XVI was called "the Baker," the queen was called "the baker's wife" (or La Boulangère), and the dauphin the "shop boy;" because a heavy trade in corn was carried on at Versailles, and consequently very little was brought to Paris.

"The return of the baker, his wife, and the shop—boy to Paris [after the king was brought from Versailles] had not had the expected effect. Flour and bread were still scarce." — A. Dumas: The Countess de Charny, chap. ix.

Baker's Dozen Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves, called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring the fine. The 13th was the

"vantage loaf."

Mr. Riley (Liber Albus) tells us that the 13th loaf was "the extent of the profit allowed to retail dealers," and therefore the vantage loaf means, the loaf allowed for profit.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To give one a baker's dozen

, in slang phraseology, is to give him a sound drubbing — i.e. all he deserves and one stroke more.

Baker's Knee

(A) A knop—knee, or knee bent inwards, from carrying the heavy bread—basket on the right arm.

Bakshish

A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are insolently demanded by all sorts of officials in Turkey, Egypt, and Asia Minor, more as a claim than a gratuity.

Bal

Donner le bal à quelqu'un (French). To make one dance for it; to abuse one. In several games played with a ball, the person who catches the ball or to whom the ball is given, is put to an immense amount of labour. Thus, in Hurling, the person who holds the ball has one of the labours of Hercules to pass through. His opponent tries to lay hold of him, and the hurler makes his way over hills, dales, hedges, and ditches, through bushes, briars, mire, plashes, and even rivers. Sometimes twenty or thirty persons lie tugging together in the water, scrambling and scratching for the ball. (See Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, section xii.) (See Ball.)

Balaam

The Earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

“And, therefore, in the name of dulness, be

The well—hung Balaam.” Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 1573—4.

Balaam.

A “citizen of sober fame,” who lived hard by the Monument of London; “he was a plain, good man; religious, punctual, and frugal,” his week—day meal being only “one solid dish.” He grew rich; got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; “took a bribe from France;” was hanged for treason, and all his goods were confiscated to the State. (See Diamond Pitt.) It was Thomas Pitt, grandfather of the Earl of Chatham, who suggested to Pope this sketch. (Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. iii.)

Balaam.

Matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodicals. These are generally refuse bits — the words of an oaf, who talks like “Balaam's ass.” (Numb. xxii. 30.) (American.)

Balaam Basket

or Box (A) An ass's pannier. In printer's slang of America, it is the place where rejected articles are deposited. (See Balaam.)

Balafre

Le [the gashed].

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Henri, son of François, second Duke of Guise. In the Battle of Dormans he received a sword-cut which left a frightful scar on his face (1550—1588). So Ludovic Lesly, an old archer of the Scottish Guards, is called, in Sir Walter Scott's Quentin Durward.

Balai

Donner trois tours de balai par la cheminée (French). To be a witch. Literally, to run your brush three times up the chimney. According to an ancient superstition, all witches had to pass their brooms on which they rode three times up the chimney between one Sabbath and the following.

Balak in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel, a satire by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Dr. Burnet, author of Burnet's Own Time.

Balâm

the ox, and the fish Nun, are the food of Mahomet's paradise; the mere lobes of the livers of these animals will suffice for 70,000 saints. (Al Koran.)

Balan

Bravest and strongest of the giant race. Vasco de Lobeira, in Amadis of Gaul. Also, Emir of the Saracens, and father of Ferumbras or Fierabras (q.v.).

Balance

(The) "Libra," the 7th sign of the zodiac, which contains the autumnal equinox. According to fable it is Astræa, who, in the iron age, returned from earth to heaven. Virgil, to praise the equity of Augustus, promises him a future residence in this sign.

According to Persian mythology, at the last day there will be a huge balance big as the vault of heaven. The two scale pans will be called that of light and that of darkness. In the former all good will be placed, in the latter all evil. And each individual will receive an award according to the judgment of the balance.

Balance

He has a good balance at his bankers. His credit side shows a large balance in his favour.

Balance of power.

The States of Europe being so balanced that no one nation shall have such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of another.

Balance of trade.

The money—value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

To balance an account.

To add up the debit and credit sides, and subtract the less of the two from the greater. The remainder is called the balance.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To strike a balance.

To calculate the exact difference, if any, between the debit and credit side of an account.

Balayer

Chacun doit balayer devant sa porte (French), "Let everyone correct his own faults." The allusion is to a custom, nearly obsolete in large towns, but common still in London and in villages, for each housewife to sweep and keep clean the pavement before her own dwelling.

Balclutha

(The tower of), in Ossian, is Dun—dee, where Dun means a tower. Those circular buildings so common in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, the Hebrides, and all the north of Scotland are duns. Dee is a corruption of Tay, the river on which the city is built; in Latin, Tao—dunum.

Bald

Charles le Chauve. Charles I, son of Louis le Débonnaire. (823, 840—877).

Baldachin

The dais or canopy under which, in Roman Catholic processions, the Holy Sacrament is carried (Italian, baldacchino, so—called from Baldacco (Italian for Bagdad), where the cloth was made). Also the canopy above an altar.

Baldassare

Chief of the monastery of St. Jacopo di Compostella. (Donizetti's opera La Favorita.)

Balder

the god of peace, second son of Odin and Frigga. He was killed by the blind war—god Höder, at the instigation of Loki, but restored to life at the general request of the gods. (Scandinavian mythology.)

N.B. — Sydney Dobell (born 1824) has a poem entitled Balder, published in 1854.

Balder is the sun or daylight which is killed by the blind—god at the instigation of Loki or darkness, but is restored to life the next day.

Balder's abode was Broadblink (vast splendour).

Balderdash

Ribaldry, jargon. (Danish balder, tattle, clatter.)

Baldwin

The youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's paladins; and the nephew of Sir Roland.

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Baldwin.

(in Jerusalem Delivered). The restless and ambitious Duke of Bologna, leader of 1,200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey's brother; not so tall, but very like him.

Baldwin, the Ass

(in the tale of Reynard the Fox). In the third part of the Beast—epic he is called “Dr. Baldwin.” (Old German, bold friend.)

Bale

When bale is highest, boot is nighest. When things have come to the worst they must needs mend.

Balearica Tormenta

Here tormenta means instruments for throwing stones. Cæsar (Gallic War, iv. 25) says: “Fundis, tormentis, sagittis hostes propellere.” The inhabitants of the Balearic Islands were noted slingers, and indeed owe their name to this skill. (Greek, ballo, to cast or hurl.) Pronounce Bale—e—ari—ca.

Balfour of Burley

Leader of the Covenanters in Scott's Old Mortality, a novel (1816).

Balios

(See Horse .)

Balisarda

or Balisardo. Rogero's sword, made by a sorceress, and capable of cutting through enchanted substances.

“With Balisarda's slightest blow

Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail, Nor strongly—tempered plate, nor twisted mail.” Ariosto Orlando Furioso, book xxiii.

Balistraria

Narrow apertures in the form of a cross in the walls of ancient castles, through which cross—bowmen discharged their arrows.

Baliverso

(in Orlando Furioso). The basest knight in the Saracen army.

Balk

means the high ridge between furrows (Anglo—Saxon balca, a beam, a ridge); hence a rising ground.

A balk of timber

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is a beam running across the ceiling, etc., like a ridge. As the balk is the part not cut by the plough, therefore “to balk” means to leave untouched, or to disappoint.

To make a balk.

To miss a part of the field in ploughing. Hence to disappoint, to withhold deceitfully.

To make a balk of good ground To throw away a good chance.

Balker

One who from an eminence balks or directs fishermen where shoals of herrings have gathered together. (Anglo—Saxon, bælc—an to shout.)

Balkis

The Queen of Sheba or Saba, who visited Solomon. (Al Koran, c. ii.)

Ball

To strike the ball under the line. To fail in one's object. The allusion is to the game of tennis, in which a line is stretched in the middle of the court, and the players standing on each side have, with their rackets, to knock it alternately over the line.

“Thou hast stricken the ball under the line.” — John Heywoode's Works (London, 1566).

To take the ball before the bound.

To anticipate an opportunity; to be overhasty. A metaphor from cricket, as when a batsman runs up to meet the ball at full pitch, before it bounds. (See Balle.)

Ball of Fortune (A).

One tossed, like a ball, from pillar to post; one who has experienced many vicissitudes of fortune.

“Brown had been from infancy a ball for fortune to spurn at.” — Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxi.

The ball is with you.

It is your turn now.

To have the ball at your feet.

To have a thing in one's power. A metaphor from foot—ball.

“We have the ball at our feet; and, if the government will allow it ... we can now crush out the rebellion.” — Lord Auckland.

To keep the ball a—rolling.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To continue without intermission. To keep the fun alive; to keep the matter going. A metaphor from the game of bandy, or la jeu de la cross.

“It is Russia that keeps the ball rolling [the Servian and Bulgarian War, 1885, fomented and encouraged by Russian agents].” — Newspaper paragraph, 1885.

To keep the ball up.

Not to let conversation or fun flag; to keep the thing going. A metaphor taken from several games played with balls.

“I put in a word now and then to keep the ball up.” — Bentham.

To open the ball.

To lead off the first dance at a ball. (Italian, ballaro, to dance.)

Balls

The three golden balls. The emblem of St. Nicholas, who is said to have given three purses of gold to three virgin sisters to enable them to marry.

As the cognisance of the Medici family they probably represent three golden pills — a punning device on the name. Be this, however, as it may, it is from the Lombard family (the first great moneylenders in England) that the sign has been appropriated by pawnbrokers. (See Mugello for another account.)

Ballad

means, strictly, a song to dance—music, or a song sung while dancing. (Italian, ballare, to dance, ballata, our ballad, ballet [q.v.]).

Ballads “Let me make the ballads, and who will may make the laws.” Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland, wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, “I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Musgrave's sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws” (1703).

Ballambangjan

(The Straits of). A sailor's joke for a place where he may lay any wonderful adventure. These straits, he will tell us, are so narrow that a ship cannot pass through without jamming the tails of the monkeys which haunt the trees on each side of the strait; or any other rigmarole which his fancy may conjure up at the moment.

Ballast

A man of no ballast. Not steady not to be depended on. Unsteady as a ship without ballast. A similar phrase is, “The man wants ballast.”

Balle

Prendre la balle au bond (French). Strike while the iron is hot; make hay while the sun shines. The allusion is to certain games at ball, which must be struck at the moment of the rebound.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Renvoyer la balle à quelqu'un

(French) To pay one off in his own coin. Literally, to strike back the ball to the sender.

Ballendino

(Don Antonio). Intended for Anthony Munday, the dramatist. (Ben Jonson, The Case Altered, a comedy.)

Ballet

(pronounce bal—lay). A theatrical representation of some adventure or intrigue by pantomime and dancing. Baltazarini, director of music to Catherine de' Medici, was the inventor of modern ballets.

Balliol College

Oxford, founded in 1263, by John de Baliol, Knight (father of Baliol, King of Scotland).

Balloon

(A pilot) Metaphorically, a feeler, sent to ascertain public opinion.

“The pilot balloon sent from ... has shown [the sender] the direction of the wind, and he now trims his sails accordingly.” — Newspaper paragraph, January, 1886.

Balloon Post

During the siege of Paris, in 1871, fifty—four balloon posts were dispatched, carrying two—and—a—half million letters, weighing ten tons.

Balm

(French, baume) Contraction of balsam (q.v.). The Balm of Gilead = the balsam of Gilead.

Is there no balm in Gilead?

Is there no remedy, no consolation, not even in religion?

Balmawhapple

A stupid, obstinate Scottish laird in Scott's Waverley, a novel (1805).

Balmérino

(Lord) was beheaded, but the executioner at the first stroke cut only half through the neck, and (we are told) his lordship turned round and grinned at the bungler.

Balmung

or Gram The sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland, the Vulcan of the Scandinavians. Wieland, in a trial of merit, clove Amilias, a brother smith, through steel helmet and armour, down to the waist; but the cut was so fine that Amilias was not even aware that he was wounded till he attempted to move, when he fell into two pieces. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Balmy

“I am going to the balmy” — i.e. to “Balmy sleep;” one of Dick Swiveller's pet phrases. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Balmy—stick (To put on the). In prison slang means to feign insanity; and the “Balmy Ward” is the prison ward in which the insane, real or feigned, are confined.

Balnibarbi

A land occupied by projectors. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels.)

Balthazar

One of the kings of Cologne — i.e. the three Magi, who came from the East to pay reverence to the infant Jesus. The two other magi were Melchior and Casper.

Baltic

The Mediterranean of the north (Swedish, balt; Danish, balte; Latin, balteus; English, belt), the sea of the “Belts.”

Balwhidder

(The Rev. Micah). A Scotch Presbyterian minister, full of fossilised national prejudices, but both kind—hearted and sincere. (Galt: Annals of the Parish, a novel (1821).)

Bambino

A picture or image of the infant Jesus, swaddled (Italian, bambino, a little boy). The most celebrated is that in the church of Sts. Maria, in the Ara Cœli of Rome.

Bambocciades

(4 syl.). Pictures of grotesque scenes in low life, such as country wakes, penny weddings, and so on. They are so called from the Italian word bamboccio (a cripple), a nickname given to Pieter van Laer, the first Dutch painter of such scenes, distinguished in Rome.

Bamboccio

or Bamboche (See Michael Angelo des Bamboches.)

Bamboozle

To cheat by cunning, or daze with tricks.

“The third refinement observable in the letter I send you, consists of the choice of certain words invented by some pretty fellows, such as banter, bamboozle ... and kidney ... some of which are now struggling for the vogue, and others are in possession of it.” — Swift: The Tatler (Sept. 28, 1710).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To bamboozle into

(doing something). To induce by trickery.

To bamboozle one out of something.

To get something by trickery.

Bampton Lectures

Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. He left an estate to the university of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects, to be preached at Great St. Mary's, and printed afterwards.

Ban

A proclamation of outlawry; a denunciation by the church (Anglo—saxon, ge—ban, a proclamation; verb, ge—bannan).

Marriage bans.

(See Banns.)

To ban

is to make a proclamation of outlawry. To banish is to proclaim a man an exile. (See Bandit.)

Lever le ban et l'arrière ban

(French). To levy the ban was to call the king's vassals to active service; to levy the arrière ban was to levy the vassals of a suzerian or under—lord.

“Le mot ban, qui signifie bannière, se disait de l'appel fait par le seigneur à ses vassaux pour les convoquer sous son étendard. On distinguait le ban composé des vassaux immédiats, qui étaient convoqués par le roi lui-même, et l'arrière ban, composé des vassaux convoqués par leurs suzerains.” — Bouillet: Dictionnaire d'Histoire, etc.

Banagher

(See under Beats .)

Banat A territory under a ban (lord), from the Illyrican word bojan, a lord. The Turks gave this title to the lords of frontier provinces — e.g. the Banat of Croatia, which now forms part of the kingdom of Hungary.

Banbury

A Banbury—man — i.e. a Puritan (Ben Jonson); a bigot. From the reign of Elizabeth to that of Charles II. Banbury was noted for its number of Puritans and its religious “zeal.”

As thin as Banbury cheese.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In Jack Drum's Entertainment we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring;" and Bardolph compares Slender to Banbury cheese (Merry Wives, i, 1). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch in thickness.

Banco

Sittings in Banco. Sittings of the Superior Court of Common Law in its own bench or court, and not in circuit, as a judge of Nisi Prius (q.v.). (Banc is Italian for "bench" or "seat of justice.")

So much banco — i.e.

so much bank money, as distinguished from current coin. At Hamburg, etc., currency is inferior to "bank money." (Not money in the bank, but the fictitious value set on cash by bankers.)

Bancus Regius

The king's or queen's bench. Bancus Communis, the bench of common pleas.

Bandana

or Bandanna A pocket—handkerchief. It is an Indian word, properly applied to silk goods, but now restricted to cotton handkerchiefs having a dark ground of Turkey red or blue, with little white or yellow spots. (Hindû, bandhnu, a mode of dyeing.)

Bandbox

He comes out of a bandbox — i.e. he is so neat and precise, so carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox.

Neat as a bandbox.

Neat as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

Bandbox Plot

(The) Rapin (History of England, iv. 297) tells us that a bandbox was sent to the lord—treasurer, in Queen Anne's reign, with three pistols charged and cocked, the triggers being tied to a pack—thread fastened to the lid. When the lid was lifted, the pistols would go off, and shoot the person who opened the lid. He adds that [dean] Swift happened to be by at the time, and seeing the pack—thread, cut it, thereby saving the life of the lord—treasurer.

"Two ink—horn tops your Whigs did fill

With gunpowder and lead;

Which with two serpents made of quill,

You in a bandbox laid;

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A tinder—box there was beside,

Which had a trigger to it,

To which the very string was ty'd

That was designed to do it." Plot upon Plot (about 1713).

Bande Noire

Properly, a black band; metaphorically, the Vandal Society. Those capitalists that bought up the Church property confiscated in the great French revolution were so called, because they recklessly pulled down ancient buildings and destroyed relics of great antiquity.

Bandit

plural banditti or bandits, properly means outlaw (Italian, bandito, banished, men pronounced "banned"). As these outlaws very often became robbers, the term soon came to signify banded highwaymen.

Bands

Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the administration of mass (Discontinued by the parochial clergy the latter part of the 19th century, but still used by clerics on the Continent.)

Legal bands are a relic of the wide collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII, and which were especially conspicuous in the reign of the Stuarts. In the showy days of Charles II the plain bands were changed for lace ends.

"The eighth Henry, as I understand,

Was the first prince that ever wore a band." John Taylor, the Water Poet (1580—1654).

Bandy

I am not going to bandy words with you — i.e. to dispute about words. The reference is to a game called Bandy. The players have each a stick with a crook at the end to strike a wooden or other hard ball. The ball is bandied from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. (Anglo—Saxon, bendan, to bend.)

"The bat was called a bandy from its being bent." — Brand: Popular Antiquities (article "Golf," p. 538).

Bane

really means ruin, death, or destruction (Anglo—Saxon, bana, a murderer); and "I will be his bane," means I will ruin or murder him. Bane is, therefore, a mortal injury.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“My bane and antidote are both before it.

This [sword] in a moment brings me to an end. But this [Plato] assures me I shall never die.” Addison: Cuto.

Bangorian Controversy

A theological paper—war stirred up by a sermon preached March 31st, 1717, before George I, by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, on the text, “My kingdom is not of this world.” The best reply is by Law, in a series of Letters to Hoadly.

Bang—up or Slap—bang. First—rate, thumping, as a “thumping legacy.” It is a slang punning synonym of thumping or striking. Slap—bang is double bang, or doubly striking.

Banian

or Banyan (A). A loose coat (Anglo—Indian).

“His coat was brownish black perhaps of yore,

In summer time a banyan loose he wore.” Lowell: Fitz Adam's Story (stanza 15).

Banian Days

[Ban—yan]. Days when no meat is served to a ship's crew. The term is derived from the Banians, a class of Hindu merchants, who carried on a most extensive trade with the interior of Asia, but being a caste of the Vaisya, abstained from the use of meat. (Sanskrit, banij, a merchant.)

Bank

A money—changer's bench or table. (Italian banco or banca.)

Bank of a River

Stand with your back to the source, and face to the sea or outlet: the left bank is on your left, and right bank on your right hand.

Sisters of the Bank, i.e

. of the bankside, “the brothel quarter” of London. Now removed to a different quarter, and divided into “North” and “South.”

“On this side of the Banke was sometimes the bordello or stews.” — Stow: Survey.

Bankrupt Money—lenders in Italy used to display the money they had to lend out on a banco or bench. When one of these money—lenders was unable to continue business, his bench or counter was broken up, and he himself was spoken of as a bancorotto — i.e. a bankrupt.

Bankside

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Part of the borough of Southwark, noted in the time of Shakespeare for its theatres and retreats of the demi monde, called "Sisters of the Bank."

"Come, I will send for a whole coach or two of Bankside ladies, and we will be jovial." — Randolph: The Muses' Looking Glass.

Banks's Horse

A learned horse, called Marocco, belonging to one Banks, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is said that his shoes were of silver. One of his exploits was "the ascent of St. Paul's steeple."

Bannatyne Club

A literary club which takes its name from George Bannatyne, to whose industry we owe the preservation of very much of the early Scotch poetry. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scotch history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.

Banner

means a piece of cloth. (Anglor—Saxon, fana; Latin, pannus; Welsh, baner; Italian, bandiera; French, bannière.)

"An emperor's banner should be sixe foote longe, and the same in breath; a king's banner five foote; a prince's and a duke's banner, four foote; a marquy's, an erle's, a viscount's, a baron's, and a banneret's banner shall be but three foote square." — Park.

The banner of the Prophet is called Sanjek—sherif, and is kept in the Eyab mosque of Constantinople.

The two black banners borne before the Califs of the house of Abbas were called Night and Shadow.

The sacred banner of France is the Oriflamme (q.v.).

Banners in churches.

These are suspended as thank—offerings to God. Those in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Henry VII's Chapel, Westminster, etc., are to indicate that the knight whose banner is hung up, avows himself devoted to God's service.

Banneret

One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. A knight made in the field was called a banneret, because the chief ceremony was cutting or tearing off the pointed ends of his banner.

Bannière

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cent ans bannière, cent ans civière. The ups and downs of life. A grand seigneur who has had his banner carried before him for a century, may come to drive his hand—barrow through the streets as a costermonger.

Bannière

Il faut la croix et la bannière pour l'avoir. If you want to have him, you must make a great fuss over him — you must go to meet him with cross and banner, “aller au devant de lui avec un croix et la bannière.”

Banns of Marriage

The publication in the parish church for three successive Sundays of an intended marriage. It is made after the Second Lesson of the Morning Service. To announce the intention is called “Publishing the banns,” from the words “I publish the banns of marriage between ... ” (Anglo—Saxon, ge—bannan, to proclaim, to announce).

To forbid the banns.

To object to the proposed marriage.

“And a better fate did poor Maria deserve than to have a banns forbidden by the curate of the parish who published them.” — Sterne: Sentimental Journey.

Banquet

used at one time to mean the dessert. Thus, Taylor, in the Pennyles Pilgrim, says: “Our first and second course being threescore dishes at one boord, and after that, always a banquet.” (French, banquet; banc, a bench or table. We use “table” also for a meal or feast, as “the funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage table,” i.e. feast.)

“After supper ... a delicate banquet, with abundance of wine.” — Cogan (1583).

A banquet of brine.

A flood of tears.

“My heart was charged to overflowing, and forced into my eyes a banquet of brine.” — O. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 263.

Banquo

A Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and Danes in the reign of Donald VII. He was murdered by the order of Macbeth, and his ghost haunted the guilty usurper. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Banshee

The supposed domestic spirit of certain Irish or Highland Scottish families, supposed to take an interest in its welfare, and to wail at the death of one of the family. The Welsh “Cyhydraeth.” is a sort of Banshee.

The distinction of a Banshee is allowed only to families of pure Milesian stock. (Gaelic, ban—sith, a womanfairy.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bantam

A little bantam cock. A little plucky fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will encounter a dunghill cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to “have a great soul in a little body.” The bantam originally came from Bantam, in Java.

Banting

Doing Banting. Reducing superfluous fat by living on meat diet, and abstaining from beer, farinaceous food, and vegetables, according to the method adopted by William Banting, a London cabinet—maker, once a very fat man (born 1796, died 1878). The word was introduced about 1864.

Bantling

A child. Mahn suggests the German, bänkling, a bastard. (Query, bandling, a little one in swaddling—clothes.)

Banyan

A Hindû shopkeeper. In Bengal it denotes a native who manages the money concerns of a European, and also serves as an interpreter. In Madras such an agent is called Dubash (i.e. one who can speak two languages). (See Banian Days.) or Baphomet. An imaginary idol or symbol, which the Templars were said to employ in their mysterious rites. The word is a corruption of Mahomet. (French, Baphomet; Old Spanish, Matomat.)

Bap

Baptés

(2 syl.). Priests of the goddess Cotytto, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even Cotytto, the goddess of obscenity. They received their name from the Greek verb bapto, to wash, because they bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner. (Juvenal, ii. 91.)

Baptist

John the Baptist. His symbol is a sword, the instrument by which he was beheaded.

Bar

The whole body of barristers; as bench means the whole body of bishops.

“A dinner was given to the English Bar.” — The Times.

Bar

excepting. In racing phrase a man will bet “Two to one, bar one,” that is, two to one against any horse in the field with one exception. The word means “barring out” one, shutting out, or debarring one.

Bar

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

At the bar. As the prisoner at the bar, the prisoner in the dock before the judge.

Trial at bar, i.e.

by the full court of judges. The bar means the place set apart for the business of the court.

To be called to the bar.

To be admitted a barrister. The bar is the partition separating the seats of the benchers from the rest of the hall. Students having attained a certain status used to be called from the body of the hall within the bar, to take part in the proceedings of the court. To disbar is to discard from the bar. Now, "to be called within the bar" means to be appointed king's (or queen's) counsel; and to disbar means to expel a barrister from his profession.

Bar

in heraldry. An honourable ordinary, consisting of two parallel lines drawn across the shield and containing a fifth part of the field.

"A barre ... is drawne overthwart the escochon ... it containeth the fifth part of the Field." — Gwillim: Heraldry.

A Bar sinister in an heraldic shield means one drawn the reverse way; that is, not from left to right, but from right to left. Popularly but erroneously supposed to indicate bastardy.

Bar

(Trial at) The examination of a difficult cause before the four judges in the superior courts.

Barabas

The hero of Marlow's tragedy, The Jew of Malta.

"A mere monster, brought in with a large painted nose ... He kills in sports, poisons whole nunneries, invents infernal machines. ... " — C. Lamb.

Barataria

Sancho Panza's island—city, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Doctor Pedro Rezio de Agüero, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted — some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it; some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from barato (cheap).

"The meat was put on the table, and whisked away, like Sancho's inauguration feast at Barataria." — Thackeray.

Barathron

A deep ditch behind the Acropolis of Athens into which malefactors were thrown: somewhat in the same way as criminals at Rome were cast from the "Tarpeian Rock."

Barb

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An arrow. The feathers under the beak of a hawk were called barb feathers (beard feathers). The point of an arrow has two iron "feathers," which stick out so as to hinder the extraction of the arrow. (Latin, barba, a beard.)

N.B. — The barb is not the feather on the upper part of the shaft, but the hooked iron point or head.

Barb

A Barbary steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit. (See Barbed Steeds.)

Barbari

Quod non fecerunt Barbari, fecerunt Barberini (What the barbarians left standing, Barberini contrived to destroy). Pope Barberini robbed the roof of the Pantheon to build the Baldacchino, or canopy of St. Peter's. It is made entirely of bronze, and weighs ninety tons.

Barbarians

is certainly not derived from the Latin barba (a beard), as many suppose, because it is a Greek word, and has many analogous ones. The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (babblers; men who spoke a language not understood by them); the Jews called them Gentiles (other nations); the Russians Ostiaks (foreigners). The reproachful meaning crept in from the natural egotism of man. It is not very long ago that an Englishman looked with disdainful pity on a foreigner, and the French still retain much of the same national exclusiveness. (See Wunderberg.)

"If then I know not the meaning of the voice [words], I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian [a foreigner], and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me." — 1 Cor. xiv. 11.

Barbarossa

[Red-beard, similar to Rufus]. The surname of Frederick I of Germany (1121—1190). Also Khairuddin Barbarossa, a famous corsair of the sixteenth century.

Barbary

St. Barbary, the patron saint of arsenals and powder magazines. Her father delivered her up to Martian, governor of Nicomedia, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence, those who invoke saints select St. Barbary in thunderstorms. (See Barbe.)

Roan Barbary. The favourite horse of Richard II (See Horse.)

"O, how it yearned my heart when I beheld

In London streets that coronation day.

When Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary!

That horse that thou [Rich. II.] so often hast bestrid, That horse that I so carefully have dressed." Shakespeare: Richard II, v. 5.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Barbason

A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in the Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2, and in Henry V, ii. 1.

“Amaimon sounds well, Lucifer well, Barbason well; yet they are ... the names of fiends.” — Merry Wives.

Barbazure

(or Blue—Beard). See “Punch's prize Novelists,” by Thackeray.

Barbe

(Ste.) The powder—room in a French ship; so called from St. Barbara, the patron saint of artillery. (See Barbary.)

A barbe de fou apprend—on à raire

(French). An apprentice is taught to shave on the chin of a fool.

Tel a fait sa barbe, qui n'est pas beau fils

(French). You may waste half the day on making your toilet, and yet not come forth an Adonis. You cannot make a silk purse of a sow's ear. Not every block will make a Mercury.

“Heap lying curls a million on your head;

On socks, a cubit high, plant your proud tread, You're just what you are — that's all about it.” Goethe: Faust (Dr. Anster), p. 163.

Barbecue

(3 syl.) A West Indian dish, consisting of a hog roasted whole, stuffed with spice, and basted with Madeira wine. Any animal roasted whole is so called.

“Oldfield with more than harpy throat subdued,

Cries, “Send me, ye gods, a whole hog barbecued!”” Pope: Satires, ii. 25, 26.

Barbed Steed

(a corruption of barded). A horse in armour. (French, bardé, caparisoned.)

“And now, instead of mounting barbēd steeds

To fright the souls of fearful adversaries,

He capers nimbly in a lady's chamber,

To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.” Shakespeare: Richard III, act i. 1.;

Barbel

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Latin, barbellus (the barbed fish); so called from the barbules, or fleshy appendages round the mouth.

Barbeliots

A sect of Gnostics. Their first immortal son they called Barbeloth, omniscient, eternal, and incorruptible. He engendered light by the instrumentality of Christ, author of Wisdom. From Wisdom sprang Autogenês, and from Autogenês, Adam (male and female), and from Adam, matter. The first angel created was the Holy Ghost, from whom sprang the first prince, named Protarchontês, who married Arrogance, whose offspring was Sin.

Barber Every barber knows that “Omnibus notum tonsoribus.” Horace: 1 Satires, VII. 3.

In Rome the tonstrinae or barbers' shops were the fashionable resort of loungers and idlers. Here every scandal was known, and all the talk of the town was repeated.

Barber Poet

Jacques Jasmin, last of the Troubadours, who was a barber of Gascony. (1798—1864.)

Barber's Pole

The gilt knob at the end represents a brass basin, which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole. The basin has a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers who came to be shaved. The pole represents the staff held by persons in venesection; and the two spiral ribbons painted round it represent the two bandages, one for twisting round the arm previous to blood—letting, and the other for binding. Barbers used to be the surgeons, but have fallen from “their high estate” since science has made its voice “to be heard on high.”

N.B. — The Barbers' Hall stood in Monkwell Street, Cripplegate. The last barber—surgeon in London was Middleditch, of Great Suffolk Street, in the Borough. He died 1821.

“To this year” (1541), says Wornum ... “belongs the Barber—Surgeons' picture of Henry (VIII) granting a charter to the Corporation. The barbers and surgeons of London, originally constituting one company, had been separated, but were again, in the 32 Henry VIII, combined into a single society and it was the ceremony of presenting them with a new charter which is commemorated by Holbein's picture, now in their hall in Monkwell Street.”

Barbican

(The) or Barbacan The outwork intended to defend the drawbridge in a fortified town or castle (French, barbacane). Also an opening or loophole in the wall of a fortress, through which guns may be fired.

Barbier

Un barbier rase l'autre (French). Caw me and I'll caw thee. One good turn deserves another. One barber shaves another.

Barcarole

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.) A song sung by Venetian barcaroli, as they row their gondolas. (Italian, barcarolo, a boatman.)

Barcelona

A). A fichu, piece of velvet for the neck, or small neck—tie, made at Barcelona, and common in England in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Also a neckcloth of some bright colour, as red with yellow spots.

“And on this handkerchief so starch and white

She pinned a Barcelona black and tight.” Peter Pindar: Portfolio (Dinah).

“A double Barcelona protected his neck.” — Scott: Peveril of the Peak (Prefatory Letter).

Barclayans

(See Bereans .)

Barcochebah

or Barchochebas (Shimeon). A fanatical leader of the Jews who headed a revolt of the Jews against the Romans A.D. 132, took Jerusalem in 132, and was slain by Julius Severus in an assault of Bethel,

A.D. 135. (Didot: Nouvelle Biographie Universelle.)

“Shared the fall of the Antichrist Barcochebah.” — Professor Seeley: Ecce Homo.

Bardesanists Followers of Bardesanes, of Edessa, founder of a Gnostic sect in the second century. They believed that the human body was ethereal till it became imbruted with sin. Milton, in his Comus, refers to this: —

“When Lust

By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,

But most by lewd and lavish acts of sin,

Lets in defilement to the inward parts,

The soul grows clotted

by contagion,

Imbodies and imbrutes.”

Bardit

The ancient German chant, which incited to war.

Bardo de Bardi

A wealthy Florentine scholar, father of Romola, in George Eliot's Romola, a novel (1863).

B

Bardolph

One of Falstaff's inferior officers. Falstaff calls him "the knight of the burning lamp," because his nose was so red, and his face so "full of meteors." He is a low—bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and poor as a church mouse. (Merry Wives; Henry IV, i., ii.)

"We must have better assurance for Sir John than Bardolph's. We like not the security." — Lord Macaulay.

Bards

The oldest bardic compositions that have been preserved are of the fifth century; the oldest existing manuscript is the Psalter of Cashel, a collection of bardic legends, compiled in the ninth century by Cormac Mac Culinan, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster.

Bard of Avon.

Shakespeare, who was born and buried at Stratford—upon—Avon. Also called "The bard of all times." (1564—1616.)

Bard of Ayrshire.

Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire. (1759—1796.)

Bard of Hope.

Thomas Campbell, author of The Pleasures of Hope. (1777—1844.)

Bard of the Imagination.

Mark Akenside, author of Pleasures of the Imagination. (1721—1770.)

Bard of Memory.

Rogers, author of The Pleasures of Memory. (1762—1855.)

Bard of Olney.

Cowper, who resided at Olney, in Bucks, for many years. (1731—1800.)

The Bard of Prose

"He of the hundred tales of love." Childe Harold, iv. 56.

i.e

. Boccaccio.

The Bard of Rydal Mount.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

William Wordsworth; so called because Rydal Mount was his mountain home. Also called the “Poet of the Excursion,” from his principal poem. (1770—1850.)

Bard of Twickenham.

Alexander Pope, who resided at Twickenham. (1688—1744.)

Barebone Parliament (The). The Parliament convened by Cromwell in 1653; so called from Praise—God Barebone, a fanatical leader, who was a prominent member.

Barefaced

Audacious, shameless, impudent. This seems to imply that social and good manners require concealment, or, at any rate, to veil the face with “white lies.” In Latin — resecta facie; in French — à visage découvert. Cassius says to his friend Brutus, “If I have veiled my looks ...,” that is, concealed my thoughts from you.

Barefooted

Certain monks and nuns, who use sandals instead of shoes. The Jews and Romans used to put off their shoes in mourning and public calamities, by way of humiliation. The practice is defended by the command of our Lord to His disciples: “Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes” (Luke x. 4).

Bare Poles

(Under) implies that the weather is rough and the wind so high that the ship displays no sails on the masts. Figuratively applied to a man reduced to the last extremity. Figuratively, a disingenuous person sails under bare poles.

“We were scudding before a heavy gale, under bare poles.” — Capt. Marryat.

Bargain

Into the bargain. In addition thereto; besides what was bargained for.

To make the best of a bad bargain.

To bear bad luck, or a bad bargain, with equanimity.

Bark

Dogs in their wild state never bark; they howl, whine, and growl, but do not bark. Barking is an acquired habit; and as only domesticated dogs bark, this effort of a dog to speak is no indication of a savage temper.

Barking dogs seldom bite.

Huffing, bouncing, hectoring fellows rarely possess cool courage.

French:

“Tout chien qui aboye ne mord pas.”

Latin:

“Canes timidi vehementius latrant quam mordent.”

Italian:

“Can che abbaia non morde.”

German:

“Ein hellender hund beisst nicht leicht.”

To bark at the moon.

To rail at those in high places, as a dog thinks to frighten the moon by baying at it. There is a superstition that it portends death or ill—luck.

“I'd rather be a dog, and bay the moon,

Than such a Roman.” Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, iv. 3

His bark is worse than his bite.

He scolds and abuses roundly, but does not bear malice, or do mischief. The proverb says, “Barking dogs never bite.”

Barker

A pistol, which barks or makes a loud report.

Barktan

The famous black stone in the eastern corner of the Kaaba; it is 4.5 feet in length, and is surrounded with a circle of gold. The legend is that when Abraham wished to build the Kaaba, the stones came to him of their own accord, and the patriarch commanded all the faithful to kiss the Barktan.

Barlaham

A hermit who converted Josaphat, an Indian prince. This German romance, entitled Barlaham and Josaphat, was immensely popular in the Middle Ages. It was written by Rudolf of Ems (13th century).

Barley

To cry barley. To ask for truce (in children's games). Query, a corruption of parley.

“A proper lad o' his quarters, that will not cry barley in a brulzie.” — Sir W. Scott: Waverley, xiii.

Barley—bree

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Barley—broth; that is, malt liquor brewed from barley (Scotch).

“The cock may crawl, the day may daw,

And aye we'll taste the barley—bree.” Burns: Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maut.

Barley Cap

To wear the barley cap. To be top—heavy or tipsy with barley—bree. The liquor got into the head.

Barleycorn

John or Sir John Barleycorn. A personification of malt liquor. The term has been made popular by Robert Burns.

“Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,

What dangers thou canst make us scorn!” Burns: Tam o' Shanter, 105, 106.

Barley—mow

A heap of barley housed, or where it is housed. (Anglo—Saxon, mowe, a heap; Italian, mucchio; Spanish, mucho.)

Barley Sugar

Sugar boiled in a decoction of barley. It is not now made so, but with saffron, sugar, and water, flavoured with oil of citron, orange, or lemon.

“Barley sugar was prepared by boiling down ordinary sugar in a decoction of pearl—barley.” — Knowledge (July 6th, 1883).

Barmecide

(3 syl.) The word is used to express the uncertainty of things on which we set our heart. As the beggar looked forward to a feast, but found only empty dishes; so many a joy is found to be mere illusion when we come to partake of it.

“To—morrow! the mysterious unknown guest

Who cries aloud, “Remember Barmecide!

And tremble to be happy with the rest.”” Longfellow.

Barmecide's Feast

A feast where there is nothing to eat; any illusion. Barmecide asked Schacabac, a poor, starving wretch, to dinner, and set before him an empty plate. “How do you like your soup?” asked the merchant. “Excellently well,” replied Schacabac. “Did you ever see whiter bread?” “Never, honourable sir,” was the civil answer. Wine was then brought in, and Schacabac was pressed to drink, but excused himself by saying he was always quarrelsome in his cups. Being over—persuaded, he fell foul of his host, and was provided with food to his heart's content. (Arabian Nights: Barber's Sixth Brother.)

Barnabas

St. Barnabas' Day, June 11. St. Barnabas was a fellow—labourer of St. Paul. His symbol is a rake, because the 11th of June is the time of hay—harvest.

Barnabites

(3 syl.) An Order of monks, so called because the church of St. Barnabas, in Milan, was given to them to preach in. They are also called “Canons of St. Paul,” because the original society made a point of reading St. Paul's Epistles.

Barnaby Lecturers

Four lecturers in the University of Cambridge, elected annually on St. Barnabas' Day (June 11), to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge

A half—witted lad whose companion is a raven. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge.)

Barnacle

The Solan goose. The strange tales of this creature have arisen from a tissue of blunders. The Latin pernacula is a “small limpet,” and bernacula (Portuguese, bernaca; French, barnache) is the Scotch bren—clake or “Solan goose.” Both words being corrupted into “barnacle,” it was natural to look for an identity of nature in the two creatures, so it was given out that the goose was the offspring of the limpet. Gerard, in 1636, speaks of “broken pieces of old ships on which is found certain spume or froth, which in time breedeth into shells, and the fish which is hatched therefrom is in shape and habit like a bird.”

Barnacles

Placemen who stick to their offices but do little work, like the barnacles which live on the ship but impede its progress.

“The redundants would be “Barnacles” with a vengeance ... and the work be all the worse done for these hangers—on.” — Nineteenth Century (August, 1888, p. 280).

Barnacles

Spectacles, or rather reading—glasses; so called because in shape they resemble the twitchers used by farriers to keep under restraint unruly horses during the process of bleeding, dressing, or shoeing. This instrument, formerly called a barnacle, consisting of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, was fixed on the horse's nose. Dr. Latham considers the word a corruption of binocles (double—eyes), Latin, binus oculus. Another suggestion is “binnacle,” the case on board ship in which the steering compass is placed, illuminated when it is dark by a lamp.

Barnardine

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A reckless, dissolute fellow, "fearless of what's past, present, and to come." (Shakespeare: Measure for Measure.)

Barn—burners

Destructives, who, like the Dutchman of story, would burn down their barns to rid themselves of the rats.

Barnet

An epicure who falls in love with, and marries, a lady on account of her skill in dressing a dish of stewed carp. (Edward, a novel by Dr. John Moore, 1796.)

Barnwell (George) The chief character in a prose tragedy, so called, by George Lillo. He was a London apprentice, who fell in with a wanton in Shoreditch, named Sarah Millwood, whom he visited, and to whom he gave #200 of his master's money, and ran away. He next robbed his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and beat out his brains. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out of doors, and each informed against the other. Sarah Millwood and George Barnwell were both hanged. (Lillo, 1693—1739.)

Baro—Devel

The great god of the gipsies. His son is named Alako.

Baron

properly means a man (Old High German, baro). It was a term applied to a serving—soldier, then to a military chief, and ultimately to a lord. The reverse of this is seen in our word slave (a servile menial), which is the Slavonic word slav (noble, illustrious). Barones vel varrones dicuntur servi militum, qui utique stultissimi sunt servi videlicet stultorum. (Scholiast.) (See Idiot.)

Baron Bung

Mine host, master of the beer bung.

Baron Munchausen

(pron. Moohn—kow—zn). Said to be a satire on Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, to whom the work was dedicated. The author was Raspè, a German fugitive from the officers of justice, living in Cornwall (1785). The chief incidents were compiled from various sources, such as the Mendacia Ridicula of

J. P. Lange; Lucian's True History of Things Discovered in the Moon: Rabelais; and the Folheto de Amba Lisboa.

Baron of Beef

Two sirloins left uncut at the backbone. The baron is the backpart of the ox, called in Danish, the rug. Jocosely said to be a pun upon baron and sir loin.

Barons' War

(The). An historical poem by Michael Drayton (1603).

“The pictures of Mortimer and the queen, and of Edward's entrance into the castle, are splendid and spirited.”
— Campbell.

Barrack Hack

(The). A lady who hangs on the sleeve of a military officer, attends all barrack fêtes of every description, and is always ready to get up a dance, dinner, or picnic, to please the officers on whom she dances attendance.

Barracks

means huts made of the branches of trees (Gaelic, barr, the top of anything; barrach, the top—branches of trees; barrachad, a hut made of branches). Our word is plural, indicative of the whole collection; but the French baraque is singular. (See B. K. S.)

Barratry

or Barretry.

Qui fait barat, barat lui vient

(French). With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Barratry is false faith to one's employers. It is a sea term, and means the commission of a fraud on the owners or insurers of a ship by the captain or the crew. The fraud may consist of many phases, such as deserting the ship, sinking her, falsifying her cargo, etc. The French have other proverbs to the same effect: as, La tricherie revient presque toujours à son maître. “He made a pit and ... is fallen into the ditch which he made. His mischief shall return upon his own head.” (Psalm vii. 14, 15, 16.)

Barrel Fever

Intoxication or illness from intemperance in drink.

Barrell's Blues

The 4th Foot; so called from the colour of their facings, and William Barrell, colonel of the regiment (1734—1739). Now called “The King's Own (Royal Lancaster Regiment).” They were called “Lions” from their badge, The Lion of England.

Barrette

Parler à la barrette (French). To give one a thump o' the head. The word barrette means the cap worn by the lower orders.

“Et moi, je pourrais bien parler à ta barrette.” Molière: L'Avare.

It is also used to signify the ordinary birretta of ecclesiastics and (probably) of French lawyers. Il à reçu le chapeau or la barrette. He has been made a cardinal.

“Le pape lui envoyait la barrette, mais elle ne servit qu'à le faire mourir cardinal.” — Voltaire: Siècle de Louis XIV, chap. xxxix.

Barricade

(3 syl.) To block up. The term rose in France in 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king's order. The king sent for his Swiss Guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavement, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they passed through the streets. The French for barrel is barrique, and to barricade is to stop up the streets with these barrels.

The day of the Barricades:

- (1) May 12th, 1588, when the people forced Henri III to flee from Paris.
- (2) August 5th, 1648, the beginning of the Fronde War.
- (3) July 27th, 1830, the first day of le grand semail which drove Charles X, from the throne.
- (4) February 24th, 1848, which drove Louis Philippe to abdicate and flee to England.
- (5) June 23rd, 1848, when Affre, Archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.
- (6) December 2nd, 1851, the day of the coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for reelection to the Presidency for ten years.

Barrier Treaty November 5th, 1715, by which the Dutch reserved the right of holding garrisons in certain fortresses of the Spanish Netherlands.

Barrikin

Jargon, words not understood. (Old French, baracan, from the Breton, bara gwyn, "white bread," taken as a type of barbarous words; modern French, baragouin, gibberish.)

Barring—out

A practice of barring the master out of the schoolroom in order to dictate terms to him. It was once common, but is now numbered with past customs. Miss Edgeworth has a tale so called.

Barrister

One admitted to plead at the bar; one who has been "called to the bar." The bar is the rail which divides the counsel from the audience, or the place thus enclosed. Tantamount to the rood—screen of a church, which separates the chancel from the rest of the building. Both these are relics of the ancient notion that the laity are an inferior order to the privileged class.

A silk gown or bencher pleads within the bar, a stuff gown or outer barrister pleads without the bar.

Outer or Utter Barrister.

This phrase alludes to an ancient custom observed in courts of law, when certain barristers were allowed to plead; but not being benchers (king's counsel or sergeants—at—law) they took their seats "at the end of the forms called the bar." The Utter Barrister comes next to a bencher, and all barristers inferior to the Utter Barristers are termed. "Inner Barristers."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The whole society is divided into three ranks: Benchers, Utter Barristers, and Inner Barristers.

An Inner Barrister.

A barrister inferior in grade to a Bencher or Utter Barrister.

A Revising Barrister.

One appointed to revise the lists of electors.

A Vacation Barrister:

One newly called to the bar, who for three years has to attend in “long vacation.”

Barristers' Bags

In the Common Law bar, barristers' bags are either red or dark blue. Red bags are reserved for Queen's Counsel and sergeants; but a stuff gownsmen may carry one “if presented with it by a silk.” Only red bags may be taken into Common Law Courts; blue bags must be carried no farther than the robing room. In the Chancery Courts the etiquette is not so strict.

Barristers' Gowns

“Utter barristers wear a stuff or bombazine gown, and the puckered material between the shoulders of the gown is all that is now left of the purse into which, in early days, the successful litigant ... dropped his ... pecuniary tribute ... for services rendered” (Notes and Queries, 11 March, 1893, p. 124). The fact is that the counsel was supposed to appear merely as a friend of the litigant. Even now he cannot recover his fees.

Barry Cornwall

poet. A nom de plume of Bryan Waller Procter. It is an anagram of his name. (1788—1874.)

Barsanians

Heretics who arose in the sixth century. They made their sacrifices consist in taking wheat flour on the tip of their first finger, and carrying it to their mouth.

Bar—sur—Aube

(*Prévo*t). Je ne voudrais pas être roi, si j'étais prévot de Bar—sur—Aube (French). I should not care to be king, if I were Provost of Bar—sur—Aube [the most lucrative and honourable of all the provostships of France]. Almost the same idea is expressed in the words

“And often to our comfort we shall find,

The sharded beetle in a safer hold

Than is the full—winged eagle.”

Almost to the same effect Pope says:

“And more true joy Marcellus exiled feels,
Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels.”

See

Castle of Bungay.

Bartholo

A doctor in the comedies of Le Mariage de Figaro, and Le Barbier de Séville, by Beaumarchais.

Bartholomew

(St.). The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was flayed alive.

St. Bartholomew's Day,

August 24th. Probably Bartholomew is the apostle called “Nathanael” by St. John the Evangelist (i. 45—51).

Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

The slaughter of the French Protestants in the reign of Charles IX, begun on St. Bartholomew's Day, i.e. between the 24th and 25th August, 1572. It is said that 30,000 persons fell in this dreadful persecution.

Bartholomew Fair

Held in West Smithfield (1133—1855) on St. Bartholomew's Day.

A Bartholomew doll.

A tawdry, overdressed woman; like a flashy, bespangled doll offered for sale at Bartholomew Fair.

Bartholomew pig.

A very fat person. At Bartholomew Fair one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Falstaff calls himself,

“A little tidy Bartholomew boar—pig.” — 2 Henry IV. ii. 4.

Barthram's Dirge

(in Sir Walter Scott's Border Minstrelsy). Sir Noel Paton, in a private letter, says: “The subject of this dirge was communicated to Sir Walter as a genuine fragment of the ancient Border Muse by his friend Mr. Surtees, who is in reality its author. The ballad has no foundation in history; and the fair lady, her lover, and the nine brothers, are but the creation of the poet's fancy.” Sir Noel adds: “I never painted a picture of this subject, though I have often thought of doing so. The engraving which appeared in the Art Journal was executed without my concurrence from the oil sketch, still, I presume, in the collection of Mr. Pender, the late M.P., by whom it was brought to the Exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy here” (at Edinburgh) November 19th, 1866.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bartoldo

A rich old miser, who died of fear and penurious self—denial. Fazio rifled his treasures, and, being accused by his own wife Bianca, was put to death. (Dean Milman: Fazio.)

Bartole

(2 syl.).

He knows his “Bartole” as well as a cordelier his “Dormi”

(French). Bartole was an Italian lawyer, born in Umbria (1313—1356), whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone with us. The cordeliers or Franciscans were not great at preaching, and perhaps for this reason used a collection called Dormi, containing the best specimens of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This compilation was called Dormi from the first word in the book. The compilation is anonymous.

Bartolist

One skilled in law. (See above.)

Barzillai (3 syl.). The Duke of Ormond, a friend and staunch adherent of Charles II. The allusion is to Barzillai, who assisted David when he was expelled by Absalom from his kingdom (2 Sam. xvii. 27—29).

“Barzillai crowned with honours and with years ...

In exile with his godlike prince he mourned,

For him he suffered, and with him returned.” Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 1. 817—94.

Bas Bleu

(See Blue Stocking .)

Base

The basis, or that on which an animal walks (Greek, baino, to go, and basis, a footstep). The foot is the foundation— hence, base of a pillar, etc. It is also the lowest part, and hence the notion of worthless. Bass in music (Italian, basso) is the lowest part, or the part for the lowest compass of voice.

Base Tenure

Holding by copy of court—roll, in opposition to freeholders.

Base of Operation

in war. That is, a fortified or otherwise secure spot, where the magazines of all sorts can be formed, whence the army can derive stores, and upon which (in case of reverse) it can fall back. If a fleet, it is called a movable base; if a fortified or other immovable spot, it is called a fixed base. The line from such a base to the object aimed at is called “the Line of Operation.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bashaw

An arrogant, domineering man; so called from the Turkish viceroys and provincial governors, each of whom bears the title of bascha (pacha).

A three—tailed bashaw.

A beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks, having a standard of three horse—tails borne before him. The next in rank is the bashaw with two tails, and then the bey, who has only one horse—tail.

Basilian Monks

Monks of the Order of St. Basil, who lived in the fourth century. This Order has produced 14 popes, 1,805 bishops, 3,010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs.

Basilica

Originally the court of the Athenian archon, called the basileus, who used to give judgment in the stoa basilike. At Rome these courts of justice had their nave, aisles, porticoes, and tribunals; so that when used for Christian worship very little alteration was needed. The church of St. John Lateran at Rome was an ancient basilica.

Basilics

or Basilica. A digest of laws begun by the Byzantine emperor Basilus in 867, and completed by his son Leo, the philosopher, in 880.

Basilidians

A sect of Gnostic heretics, followers of Basilides, an Alexandrian Gnostic, who taught that from the unborn Father “Mind” was begotten; from Mind proceeded “The Word”; from the Word or Logos proceeded “Understanding”; from Understanding “Wisdom” and “Power”; from Wisdom and Power

“Excellencies,” “Princes,” and “Angels,” the agents which created heaven. Next to these high mightinesses come 365 celestial beings, the chief of whom is Abraxas (q.v.), and each of whom has his special heaven. What we call Christ is what the Basilidians term The firstbegotten “Mind.”

Basilisco

A braggart; a character in an old play entitled Solyman and Perseda. Shakespeare makes the Bastard say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill—birth, “Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco—like”—i.e. my boasting has made me a knight. (King John, i. 1.)

Basilisk The king of serpents (Greek, basileus, a king), supposed to have the power of “looking any one dead on whom it fixed its eyes.” Hence Dryden makes Clytus say to Alexander, “Nay, frown not so; you cannot look me dead.” This creature is called a king from having on its head a mitre—shaped crest. Also called a cockatrice, and fabulously alleged to be hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg.

“Like a boar

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Plunging his tusk in mastiff's gore:

Or basilisk, when roused, whose breath,

Teeth, sting, and eyeballs all are death.”

King: Art of Love.

Basket

To be left in the basket. Neglected or uncared for. Left in the waste—basket.

To give a basket.

To refuse to marry. In Germany a basket [korb] is fixed on the roof of one who has been jilted, or one who, after long courtship, cannot persuade the lady courted to become his wife.

Basochians

Clerks of the basilica or palace. When the Kings of France inhabited the “Palace of Justice,” the judges, advocates, proctors, and lawyers went by the common name of the clercs de la basoche; subsequently (in 1303) divided into “Clerks of the Palace,” and “Clerks of the Châtelet.” The chief of the basochians was called Le roi de la basoche, and had his court, coin, and grand officers. He reviewed his “subjects” every year, and administered justice twice a week. Henri III. suppressed the title of the chief, and transferred all his functions and privileges to the Chancellor.

Bass

Matting made of bast, that is the lime or linden tree. Dutch, bast, bark; Swedish, basta, to bind; so called because used for binding. “Ribbons from the linden tree give a wreath no charms to me.” The shepherds of Carniola make a cloth of the outer bark. The inner bark is made into Russian matting, and is serviceable to gardeners for packing, tying up plants, protecting trees, etc. Other materials are now used for the same purposes, and for hassocks, etc., but the generic word bass designates both bast—bark and all its imitations.

Bastard

Any sweetened wine, but more correctly applied to a sweet Spanish wine (white or brown) made of the bastard muscadine grape.

“I will pledge you willingly in a cup of bastard.”— Sir Walter Scott: Kenilworth, chap. iii.

Baste

(1 syl.). I'll baste your jacket for you, i.e. cane you. I'll give you a thorough basting, i.e. beating. (Spanish, baston, a stick; Italian, bastone; French, bâton.)

Bastille

means simply a building (French, bastir, now bâtir, to build). Charles V. built it as a royal château; Philippe—Auguste enclosed it with a high wall; St. Louis administered justice in the park, under the oak—trees; Philippe de Valois demolished the old château and commenced a new one; Louis XI. first used it as a state prison; and it was demolished by the rabble in the French Revolution, July 14th, 1789.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bastinado

A beating (Italian, bastone; French, baston, now bâton, a stick). The Chinese, Turks, and Persians punish offenders by beating them on the soles of the feet. The Turks call the punishment zarb.

Bastion

(A), in fortification, is a work having two faces and two flanks, all the angles of which are salient, that is, pointing outwards towards the country. The line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two bastions is technically called a curtain.

Bastions in fortifications were invented in 1480 by Achmet Pasha; but San Michaeli of Verona, in 1527, is said by Maffei and Vasari to have been the real inventor.

Bat Harlequin's lath wand (French, battle, a wooden sword).

To carry out one's bat

(in cricket). Not to be "out" when the time for drawing the stumps has arrived. Off his own bat. By his own exertions; on his own account. A cricketer's phrase, meaning runs won by a single player.

Bat—horses and Bat—men. Bat—horses are those which carry officers' baggage during a campaign (French, bât, a pack—saddle). Bat—men are those who look after the pack—horses.

Batavia

The Netherlands; so called from the Batavi, a Celtic tribe who dwelt there.

"Flat Batavia's willowy groves."

Wordsworth.

Bate me an Ace

(See Bolton.)

Bath

Knights of the Bath. This name is derived from the ceremony of bathing, which used to be practised at the inauguration of a knight, as a symbol of purity. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661. G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first—class); K.C.B. Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); C.B. Companion of the Bath (the third class).

King of Bath.

Richard Nash, generally called Beau Nash, a celebrated master of the ceremonies at Bath for fifty—six years. (1674—1761.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

There, go to Bath with you!

Don't talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implied reproof is, what you say is so silly, you ought to go to Bath and get your head shaved.

Bath Brick

Alluvial matter made in the form of a brick, and used for cleaning knives and polishing metals. It is not made at Bath, but at Bridgwater, being dredged from the river Parrett, which runs through Bridgwater.

Bath Chair

(A). A chair mounted on wheels and used for invalids. Much used at Bath, frequented by invalids for its hot springs.

Bath Metal

The same as Pinchbeck (q.v.). An alloy consisting of sixteen parts copper and five of zinc.

Bath Post

A letter paper with a highly—glazed surface, used by the highly—fashionable visitors of Bath when that watering—place was at its prime. (See Post.) Since the introduction of the penny post and envelope system, this paper has gone out of general use.

Bath Shillings

Silver tokens coined at Bath in 1811—1812, and issued for 4s., for 2s., and for 1s., by C. Culverhouse, J. Orchard, and J. Phipps.

Bath Stone

A species of limestone, used for building, and found in the Lower Oolite, in Wiltshire and Somersetshire. It is easily wrought in the quarry, but hardens on exposure to the air. Called “Bath” stone because several of the quarries are near Bath, in Somersetshire.

Bath

(Major). A poor, high—minded officer, who tries to conceal his poverty by bold speech and ostentatious bearing. Colman's Poor Gentleman (Lieutenant Worthington) is a similar character. (Fielding: Amelia (a novel) 1751.)

Bath—kol

(daughter of the voice). A sort of divination common among the ancient Jews after the gift of prophecy had ceased. When an appeal was made to Bath—kol, the first words uttered after the appeal were considered oracular.

Bathos

[Greek, bathos, depth]. A ludicrous descent from grandiloquence to commonplace. A literary mermaid.

“Humano capiti cervicem pictor equinam

Jungere si velit ... ut turpiter atrum

Desinat in piscem mulier formosa superne.”

“Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus.”

Horace: De Arte Poetica,

line 139.

A good example is the well—known couplet:

“And thou, Dalhousie, the great god of war,

Lieutenant—general to the earl of Mar.”

Bathsheba

The Duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite court lady of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uriah the Hittite, criminally beloved by David (2 Sam. xi.). The Duke of Monmouth says:

“My father, whom with reverence yet 1 name,

Charmed into ease, is careless of his fame;

And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold,

Is grown in Bathsheba's embraces old.”

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 707—10.

Bathyllus

A beautiful boy of Samos, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by the poet Anacreon. (See Horace: Epistle xiv. 9.)

“To them [i.e. the æsthetic school] the boyhood of Bathyllus is of more moment than the manhood of Napoleon.”—Mallock: The New Republic, book iv. chap. 1.

Batiste

The fabric is so called from Baptiste of Cambrai, who first manufactured it.

Batrachomyomachia (pronounce Ba—trak'o—my'o—makia). A storm in a puddle; much ado about nothing. The word is the name of a mock heroic poem in Greek, supposed to be by Pigres of Caria, and means The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Batta

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Batty (Hindustanee). Perquisites; wages. Properly, an allowance to East Indian troops in the field. In garrison they are put on half—batta.

“He would rather live on half—pay in a garrison that could boast of a fives—court, than vegetate on full batta where there was none.”— G.R. Gleig: Thomas Munro, vol. i. chap. iv. p. 227.

Battar

Al [the Trenchant]. One of Mahomet's swords, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medina.

Battels

Rations or “commons” allowed to students at the University of Oxford. (To batten, to feast.)

Battel Bills.

Buttery bills at the universities. (See above.)

Battersea

You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproof to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medicinal herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to select or cut such as they wanted. (See Naviga.)

Battle

Professor Creasy says there are fifteen decisive battles; that is, battles which have decided some political change: B.C. 490, Marathon, 413, Syracuse; 331, Arbela; 207, Metaurus; the defeat of the Romans by Varus, 9; Chalons, A.D. 451; Tours, 732; Hastings, 1066; Joan of Arc's victory at Orléans, 1429; the Armada, 1588; Blenheim, 1704; Pultow'a, 1709, Saratoga, 1777, Valmy, 1792; and Waterloo, 1815. See also Fifteen Decisive Battles.

Battle royal.

A certain number of cocks, say sixteen, are pitted together; the eight victors are then pitted, then the four, and last of all the two; and the winner is victor of the battle royal. Metaphorically, the term is applied to chess, etc.

Battle scenes.

Le Clerc could arrange on a small piece of paper not larger than one's hand an army of 20,000 men.

The Battle—painter

or Delle Battaglie. (See Michael Angelo.)

Battle of the Books.

A satire, by Dean Swift, on the contention among literary men whether ancient or modern authors were the better. In the battle the ancient books fight against the modern books in St. James's Library.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Battle of the Giants; i.e.

the battle of Marignan (Ma—rin—yan') in 1515, when Francois I. won a complete victory over 12,000 Swiss, allies of the Milanese.

Battle of the Herrings, in 1429. A sortie made by the men of Orléans, during the siege of their city, to intercept a supply of salt herrings sent to the besiegers.

Battle of the Moat.

A skirmish or battle between Mahomet and Abu Sofian (chief of the Koreishites) before Medina; so called because the “prophet” had a moat dug before the city to keep off the invaders; and in the moat much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Standard, in 1138, when the English overthrew the Scotch, at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. The standard was a high crucifix borne by the English on a wagon.

Battle of the Spurs

(1302), in which the allied citizens of Ghent and Bruges won a famous victory over the chivalry of France under the walls of Courtray. After the battle more than 700 gilt spurs (worn by French nobles) were gathered from the field.

In English history the Battle of Guinegate (1513) is so called, “because the French spurred their horses to flight, almost as soon as they came in sight of the English troops.”

A close battle.

A naval fight at “close quarters,” in which opposing ships engage each other side by side. A line of battle. The position of troops drawn up in battle array. At sea, the arrangement formed by ships in a naval engagement. A line—of—battle ship is a ship fit to take part in a main attack. Frigates do not join in a general engagement.

A pitched battle.

A battle which has been planned, and the ground pitched on or chosen beforehand, by both sides.

Half the battle.

Half determines the battle. Thus, “The first stroke is half the battle,” that is, the way in which the battle is begun half determines what the end will be.

Trial by battle.

The submission of a legal suit to a combat between the litigants, under the notion that God would defend the right. It was legal in England till the nineteenth century.

Wager of Battle.

One of the forms of ordeal or appeal to the judgment of God, in the old Norman courts of the kingdom. It consisted of a personal combat between the plaintiff and the defendant, in the presence of the court itself. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice

(The). [See Batrachomyomachia.]

Battle of the Kegs

(The). A mockheroic by Francis Hopkinson (1738—1791). In the War of Independence certain machines, in the form of kegs, charged with gunpowder, were sent down the river to annoy the British at Philadelphia. When the British found out the nature of these machines, they waged relentless war with everything they saw floating about the river.

Battle of the Poets

(The). A satirical poem by John [Sheffield], Duke of Buckingham, in which all the versifiers of the time are brought into the field (1725).

Battle of the Whips

The Scythian slaves once rose in rebellion against their masters, and many a bloody encounter followed. At length, one of the Scythian masters said to his followers: Let us throw away our spears and swords, and fight in future with whips. We get killed by the former weapons and weakened. So in the next encounter they armed themselves with whips, and immediately the slaves saw the whips, remembering former scourgings, they turned tail and were no more trouble.

Battle

(Sarah), who considered whist the business of life and literature one of the relaxations. When a young gentleman, of a literary turn, said to her he had no objection to unbend his mind for a little time by taking a hand with her, Sarah was indignant, and declared it worse than sacrilege to speak thus of her noble occupation. Whist “was her life business; her duty; the thing she came into the world to do, and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards over a book.” (C. Lamb: Elia.)

Battledore

(3 syl.) means, properly, a baton for washing linen by striking on it to knock out the dirt. The plan is still common in France. The word is the French battoir, a beater used by washerwomen; Portuguese, Batidor, Spanish, batidero, a wash—board.

Battu

Autant pleure mal battu que bien battu (French). It little matters whether stripes are given maliciously or not, as they smart the same. Whether misfortunes come from God or Satan, they are misfortunes still. A slight variant is “Autant vaut bien battu que mal battu,” which means, it is of no consequence whether badly beaten or not, enough that I am beaten; “over shoes, over boots.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Battu de fol Oiseau

(Etre), or “être battu de l’oiseau,” to be utterly dismayed; to be dazed. The allusion is to bird—catching at night, when a candle or lantern is held up before the birds aroused from their sleep; the birds, being dazed, are beaten down easily with sticks.

Battus paieront

(Les). Væ victis! Those who lose must pay the piper. “C’est le loi du pays de Béarn que le battu paie l’amende.” Again, “C’est la coutume de Lorris, les battus paient l’amende.” This is certainly the general custom in law and war.

Baabee (See Bawbee.)

Bauble

A fool should never hold a bauble in his hand. “`Tis a foolish bird that fouls its own nest.” The bauble was a short stick, ornamented with ass's ears, carried by licensed fools. (French, babiole, a plaything; Old French, baubel, a child's toy.)

If every fool held a bauble, fuel would be dear.

The proverb indicates that the world contains so many fools that if each had a separate bauble there would be but little wood left for lighting fires.

To deserve the bauble.

To be so foolish as to be qualified to carry a fool's emblem of office.

Baucis

(See Philemon.)

Baviad

(The). A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Cruscan poetry, published 1794. The word is from Virgil's Eclogue, iii. 9.

“He may with foxes plough, and milk he—goats,

Who praises Bavins or on Mævius dotes.”

E.C.B.

Bavieca

The Cid's horse.

Bavius

Any bad poet. (See Baviad.)

B

“May some choice patron bless each grey goose quill,

May every Bavius have his Bufo still.”

Pope: Prologue to the Satires,

249—50.

Bawbee

“Whall hire, whall hire, whall hire me?

Three plumps and a wallop for ae bawbee.”

The tale is that the people of Kirkmahoe were so poor, they could not afford to put any meat into their broth. A `cute cobbler invested all his money in buying four sheep—shanks, and when a neighbour wanted to make mutton broth, for the payment of one halfpenny the cobbler would “plump” one of the sheep—shanks into the boiling water, and give it a “wallop” or whisk round. He then wrapped it in a cabbage—leaf and took it home. This was called a gustin bone, and was supposed to give a rich “gust” to the broth. The cobbler found his gustin bone very profitable.

Jenny's bawbee.

Her marriage portion. The word means, properly, a debased copper coin, equal in value to a halfpenny, issued in the reign of James V. of Scotland. (French, bas billon, debased copper money.)

The word “bawbee” is derived from the laird of Sillebawby, a mint—master. That there was such a laird is quite certain from the Treasurer's account, September 7th, 1541, “In argento receptis a Jacobo Atzinsone, et Alexandro Orok de Sillebawby respective.”

Bawley Boat

(A). A small fishing—smack used on the coasts of Kent and Essex, about the mouth of the Thames and Medway. Bawleys are generally about 40 feet long, 13 feet beam, 5 feet draught, and from 15 to 20 tons measurement. They differ in rig from a cutter in having no booms to the mainsail, which is, consequently, easily brailed up when working the trawl nets. They are half—decked, with a wet well to keep fish alive.

Bawtry

Like the saddler of Bawtry, who was hanged for leaving his liquor (Yorkshire proverb). It was customary for criminals on their way to execution to stop at a certain tavern in York for a “parting draught.” The saddler of Bawtry refused to accept the liquor and was hanged. If he had stopped a few minutes at the tavern, his reprieve, which was on the road, would have arrived in time to save his life.

Baxterians

Those who entertain the same religious views as Richard Baxter. The chief points are— (1) That Christ died in a spiritual sense for the elect, and in a general sense for all; (2) that there is no such thing as reprobation; (3) that even saints may fall from grace. Dr. Isaac Watts and Dr. Doddridge held these views.

Bay

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Supposed to be an antidote against lightning, because it was the tree of Apollo. Hence Tiberius and some other of the Roman emperors wore a wreath of bay as an amulet, especially in thunder—storms. (Pliny.)

“Reach the bays—

I'll tie a garland here about his head; `Twill keep my boy from lightning.”

The White Devil.

The withering of a bay—tree was supposed to be the omen of a death.

“ `Tis thought the king is dead. We'll not stay—

The bay—trees in our country are withered.”

Shakespeare: Richard II., ii. 4.

Crowned with bays,

in sign of victory. The general who obtained a victory among the Romans was crowned with a wreath of bay leaves.

Bay.

The reason why Apollo and all those under his protection are crowned with bay is a pretty fable. Daphne, daughter of the river—god Peneos, in Thessaly, was very beautiful and resolved to pass her life in perpetual virginity. Apollo fell in love with her, but she rejected his suit. On one occasion the god was so importunate that Daphne fled from him and sought the protection of her father, who changed her into the bay—tree. The gallant god declared henceforth he would wear bay leaves on his brow and lyre instead of the oak, and that all who sought his favour should follow his example.

The Queen's Bays.

The 2nd Dragoon Guards; so called because they are mounted on bay horses. Now called The Queen's.

Bay.

The colour of a horse is Varro's equus badius, given by Ainsworth as, “brown, bay, sorrel, chestnut colour.” Coles gives the same. Our bayard; bright bay, light bay, blood bay, etc.

Bay the Moon

(To). To bark at the moon. (French, aboyer, to bark at.) (See Bark.) is salt of a bay colour. It is the salt of sea—water hardened by the heat of the sun.

Bay Salt

Bayadere (bah—ya—dare). A dancing girl dressed in Eastern costume; so called from the bajaderes of India, whose duty is to dance before the images of the gods; but the grandees employ similar dancers for their private amusements. The word is a corruption of the Portuguese bailadeira.

Bayard

(Chevalier), Pierre du Terrail, a celebrated French knight (1476—1524). Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche.

The British Bayard.

Sir Philip Sidney. (1554—1584.) The Polish Bayard. Prince Joseph Poniatowski. (1763—1814.)

Bayard of the East

(The) or Of the Indian Army. Sir James Outram (1803—1863).

Bayard

A horse of incredible swiftness, belonging to the four sons of Aymon. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse, and means a “high—bay” (bay—ard). (Villeneuve: Les Quatre—Fils Aymon.) (See Horse.)

Keep Bayard in the stable, i.e.

keep what is of value under lock and key. (See above. Bold as Blind Bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is he will fall into a ditch. Grose mentions the following expression, To ride bayard of ten toes—“Going by the marrow—bone stage”— i.e. walking.

Bayardo

The famous steed of Rinaldo, which once belonged to Amadis of Gaul. (See Horse.)

Bayardo's Leap.

Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed Bayardo, when the demon of the place sprang behind him; but the animal in terror took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes

in the Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham, was designed to satirise John Dryden, the poet laureate.

Bayes's Troops

Dead men may rise again, like Bayes's troops, or the savages in the Fantocini (Something New). In the Rehearsal, by George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, a battle is fought between foot—soldiers and great hobby—horses. At last Drawcansir kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off, to which Bayes replies, “As they came on— upon their legs”; upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayeux Tapestry

Supposed to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It represents the mission of Harold to the duke, and all the incidents of his history from that event till his death at Hastings in 1066. It is called Bayeux from the place where it is preserved. A drawing, on a reduced scale, of this curious antique is preserved in the Guildhall Library.

Bayle

(2 syl.). Dances of the common people were so called in Spain, in opposition to the stately court dances, called danza. The Bayle were of Moorish invention, the most celebrated being La Sarabanda, La Chacona, Las Gambelas, and El Hermano Bartolo.

Bayonet

So called from La Bayonette, a lower ridge of the Montage d'Arrhune. A Basque regiment, early in the seventeenth century, running short of powder, stuck their knives into their muskets; and charged the Spaniards with success. Some derive this word from Bayonne.

Bayonets

A synonym of "rank and file," that is, privates and corporals of infantry. As, "the number of bayonets was 25,000."

"It is on the bayonets that a Quartermaster—General relies for his working and fatigue parties." — Howitt: Hist. of Eng. (year 1854, p. 200).

Bead (Anglo—Saxon, bed, a prayer). When little balls with a hole through them were used for keeping account of the number of prayers repeated, the term was applied to the prayers also. (See Beadsman.)

To count one's beads.

To say one's prayers. In the Catholic Church beads are threaded on a string, some large and some small, to assist in keeping count how often a person repeats a certain form of words.

To pray without one's beads.

To be out of one's reckoning. (See above. Baily's Beads. When the disc of the moon has (in an eclipse) reduced that of the sun to a thin crescent, the crescent assumes the appearance of a string of beads. This was first observed by Francis Baily, whence the name of the phenomenon.

St. Cuthbert's Beads.

Single joints of the articulated stems of encrinites. They are perforated in the centre, and bear a fanciful resemblance to a cross; hence, they were once used for rosaries (beads). St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be called the St. Patrick of the north of England and south of Scotland.

St. Martin's beads.

Flash jewellery. St. Martins—le—Grand was at one time a noted place for sham jewellery.

Bead—house

An almshouse for beads—men.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bead—roll

A list of persons to be prayed for; hence, also, any list.

Beadle

A person whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear to a summons; also a church servant, whose duty it is to bid the parishioners to attend the vestry, or to give notice of vestry meetings. (Anglo—Saxon, bædel, from beodan, to bid or summon.)

Beadsman

or Bedesman. An inhabitant of an almshouse; so called because in Catholic times most charities of this class were instituted that the inmates might “pray for the soul of the founder.” (See Bead.)

“Seated with some grey beadsman.”

Crabbe: Borough.

Beak

A magistrate. (Anglo—Saxon beag, a gold collar worn by civic magistrates.) W. H. Black says, “The term is derived from a Mr. Beke, who was formerly a resident magistrate at the Tower Hamlets.”

Beaker

A drinking—glass; a rummer. (Greek, bikos, a wine jar.)

“Here, Gerard, reach your beaker.”

Browning: Blot in the Scutcheon,

i. 1.

Beam

Thrown on my beam—ends. Driven to my last shift. A ship is said to be on her beam—ends when she is laid by a heavy gale completely on her beams or sides. Not unfrequently the only means of righting her in such a case is to cut away her masts.

On the starboard beam.

A distant point out at sea on the right—hand side, and at right angles to the keel. On the port beam. A similar point on the left—hand side.

On the weather beam.

On that side of a ship which faces the wind.

Beam

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(of a stag). That part of the head from which the horns spring. (Anglo—Saxon béam, a tree; the horns are called branches.)

Bean

Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitiis nascitur, “everyone has his faults.” The bean has a black eye. (Ogni grano ha la sua semola.)

He has found the bean in the cake,

he has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to twelfth cakes in which a bean is buried. When the cake is cut up and distributed, he who gets the bean is the twelfth—night king.

Beans slang for property, money, is the French biens, goods. “A bean’ = a guinea, is in Grose.

“Like a beane [alms—money] in a monkeshood.” — Cotgrave.

(See Barristers' Gowns.)

Beans.

Pythagoras forbade the use of beans to his disciples— not the use of beans as a food, but the use of beans for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythagoras advised was that his disciples should not interfere with politics or “love beans”— i.e. office.

Aristotle says the word bean means venery, and that the prohibition to “abstain from beans” was equivalent to “keeping the body chaste.”

The French have the proverb, “If he gives me peas I will give him beans,” S'il me donne des pois, je lui donnerai des fèves, i.e. I will give him tit for tat, a Rowland for an Oliver.

Beans are in flower, les fèves fleurissent, and this will account for your being so silly. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of the flowering bean was bad for the head, and made men silly or light—headed. He knows how many beans go to make up five. He is “up to snuff;” he is no fool; he is not to be imposed upon. The reference is to the ancient custom of moving beans in counting.

“I was a fool, I was, and didn't know how many beans make five [that is how many beans must be moved to make up five].” — Farjeon.

“Few men better knew how many blue beans it takes to make five.” — Galt.

Blue Beans: “Three blue beans in a blue bladder.” A rattle for children.

“F. Hark! does it rattle?”

S. Yes, like three blue beans in a blue bladder.” Old Fortunatus (Ancient Dramas), iii. p. 128.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Blue beans” are bullets or shot. Three small bullets or large shot in a bladder would make a very good rattle for a child. (See Blue Beans.)

Full of beans.

Said of a fresh and spirited horse. To get beans. To incur reproof.

I'll give him beans.

A licking; a jolly good hiding. A very common phrase. Probably from the French referred to above, meaning as good as I got; “beans for his peas.”

Bean Feast

Much the same as wayz—goose (q.v.). A feast given by an employer to those he employs.

Bean Goose

(The). A migratory bird which appears in England in the autumn of the year, and is so named from a mark on its bill like a horse—bean. It is next in size to the Grey Lag—goose. The term comes from the northern counties where the bean (goose) is common.

Bean—king

(The). Rey de Habas, the child appointed to play the part of king on twelfth—night. In France it was at one time customary to hide a bean in a large cake, and he to whom the bean fell, when the cake was distributed, was for the nonce the bean king, to whom all the other guests showed playful reverence. The Greeks used beans for voting by ballot.

Bean—King's festival.

Twelfth—night. (See above.)

Bear (A). (Stock Exchange), a fall, or a speculator for a fall. To operate for a bear. To realise a profitable bear.

Bearing the market is using every effort to depress the price of stocks in order to buy it. The arena of bears and bulls, i.e. the Stock Exchange.

Dr. Warton says the term bear came from the proverb of “Selling the skin before you have caught the bear,” and referred to those who entered into contracts in the South Sea Scheme to transfer stock at a stated price.

(See Bull.)

“So was the huntsman by the bear oppressed,

Whose hide he sold before he caught the beast.” Waller: Battle of the Summer Islands, c. ii.

A Bear account.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A speculation in stocks on the chance of a fall in the price of the stock sold, with a view of buying it back at a lower price or receiving the difference. (See Bulls.)

Bear

(The). Albert, margrave of Brandenburg. He was also called “The Fair” (1106—1170).

The bloody Bear, in Dryden's poem called The Hind and Panther, means the Independents.

“The bloody bear, an independent beast,

Unlicked to form, in groans her hate expressed.” Pt. i. 35, 36.

The Great Bear

and Little Bear. The constellations so called are specimens of a large class of blunders founded on approximate sounds. The Sanskrit rakh means “to be bright;” the Greeks corrupted the word into arktos, which means a bear; so that the “bear” should in reality be the “bright ones.” The fable is that Calisto, a nymph of Diana, had two sons by Jupiter, which Juno changed into bears, and Jupiter converted into constellations.

“The wind—shaked surge, with high and monstrous mane,

Seems to cast water on the burning bear,

And quench the guards of th'ever—fixed pole.” Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1.

“’Twas here we saw Calisto's star retire

Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire.”

Camoens: Lusiad, book v.

The Bear

or Northern Bear. Russia.

“France turns from her abandoned friends a fresh,

And soothes the bear that growls for patriot flesh.” Campbell: Poland, Stanza 5.

A Bridled Bear.

A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. (See Bear—Leader.) The Bear and Ragged Staff. A public—house sign in compliment to Warwick, the king—maker, whose cognisance it was. The first earl was Arth or Arthgal, of the Round Table, whose cognisance was a bear, because artk means a bear (Latin, urs'). Morvid, the second earl, overcame, in single combat, a mighty giant, who came against him with a club, which was a tree pulled up by the roots, but stripped of its branches. In remembrance of his victory over the giant he added “the ragged staff.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The Bear and the Tea—kettle

(Kamschatka). Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rage. One day a bear entered a hut in Kamschatka, where a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin went to the kettle, and smelling at it burnt his nose, being greatly irritated, he seized the kettle with his paws, and squeezed it against his breast. This, of course, made matters worse, for the boiling water scalded him terribly, and he growled in agony till some neighbours put an end to his life with their guns.

A bear sucking his paws.

It is said that when a bear is deprived of food, it sustains life by sucking its paws. The same is said of the English badger. Applied to industrious idleness.

As savage as a bear with a sore

(or scalt) head. Unreasonably ill—tempered. As a bear has no tail, for a lion he'll fail. The same as Ne sutor supra crepidam, "let not the cobbler aspire above his last." Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, being a descendant of the Warwick family, changed his own crest, which was "a green lion with two tails," for the Warwick crest, a "bear and ragged staff." When made governor of the Low Countries, he was suspected of aiming at absolute supremacy, or the desire of being the monarch of his fellows, as the lion is monarch among beasts. Some wit wrote under his crest the Latin verse, "Ursa caret cauda non queat esse leo."

"Your bear for lion needs must fail,

Because your true bears have no tail."

To take the bear by the tooth.

To put your head into the lion's mouth; needlessly to run into danger. You dare as soon take a bear by his tooth. You would no more attempt such a thing, than attempt to take a bear by its tooth.

Bear

(To). Come, bear a hand! Come and render help! In French, "Donner un coup à quelqu'un." Bring a hand, or bring your hand to bear on the work going on.

To bear arms.

To do military service. To bear away (Nautical). To keep away from the wind. To bear one company. To be one's companion.

"His faithful dog shall bear him company."

Pope: Essay on Man, epistle i. 112.

To bear down.

To overpower; to force down.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Fully prepared to bear down all resistance.”— Cooper: The Pilot, chap. xvii.

To bear down upon

(Nautical). To approach from the weather side.

To bear in mind.

Remember; do not forget. Carry in your recollection. “To learn by heart,” means to learn memoriter. Mind and heart stand for memory in both phrases.

To bear out.

To corroborate, to confirm. To bear up. To support; to keep the spirits up. To bear with. To show forbearance; to endure with complacency.

“How long shall I bear with this evil congregation?”—Numbers xiv. 27.

To bear the bell.

(See Bell.)

Bear of Bradwardine

(The) was a wine goblet, holding about an English pint, and, according to Scott, was made by command of St. Duthac, Abbot of Aberbrothoc, to be presented to the Baron of Bradwardine for services rendered in defence of the monastery. Inscribed upon the goblet was the motto: “Beware the bear.”

Bear Account

(A). (See Bear.)

Bear Garden

This place is a perfect bear—garden — that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult, and quarrels. Bear—gardens were places where bears used to be kept and baited for public amusement.

Bear—leader

One who undertakes the charge of a young man of rank on his travels. It was once customary to lead muzzled bears about the streets, and to make them show off in order to attract notice and gain money.

“Bear! [said Dr. Pangloss to his pupil]. Under favour, young gentleman, I am the bear—leader, being appointed your tutor.”— G. Colman: Heirat—Law.

Bears are caught by Honey In French, “Il faut avoir mauvaise bête par douceur, ” for, as La Fontaine says, “Plus fait douceur que violence.” Bears are very fond of honey. Bribes win even bears.

There is another phrase: Divide honey with a bear, i.e. It is better to divide your honey with a bear than to provoke its anger.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Beard

Cutting the beard. The Turks think it a dire disgrace to have the beard cut. Slaves who serve in the seraglio have clean chins, as a sign of their servitude.

Kissing the beard.

In Turkey wives kiss their husband, and children their father on the beard. To make one's beard (Chaucer). This is the French "Faire la barbe à quelqu'un," and refers to a barber's taking hold of a man's beard to dress it, or to his shaving the chin of a customer. To make one's beard is to have him wholly at your mercy.

I told him to his beard.

I told him to his face, regardless of consequences; to speak openly and fearlessly.

Beard

(To). To beard one is to defy him, to contradict him flatly, to insult by plucking the beard. Among the Jews, no greater insult could be offered to a man than to pluck or even touch his beard.

To beard the lion in his den.

To contradict one either in his own growlery, or on some subject he has made his hobby. To defy personally or face to face.

"Dar'st thou, then,

To beard the lion in his den,

The Douglas in his hall?"

Sir W. Scott: Marmion, canto vi. stanza 14."

Maugre his beard.

In spite of him. To laugh at one's beard. To attempt to make a fool of a person— to deceive by ridiculous exaggeration.

"`By the prophet! but he laughs at our beards,' exclaimed the Pacha angrily. `These are foolish lies.'"—Marryat: Pacha of Many Tales.

To laugh in one's beard ["Rire dans sa barbe"] To laugh in one's sleeve. To run in one's beard. To offer opposition to a person; to do something obnoxious to a person before his face. The French say, "à la barbe de quelqu'un," under one's very nose.

With the beard on the shoulder

(Spanish). In the attitude of listening to overhear something; with circumspection, looking in all directions for surprises and ambushes.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“They rode, as the Spanish proverb expresses it, ‘with the beard on the shoulder,’ looking round from time to time, and using every precaution ... against pursuit.”— Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. vii.

Tax upon beards.

Peter the Great imposed a tax upon beards. Every one above the lowest class had to pay 100 roubles, and the lowest class had to pay a copec, for enjoying this “luxury.” Clerks were stationed at the gates of every town to collect the beard—tax.

Bearded

Bearded Master (Magister barbatus). So Persius styled Socrates, under the notion that the beard is the symbol of wisdom. (B.C.468—399.)

Pogonatus

(Bearded). Constantine IV., Emperor of Rome (648, 668—685). The Bearded. Geoffrey the Crusader, and Bouchard of the house of Montmorency. Handsome—beard. Baldwin IV., Earl of Flanders. (1160—1186.)

John the Bearded.

Johann Mayo, the German painter, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright.

Bearded Women:

Bartel Grætjé, of Stuttgard, born 1562.

The Duke of Saxony had the portrait taken of a poor Swiss woman, remarkable for her large bushy beard. In 1726 a female dancer appeared at Venice, with a large bushy beard.

Charles XII. had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, and presented to the Czar, 1724.

Mlle. Bois de Chêne, born at Geneva in 1834, was exhibited in London in 1852—3; she had a profuse head of hair, a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and back.

Julia Pastrana was exhibited in London in 1857; died, 1862, at Moscow; was embalmed by Professor Suckaloff; and the embalmed body was exhibited at 191, Piccadilly. She was found among the Digger Indians of Mexico.

Margaret of Holland had a long, stiff beard.

Bearings

I'll bring him to his bearings. I'll bring him to his senses. A sea term. The bearings of a ship at anchor is that part of her hull which is on the water—line when she is in good trim. To bring a ship to her bearings is to get her into this trim. (Dana: The Seaman's Manual, 84.)

To lose one's bearings.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To become bewildered; to get perplexed as to which is the right road. To take the bearings. To ascertain the relative position of some object.

Bearnais

(Le). Henri IV. of France; so called from Le Bearn, his native province (1553—1610).

Beasts

(Heraldic):

Couchant,

lying down. Counter—passant, moving in opposite directions. Dormant, sleeping.

Gardant,

full—faced. Issuant, rising from the top or bottom of an ordinary. Nascent, rising out of the middle of an ordinary. Passant, walking.

Passant gardant,

walking, and with full face. Passant regardant, walking and looking behind. Rampant, rearing.

Regardant,

looking back. Sejant, seated.

Salient,

springing. Statant, standing still.

Beastly Drunk

It was an ancient notion that men in their cups exhibited the vicious qualities of beasts. Nash describes seven kinds of drunkards:— (1) The Ape—drunk, who leaps and sings; (2) The Lion—drunk, who is quarrelsome; (3) The Swine—drunk, who is sleepy and puking; (4) The Sheep—drunk, wise in his own conceit, but unable to speak, (5) The Martin—drunk, who drinks himself sober again; (6) The Goat—drunk, who is lascivious; and (7) The Fox—drunk, who is crafty, like a Dutchman in his cups. [See Maudlin.]

Beat

A track, line, or appointed range. A walk often trodden or beaten by the feet, as a policeman's boat. The word means a beaten path.

Not in my beat.

Not in my line; not in the range of my talents or inclination. Off his beat. Not on duty; not in his appointed walk; not his speciality or line.

“Off his own beat his opinions were of no value.”— Emerson: English Traits, chap. i.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

On his beat.

In his appointed walk; on duty.

Out of his beat.

In his wrong walk; out of his proper sphere. To beat up one's quarters. To hunt out where one lives; to visit without ceremony. A military term, signifying to make an unexpected attack on an enemy in camp.

“To beat up the quarters of some of our less—known relations.”— Lamb: Essays of Elta.

Beat

(To). To strike. (Anglo—Saxon, beatan.)

To beat an alarm.

To give notice of danger by beat of drum.

To beat

or drum a thing into one. To repeat as a drummer repeats his strokes on a drum. To beat a retreat (French, battre en retraite); to beat to arms; to beat a charge. Military terms similar to the above.

To beat the air.

To strike out at nothing, merely to bring one's muscles into play, as pugilists do before they begin to fight; to toil without profit, to work to no purpose.

“So fight I, not as one that beateth the air.”— I Cor. ix. 26.

To beat the bush.

One beat the bush and another caught the hare. “Il a battu les buissons, et autre a pris les oiseaux.” “Il bat le buisson sans prendre les oisillons” is a slightly different idea, meaning he has toiled in vain. “Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours” (John iv. 48). The allusion is to beaters, whose business it is to beat the bushes and start the game for a shooting party.

To beat the Devil's Tattoo.

(See Tattoo.) To beat the Dutch. To draw a very long bow; to say something very incredible.

“Well! if that don't beat the Dutch!”

To beat time. To mark time in music by beating or moving the hands, feet, or a wand. To beat up supporters. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are by beat of drum.

Beat

(To). To overcome or get the better of. This does not mean to strike, which is the Anglo—Saxon beátan, but to better, to be better, from the Anglo—Saxon verb bétan.

Dead beat.

So completely beaten or worsted as to have no leg to stand on. Like a dead man with no fight left in him; quite tired out.

“I'm dead beat, but I thought I'd like to come in and see you all once more.”— Roe: Without a Home, p. 32.

Dead beat escapement

(of a watch). One in which there is no reverse motion of the escape—wheel. That beats Banagher.

Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd — exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in King's County. It formerly sent two members to Parliament, and was, of course, a famous pocket borough. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the lord, it was not unusual to reply, “Well, that beats Banagher.”

“ ‘Well,' says he, `to gratify them I will. So just a morsel. But, Jack, this beats Bannagher' (sic).” — W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 196.

That beats Termagant.

Your ranting, raging promposity, or exaggeration, surpasses that of Termagant (q.v.). To beat hollow is to beat wholly, to be wholly the superior.

To beat up against the wind.

To tack against an adverse wind; to get the better of the wind.

Beat

(French, abattre, to abate.)

To beat down.

To make a seller “abate” his price.

Beaten to a Mummy

Beaten so that one can distinguish neither form nor feature.

Beaten with his own Staff

Confuted by one's own words. An argumentum ad hominem.

“Can High Church bigotry go father than this? And how well have I since been beaten with mine own staff.”— J Wesley. (He refers to his excluding Bolzious from “the Lord's table,” because he had not been canonically baptized.)

Beating about the Bush

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Not coming directly to the matter in hand, but feeling your way timidly by indirection, as persons beat bushes to ascertain if game is lurking under them.

Beating the Bounds

On Holy Thursday, or Ascension Day, it used to be customary for the parish school children, accompanied by the clergymen and parish officers, to walk through their parish from end to end. The boys were struck with willow wands all along the lines of boundary. Before maps were common, the boys were thus taught to know the bounds of their own parish. The custom still prevails in some parishes.

Beati Possidentes

Blessed are those who have [for they shall receive]. "Possession is nine points of the law."

Beatific Vision

The sight of the Deity, or of the blessed in the realms of heaven. (See Isaiah vi. 1—4, and Acts vii. 55, 56.)

Beatrice

beloved from girlhood by Dante, a native of Florence, was of the Portinari family. She died under twenty—four years of age (1266—1290). Beatrice married Simone de' Bardi, and Dante married Gemma Donati.

Beau

Beau Brummel. George Bryan. (1778—1840.) Le Beau D'Orsay. Father of Count D'Orsay, and called by Byron Jeune Cupidon. Beau Fielding, called "Handsome Fielding" by Charles II., whose name was Hendrome Fielding. He died in Scotland Yard, London.

Beau Hewitt.

The "Sir Fopling Flutter" of Etheredge. (The Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter. Beau Nash. Son of a Welsh gentleman, a notorious diner—out. He under—took the management of the bath—rooms at Bath, and conducted the public balls with a splendour and decorum never before witnessed. In old age he sank into poverty. (1674—1761.)

Beau Tibbs

noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty. (Goldsmith: Citizen of the World.)

Beau Ideal

The model of beauty or excellency formed by fancy.

Beau Jour beau Retour

(A). My turn will come next. (Never used in a good sense, but always to signify the resentment of an injury.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Beau Lion

(Un). A fine dashing fellow; an aristocrat every inch; the “lion” of society. The lion is the king of beasts.

Beau Monde

The fashionable world: people who make up the coterie of fashion.

Beau Trap

A loose pavement under which water lodges, and which squirts up filth when trodden on, to the annoyance of the smartly dressed.

Beauclerc

[good scholar]. Applied to Henry I., who had clerk—like accomplishments, very rare in the times in which he lived (1068, 1100—1135).

Beaumontague

[pronounce bo—mon—taig]. Bad work, especially ill—fitting carpenter's work; literary padding; paste and scissors literature; so called from putty used by carpenters, etc., for filling up cracks and bad joinery. German, teig, dough; and Emile Beaumont, the geologist (1798—1851), who also gives his name to “Beaumontite.”

Beautiful

Beautiful or fair as an angel. Throughout the Middle Ages it was common to associate beauty with virtue, and ugliness with sin; hence the expressions given above, and the following also — “Seraphic beauty,” “Cherubic loveliness,” “Ugly as sin,” etc.

Beautiful Parricide

Beatrice Cenci, the daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father because he violently defiled her. (Died 1599.)

“Francesco Cenci (xvi. siècle) ... avait quatre fills et une fille (Béatrix). Il les maltraitait cruellement, ou les faisait servir à ses plaisirs brutaux ... Révoltée de tant d'horreurs, Bèatrix, sa fille, de concert avec deux de ses frerès, et Lucrece leur mere, fit assassiner Francesco Cenci. Accusés de parricide, ils périrent tous quatre sur pechafaud par la sentence de Clément VIII. (1605).”—Bouillet.

This is Muratori's version of the affair, but it is much disputed. It is a favourite theme for tragedy.

Beauty

Tout est beau sans chandelles. “La nuit tous les chats sont gris.” Beauty is but skin deep.

“O formose puer, nimium ne crede colori.”

Virgil, Bucolics,

ii.

Beauty and the Beast

The hero and heroine of Madame Villeneuve's fairy tale. Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast; and the Beast, being disenchanted by Beauty's love, became a handsome prince, and married her. (Contes Marines, 1740.)

A handsome woman with an uncouth or uncomely male companion.

Beauty of Buttermere

Mary Robinson, married to John Hatfield, a heartless impostor, executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803.

Beauty Sleep

Sleep taken before midnight. Those who habitually go to bed, especially during youth, after midnight, are usually pale and more or less haggard.

“Would I please to remember that I had roused him up at night ... [in] his beauty sleep.” — Blackmore: Lorna Doone, chap. 64.

Beaux Esprits

(French). Men of wit or genius (singular number, Un bel esprit, a wit, a genius).

Beaux Yeux

(French). Beautiful eyes or attractive looks. “I will do it for your beaux yeux” (because you are so pretty, or because your eyes are so attractive).

Beaver

A hat; so called from its being made of beaver—skins.

Beaver

That part of the helmet which lifted up to enable the wearer to drink. Similarly bever, the afternoon draught in the harvest—field, called fours's. (Italian, bevere, to drink; Spanish, beber; Latin, bibo; French, buveur, a drinker; Armoric, beuvrauh, beverage, etc.)

“Hamlet:

Then you saw not his face? “Horatio: O, yes, my lord; he wore his beaver up.” Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.

Becarre, Bemol

Sauter de bécarre en bémol (French), to jump from one subject to another without regard to pertinence; “Sauter du coq à l'ane,” from Genesis to Revelation. Literally, to jump from sharps to flats. Becarre is the Latin B quadratum or B quarré. In old musical notation B sharp was expressed by a square B, and B flat by a round B.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bémol is B mollis, soft (flat).

Becasse

You goose; you simpleton; you booby. Bécasse is a woodcock. "C'est une becasse," he or she is a fool.

Becket's Assassins

William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, Richard Brito (or le Bret), and Fitz—Urse.

Bed

The great bed of Ware. A bed twelve feet square, and capable of holding twelve persons; assigned by tradition to the Earl of Warwick, the king—maker. It is now in Rye House.

"Although the sheet were big enough for the bed of Ware in England."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

To make the bed. To arrange it and make it fit for use. In America this sense of "make" is much more common than it is with us. "Your room is made," arranged in—due order. To make it all right.

As you make your bed you must lie on it.

Everyone must bear the consequences of his own acts. "As you sow, so must you reap." "As you brew, so must you bake."

To bed out.

To plant what are called "bedding—out plants" in a flower—bed. Bedding—out plants are reared in pots, generally in a hot—house, and are transferred into garden—beds early in the summer. Such plants as geraniums, marguerites, fuchsias, penstemons, petunias, verbenas, lobelias, calceolarias, etc., are meant.

You got out of bed the wrong way, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is patchy and ill—tempered. It was an ancient superstition that it was unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first on getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first, a "fancy" not yet wholly exploded.

Augustus Caesar was very superstitious in this respect.

Bed of Justice

(See Lit .)

Bed of Roses

(A). A situation of ease and pleasure.

Bed of Thorns

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A situation of great anxiety and apprehension.

Bed—post

In the twinkling of a bed—post. As quickly as possible. In the ancient bed—frames movable staves were laid as we now lay iron laths; there were also staves in the two sides of the bedstead for keeping the bed—clothes from rolling off; and in some cases a staff was used to beat the bed and clean it. In the reign of Edward I., Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish with his servant (Sir John with his rapier and the servant with the bed—staff), in which the servant was accidentally killed. Wright, in his Domestic Manners, shows us a chamber—maid of the seventeenth century using a bed—staff to beat up the bedding. “Twinkling” means a rapid twist or turn. (Old French, guincher: Welsh, gwing, gwingaw, our wriggle.)

“Ill do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed—staff.”— Shadwell: Virtuoso, 1676.

“He would have cut him down in the twinkling of a bed—post.”— “Rabelais,” done into English.

Bobadil, in Every Man in his Humour, and Lord Duberley, in the Heir—at—Law, use the same expression.

Bede

(Adam). A novel by George Eliot (Marian Evans), 1859. One of the chief characters is Mrs. Poyser, a woman of shrewd observation, and as full of wise saws as Sancho Panza.

Bedell

The Vice—chancellor's bedell (not beadle). The officer who carries the mace before the Vice—Chancellor, etc., in the universities is not a beadle but a bedell (the same word in an older form).

Beder

A valley famous for the victory gained by Mahomet, in which “he was assisted by 3,000 angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Haizum.” (Al Koran).

Beder.

King of Persia, who married Giauha'rê daughter of the most powerful of the under—sea emperors. Queen Labê tried to change him into a horse, but he changed her into a mare instead. (Arabian Nights, “Beder and Giauharê.”)

Bedford

Saxon, Bedean—forda (fortress ford)— that is, the ford at the fortress of the river Ouse.

Bedford Level

Land drained by the Earl of Bedford in 1649. This large tract of fenny land lay in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire.

Bedfordshire I am off to Bedfordshire. To the land of Nod, to bed. The language abounds with these puns, e.g. “the marrowbone stage,” “A Dunse scholar,” “Knight of the beerbarrel,” “Admiral of the blue,” “Master of the Mint” (q.v.), “Master of the Rolls” (q.v.), etc. And the French even more than the English.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bediver

A knight of the Round Table, and the butler of King Arthur.

Bedlam

A lunatic asylum or madhouse; a contraction for Bethlehem, the name of a religious house in London, converted into a hospital for lunatics.

Tom o' Bedlam. (See

Tom.)

St. Mary of Bethlehem, London, was founded as a priory in 1247, and in 1547 it was given to the mayor and corporation of London, and incorporated as a royal foundation for lunatics.

Bedlamite

(3 syl.). A madman, a fool, an inhabitant of a Bedlam.

Bedouins

[Bed—wins]. The homeless street poor are so called. Thus the Times calls the ragged, houseless boys “the Bedouins of London” The Bedouins are the nomadic tribes of Arabia (Arabic, bedawin, a dweller in a desert; badw, a desert). (See Street Arabs .)

“These Bedouins of the prairie invariably carry their lodges with them.”— A. D. Richardson: Beyond the Mississippi, chap. v.

Bedreddin' Hassan

in the story of Noureddin' and his Son, in the Arabian Nights.

“Comparing herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier ... discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream—tarts without pepper in them.”— Scott: Heart of Midlothian.

Bed—rock

American slang for one's last shilling. A miner's term, called in England the “stone—head,” and in America, the “Bed—rock,” the hard basis rock. When miners get to this bed the mine is exhausted. “I'm come down to the bed—rock,” i.e. my last dollar.

“`No, no!' continued Tennessee's partner, hastily, `Ill play this yer hand alone. I've come down to the bed—rock; it's just this: Tennessee, thar, has played it pretty rough and expensive, like, on a stranger ... Now what's the fair thing? Some would say more, and some would say less. Here's seventeen hundred dollars in coarse gold and a watch— it's about all my pile— and call it square.’”— Bret Harte; Tennessee's Partner.

Bedver

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

King Arthur's butler; Caius or Kaye was his sewer. (Geoffrey: British History, ix. 13.)

The Athenian Bee. Plato. (See Athenian Bee, page 72, col. 1.)

It is said that when Plato was in his cradle, a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth. The story is good enough for poets and orators. The same tale is told of St. Ambrose. (See Ambrose, page 41, col. 1.)

The Bee of Athens.

Xenophon (B.C. 444—359) is also called “the Bee of Athens,” or “the Athenian Bee.”

See

also Animals, page 50, col. 2.

To have your head full of bees.

Full of devices, crotchets, fancies, inventions, and dreamy theories. The connection between bees and the soul was once generally maintained: hence Mahomet admits bees to Paradise. Porphyry says of fountains, “they are adapted to the nymphs, or those souls which the ancients called bees.” The moon was called a bee by the priestesses of Ceres, and the word lunatic or moon—struck still means one with “bees in his head.”

Il a des rats dans la tête.”— French Proverb. (See Maggot.)

To have a bee in your bonnet.

To be cranky; to have an idiosyncrasy; also, to carry a jewel or ornament in your cap. (See Bighes.)

“For pity, air, find out that bee

That bore my love away—

’I’ll seek him in your bonnet brave. ...”

Herrick: The Mad Maid's Song.

Bee

A social gathering for some useful work. The object generally precedes the word, as a spelling — bee (a gathering to compete in spelling). There are apple—bees, husking—bees, and half a dozen other sorts of bees or gatherings. It is an old Devonshire custom, which was carried across the Atlantic in Elizabethan times.

Bee—line

The line that a bee, takes in making for the hive; the shortest distance between two given points.

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Our footmarks, seen afterwards, showed that we had steered a bee—line to the brig.”— Kane: Arctic Explorations, vol. i. chap. xvii. p. 198.

Bees

Jupiter was nourished by bees in infancy. (See Athenian Bee, p. 72, col. 1.) Pindar is said to have been nourished by bees with honey instead of milk.

The coins of Ephesus had a bee on the reverse.

The Greeks consecrated bees to the moon.

With the Romans a flight of bees was considered a bad omen. Appian (Civil War, book ii.) says a swarm of bees lighted on the altar and prognosticated the fatal issue of the battle of Pharsalia.

The priestesses of Ceres were called bees.

In Christian Art St. Ambrose is represented with a beehive, from the tradition that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth in his infancy.

Beef

Ox The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. The Normans had the cooked meat, and when set before them used the word they were accustomed to. The Saxon was the herdsman, and while the beast was under his charge called it by its Saxon name.

“Old Alderman Ox continues to hold his Saxon title while he is under the charge of serfs and bondsmen; but becomes Beef, a fiery French gallant, when he arrives before the worshipful jaws that are destined to consume him.”— Ivanhoe.

Weaver's beef of Colchester, i.e. sprats, caught abundantly in the neighbourhood. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Beefeaters

Yeomen of the Guard in the royal household, appointed, in 1485, by Henry VII., to form part of the royal train in banquets and other grand occasions. The old theory was that the word means “an attendant on the royal buffets,” Anglicised into buffeters or buffeteers, and corrupted into Beefeaters; but Professor Skeat says no such word as buffeter has yet been found in any book; nor does buffetier exist in French.

A plausible reply to this objection is that the word may have got corrupted almost ab initio in those unlettered days; and the earliest quotation of “Beefeater,” already adduced, is above 150 years from the institution of the force, and even then the allusions are either satirical or humorous: as “Begone, yee greedy beefe—eaters, y' are best” (Histrionastix, iii. 1; A.D. 1610); “Bows, or Beefeaters, as the French were pleased to terme us” (1628); “You beef—eater, you saucy cur” (1671). Not one of the quotations fixes the word on the Yeomen of the Guard, and that the English have been called Beefeaters none will deny. Even if the allusion given above could be certainly affixed to Yeomen of the Guard it would only prove that 150 or 160 years after their establishment in the palace they were so called (corruptly, humorously or otherwise).

Arguments in favour of the old derivations:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

— (1) Certainly Henry VII. himself did not call these yeomen “beef—eaters.” He was as much French as Welsh, and must have been familiar with the buffet (bu—fey); he had no spark of humour in his constitution, and it is extremely doubtful whether beef was a standing dish at the time, certainly it was not so in Wales. We have a good number of menus extant of the period, but beef does not appear in any of them.

(2) We have a host of similar corruptions in our language, as Andrew Macs (q.v.), Billy—ruffians (see Bellerophon), Bull and Mouth (q.v.), Charles's Wain (q.v.), Bag—o'—Nails, Goat and Compasses,

Sparrow—grass (asparagus), ancient (ensign), lutestring (lustring, from lustre), Dog—cheap (god—kepe, i.e. a good bargain), and many more of the same sort.

(3) There can be no doubt that the “beefeaters” waited at the royal table, for in 1602 we read that “the dishes were brought in by the halberdiers [beefeaters], who are fine, big fellows” (quoted in Notes and Queries, February 4th, 1893, p. 86).

(4) If beef was a general food in the sixteenth century, which is extremely doubtful, it would be supremely ridiculous to call a few yeomen “eaters of beef,” unless beef was restricted to them. In the present Argentine Republic, beef dried, called “jerked beef,” is the common diet, and it would be foolish indeed to restrict the phrase “eaters of jerked beef” to some halfscore waiters at the President's table.

(5) That the word buffeteer or buffetier is not to be found (in the English sense) in any—French author, does not prove that it was never used in Anglo—French. We have scores of perverted French words, with English meanings, unrecognised by the French; for example: encore, double entendre, surtout (a frock coat), epergne, and so on.

(6) Historic etymology has its value, but, like all other general rules, it requires to be narrowly watched, or it may not unfrequently over—ride the truth. Historically, Rome comes from Romulus, Scotland from Scota or Scotia, Britain from Brutus. All sorts of rubbishy etymology belong to the historic craze.

Beefeaters.

Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard appointed as warders of the Tower by Edward VI. They wear the same costume as the Yeomen of the Guard mentioned above. (See Buphagos.)

Beef—steak Club

owed its origin to an accidental dinner taken by Lord Peterborough in the scene—room of Rich, over Covent Garden Theatre. The original gridiron on which Rich broiled the peer's steak is still preserved in the palladium of the club, and the members have it engraved on their buttons. (History of the Clubs of London.) or Milor Beefington, a character in Canning's mock tragedy, The Rovers, a burlesque, in the Anti—Jacobin, on the sentimental German dramas of the period. Casimere is a Polish emigrant, and Beefington an English nobleman, exiled by the tyranny of King John.

Beefington

Beelzebub

God of flies, supposed to ward off flies from his votaries. One of the gods of the Philistines. (See Achor .) The Greeks had a similar deity, Zeus Apomyios. The Jews, by way of reproach, changed Beelzebub into Baal Zeboub (q.v.), and placed him among the dæmons. Milton says he was next in rank to Satan, and stood

“With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear

The weight of mightiest monarchies.” (Book ii.)

“One next himself in power, and next in crime,

Long after known in Palestine, and named

Beëlzebub.” Paradise Lost, i. 79—81.

Beer Ceres, when wandering over the earth in quest of her daughter, taught men the art of making beer, because “ils me ne purent apprendre l'art de faire le vin.” (Mem. de l'Academis des Inscriptions, xvii.) (See Ale.)

He does not think small beer of himself. [See

Small Beer].

Beer and Skittles

Life is not all beer and skittles, i.e. not all eating, drinking, and play; not all pleasure; not all harmony and love.

“Sport like life, and life like sport,

Isn't all skittles and beer.”

Beer aux Mouches

or Beer aux corneilles. To stand gaping in the air (at the flies or the rooks). Béer, Old French for bayer, to gape.

Beeswing

The film which forms on the sides of a bottle of good old port. This film, broken up into small pieces, looks like the wings of bees. A port drinker is very particular not to “break the beeswing” by shaking the bottle, or turning it the wrong way up.

Beeswinged port is old port which has formed its second crust or beeswing.

Beetle

(To). To overhang, to threaten, to jut over (Anglo—Saxon, beot—ian, to menace). Hence beetle or beetled brow.

“Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff,

That beetles o'er his base into the sea.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 4.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Beetle—crusher

A large, flat foot. The expression was first used in Punch, in one of Leech's caricatures. Those who know London know how it is overrun with cockroaches, wrongly called black—beetles.

Befana

The good fairy of Italian children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night. Some one enters the children's bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "Ecco la Befana." According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to look after the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Befana, every Twelfth Night, watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Before the Lights

in theatrical parlance, means on the stage, before the foot—lights.

Before the Mast

To serve before the mast. To be one of the common sailors, whose quarters are in the forward part of the ship. The half—deck is the sanctum of the second mate, and, in Greenland fishers, of the spikeoneer, harpooners, carpenters, coopers, boatswains, and all secondary officers; of low birth.

"I myself come from before the mast."— Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xx.

Beg the Question

(To). (See Begging .)

Beggar

A beggar may sing before a pickpocket. (In Latin, "Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator.") A beggar may sing before a highwayman because he has nothing in his pocket to lose.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the de'il.

There is no one so proud and arrogant as a beggar who has suddenly grown rich.

"Such is the sad effect of wealth— rank pride—

Mount but a beggar, how the rogue will ride!"

Peter Pindar: Epistle to Lord Lonsdale.

Latin: "Asperius nihil est humili cum surgit in altum."

French:

"Il n'est orgueil que de pauvre enrichi." Italian: "Il vilan nobilitado non conosce il parentado" (A beggar ennobled does not know his own kinsmen).

Spanish:

“Quando el villano está en el mulo, non conoze a dios, ni al mundo” (when a beggar is mounted on a mule, he knows neither gods nor men).

Beggars

King of the Beggars. Bampfylde Moore Carew (1693—1770).

Beggars should not be choosers.

Beggars should take what is given them, and not dictate to the giver what they like best. They must accept and be thankful.

Beggars' Barm

The thick foam which collects on the surface of ponds, brooks, and other pieces of water where the current meets stoppage. It looks like barm or yeast, but, being unfit for use, is only beggarly barm at best.

Beggars' Bullets

Stones.

Beggar's Bush

To go by beggar's bush, or Go home by beggar's bush — i.e. to go to ruin. Beggar's bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton; so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. These punning phrases and proverbs are very common.

Beggar's Daughter

Bessee, the beggar's daughter of Bednall Green. Bessee was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once— a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the inn—keeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bethnal Green. When they heard that, they all slunk off except the knight, who went to ask the beggar's leave to wed the “pretty Bessee.” The beggar gave her 100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort. At the battle of Evesham the barons were routed, Montfort slain, and himself left on the field for dead. A baron's daughter discovered him; nursed him with care, and married him; the fruit of this marriage was “pretty Bessee.” Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a beggar to escape the vigilance of King Henry's spies. (Percy: Reliques.) were of the Augustine order; they renounced all property, and lived on the voluntary alms of “the faithful.”

Begging Hermits

Begging Friars

were restricted to four orders: Franciscans (Grey Friars). Augustines (Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Dominicans (Preaching Friars).

Begging the Question

Assuming a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is a translation of the Latin term, petitio principii, and was first used by Aristotle.

Beghards

A brotherhood which rose in the Low Countries in the twelfth century, and was so called from Lambert Bégue. The male society were Beghards, the female, Beguins. They took no vows, and were free to leave the society when they liked. In the seventeenth century, those who survived the persecutions of the popes and inquisition joined the Tertiarii of the Franciscans. (See Beguins .)

Begtashi

A religious order in the Ottoman Empire, which had its origin in the fourteenth century. The word is derived from Hadji Begtash, a dervish, its founder.

Begue d'entendement

This is a really happy phrase for one whose wits are gone wool—gathering; he is a man of “stammering understanding.”

Beguins

A sisterhood instituted in the twelfth century, founded by Lambert Bégue or Lambert le Bègue. The members of the male society were called Beghards (q.v.). The Béguins were at liberty to quit the cloister, if they chose, and marry. The cap called a beguin was named from this sisterhood.

“Secta quædam pestifera illorum qui Beguini vulgariter appellantur, qui se Fratres Pauperes de tertia ordine S. Francisci communiter nominabant, ex quibus plures fuerunt tanquam hæretici condemnati et combusti.” — Bernard Guido: Life of John, xxii.

Begum

A lady, princess, or woman of high rank in India; the wife of a ruler. (Bey or Beg, governor of a Turkish province, a title of honour.)

Behemoth

(Hebrew). The hippopotamus; once thought to be the rhinoceros. (See Job xl. 15.)

“Behold! in plaited mail,

Behemoth rears his head.”

Thomson: Summer, 709, 710.

The word is generally, but incorrectly, pronounced Behemoth; but Milton, like Thomson, places the accent on the second syllable.

“Scarce from his mold

Behemoth, biggest born of earth, upheaved

His vastness.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

vii, 471.

Behmenists

A sect of visionary religionists, so called from Jacob Behmen (Böhme), their founder. (1575—1625.)

Behram The most holy kind of fire, according to Parseeism. (See Adaran .)

Bejan

A freshman or greenhorn. This term is employed in the French and Scotch universities, and is evidently a corruption of bec jaune (yellow beak), a French expression to designate a nestling or unfledged bird. In the university of Vienna the freshman is termed beanus, and in France footing—money is bejaunia.

“His grandmother yielded, and Robert was straightway a bejan or yellow—beak.” — Macdonald: R. Falconer.

Bel—a—faire—peur

A handsome, dare—devil of a fellow.

Bel Esprit

(French). A vivacious wit; a man or woman of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee. (Plural, beaux esprits.)

Belch

Sir Toby Belch. A reckless, roistering, jolly knight of the Elizabethan period. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night.)

Belcher

A pocket—handkerchief— properly, a blue ground with white spots; so called from Jim Belcher, the pugilist, who adopted it.

Beldam

An old woman; literally, a grandmother. The French also use bel age for old age.

“Old men and beldames in the streets

Do prophesy upon it dangerously.”

Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

Beleses

(3 syl.). A Chaldean soothsayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arbaces, governor of Media, that he would one day sit on the throne of Sardanapalus. King of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by Arbaces with the government of Babylon. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Belfast Regiment

(The). The 35th Foot, which was raised in Belfast in 1701. There is no such regiment now in the British Army. What used to be called No. 35 is now called the 1st battalion of the Royal Sussex, the 2nd battalion being the old No. 107.

Bel—fires

Between Bel's two fires. Scylla on one side and Charybdis on the other. In Irish, Itter dha teine Bheil, in a dilemma. The reference is to the two fires kindled on May Eve in every village, between which all men and beasts devoted to sacrifice were compelled to pass.

Belford

A friend of Lovelace in Richardson's Clarissa Harlowe. These "friends" made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.

Belfry

A military tower, pushed by besiegers against the wall of a besieged city, that missiles may be thrown more easily against the defenders. Probably a church steeple is called a belfry from its resemblance to these towers, and not because bells are hung in it. (French, beffroi, a watch—tower, Old French, berfreit, belefreit, from German, berg—frit, bergen, to protect, frit [vride], a place fenced in for security.)

"Alone, and warming his five wits,

The white owl in the belfry sits."

Tennyson: The Owl, stanza 1.

Belial (Hebrew). The worthless or lawless one, i.e. the devil. Milton, in his pandemonium, makes him a very high and distinguished prince of darkness. (Paradise Lost.)

"What concord hath Christ with Belial?" — 2 Cor. vi. 15.

"Belial came last— than whom a spirit more lewd

Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love

Vice for itself."

Milton: Paradise Lost,

book i. 490—2.

Sons of Belial.

Lawless, worthless, rebellious people. (See above.)

“Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial.” — 1 Sam. ii. 12.

Belinda

The heroine of Pope's serio—comical poem, entitled the Rape of the Lock. The poem is based on a real incident:— Lord Petre cut off a lock of Miss Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to a bitter feud between the two noble families. The poet says that Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa. Belinda, in anger, demanded back the ringlet; but it had flown to the skies and become a meteor, which “shot through liquid air, and drew behind a radiant trail of hair.” (See Berenice.)

Belinuncia

A herb sacred to Belis, with the juice of which the Gauls used to poison their arrows.

Belisarius

Belisarius begging for an obolus. Belisarius, the greatest of Justinian's generals, being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, was deprived of all his property; and his eyes being put out, he lived a beggar in Constantinople. The tale is that he fastened a bag to his road—side hut, and had inscribed over it, “Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius.” This tradition is of no historic value.

Bell

Acton, Currer, and Ellis. Assumed names of Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë.

Bell

As the bell clinks, so the fool thinks, or, As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. The tale says when Whittington ran away from his master, and had got as far as Hounslow Heath, he was hungry, tired, and wished to return. Bow Bells began to ring, and Whittington fancied they said, “Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London.” The bells clinked in response to the boy's thoughts. “Les gens de peu de jugement sont comme les cloches, à qui Von fait dire tout ce que Von veut.” Dickens has the same idea in his Christmas Chimes.

The Passing Bell

is the hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits which were supposed to lurk about the dying, to pounce on the soul while “passing from the body to its resting—place.” A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood the fact that all good Christians might offer up a prayer for the safe passage of the dying person into Paradise. We now call the bell rung at a person's decease the “passing bell.”

The Athenians used to beat on brazen kettles at the moment of a decease to scare away the Furies.

Ringling the hallowed bell.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bells were believed to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils, and extinguish fire. In France it is still by no means unusual to ring church bells to ward off the effects of lightning. Nor is this peculiar to France, for even in 1852 the Bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour to “lay a gale of wind.” Of course, the supposed efficacy of a bell resides in its having been consecrated.

“Funera plango, fulgura frango, sabbata pango,

Excito lentos, dissipo ventos, paco cruentos.”

(Death's tale I tell, the winds dispel, ill—feeling quell,

The slothful shake, the storm—clouds break, the Sabbath wake. E.C.B.)

Sound as a bell. (See Similes.)

Tolling the bell.

(for church). A relic of the Ave Bell, which, before the Reformation, was tolled before service to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

To bear the bell.

To be first fiddle; to carry off the palm; to be the best. Before cups were presented to winners of horse—races, etc., a little gold or silver bell used to be given for the prize.

“Jockey and his horse were by their masters sent

To put in for the bell...

They are to run and cannot miss the bell.”

North: Forest of Varieties.

It does not refer to bell—wethers, or the leading horse of a team, but “bear” means bear or carry off.

Who is to bell the cat?

Who will risk his own life to save his neighbours? Any one who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to “bell the cat.” The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse, who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. “Excellent,” said a wise young mouse, “but who is to undertake the job?” (See Bell—The—Cat.)

“Is there a man in all Spain able and willing to bell the cat [i.e. persuade the queen to abdicate]?” — The Times.

Bells

The Koran says that bells hang on the trees of Paradise, and are set in motion by wind from the throne of God, as often as the blessed wish for music. (Sale.)

“Bells as musical

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

As those that, on the golden—shafted trees

Of Eden, shook by the eternal breeze.”

T. Moore: Lalla Rookh,

part i.

At three bells, at five bells, etc. A term on board ship pretty nearly tantamount to our expression o'clock. Five out of the seven watches last four hours, and each half—hour is marked by a bell, which gives a number of strokes corresponding to the number of half—hours passed. Thus, “three bells” denotes the third half—hour of the watch, “five bells” the fifth half—hour of the watch, and so on. The two short watches, which last only two hours each, are from four to six and six to eight in the afternoon. At eight bells a new watch begins. (See Watch.)

“Do you there hear? Clean shirt and a shave for muster at five bells.”— Basil Hall.

I'll not hang all my bells on one horse. I'll not leave all my property to one son. The allusion is manifest. Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of the matter, but do not attempt to bolster it up. When a hawk was worthless, the bells were taken off, and the bird was suffered to escape, but the advice given above is to “leave the bells” and let the hawk go.

Ring the bells backwards, is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote “in a contrary direction” (tout le contraire), as, “I hear you are grown rich—” “Yes, backwards.” To ring a muffled peal, is to ring a peal of sorrow, not of joy.

In olden times bells were rung backwards as a tocsin, or notice of danger.

“Beacons were lighted upon crags and eminences; the bells were rung backwards in the churches; and the general summons to arm announced an extremity of danger.”— Sir W. Scott. The Betrothed. chap. iii.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh (Hamlet, iii. 1). A most exquisite metaphor for a deranged mind, such as that of Don Quixote.

Warwick shakes his bells.

Beware of danger, for Warwick is in the field. Trojans beware, Achilles has donned his armour. The bells mean the bells of a hawk, the hawk shakes his bells.

“Neither the king, nor he that loves him best,

Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shakes his bells.” Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI, i. 1.

Bell, Book, and Candle

A ceremony in the greater excommunication introduced into the Catholic Church in the eighth century. After reading the sentence a bell is rung, a book closed, and a candle extinguished. From that moment the excommunicated person is excluded from the sacraments and even divine worship.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Bell, book, and candle shall not drive me back.”— Shakespeare: King John, iii. 3.

In spite of bell, book, and candle, i.e.

in spite of all the opposition which the Christian hierarchy can offer. (See Cursing.)

Bell of Patrick's Will

(clog an eadhachta Phatraic) is six inches high, five broad, and four deep. It certainly was in existence in the sixth century. In the eleventh century a shrine was made for it of gold and silver filigree, adorned with jewels.

Bell Savage

or La Belle Sauvage = Pocahontas. According to one derivation it is a contraction of Isabelle Savage, who originally kept the inn. It is some—what remarkable that the sign of the inn was a pun on the Christian name, a “bell on the Hope” (hoop), as may be seen in the Close Roll of 1453. The hoop seems to have formed a garter or frame to most signs. The site of the inn is now occupied by the premises of Messrs. Cassell & Co.

“They now returned to their inn, the famous Bell Savage.”— Scott: Kenilworth, xiii.

Bell—the—Cat

Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, was so called. James III. made favourites of architects and masons. One mason, named Cochrane, he created Earl of Mar. The Scotch nobles held a council in the church of Lauder for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when Lord Gray asked, “Who will bell the cat?”

“That will I,” said Douglas, and he fearlessly put to death, in the king's presence, the obnoxious minions. (See Bell.)

Bell—wavering

Vacillating, swaying from side to side like a bell. A man whose mind jangles out of tune from delirium, drunkenness, or temporary insanity, is said to have his wits gone bell—wavering.

“I doubt me his wits have gone bell—wavering by the road.”— Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap vii.

Belladonna

(Italian, beautiful lady). This name was given to the Deadly Nightshade, from a practice once common among ladies of touching their eyes with it to make the pupils large and lustrous.

Bellarmino

(A). A large Flemish gotch, i.e. a corpulent beer—jug of some strong ware, originally made in Flanders in ridicule of Cardinal Bellarmine, the great persecutor of the reformed party there. These jugs had at the neck a rude likeness of the cardinal with his large, square, ecclesiastical beard.

“... like a larger jug, that some men call

A bellarmine ...

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Whereon the lewder hand of pagan workmen,

Over the proud ambitious head, hath carved

An idol large, with beard episcopal,

Making the vessel look like tyrant Eglon.”

Cartright: The Ordinary.

“One of the Fellows of Exeter [College], when Dr. Prideaux was rector, sent his servitor, after nine o'clock at night, with a large bottle to fetch some ale from the alehouse. When he was coming home with it under his gown the proctor met him, and asked him what he did out so late, and what he had under his gown? The man answered that his master had sent him to the stationers to borrow Bellarmino, which book he had under his arm; and so he went home. Whence a bottle with a big belly is called a Bellarmine to this day, 1667.”—Oxoniana, vol. i.

p. 232.

Bellaston

(Lady). A profligate, whose conduct and conversation are a life—like photograph of the court “beauties” of Louis XV. (Fielding: Tom Jones.)

Belle

A beauty. The Belle of the room. The most beautiful lady in the room (French).

La belle France.

A common French phrase applied to France, as “Merry England” is to our own country.

Belles Lettres

Polite literature (French); similarly, Beaux arts, the fine arts.

Bellefontaine

(Benedict). The most wealthy farmer of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), and father of Evangeline. When the inhabitants of his village were exiled, and he was about to embark, he died of a broken heart, and was buried on the sea—shore. (Longfellow: Evangeline.)

Bellerophon

One of the ships which took part in the Battle of the Nile, and was called by the English sailors “the Bully—ruffran,” or “Belly—ruffron.”

“Why, she and the Belly—ruffron seem to have pretty well shared and shared alike.”—Captain Marryat: Poor Jack, chap. xiii.

Bellerophon

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The Joseph of Greek mythology; Antæa, the wife of Proetos, being the "Potiphar's wife" who tempted him, and afterwards falsely accused him. Being successful in various enterprises, he attempted to fly to heaven on the winged horse Pegasus, but Zeus sent a gad—fly to sting the horse, and the rider was overthrown.

Letters of Bellerophon.

Letters or other documents either dangerous or prejudicial to the bearer. Proetos sent Bellerophon with a letter to the King of Lycia, his wife's father, recounting the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death.

Pausanias, the Spartan, sent messengers from time to time to King Xerxes, with similar letters; the discovery by one of the bearers proved the ruin of the traitor.

David's letter sent by Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14) was of a similar treacherous character; hence the phrase, "Letters of Uriah."

Bellerus

Bellerium is the Land's End, Cornwall, the fabled land of the giant Bellerus.

"Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old."

Milton: Lycidas,

160.

Bellicent

Daughter of Gorloise and Igera. According to Tennyson, she was the wife of Lot, King of Orkney; but in La Morte d'Arthur Margause is called Lot's wife.

Bellin

The ram, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Bellisant Sister to King Pepin of France, wife of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she became the mother of Valentine and Orson. (Valentine and Orson.)

Bellman

Before the new police force was established, watchmen or bellmen used to parade the streets at night, and at Easter a copy of verses was left at the chief houses in the hope of obtaining an offering. These verses were the relies of the old incantations sung or said by the bellman to keep off elves and hobgoblins. The town crier.

Bellona

Goddess of war and wife of Mars. (Roman mythology.)

"Her features, late so exquisitely lovely, inflamed with the fury of frenzy, resembled those of a Bellona."—Sir Walter Scott.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bellows

The pit of the stomach. To knock a man on the “bellows” takes his “wind (breath) away.”

Sing old rose and burn the bellows.

(See Sing.)

Bellwether of the Flock

A jocose and rather depreciating term applied to the leader of a party. Of course the allusion is to the wether or sheep which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belly

The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they seceded to the Sacred Mount: “Once on a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but, as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them.” Shakespeare introduces the fable in his Coriolanus, i. 1.

The belly has no ears.

A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, Venter non habet aures; and in French, Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles.

Belly—timber

Food.

“And now, Dame Peveril, to dinner, to dinner. The old fox must have his belly—timber, though the hounds have been after him the whole day.”—Sir W. Scott. Peveril of the Peak, chap. 48.

Belomancy

(Greek). Divination by arrows. Labels being attached to a given number of arrows, the archers let them fly, and the advice on the label of the arrow which flies farthest is accepted and acted on. This practice is common with the Arabs.

Beloved Disciple

St. John. (John xiii. 23, etc.)

Beloved Physician

St. Luke. (Col. iv. 14.)

Below the Belt

(See Belt.)

Belphegor

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A nasty, licentious, obscene fellow. Bel—Phegor was a Moabitish deity, whose rites were celebrated on Mount Phegor, and were noted for their obscenity. The Standard, speaking of certain museums in London, says, “When will men cease to be deluded by these unscrupulous Belphegors?” (meaning “quacks”).

Phegor, Phogor, or Peor, a famous mountain beyond the Jordan. Nebo and Pisgah were neighbouring mountains. Beth—Peor is referred to in Deut. iii. 29.

Belphoebe meant for Queen Elizabeth. She was sister of Amoret. Equally chaste, but of the Diana and Minerva type. Cold as an icicle, passionless, immovable. She is a white flower without perfume, and her only tender passion is that of chivalry. Like a moonbeam, she is light without warmth. You admire her as you admire a marble statue. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iii.)

Belt

To hit below the belt. To strike unfairly. It is prohibited in prize—fighting to hit below the waistbelt. To call men knaves and fools, to charge a man with nepotism, to make a slanderous report which is not actionable, indeed to take away a man's character in any way where self—defence is impossible, is “hitting him below the belt.”

“Lord Salisbury hits hard, but never hits below the belt.”—Daily Telegraph, November, 1885.

To hold the belt.

To be the champion. In pugilism, etc., a belt is passed on to the champion.

Beltane

(2 syl.). A festival observed in Ireland on June 21st, and in some parts of Scotland on May Day. A fire is kindled on the hills, and the young people dance round it, and feast on cakes made of milk and eggs. It is supposed to be a relic of the worship of Baal. The word is Gaelic, and means Bel's fire; and the cakes are called beltane—cakes.

Belted Knight

The right of wearing belt and spurs. Even to the present day knights of the shire are “girt with a belt and sword,” when the declaration of their election is officially made.

Belted Will

Lord William Howard, warden of the western marches (1563—1640).

“His Bilboa blade, by marchmen felt,

Hung in a broad and studded belt;

Hence, in rude phrase, the borderers still Called noble Howard Belted Will. “Scott.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Beltenebros

Amadis of Gaul so calls himself after he retires to the Poor Rock. His lady—love is Oriana. (Amadis of Gaul, ii. 6.)

Belvawney

(Miss), of the Ports—mouth theatre. She always took the part of a page, and wore tights and silk stockings. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, 1838.)

Belvedere

[bel—ve—dear]. A sort of pleasure—house or look—out on the top of a house. The word is Italian, and means a fine prospect.

Belvidera

(in Otway's Venice Preserved). Sir Walter Scott says, “More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Belvidera and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona.”

“And Belvidera pours her soul in love.”

Thomson: Winter.

Bemuse

(2 syl.). To get into a dreamy, half—intoxicated state.

“Bemusing himself with beer.”— Sala: Gaslight and Daylight.

Ben

The Neptune of the Saxons.

Ben (a theatrical word). Benefit. “A big ben,” a good or bumping benefit.

Big Ben of Westminster.

A name given to the large bell, which weighs 13 tons 10 cwt., and is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, the Chief Commissioner of Works when the bell was cast. (1856.)

Ben Jochanan'

in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who suffered much persecution for his defence of the right of private judgment.

“A Jew [Englishman] of humble parentage was he;

By trade a Levite [clergyman], though of low degree.” Part ii. 354, 355.

Ben trovato

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Italian). Well found; a happy discovery or invention.

Benaiah

(3 syl.), in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for George Edward Sackville, called General Sackville, a gentleman of family, and a zealous partisan of the Duke of York. Benaiah was captain in David's army, and was made by Solomon generalissimo. (1 Kings ii. 35.)

“Nor can Benaiah's worth forgotten lie,

Of steady soul when public storms were high;

Whose conduct, while the Moors fierce onsets made, Secured at once our honour and our trade.'

Part ii. 819—20.

Benares

(3 syl.). One of the “most holy” cities of the Hindus, revered by them as much as Mecca is by the Mohammedans.

Benbow

(Admiral), in an engagement with the French near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by a chain—shot, but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter—deck till morning, when Du Casse bore away. Almeyda, the Portuguese governor of India, in his engagement with the united fleet of Cambay'a and Egypt, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar manner; but, instead of retreating, had himself bound to the ship's mast, where he “waved his sword to cheer on the combatants,” till he died from loss of blood. (See Cynægiros, Jaafer, etc.)

“Whirled by the cannon's rage, in shivers torn,

His thighs far shattered o'er the waves are borne; Bound to the mast the god—like hero stands,

Waves his proud sword and cheers his woeful bands; Though winds and seas their wonted aid deny,

To yield he knows not, but he knows to die.”

Camoens: Lusiad, book x.

Benbow

A sot, generous, free, idle, and always hanging about the ale—house. He inherited a good estate, spent it all, and ended life in the workhouse. The tale is in Crabbe's Borough.

“Benbow, a boon companion, long approved

By jovial sets, and (as he thought) beloved,

Was judged as one to joy and friendship prone, And deemed injurious to himself alone.”

Letter xvi.

Bench

The seat of a judge in the law courts; the office of judge.

To be raised to the bench.

To be made a judge.

The King's [queen's] bench.

The Supreme Court of Common Law; so called because at one time the sovereign presided in this court, and the court followed the sovereign when he moved from one place to another. Now a division of the High Court of Judicature.

Bench

Bench of bishops. The whole body of English prelates, who sit together on a bench in the House of Lords.

To be raised to the Episcopal bench.

To be made a bishop.

Bench and Bar

Judges and pleaders. The bench is the seat on which a judge sits. The bar of a court was formerly a wooden barrier, to separate the counsel from the audience. Now, silk gowns (q.v.) sit nearer the judge, and their juniors behind them. (See Barristers.)

Benchers

Senior members of the Inns of Court; so called from the bench on which they used to sit. They exercise the function of calling students to the bar, and have the right of expelling the obnoxious. (See Bar, page 94, col. 1.)

“He was made successively Barrister, Utter Barrister, Bencher, and Reader.”— Wood.

Bend

meaning power, as Beyond my bend, i.e. my means or power. The allusion is to a bow or spring; if strained beyond its bending power, it breaks. (See Bent.)

Bend Sinister

He has a bend sinister. He was not born in lawful wedlock. In heraldry, a band running from the upper right—hand corner to the lower left—hand corner (as the shield appears before you on paper) is called a bend—sinister, and is popularly, but erroneously, supposed to indicate bastardy.

Bendemeer

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A river that flows near the ruins of Chilminar' or Istachar', in the province of Chusistan' in Persia.

“There's a bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long.”

T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, Part 1.

Bender

Sixpence.

Bendigo

A rough fur cap, named from a noted pugilist, William Thompson; so nicknamed from his birthplace in Australia.

Bendy

(Old). The devil, who is willing to bend to anyone's inclination. The way of sin is so broad that every shade of error can be admitted without obstruction.

Benedicite

(5 syl.). “Bless you:” a benediction used in the Roman Catholic Church; also the canticle.

Benedick

A sworn bachelor caught in the wiles of matrimony, like Benedick in Shakespeare's comedy of Much Ado about Nothing.

“Let our worthy Cantab be bachelor or Benedick, what concern is it of ours.”—Mrs. Edwards: A Girton Girl, chap. xv.

Benedick and Benedict are used indiscriminately, but the distinction should be observed.

Benedict

A bachelor, not necessarily one pledged to celibacy, but simply a man of marriageable age, not married. St. Benedict was a most uncompromising stickler for celibacy.

“Is it not a pun? There is an old saying, ‘Needles and pins; when a man marries his trouble begins.’ If so the unmarried man is benedictus.”—Life in the West.

Benedictines

(4 syl.). Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict, viz. implicit obedience, celibacy, abstaining from laughter, spare diet, poverty, the exercise of hospitality, and unremitting industry.

Benefice

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.). Under the Romans certain grants of lands made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in the Middle Ages an estate held ex mero beneficio of the donor was called “a benefice.” When the popes assumed the power of the feudal lords with reference to ecclesiastical patronage, a “living” was termed by them a benefice held under the pope as superior lord. This assumption roused the jealousy of France and England, and was stoutly resisted.

Benefit of Clergy

Exemption of the clerical order from civil punishment, based on the text, “Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm” (1 Chron. xvi. 22). In time it comprehended not only the ordained clergy, but all who, being able to write and read, were capable of entering into holy orders. This law was abolished in the reign of George IV. (1827).

Benen—geli

(See Hamet.)

Benet

(French). A simpleton, so called because they were supposed to be, in a special way, the objects of God's care. (French, béni, Old French, benêt, from Latin, benedictus.) We call an idiot an “Innocent” (q.v.).

Benevolence

A “forced” gratuity, under the excuse of a loan, exacted by some of the Plantagenet kings. First enforced in 1473, it was declared illegal by the Bill of Rights in 1689.

“Royal benevolences were encroaching more and more on the right of parliamentary taxation.”—Green: History of the English People, vol. ii. book vi. chap. i. p. 197.

Benevolus

in Cowper's Task, is John Courtney Throckmorton of Weston Underwood.

Bengal Tigers

The old 17th Foot, whose badge, a royal tiger, was granted them for their services in India (1802—23). Now the Leicester Regiment.

Bengalese

(3 syl.) for Bengalis or Bengalees. Natives of Bengal. (Singular, Bengali or Bengalee.)

Bengodi

A wonderful country where “they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have the giblets given into the bargain. In this place there is a mountain of Parmesan cheese, and people's employment is making cheesecakes and macaroons. There is also a river which runs Malmsey wine of the very best quality. (Boccaccio: Eighth Day, Novel iii.)

Benicia Boy

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

John C. Heenan, the American pugilist, who challenged and fought Tom Sayers for “the belt” in 1860; so called from Benicia in California, his birthplace.

Benjamin The pet, the youngest. Queensland is the Benjamin of our colonial possessions. The allusion is to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Benjamin

A smart overcoat; so called from a tailor of the name, and rendered popular by its association with Joseph's “coat of many colours.”

Benjamin's Mess

The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. “Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs” (Gen. xliii. 34).

Bennaskar

A wealthy merchant and magician of Delhi, in Ridlay's Tales of the Genii.

“Like the jeweller of Delhi, in the house of the magician Bennaskar, I at length reached a vaulted room dedicated to secrecy and silence.”—Sir W. Scott.

Benshie, Benshee

(see Banshee). The Scotch Bodach Glay, or Grey Spectre, is a similar superstition; and the Pari—Banou (Nymph of the Air) of the Arabian Nights is also a sort of Benshee.

“How oft has the Benshee cried!” [How busy death has been of late with our notables.]—T. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. ii.

Bent

Inclination; talent for something. Out of my bent, not in my way, not in the range of my talent. Bent on it, inclined to it. As a thing bent is inclined, so a bent is an inclination or bias. Genius or talent is a bent or bias.

“Whatever is done best, is done from the natural bent and disposition of the mind.”—Hazlitt: Table Talk.

They fool me to the top of my bent, i.e. as far as the bow can be bent without snapping. (Hamlet, iii. 2.) (See Bend.)

Benvolio

Nephew to Montague, a testy, litigious gentleman, who would “quarrel with a man that had a hair more or a hair less in his beard than he had.” Mercutio says to him, “Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun.” (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.)

Beppo

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The contraction of Giuseppe, and therefore equal to our Joe. Husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and, after several years' absence, returned to his native land, where he discovered his wife at a carnival ball with her cavaliero servente. He made himself known to her, and they lived together again as man and wife. (Byron: Beppo.)

Berchta

[the white lady]. This fairy, in Southern Germany, answers to Hulda (the gracious lady) of Northern Germany; but after the introduction of Christianity, when pagan deities were represented as demons, Berchta lost her former character, and became a bogie to frighten children.

Bereans

(3 syl.). The followers of the Rev. John Barclay, of Kincardineshire (1773). They believe that all we know of God is from revelation; that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; and that unbelief is the unpardonable sin. They took their name from the Bereans, mentioned in the Book of the Acts

(xvii. 11), who “received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily.”

Berecynthian Hero

Midas, the Phrygian king; so called from Mount Berecynthus, in Phrygia

Berengarians

Followers of Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, the learned opponent of Lanfranc (eleventh century). He said that the bread by consecration did not become the very body of Christ “generated on earth so many years before, but becomes to the faithful, nevertheless, the blessed body of Christ.”

Berenice

(4 syl.). The sister—wife of Ptolemy III., who vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple of the war—god, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices.

Pope, in his Rape of the Lock, converts the purloined ringlet into a star or meteor, “which drew behind a radiant trail of háir.” (Canto v.)

Berg Folk

Pagan spirits doomed to live on the Scandinavian hills till the day of redemption. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bergæan

(A). A great liar; so called from Antiphanes Berga.

Bergelmir

A frost—giant, father of the Jötuns, or second dynasty of giants. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Berger

L'heure du Berger (French). The shepherd's hour, i.e. the swain's or lover's hour; the happy hour of tryst; the critical moment.

Bergomask

A clown or merryandrew; a native of Bergamo. Compare, a gasconader; a Boeotian.

Berkley

(Mr.). An Englishman of fortune, good—humoured, and humane. He is a bachelor and somewhat eccentric, but sound common sense is a silver thread which is never lost. (Longfellow: Hyperion (a romance), 1839.)

Berkshire

(Saxon, Bearoc — scire, forest—shire), a name peculiarly appropriate to this county, which contains the forest districts of Windsor and Bagshot.

Berlin Decree

A decree issued at Berlin by Napoleon I., forbidding any of the nations of Europe to trade with Great Britain (1806). This mad fancy was the first step to the great man's fall.

Berlin Time

The new Berlin Observatory is 44' 14" east of Paris, and 53' 35" east of Greenwich. The Berlin day begins at noon, but our civil day begins the midnight preceding.

Berliners

The people of Berlin, in Prussia.

Bermeja

Insula de la Torre, from which Amadis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the Enchantress—Damsel, daughter of Finetor the necromancer.

Bermoothes

An hypothetical island feigned by Shakespeare to be enchanted, and inhabited by witches and devils. Supposed by some to be Bermudas; but a correspondent in Notes and Queries (January 23rd, 1886, p.

72) utterly denies this, and favours the suggestion that the island meant was Lampedusa.

“From the still—vexed Bermoothes, there she's hid.”

Shakespeare: The Tempest,

i. 2.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bermudas

To live in the Bermudas, i.e. in some out—of—the—way place for cheapness. The shabby genteel hire a knocker in some West—end square, where letters may be left for them, but live in the Bermudas, or narrow passages north of the Strand, near Covent Garden.

Bernard

(St.). Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the twelfth century. His fame for wisdom was very great, and few church matters were undertaken without his being consulted.

Petit Bernard.

Solomon Bernard, engraver of Lyons. (Sixteenth century.) Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard, of Dijon, philanthropist (1588—1641). Lucullus. Samuel Bernard, capitalist (1651—1739).

Le gentil Bernard.

Pierre Joseph Bernard, the French poet (1710—1775).

Bernard Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia (see above). We are all apt to forget sometimes; events do not always turn out as they are planned before—hand.

“Poor Peter was to win honours at Shrewsbury school, and carry them thick to Cambridge; and after that a living awaited him, the gift of his godfather, Sir Peter Arley; but Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia, and Poor Peter's lot in life was very different to what his friends had planned.”—Mrs. Gaskell: Cranford, chap. vi.

Bernard Soup

(St.). (See Stone Soup.)

Bernardo

in Dibdin's bootlegbooks (a romance), is meant for Joseph Hazlewood, antiquary and critic (1811).

Bernardo del Carpio

One of the most favourite subjects of the Spanish minstrels; the other two being the Cid and Lara's seven infants.

Bernard's Inn

Formerly called Mackworth Inn, from Dean Mackworth, who died 1454.

“This house was, in the thirty—first year of the reign of Henry VI., a messuage belonging to Dr. John Mackworth, dean of the cathedral church of Lincoln, and at that time in the holding of one Lionel Bernard. ... and it hath ever since retained the name of Bernard's Inn.”—Harleian MSS. No. 1104.

Berners

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Barnes (Juliana). Prioress of Sopewell nunnery, near St. Albans, reputed authoress of the Bokys of Hawking and Hunting (1486). Generally called “Dame Berners.” Another book ascribed to her is the Boke of the Blazing of Arms (1485).

Bernese

(2 syl.). A native of Berne, in Switzerland.

Bernesque Poetry

Serio—comic poetry; so called from Francesco Berni, of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it. (1490—1536).

Bernouilli's Numbers or the properties of numbers first discovered by James Bernouilli, professor of mathematics at Basle (1654—1705).

Berserker

Grandson of the eight—handed Starkader and the beautiful Alfhilde, called bær—serce (bare of mail) because he went into battle unharnessed. Hence, any man with the fighting fever on him.

“You say that I am berserker. And ... baresark I go to—morrow to the war.”—Rev. C. Kingsley; Hereward the Wake.

Berth

He has tumbled into a nice berth. A nice situation or fortune. The place in which a ship is anchored is called its berth, and the sailors call it a good or bad berth as they think it favourable or otherwise. The space also allotted to a seaman for his hammock is called his berth. (Norman, berth, a cradle.)

To give a wide berth.

Not to come near a person; to keep a person at a distance. The place where a ship lies in harbour is called her berth: hence, to give a “wide berth” is to give a ship plenty of room to swing at anchor.

Bertha

The betrothed of John of Leyden, but, being a vassal of Count Oberthal, she was unable to marry without her lord's consent. When she went with her mother to ask permission of marriage, the count, struck with her beauty, determined to make her his mistress. She afterwards makes her escape from the castle, and, fancying that the “prophet” had caused the death of her lover, goes to Munster fully resolved to compass his death by setting fire to the palace. She is apprehended, and, being brought before the prophet—king, recognises her lover in him, saying, “I loved thee once, but now my love is turned to hate,” and stabs herself.

(Meyerbeer's opera, Le Prophète.)

Bertha

The blind daughter of Caleb Plummer in Dickens's Cricket on the Hearth (a Christmas story), 1845.

B

Bertha

(Frau). A German impersonation of the Epiphany, corresponding to the Italian Befana. Represented as a white lady, who steals softly into nurseries and rocks infants asleep in the absence of negligent nurses; she is, however, the terror of all naughty children. Her feet are very large, and she has an iron nose. (See Befana.)

Berthas

[Stock Exchange term]. The London, Brighton, & South Coast Railway Deferred Stock.

Berthe au Grand Pied

Mother of Charlemagne, and great granddaughter of Charles Martel; so called because she had a club—foot.

Bertolde

[Bar—told]. Imperturbable as Bertolde, i.e. not to be taken by surprise, thrown off your guard, or disconcerted at anything. Bertolde is the hero of a little jeu d'esprit in Italian prose, J. Cesare Croce. He is a comedian by profession, whom nothing astonishes, and is as much at his ease with kings and queens as with persons of his own rank and vocation.

Bertram

One of the conspirators against the Republic of Venice “in whom there was a hesitating softness fatal to a great enterprise.” He betrayed the conspiracy to the senate. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Bertram

(Henry), in Sir W. Scott's novel of Guy Mannering, was suggested by James Annesley, Esq., rightful heir of the earldom of Anglesey, of which he was dispossessed by his uncle Richard. He died in 1743.

Bertram, Count of Rousillon beloved by Helena, the hero of Shakespeare's comedy, All's Well that Ends Well.

“I cannot reconcile, my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Helena as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate.”—Dr. Johnson.

Bertram Risingham

The vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Marston Moor, and for this vile deed the vassal demanded of him all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even murder him; but in the end it turns out that Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald his heir, for Redmond O'Neale, the page of Rokeby, is found to be Mortham's son. (Scott: Rokeby.)

Bertramo

The fiend—father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his possessions, he meets him near the rocks St. Irene, and Helena seduces him in the “Dance of Love.” When Bertramo at last comes to claim his victim, he is resisted by Alice, the foster—sister of the duke, who reads to him his mother's will, and angels come to celebrate the triumph of good over evil. (Meyerbeer's opera of Roberto il Diavolo.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Berwicks [Stock Exchange term], meaning the North—Eastern Railway shares. The line runs to Berwick.

Beryl Molozane

(3 syl.). The lady beloved by George Geith; a laughing, loving beauty, all sunshine and artlessness; tender, frank, full of innocent chatter; helping everyone and loving everyone. Her lot is painfully unhappy, and she dies. (F. G. Trafford [J. H. Riddell]: George Geith.)

Berzak

[the interval]. The space between death and the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Besaile

A great grandfather (French, bisaieul). This word should be restored.

Besants

or Bezants. Circular pieces of bullion without any impression, supposed to represent the old coinage of Byzantium, and to have been brought to Europe by the Crusaders.

Beside the Cushion

Beside the question; not to the point; not pertinent to the matter in hand. French, hors de propos; Latin, nihil ad rhombum. It was Judge Jeffreys who used the phrase, “Besides [sic] the cushion.”

Besom

To hang out the besom. To have a fling when your wife is gone on a visit. To be a quasi bachelor once more. Taking this in connection with the following phrase, it evidently means, holding the marriage service in abeyance.

“This is French argot. Rotir le balai (to burn the besom) means to live the life of a libertine, whence balochard, Paris slang for a libertine. Probably our phrase, “burn the bellows,” is pretty much the same as rotir le balai.

Jumping the besom. Omitting the marriage service after the publication of banns, and living together as man and wife. In Southern Scotch, a street—walker is called a besom, and in French balai (a besom) means the life of a libertine, as Rôtir le balai; Il ont bien rôti le balai ensemble, where balai means a debauch or something worse. No further explanation can be needed or could be given.

Bess

Good Queen Bess. Queen Elizabeth (1533, 1558—1603).

Bess o' Bedlam

A female lunatic vagrant. Bedlam is a common name for a madhouse, and Bess is a national name for a woman, especially of the lower order. The male lunatic is a Tom o' Bedlam.

Bess of Hardwicke

Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury, to whose charge, in 1572, Mary Queen of Scots was committed. The countess treated the captive queen with great harshness, being jealous of the earl her husband. Bess of Hardwicke married four times: Alexander Barley (when she was only fourteen years of age); William Cavendish; Sir William St. Loe, Captain of Queen Elizabeth's Guard; and lastly, George, Earl of Shrewsbury. She built Hardwicke Hall, and founded the wealth and dignity of the Cavendish family.

Bessemer Iron

Pig—iron refined, and converted into steel or malleable iron by passing currents of air through the molten metal, according to a process discovered by Sir H. Bessemer, and patented in 1856.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray

A ballad. The tale is that these two young ladies, natives of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retired to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, about a mile from Lynedock, the residence of Mary Gray. A young man, in love with both, carried them provisions. Both ladies died of the plague, and were buried at Dornock Hough.

Bessus

A cowardly, bragging captain, a sort of Bobadil (q.v.). (Beaumont and Fletcher: A King and no King.)

Best At best or At the very best. Looking at the matter in the most favourable light. Making every allowance.

“Life at best is but a mingled yarn.”

At one's best.

At the highest or best point attainable by the person referred to. For the best. With the best of motives; with the view of obtaining the best results. I must make the best of my way home. It is getting late and I must use my utmost diligence to get home as soon as possible.

To have the best of it, or, To have the best of the bargain. To have the advantage or best of a transaction. To make the best of the matter. To submit to ill—luck with the best grace in your power.

Best Man

(at a wedding). The bridegroom's chosen friend who waits on him, as the bride's maids wait on the bride.

Best Things

(The Eight), according to Scandinavian mythology:— (1) The ash Yggdrasil is the best of trees;

(2) Skidbladnir, of ships;

(3) Odin, of the Æsir';

(4) Sleipnir, of steeds;

(5) Bifrost, of bridges;

(6) Bragi, of bards;

(7) Habrok, of hawks

(8) Garm, of hounds.

Bestiaries

or Bestials. Books very popular in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, containing the pictures of animals and their symbolisms.

“The unicorn has but one horn in the middle of its forehead. It is the only animal that ventures to attack the elephant; and so sharp is the nail of its foot, that with one blow it can rip the belly of that beast. Hunters can catch the unicorn only by placing a young virgin in its haunts. No sooner does he see the damsel, than he runs towards her, and lies down at her feet, and so suffers himself to be captured by the hunters. The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on Him our nature in the virgin's womb, was betrayed to the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the Gospel of Truth. ...”—Le Bestiaire Divin de

Guillaume, Clerc de Normandic (13th century).

Bete

Morte la bête, mort le venin. Dead men tell no tales; dead dogs don't bite. When one is dead his power of mischief is over. Literally, if the beast is dead, its poison is dead also.

Quand Jean—Bête est mort, il à laissè bien des héritiers.

Casimir Delavigne says to the same effect, Les sots depuis Adam sont en majorité. Jean—Bête means a fool or dolt.

Bête Noire

The thorn in the side, the bitter in the cup, the spoke in the wheel, the black sheep, the object of aversion. A black sheep has always been considered an eyesore in a flock, and its wool is really less valuable. In times of superstition it was looked on as bearing the devil's mark.

“The Dutch sale of tin is the bête noire of the Cornish miners.”—The Times.

Beth Gelert

or “the Grave of the Greyhound.” A ballad by the Hon. William Robert Spencer. The tale is that one day Llewellyn returned from hunting, when his favourite hound, covered with gore, ran to meet him. The chieftain ran to see if anything had happened to his infant son, found the cradle overturned, and all around was sprinkled with gore and blood. Thinking the hound had eaten the child, he stabbed it to the heart. Afterwards he found the babe quite safe, and a huge wolf under the bed, quite dead. Gêlert had killed the wolf and saved the child.

Bethlemites

(4 syl.). Followers of John Huss, so called because he used to preach in the church called Bethlehem of Prague.

Betrothed

(The). One of the Tales of the Crusaders, by Sir Walter Scott, 1832. Lady Eveline Berenger is the betrothed of Sir Damian de Lacy, whom she marries.

Better

My better half. A jocose way of saying my wife. As the twain are one, each is half. Horace calls his friend animæ dimidium meæ. (1 Odes iii. 8.)

To be better than his word.

To do more than he promised. To think better of the matter. To give it further consideration; to form a more correct opinion respecting it.

Better kind Friend, etc

Better kind friend than friend kind. Friend is a corruption of fremd, meaning a stranger. Better [a] kind stranger than a kinsman who makes himself a stranger, or an estranged kinsman.

Better off.

In more easy circumstances.

Bettina

A mascotte who always brought good luck wherever she went. Though a mere peasant, she is taken to the Prince of Piombino's palace of Laurent, to avert his ill—luck; but by marrying Pippo (a shepherd) she loses her gift. However, the prince is reminded that the children of a mascotte are hereditary mascottes, and makes Bettina promise that her first child shall be adopted by the prince. (See Mascotte.)

Bettina

The name under which Elizabeth Brentano translated into English Goethe's Letters to a Child in 1835. She was the wife of Ludwig Achim von Arnim, and it was her correspondence with Goethe which were the Letters to a Child referred to. Elizabeth Brentano was born 1785.

Betty

A name of contempt given to a man who interferes with the duties of female servants, or occupies himself in female pursuits; also called a “Molly.”

Betty

A skeleton key; the servant of a picklock. Burglars call their short crowbars for forcing locks Jennies and Jemmies. “Jenny” is a “small engine,” i.e. 'ginie, and Jemmy is merely a variant.

Betubium

Dumsby, or the Cape of St. Andrew, in Scotland.

“The north—inflated tempest foams

O'er Orka's and Betubium's highest peak.”

Thomson: Autumn, 891, 2.

Between

Between hay and grass. Neither one thing nor yet another; a hobbledehoy, neither a man nor yet a boy.

Between cup and lip.

(See Slip.)

Between Scylla and Charybdis. Between two equal dangers; on the horns of a dilemma. (See Charybdis.) Between two fires. Between two dangers. In war, an army fired upon from opposite sides is in imminent danger.

Between two stools you come to the ground:

“Like a man on double business bound, I stand in pause where I shall first begin, and both neglect.” He who hunts two hares leaves one and loses the other.” Simul sorbere ac flare non possum. The allusion is to a children's game called “The Ambassador,” also a practical joke at one time played at sea when the ship crossed the line. Two stools are set side by side, but somewhat apart, and a cloth is covered over them. A person sits on each stool to keep the cloth taut, and the ambassador is invited to sit in the middle; but, as soon as he is seated, the two rise and the ambassador comes to the ground.

Between you and me

(French, entrenous). In confidence be it spoken. Sometimes, Between you and me and the gate—post. These phrases, for the most part, indicate that some ill—natured remark or slander is about to be made of a third person, but occasionally they refer to some offer or private affair. “Between ourselves” is another form of the same phrase.

Betwixt and Between

Neither one nor the other, but somewhere between the two. Thus, grey is neither white nor black, but betwixt and between the two.

Beurre

Avoir beurre sur la tête. To be covered with crimes. Taken from a Jewish saying, “If you have butter on your head (i.e. have stolen butter and put it in your cap), don't go into the sun.” (Vidocq: Voleurs, vol. i. p.

16.)

J'y suis pour mon beurre.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Here beurre means argent: I paid for it through the nose. Beurre or butter has the same relation to food as wealth has to civil life; it does not take the place of it, and does not make it, but it makes it go down more pleasantly, and adds somewhat to its wholesomeness. As Shakespeare says, "Where virtue is, it makes more virtuous."

Promettre plus de beurre que de pain.

To promise much, but perform little. To promise more than one, can, or chooses to, perform. The butter of a promise is of no use without substantial bread. "Be thou fed" will not fill an empty stomach. A little help is worth a deal of pity.

Beuves

(1 syl.), or Buovo of Aygremont. The father of Malagigi, and uncle of Rinaldo. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Bever

A "drink" between meals. (Italian, bevere, to drink— our beverage; Latin, bibere — our im—bibe). At Eton they used to have "Bever days," when extra beer and bread were served during the afternoon in the College Hall to scholars, and any friends whom they might bring in.

"He . . . will devour three breakfasts . . . without prejudice to his bevers."— Beaumont and Fletcher: Woman Hater, i. 3.

Bevil

A model gentleman in Steele's Conscious Lovers.

"Whate'er can deck mankind,

Or charm the heart, in generous Bevil showed." Thomson: Winter, 654—5.

Bevis'

The horse of Lord Marmion. (Sir Walter Scott.) (See Horse.)

Bevis of Southampton.

A knight of romance, whose exploits are recounted in Drayton's Polyolbion. The French call him Beuves de Hantone.

Bevoriskius

whose Commentary on the Generations of Adam is referred to by Sterne in the Sentimental Journey, was Johannes Bevoricius, physician and senator, author of a large number of books. The Commentary will be found at fol. 1 (1652).

Bevy A bevy of ladies. A throng or company; properly applied to roebucks, quails, and pheasants. Timid gregarious animals, in self—defence, go down to a river to drink in be vies or small companies. Ladies, from their timidity, are placed in the same category (Italian, bevere, to drink).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“And upon her deck what a bevy of human flowers— young women, how lovely!— young men, how noble!”— De Quincey: Dream—fugue.

Bezaliel

in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Marquis of Worcester, afterwards Duke of Beaufort.

“Bezaliel with each grace and virtue fraught,

Serene his looks, serene his life and thought;

On whom so largely Nature heaped her store,

There scarce remained for arts to give him more.” Part ii. 947—56.

Bezonian

A new recruit; applied originally in derision, to young soldiers sent from Spain to Italy, who landed both ill—accoutred and in want of everything (Ital. besogni, from bisogno, need; French besoin).

“Base and pilfering besognios and marauders.” — Sir W. Scott: Monastery, xvi.

“Great men oft die by vile bezonians.”

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI.,

act iv. 1.

“Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die” (2 Hen. IV., act v. 3). Choose your leader or take the consequences — Cæsar or Pompey? “Speak or die.”

Bheem

or Bhima. One of the five Pandoos, or brotherhoods of Indian demi—gods, famous for his strength. He slew the giant Kinchick, and dragged his body from the hills, thereby making the Kinchick ravine.

Biæum

in rhetoric, means converting the proof into a disproof. As thus: That you were the murderer is proved by your being on the spot at the time. Reply: Just the contrary, if I had been the guilty person most certainly I should have run away. (Greek, biaion.)

Bianca

Wife of Fazio. When Fazio became rich, and got entangled with the Marchioness Aldabella, she accused him to the Duke of Florence of being privy to the death of Bartoldo, an old miser. Fazio was arrested and condemned to death. Bianca now repented of her jealous rashness, and tried to save her husband, but failing in her endeavours, went mad, and died of a broken heart. (Dean Milman: Fazio. N. B. — The name is employed by Shakespeare both in his Taming of the Shrew and also in Othello.)

Bianchi

(See Neri.)

Bias

The weight in bowls which makes them deviate from the straight line; hence any favourite idea or pursuit, or whatever predisposes the mind in a particular direction.

Bowls are not now loaded, but the bias depends on the shape of the bowls. They are flattened on one side, and therefore roll obliquely.

“Your stomach makes your fabric roll,

Just as the bias rules the bowl.”

Prior: Alma, iii. line 1281

Biberius Cadius Mero The punning nickname of Tiberius Claudius Nero. Biberius [Tiberius], drink—loving, Cadius Mero [Claudius Nero], by metathesis for calidus mero, hot with wine.

Bible

means simply a book, but is now exclusively confined to the “Book of Books.” (Greek, biblos, a book.) The headings of the chapters were prefixed by Miles Smith, Bishop of Gloucester, one of the translators. (i) BIBLES NAMED FROM ERRORS OF TYPE, or from archaic words:—

The Breeches Bible.

So called because Genesis iii. 7 was rendered, “The eyes of them bothe were opened . .

. . and they sowed figge—tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches.” By Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson, 1579.

The Idle Bible,

1809. In which the “idole shepherd” (Zech. xi. 17) is printed “the idle shepherd.” The Bug Bible, 1551. So called because Psalm xci. 5 is translated, “Thou shalt not be afraid of bugges [bogies] by nighte.”

The Great Bible.

The same as Matthew Parker's Bible (q.v.).

The Place—maker's Bible.

So called from a printer's error in Matt. v. 9, “Blessed are the placemakers [peace—makers], for they shall be called the children of God.”

The Printers' Bible

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

makes David pathetically complain that “the printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause” (Ps. cxix. 161).

The Treacle Bible,

1549 (Beck's Bible), in which the word “balm” is rendered “treacle.” The Bishops' Bible has tryacle in Jer. iii. 28; xlv. 11; and in Ezek. xxvii. 17.

The Unrighteous Bible,

1652 (Cambridge Press). So called from the printer's error, “Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the Kingdom of God?” (1 Cor. vi. 9).

The Vinegar Bible.

So called because the heading to Luke xx. is given as “The parable of the Vinegar” (instead of Vineyard). Printed at the Clarendon Press in 1717.

The Wicked Bible.

So called because the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it, “Thou shalt commit adultery.” Printed by Barker and Lucas, 1632.

To these may be added: the Discharge Bible, the Ears to Ear Bible, Rebecca's Camels Bible, the Rosin Bible, the Standing Fishes Bible, and some others.

(ii) BIBLES NAMED FROM PROPER NAMES, or dignities.

Bishop's Bible.

The revised edition of Archbishop Parker's version. Published 1568. Coverdale's Bible, 1535. Translated by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. This was the first Bible sanctioned by royal authority.

Cranmer's Bible,

1539. This is Coverdale's Bible corrected by Archbishop Cranmer. It was printed in 1540, and in 1549 every parish church was enjoined to have a copy under a penalty of 40s. a month.

The Douay Bible,

1581. A translation made by the professors of the Douay College for the use of English boys destined for the Catholic priesthood.

The Geneva Bible.

The Bible translated by the English exiles at Geneva. The same as the “Breeches Bible” (q.v.).

King James's Bible.

The Authorised Version; so called because it was undertaken by command of James I. Published 1611.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Matthew Parker's Bible, or "The Great Bible," published in the reign of Henry VIII. under the care of Archbishop Parker and his staff (1539—1541). In 1572 several prolegomena were added.

Matthews' Bible

is Tindal's version. It was so called by John Rogers, superintendent of the English churches in Germany, and was published with notes under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthews, 1537.

The Mazarine Bible.

The earliest book printed in movable metal type. It contains no date. Copies have been recently sold from 3,900. Called the Mazarine Bible from the Bibliothèque Mazarine, founded in Paris by Cardinal Mazarine in 1648.

Sacy's Bible.

So called from Isaac Louis Sacy (Le—maistre), director of the Port Royal Monastery. He was imprisoned for three years in the Bastille for his Jansenist opinions, and translated the Bible during his captivity (1666—1670).

Tyndale's Bible.

William Tyndale, or Tindal, having embraced the Reformed religion, retired to Antwerp, where he printed an English translation of the Scriptures. All the copies were bought up, whereupon Tyndale printed a revised edition. The book excited the rancour of the Catholics, who strangled the "heretic" and burnt his body near Antwerp in 1536.

Wyclif's Bible,

1380, but first printed in 1850. (iii) VERSIONS.

The Authorised Version,

1611. (See King James's Bible.)

The Revised Version.

Published in May, 1885. The work was begun in June, 1870, by twenty—five scholars, ten of whom died before the version was completed. The revisers had eighty—five sessions, which extended over fourteen years.

Bible—backed

Round—shouldered, like one who is always poring over a book.

Bible—carrier

(A). A pogram; creakshoes; or saint, in a scornful sense.

"Of all bookes, they least respect the Bible. Many will have statute bookes, cronicles, yea

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

play—bookes, and such—like toyish pamphlets, but not a bible in their house or hands. . . Some vse to carry other bookes with them to church . . . to draw away their mindes from hearing God's word when it is read and preached to them. Some goe yet further, and will not suffer their wives, children, or other of their household to reade the Word. And some scoffe at such as carry the scriptures with them to church, terming them in reproach Bible—carriers.”— Gouge: Whole Armour of God, p. 318 (1616).

Bible Christians

A Protestant sect founded in 1815 by William O'Bryan, a Wesleyan, of Cornwall; also called Bryanites (3 syl.).

Bible—Clerk

A sizar of the Oxford university; a student who gets certain pecuniary advantages for reading the Bible aloud at chapel. The office is almost a sinecure now, but the emolument is given, in some colleges, to the sons of poor gentlemen, either as a free gift, or as the reward of merit tested by examination.

Bible Statistics

The Number of Authors is 50. About 30 books are mentioned in the Bible, but not included in the canon.

Old Testament New Testament Total.

(between verses 17 and 18)

Ezra vii. 21 contains all the letters of the alphabet except j. 2 Kings xix. and Isaiah xxxvii. are exactly alike.

The last two verses of 2 Chron. and the opening verses of Ezra are alike. Ezra ii. and Nehemiah vii are alike.

The word and occurs in the Old Testament 35,543 times.

The word and occurs in the New Testament 10,684 times. The word Jehovah occurs 6,835 times.

The letter Mem in the Hebrew text occurs 77,778 times.

The letter Vau in the Hebrew text occurs 76,922 times. (These are the most frequent.) The letter Teth occurs 11,052 times.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The letter Samech occurs 13,580 times. (These are the least frequent.) The Bible was divided into chapters by Cardinal. Hugo de Sancto—Caro, about 1236. The Old Testament was divided into verses by Rabbi Mordecai Nathan; and the New Testament, in 1544, by

R. Stephens, a French printer, it is said, while on horseback.

Of the 3,000 languages and dialects on the earth, the Bible has been translated into 180. The Septuagint, a translation into Greek, was made in Egypt 285 B.C.

The first complete English translation was by Wicklif, A.D. 1380; the first French translation, in 1160; the first German, in 1460; the first American edition was printed at Boston in 1752.

The oldest MS. of the Bible in the British Museum is the “Codex Alexandrinus.” Parts of the New Testament are omitted. The “Codex Vaticanus” is the oldest in the Vatican Library at Rome.

Biblia Pauperum

[the poor man's Bible]. Some forty or fifty pictures of Bible subjects used in the Middle Ages, when few could read, to teach the leading events of Scripture history. (See Mirror Of Human Salvation

.)

Biblical

Father of Biblical criticism and exegesis. Origen (185—254).

bootlegbooks

A love of books pursued to the point of unreason or madness. One Don Vicente, a Spanish scholar, is reputed to have committed murder to obtain a supposedly unique book.

Bibliomancy

Forecasting future events by the Bible. The plan was to open the sacred volume at random, and lay your finger on a passage without looking at it. The text thus pointed out was supposed to be applicable to the person who pointed it out. (Greek, biblia, Bible; manteia, prophecy.) (See Sortes.)

Another process was to weigh a person suspected of magic against a Bible. If the Bible bore down the other scale, the accused was acquitted.

Bibulus

Colleague of Julius Cæsar, a mere cipher in office, whence his name has become proverbial for one in office who is a mere fainéant.

Biceps

Muscular strength of the arm; properly, the prominent muscles of the upper arm; so called because they have two heads. (Latin, biceps, two heads.)

Biceps Parnassus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Pers. Prol. 2), i.e. Parnassus with two heads or tops (bis caput).

“Nec fonte labra prolui caballino,

Nec in bicipiti somniasse Parnasso

Memini, ut repente sic poeta prodiren

Persius: Satires (prologue.

Bickerstaff

(Isaac). A name assumed by Dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack—maker. This produced a paper war so diverting that Steele issued the Tatler under the editorial name of “Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer (1709).

Bicorn

An hypothetical beast supposed to devour all men under petticoat government. It is described as very fat and well liking. There was another beast called Chichevache, which fed on obedient wives, but the famished beast was thinner than the most rascal of Pharaoh's lean kine, for its food always fell short. Of course, bi—corn (two—horns) contains an allusion familiar to all readers of our early literature.

Bid

To bid fair. To seem likely: as “He bids fair to do well;” “It bids fair to be a fine day.” (Anglo—Saxon, bédan or beódan, to promise, to offer.)

To bid for [votes]. To promise to support in Parliament certain measures, in order to obtain votes. To bid against one. To offer or promise a higher price for an article at auction.

I bid him defiance.

I offer him defiance; I defy him.

Bid

I bid you good night. I wish you good night, or I pray that you may have a good night. This is the Anglo—Saxon biddan, to ask, pray, or intreat. Whence “beads—men” (q.v.), “bidding prayer” (q.v.). “Bid him welcome.”

“Neither bid him God—speed.”— 2 John 10, 11.

To bid the [marriage] banns.

To ask if anyone objects to the marriage of the persons named. “Si quis” (q.v.).

To bid to the wedding.

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In the New Testament is to ask to the wedding feast.

Bid—ale

An invitation of friends to assemble at the house of a poor man to drink ale, and thus to raise alms for his relief.

“The ordinary amusements in country parishes (in 1632) were church—ales, clerk—ales, and bid—ales, . . . consisting of drinking and sports, particularly dancing.”— T. V. Short, D. D.: History of the Church of England, p. 392.

“Denham, in 1634, issued an order in the western circuit to put an end to the disorders attending church—ales, bid—ales, clerk—ales, and the like.”— Howitt: History of England (Charles I., chap. iii. p. 159).

Bidding Beads

Telling off prayers by beads (Anglo—Saxon, biddan, to ask, to pray).

Bidding—Prayer

The prayer for the souls of benefactors said before the sermon; a relic of this remains in the prayer used in cathedrals, university churches, etc. Bidding is from bead or bede. (Anglo—Saxon, biddan, to pray for the souls of benefactors.) (See Beadsman.)

Biddy (i.e. Bridget). A generic name for an Irish servant—maid, as Mike is for an Irish labourer. These generic names are very common: for example, Tom Tug, a waterman; Jack Pudding, a buffoon; Cousin Jonathan, an American of the United States; Cousin Michel, a German; John Bull, an Englishman; Moll and Betty, English female servants of the lower order; John Chinaman, a Chinese; Colin Tompon, a Swiss; Nic Frog, a Dutchman; Mossoo, a Frenchman: and many others.

In Arbuthnot's John Bull Nic Frog is certainly a Dutchman; and Frogs are called “Dutch Nightingales.” The French sometimes serve Liège frogs at table as a great delicacy, and this has caused the word to be transferred to the French; but, properly, Nic Frog is a Dutchman.

Bideford Postman

Edward Caporn, the poet (born 1819), so called because at one time he was a letter—carrier at Bideford. He died in 1894.

Bidpai

[See Pilpay.]

Biforked Letter of the Greeks

The capital U, made thus Y, which resembles a bird flying.

“[The birds] flying, write upon the sky

“The biforked letter of the Greeks.”

B

Longfellow: The Wayside Inn, prelude.

Bifrost

in Scandinavian mythology, is the name of the bridge between heaven and earth; the rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones. (Icelandic, bifa, tremble, and rost, path.)

The keeper of the bridge is Heimdall. It leads to Doomstead, the palace of the Norns or Fates.

Big

To look big. To assume a consequential air.

To talk big.

To boast or brag.

“The archdeacon waxed wroth, talked big, and looked bigger.”— Trollope: The Warden, chap.

20.

Big Bird

To get the big bird (i.e. the goose). To be hissed on the stage. A theatrical expression.

Big—endians

A religious party in the empire of Lilliput, who made it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end; they were looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who broke theirs at the small end. The Big—endians are the Catholics, and the Little—endians the Protestants.

Big Gooseberry Season

(The). The time when Parliament is not assembled. It is at such times that newspapers are glad of any subject to fill their columns and amuse their readers; monster gooseberries will do for such a purpose for the nonce, or the seaserpent.

Big—wig

(A). A person in authority, a “nob.” Of course, the term arises from the custom of judges, bishops, and so on, wearing large wigs. Bishops no longer wear them.

Bigaroon

Incorrectly spelt Bicaroon. A white—heart cherry. (French, bigarreau; Latin, bigarelia; i.e. bis varellus, double—varied, red and white mixed. The French word, bigarrure, means party—colour, bigarrer).

Bighes

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(pron. bees). Jewels, female ornaments. (Also written bie.)

She is all in her bighes to—day— i.e.

in full fig, in excellent spirits, in good humour.

Bight To hook the bight— i.e. to get entangled. The bight is the bend or doubled part of a rope, and when the rope of one anchor gets into the “bight” of another, it gets “hooked.”

Bigorne

(2 syl.). A corruption of “Bicorn” (q.v.).

Bigot

means simply a worshipper (Anglo—Saxon, bigan, to worship; German, bigott). Various explanations have been given from time to time, but none are well supported.

Bigot and his Castle of Bungay

(See Castle, etc.)

Bilbo

A rapier or sword. So called from Bilba'o, in Spain, once famous for its finely—tempered blades. Falstaff says to Ford:

“I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; first, an intolerable fright, to be detected ... next, to be compassed, like a good bilbo ... hilt to point, heel to head; and then ...”— Merry wives iii:

5.

Bilboes

A bar of iron with fetters annexed to it, by which mutinous sailors are linked together. The word is derived from Bilba'o, in Spain, where they were first made. Some of the bilboes taken from the Spanish Armada are still kept in the Tower of London.

Bile

It rouses my bile. It makes me angry or indignant. In Latin, biliosus (a bilious man) meant a choleric one. According to the ancient theory, bile is one of the humours of the body, and when excited abnormally it produces choler or rage.

“It raised my bile to see him so reflect their grief aside.”— Hood: Plea of Midsummer Fairies, stanza 54.

Black bile is melancholy.

Bilge Water

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Filthy drainings. The bilge is the lowest part of a ship, and, as the rain or sea—water which trickles down to this part is hard to get at, it is apt to become foul and very offensive.

Bilk

To cheat, to obtain goods and decamp without paying for them.

“The landlord explained it by saying that ‘a bilk’ is a man who never misses a meal and never pays a cent.”—A. K. McClure: Rocky Mountains letter xxii. p. 211.

To “bilk” in cribbage is to spoil your adversaries' score; to balk him. Perhaps the two words are mere variants.

Bilker

(A). A person who gives a cabman less than his fare, and, when remonstrated with, gives a false name and address. Sometimes a “bilker” gets out and says, “Cabby, I shall be back in a minute,” turns the corner and is no more seen.

“The time for taking out a summons expires in seven days, and it often takes longer than that to hunt a ‘bilker’ down.”—Nineteenth Century (March, 1893, p. 177).

Also a cabman who does not pay the owner for the cab.

Bill

(The). The nose, also called the beak. Hence, “Billy” is slang for a pocket—handkerchief.

“Lastly came Winter, clothed all in frize,

Chattering his teeth for cold that did him chill; Whilst on his hoary beard his breath did freeze; And the dull drops that from his purple bill [nose], As from a limbeck, did adown distill.”

Spenser: Faërie Queene,

canto vii.

Bill

(A). The draft of an Act of Parliament.

A public bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament affecting the general public. A private bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament for the granting of something to a company, corporation, or certain individuals.

A true bill.

I confess what you say is true. The case against the accused is first submitted to the grand jury. If they think the charge has a fair colour, they write on the declaration “A true bill,” and the case is submitted to the petty jury. Otherwise, they write “No true bill,” or “Not found,” and the case is at once dismissed or “ignored.”

To ignore a bill is to write on it ignoramus.

“Ignoramus' is the word properly used by the Grand Enquest ... and written upon the bill.”— Cowell.

Bills payable. Bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other documents promising to pay a sum of money. Bills receivable. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other acceptances held by a person to whom the money stated is payable.

Bill of Fare

(A). A list of the menu provided, or which may be ordered, at a restaurant.

Bill of Health

A clean bill of health. A document, duly signed by the proper authorities, to certify that when the ship set sail no infectious disorder existed in the place.

A foul bill of health is a document to show that the place was suffering from some infection when the ship set sail. If a captain cannot show a clean bill, he is supposed to have a foul one.

Bill of Lading

A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgment of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition to the persons named in the bill, certain exceptions being duly provided for. These bills are generally in triplicate— one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Pains and Penalties

(A). A legislative act imposing punishment (less than capital) upon a person charged with treason or other high crimes.

Bill of Quantities

An abstract of the probable cost of a building.

Bill of Rights

The declaration delivered to the Prince of Orange on his election to the British throne, confirming the rights and privileges of the people. (Feb. 13th, 1689.)

Bill of Sale

When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives him a bill of sale, that is, permission to sell the goods if the money is not returned on a stated day.

Bills of Mortality

took their rise in 1592, when a great pestilence broke out, which continued till 1595. The term is now used for those abstracts from parish registers which show the births, deaths, and baptisms of the district.

Within the Bills of Mortality

= within the district.

Bills of Parcels

An itemised statement of articles purchased. These bills are itemised by the seller.

Billee'

(Little). The youngest of "Three sailors of Bristol city," who "took a boat and went to sea."

"There was gorging Jack, and guzzling Jimmy,

And the youngest— he was little Billee,

Now, when they got as far as the equator,

They had nothing left but one split pea.

To gorging Jack says guzzling Jimmy, 'We've nothing left, we must eat we.'"

Thackeray.

[They decide to eat Little Billee, but he contrives to escape.]

Billet—doux

[pronounce billy doo]. French, a love—letter, a sweet or affectionate letter.

Billiards

A corrupt form of the French billard. "Autrefois, le bâton avec lequel on poussait les billes"; then "la table verte sur laquelle on joue"; and, lastly, the "game itself."

Similar plural forms are the games called bowls, cards, dominoes, draughts, marbles, quoits, skittles, tops, etc.

Billings

(Josh). The nom de plume of H. W. Shaw, an American humorist, who died 1885. His Book of Sayings was published in 1866.

Billingsgate

(London). Gate = quay, and bellan is to bawl or bellow. This quay is so called from the shouting of the fishermen in trying to attract attention and vend their fish.

That's Billingsgate.

Vulgar and coarse, like the manners and language of Billingsgate fish—fags.

“Parnassus spoke the cant of Billingsgate.”

Dryden: Art of Poetry,

c. 1.

To talk Billingsgate, i.e.

to slang, to scold in a vulgar, coarse style.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish—fag, i.e.

you are as rude and ill—mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish—market. The French say “Maubert” instead of Billingsgate, as Your compliments are like those of the Place Maubert, i.e. no compliments at all, but vulgar dirt—flinging. The “Place Maubert” has long been noted for its market.

Billingsgate Pheasant

(A). A red herring.

Billy

A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billet.

A pocket—handkerchief. “A blue billy” is a handkerchief with blue ground and white spots.

Billy Barlow

A street droll, a merry Andrew; so called from a half—idiot of the name, who fancied himself “some great personage.” He was well known in the East of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes really droll.

Billycock Hats

First used by Billy Coke (Mr. William Coke) at the great shooting parties at Holkham. The old—established hatters in the West End still call them “Coke hats.”

Bi—metallism

The employment of two metals, silver and gold, of fixed relative value. Now gold is the only standard metal in England and some other countries. Silver coins are mere tokens, like copper coins; and if given in payment of large sums are estimated at the market value, so much an ounce; but a gold sovereign is always of one fixed legal value.

Binary Arithmetic

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Arithmetic in which the base of the notation is 2 instead of 10. The unit followed by a cipher signifies two, by another unit it signifies three, by two ciphers it signifies four, and so on. Thus, 10 signifies two, 100 signifies four; while 11 signifies 3, etc.

Binary Theory

A theory which supposes that all definite chemical salts are combinations of two radicles or elements, one of which is electro—positive (basic), and the other electro—negative (acid).

Bingham's Dandies The 17th Lancers; so called from their colonel, the Earl of Lucan, formerly Lord Bingham. The uniform is noted for its admirable fit and smartness. Now called “The Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers.”

Binnacle

The case of the mariner's compass, which used to be written bittacle, a corruption of the Portuguese bitacola, French, habitacle, properly an abode.

Birchin Lane

I must send you to Birchin Lane, i.e. whip you. The play is on birch (a rod).

A suit in Birchin Lane.

Birchin Lane was once famous for all sorts of apparel; references to second—hand clothes in Birchin Lane are common enough in Elizabethan books.

“Passing through Birchin Lane amidst a camp—royal of hose and doublets, I took ... occasion to slip into a captain's suit— a valiant buff doublet stuffed with points and a pair of velvet slops scored thick with lace.”—Middleton: Black Book (1604).

Bird

An endearing name for girl.

“And by my word, your bonnie bird

In danger shall not tarry;

So, though the waves are raging white,

I'll row you o'er the ferry.”

Campbell: Lord Ullin's Daughter.

Bird is the Anglo—Saxon bird, the young of any animal, hence bride, verb, beran, to bring forth.

A bird of ill—omen.

A person who is regarded as unlucky; one who is in the habit of bringing ill—news. The ancients thought that some birds indicated good luck, and others evil. Even to the present day many look upon owls, crows, and ravens as unlucky birds; swallows and storks as lucky ones.

Ravens, by their acute sense of smell, discern the savour of dying bodies, and, under the hope of preying on them, light on chimney—tops or flutter about sick rooms; hence the raven indicates death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand, and as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.

A bird of passage.

A person who shifts from place to place; a temporary visitant, like a cuckoo, the swallows, starlings, etc.

A jail—bird.

(See Jail.)

The bird of Juno.

The peacock.

Minerva's bird is either the cock or the owl; that of Venus is the dove.

The bird of Washington.

The American or baldheaded eagle.

“The well—known bald—headed eagle, sometimes called the Bird of Washington.”— Wood.

The Arabian bird. The phoenix. The green bird tells everything a person wishes to know. (Cherry and Fairstar.) The talking bird spoke with a human voice, and could bid all other birds join in concert. (Arabian Nights.) Old birds are not to be caught with chaff. Experience teaches wisdom.

One beats the bush, and another takes the bird.

The workman does the work, the master makes the money. ’Tis the early bird that catches the worm.

“Early to bed and early to rise,

Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.”

A little bird told me so.

From Eccles. x. 20: “Curse not the king, no not in thy thought, ... for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.”

Bird in the hand A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. Possession is better than expectation.

Italian:

“E meglio aver oggi un novo, che dimani una gallina.” French: “Il vaut mieux avoir l'oeuf aujourd'hui, que la poule demain” (Turkish).

“Un tien vaut mieux que deux tu l'auras.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Un sou, quand il est assuré, vaut mieux que cinq en espérance.”

German:

“Ein vogel in der hand ist besser als zehen über land.”

“Besser ein spatz in der hand, als ein storch auf dem dache.”

Latin:

“Ego spem pretio non emam.”

English:

“A pound in the purse is worth two in the book.” On the other side we have: “Qui ne s'aventure, n'a ni cheval ni mule.” “Nothing venture, nothing have.” “Give a sprat to catch a mackerel.” “Chi non s'arrischia, non guadagna.”

Bird in thy Bosom

Thou hast kept well the bird in thy bosom. Thou hast remained faithful to thy allegiance or faith. The expression was used by Sir Ralph Percy (slain in the battle of Hedgly Moor in 1464) to express his having preserved unstained his fidelity to the House of Lancaster.

Bird of Este

The white eagle, the cognisance of the house.

“His dazzling way

The bird of Estë soars beyond the solar ray.”

Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, x.

Birds

Birds of a feather flock together. Persons associate with those of a similar taste and station as themselves. Qui se ressemble s'assemble. Cicero says, “Similes similibus gaudent, pures cum paribus facillime congregantur.” “Ne nous associons qu'avec nos égaux” (La Fontaine).

To kill two birds with one stone.

To effect two objects with one outlay of trouble.

Birds

(protected by superstitions).

Choughs

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

are protected in Cornwall, because the soul of King Arthur migrated into a chough. The Hawk is held sacred by the Egyptians, because it is the form assumed by Ra or Horus. The Ibis is sacred in Egypt, and to kill one was at one time a capital offence. It is said that the god Thoth escaped (as an Ibis) from the pursuit of Typhon.

Mother Carey's Chickens, or Storm Petrels are protected by sailors, from a superstition that they are the living forms of the souls of deceased sailors.

The Robin

is protected, both from Christian tradition and nursery legend. (See Robin Redbreast.) The Stork is a sacred bird in Sweden, from the legend that it flew round the cross, crying Styrka, Styrka, when Jesus was crucified. (See Stork.)

Swans

are superstitiously protected in Ireland from the legend of the Fionnuala (daughter of Lir), who was metamorphosed into a swan and condemned to wander in lakes and rivers till Christianity was introduced.

(See Irish Melodies, Silent O'Moyle.)

The bat (a winged animal) was regarded by the Caribs as a good angel, which protected their dwellings at night; and it was accounted sacrilegious to kill one.

Bird's—eye View

A mode of perspective drawing in which the artist is supposed to be over the objects delineated, in which case he beholds them as a bird in the air would see them. A general view.

Birdcage Walk

(St. James's Park, London); so called from an aviary.

Birmingham Poet

John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy—eight in 1808. He was wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Birthday Suit He was in his birthday suit. Quite nude, as when first born.

Bis

Bis dat, qui cito dat (he gives twice who gives promptly)— i.e. prompt relief will do as much good as twice the sum at a future period (Publius Syrus Proverbs.)

Purple and bis, i.e.

purple and fine linen (Latin, byssus, fine flax). The spelling is sometimes biss, bys, etc.

Biscuit

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(French—Latin, bis, twice; cuit, baked). So called because it was originally twice ovened. The Romans had a bread of this kind.

In pottery, earthenware or porcelain, after it has been hardened in the fire, but has not yet been glazed, is so called.

Bise

A wind that acts notably on the nervous system. It is prevalent in those valleys of Savoy that open to the north.

“The Bise blew cold.”

Rogers: Italy,

part 1. div. ii. stanza 4.

Bishop

(Evêque), the same word, episcopus; whence episc, evesc, evesque, evêque; also 'piscop, bishop.

Bishop, Cardinal, Pope

(as beverages):

Bishop

is made by pouring red wine (such as claret or burgundy), either hot or cold, on ripe bitter oranges. The liquor is then sugared and spiced to taste. In Germany, “bishop” is a mixture of wine, sugar, nutmeg, and orange or lemon. It is sometimes called “Purple Wine,” and has received its name of bishop from its colour.

Cardinal

is made by using white wine instead of red. Pope is made by using tokay.

“When I was at college, Cup was spiced audit ale; Bishop was “cup” with wine (properly claret or burgundy) added; Cardinal was “cup” with brandy added. All were served with a hedge—hog [i.e. a whole lemon or orange bristling with cloves] floating in the midst. Each guest had his own glass or cup filled by a ladle from the common bowl (a large silver one).”

The bishop hath put his foot in it.

Said of milk or porridge that is burnt, or of meat over—roasted. Tyndale says, “If the podech be burned—to, or the meate ouer rosted, we saye the byshope hath put his fote in the potte,” and explains it thus, “because the bishopes burn who they lust.” Such food is also said to be bishopped.

Bishop Barnaby

The May—bug, lady—bird, etc.

Bishop in Partibus

(See In Partibus .)

Bishop of Hippo

St. Augustine. (354—430) is often so referred to. He held the See for many years.

Bishop's Apron

represents the short cassock which, by the 74th canon, all clergymen were enjoined to wear.

Bishop's Bible

(The). (See under Bible, page 131, col. 2.)

Bishop's Mitre

Dean Stanley tells us that the cleft of a bishop's mitre represents the mark of the crease of the mitre, when folded and carried under the arm, like an opera hat. (Christian Institutions, p. 154.)

Bissextile

Leap—year. We add a day to February in leap—year, but the Romans counted the 24th of February twice. Now, the 24th of February was called by them “dies bissextus” (sexto calendas Martias), the sextile or sixth day before March 1st; and this day being reckoned twice (bis) in leap—year, was called “annus bissextus.”

Bisson

or Bisen [blind] is the Anglo—Saxon bisen. Shakespeare (Hamlet, ii. 2) speaks of bisson rheum (blinding tears), and in Coriolanus, ii. 1, “What harm can your bisson conspectuities glean out of this character?”

Bistonians

The Thracians; so called from Biston, son of Mars, who built Bistonia on the Lake Bistonis.

“So the Bistonian race, a maddening train,

Exult and revel on the Thracian plain;

With milk their bloody banquets they allay.

Or from the lion rend his panting prey;

On some abandoned savage fiercely fly,

Seize, tear, devour, and think it luxury.”

Pitt: Statius, Book ii.

Bit

A piece.

A bit of my mind,

as "Ill tell him a bit of my mind," I'll reprove him. Same word as bite, meaning a piece bitten off, hence a piece generally. (Anglo—Saxon, bitan, to bite.)

Bit by bit.

A little at a time; piece—meal.

Not a bit,

or Not the least bit. Not at all; not the least likely. This may be not a morsel, or not a doit, rap, or sou. "Bit" used to be a small Jamaica coin. We still talk of a threepenny—bit. Bit, of course, is the substantive of bite, as morsel (French morceau) of mordre.

Bit

(of a horse). To take the bit in (or between) his teeth. To be obstinately self—willed; to make up one's mind not to yield. When a horse has a mind to run away, he catches the bit "between his teeth," and the driver has no longer control over him.

"Mr. X. will not yield. He has taken the bit between his teeth, and is resolved to carry out his original measure."— Newspaper paragraph, April, 1886.

Bit

Money. The word is used in the West Indies for a half pistareen (fivepence). In Jamaica, a bit is worth sixpence, English; in America, 12 1/2 cents; in Ireland, tenpence.

The word is still thieves' slang for money generally, and coiners are called bit—makers. In English we use the word for a coin which is a fraction of a unit. Thus, a shilling being a unit, we have a six—penny bit and threepenny bit (or not in bits but in divers pieces). So, taking a sovereign for a unit, we had seven—shilling bits, etc.

Bite

A cheat; one who bites us. "The biter bit" explains the origin. We say "a man was bitten" when he "burns his fingers" meddling with something which promised well but turned out a failure.

To bite the dust,

as "Their enemies shall bite the dust," i.e. be slain in battle.

Bite

To bite one's thumb at another. To insult; to provoke to a quarrel.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Gregory. I will frown as I pass by: and let them take it as they list.

“Sampson. Nay, as they dare. I will bite my thumb at them; which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it.”—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 1.

To bite the lip,

indicative of suppressed chagrin, passion, or annoyance.

“She had to bite her lips till the blood came in order to keep down the angry words that would rise in her heart.”—Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, chap. xi.

To bite upon the bridle.

To champ the bit, like an impatient or restless horse.

Bitelas

Sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukenaw, the ape, in the story of Reynard the Fox. (Alkmar.)

Bites and Bams

Hoaxes and quizzes; humbugery.

“[His] humble efforts at jocularities were chiefly confined to ... bites and bams.”—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. 3.

Biting Remark

(A). A remark more biting than Zeno's. Nearchos ordered Zeno the philosopher to be pounded to death in a mortar. When he had been pounded some time, he told Nearchos he had an important secret to communicate to him; but, when the tyrant bent over the mortar to hear what Zeno had to say, the dying man bit off his ear.

“That would have been a biting jest.”

Shakespeare: Richard III.,

act ii. 4.

Bitt

To bitt the cable is to fasten it round the “bitt” or frame made for the purpose, and placed in the fore part of the vessel.

Bitten

Imposed upon, let in, made to suffer loss. “I was terribly bitten in that affair.” I suffered great loss. To bite is to cheat or suffer retaliation. Thus, Pope says, “The rogue was bit,” he intended to cheat, but was himself taken in. “The biter bit” is the moral of Æsop's fable called The Viper and the File; and Goldsmith's mad dog, which, “for some private ends, went mad and bit a man,” but the biter was bit, for “The man recovered of the bite, the dog it was that died.”

Bitter End

(The). A outrance; with relentless hostility; also applied to affliction, as, “she bore it to the bitter end,” meaning to the last stroke of adverse fortune. “All Thy waves have gone over me, but I have borne up under them to the bitter end.” Here “bitter end” means the end of the rope. The “bitter—end” is a sea term meaning “that part of the cable which is “abaft the bitts.” When there is no windlass the cables are fastened to bitts, that is, pieces of timber so called; and when a rope is payed out to the bitter—end, or to these pieces of timber, all of it is let out, and no more remains. However, we read in Prov. v. 4, “Her end is bitter as wormwood,” which, after all, may be the origin of the phrase.

Bitter as Gall

as soot, as wormwood. Absinthe is made of wormwood. (See Similes.)

Bittock

A little bit; —ock as a diminutive is preserved in bull—ock, hill—ock, butt—ock, etc. “A mile and a bittock” is a mile and a little bit. (Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, i.)

Biz

in theatrical slang, means “business.” Good biz means full houses; but an actor's “biz” is quite another thing, meaning by—play. Thus, Hamlet trifling with Ophelia's fan, Lord Dundreary's hop, and so on, are the special “business” of the actor of the part. As a rule, the “business” is invented by the actor who creates the part, and is handed down by tradition.

Black

for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x. 245) borrowed from the Egyptians.

Black,

in blazonry, means constancy, wisdom, and prudence. Black, in several of the Oriental nations, is a badge of servitude, slavery, and low birth. Our word blackguard seems to point to this meaning. The Latin niger meant bad, unpropitious. (See Blackguard.)

Black (See under Colours for its symbolisms, etc.).

Black as a Crow

(or as a raven); “as a raven's wing;” as ink; as hell, i.e. hades (2 syl.), meaning death or the grave; as your hat, etc. (See Similes.)

Black as a Newgate Knocker

A Newgate knocker is the fringe or lock of hair which costermongers and thieves twist back towards the ear.

Black in the Face

Extremely angry. The face discoloured with passion or distress.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Mr. Winkle pulled ... till he was black in the face.”— Dickens: Pickwick Papers.

“He swore himself black in the face.”— Peter Pindar Wolcott .

Black is White

(See Swear.)

Beaten black and blue.

So that the skin is black and blue with the marks of the beating. I must have it in black and white, i.e. in plain writing; the paper being white and the ink black. To say black's his eye, i.e. to vituperate, to blame. The expression, Black's the white of his eye, is a modern corruption. To say the eye is black or evil, is to accuse a person of an evil heart or great ignorance. The Latin niger also meant evil. (See Black Prince.)

“A fool may do all things, and no man say black's his eye.”— The Tell Tale.

Black Act

9 Geo. I. c. 22 is so called, because it was directed against the Waltham deer—stealers, who blackened their faces for disguise, and, under the name of Blacks, appeared in Epping Forest. This Act was repealed in 1827.

Black Acts

Acts of the Scottish Parliament between the accession of James I. and the year 1587; so called because they were printed in black characters.

Black Art

The art practised by conjurors, wizards, and others, who professed to have dealings with the devil. Black here means diabolical or wicked. Some derive it from nigromancy, a corruption of necromancy.

Black Assize

July 6th, 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford during the time of assize.

Black—balled

Not admitted to a club; the candidate proposed is not accepted as a member. In voting by ballot, those who accept the person proposed drop a white or red ball into the box, but those who would exclude the candidate drop into it a black one. It is now more usually done by two compartments, for “yes” and “no” respectively.

Black Book

A book exposing abuses in Church and State, which furnished much material for political reform in the early part of the present century. (See Black Books.)

Amherst speaks of the Proctor's black book, and tells us that no one can proceed to a degree whose name is found there. (1726.) It also appears that each regiment keeps a black book or record of ill—behaviour.

Black Book of the Admiralty.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An old navy code, said to have been compiled in the reign of Edward III.

Black Books

To be in my black books. In bad odour; in disgrace; out of favour. The black books were those compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. to set forth the scandalous proceedings of the English monasteries, and were so called from the colour of their binding. We have similarly the Blue Book, the Red Book, and so on.

Black Books of the Exchequer.

An official account of the royal revenues, payments, perquisites, etc., in the reign of Henry II. Its cover was black leather. There are two of them preserved in the Public Record Office.

Black Brunswickers A corps of 700 volunteer hussars under the command of Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick, who had been forbidden by Napoleon to succeed to his father's dukedom. They were called “Black” because they wore mourning for the deceased Duke. Frederick William fell at Quatre—Bras, 1815. One of Millais's best pictures is called “The Black Brunswicker.”

Black Cap

or the Judgment Cap, worn by a judge when he passes sentence of death on a prisoner. This cap is part of the judge's full dress. The judges wear their black caps on November 9th, when the Lord Mayor is presented in the Court of Exchequer. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo—Saxons. (2 Sam. xv. 30.)

Black Cattle

Oxen for slaughter; so called because black is their prevailing colour, at least in the north.

Black Cattle

Negro slaves.

“She was chartered for the West Coast of Africa to trade with the natives, but not in black cattle, for slavery was never our line of business.”—J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. xi.

Black Death

A putrid typhus, in which the body turned black with rapid putrefaction. It occurred in 1348, and carried off twenty—five millions in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater.

Black Diamonds

Coals; also clever fellows of the lower orders. Coals and diamonds are both carbon.

Black Dog

A fiend still dreaded in many country places. (See Dog.)

Black Dog.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Base silver coin in the reign of Anne. Made of pewter double washed.

Black Doll

(A). The sign of a marine store shop. The doll was a dummy dressed to indicate that cast—off garments were bought.

Black Douglas

William Douglas, Lord of Nithsdale. Died 1390.

Black Flag

(A) denotes a pirate, and is called the “Jolly Roger.”

Black Flags

Moslem soldiers. The banner of the Abbasides (3 syl.) is black; that of the Fatimites (3 syl.) green; and that of the Ommiades (3 syl.) white. Hence the banner of the Kalif of Bagdad is black, but that of the Sultan of Damascus is green. (Gibbon, chap. iii.)

Black Flags.

Pirates of the Chinese Sea who opposed the French in Tonquin, etc.

Black—foot

There is a powerful and numerous tribe of North American Indians called Black—feet. A black—foot is an intermediary in love affairs; but if perfidious to the wooer he was called a white—foot.

Blackfoot

(The). One of the many Irish factions which disturbed the peace in the first half of the nineteenth century.

“And the Blackfoot, who courted each foeman's approach, Faith! `tis hot—foot [speedily] he'd fly from the stout Father Roach.” Lover.

Black Friars

The Dominicans were formerly so called in England.

Black Friday

December 6th, 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Pretender had reached Derby.

Black Game

Heath—fowl; in contradistinction to red game, as grouse. The male bird is called a blackcock.

Black Genevan

(A). A black preaching gown; once used in some Anglican churches, and still used by some Dissenters in the pulpit. So called from Geneva, where Calvin preached in such a robe.

“The Nonconformist divine leaves his vestry in his black Genevan, toadied by his deacons and elders.”—Newspaper paragraph, July 18th, 1885 (on Sunday bands).

Black—guards

Those horse—boys and unmilitary folk, such as cooks with their pots, pans, and other kitchen utensils, which travel with an army, and greatly impede its march.

Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says: “In all great houses there were a number of dirty dependents, whose office it was to attend the wool—yards, sculleries, etc. Of these the most forlorn were selected to carry coals to the kitchen. They rode with the pots and pans, and were in derision called the black—guards.”

In the Lord Steward's office a proclamation (May 7th, 1683) begins thus: “Whereas ... a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boyes and rogues, commonly called the Black—guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows

... do usually haunt and follow the court. ... Wee do hereby strictly charge ... all those so called, ... with all other loose, idle ... men ... who have intruded themselves into his Majesty's court and stables ... to depart upon pain of imprisonment.”

Black Hole of Calcutta

A dark cell in a prison into which Suraja Dowlah thrust 146 British prisoners. Next morning only twenty—three were found alive (1756).

The punishment cell or lock—up in barracks.

Black Horse

The 7th Dragoon Guards, or “the Princess Royal's D.G.” Their “facings” are black. Also called “Strawboots,” “The Blacks.”

Black Jack

Black Jack rides a good horse (Cornish). The miners call blende or sulphide of zinc “Black Jack,” the occurrence of which is considered by them a favourable indication. The blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

Black Jack

(A). A large leather gotch for beer and ale, so called from the outside being tarred.

Black Joke

An old tune, now called The Sprig of Shillelagh. Tom Moore has adapted words to the tune, beginning, “Sublime was the warning which Liberty spoke.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Black Leg A swindler, especially in cards and races. Also, one who works for less than trade—union wages; a non—union workman.

“Pledging the strikers not to return to work so long as a single Black—leg was retained in the service.”—Nineteenth Century, February, 1891, p. 243.

Black Letter

The Gothic or German type. So called because of its black appearance. The initial items of this book are now called “black letter,” sometimes called “Clarendon type.”

Black Letter Day

An unlucky day; one to be recalled with regret. The Romans marked their unlucky days with a piece of black charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk.

Black—letter dogs.

Literary antiquaries who poke and pry into every hole and corner to find out black—letter copies of books.

“By fell black—letter dogs ...

That from Gothic kennels eager strut.”

Matthias: Pursuits of Literature.

Black Lists

Lists of insolvency and bankruptcy, for the private guidance of the mercantile community. (See Black Books .)

Black Looks

Looks of displeasure. To look black. To look displeased. The figure is from black clouds indicative of foul weather.

Black Mail

Money given to free—booters by way of exempting property from depredation. (Anglo—Saxon, mal, “rent—tax;” French, maille, an old coin worth .083 farthing). Grass mail was rent paid for pasturage. Mails and duties (Scotch) are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. “Black” in this phrase does not mean wicked or wrongful, but is the Gaelic, to cherish or protect. Black mail was a rent paid to Free Companies for protecting the property paid for, from the depredations of freebooters, etc.

To levy black mail

now means to exact exorbitant charges; thus the cabs and omnibuses during the Great Exhibition years “levied black mail” on the public.

Black Man

(The). The Evil One.

Black Maria

The black van which conveys prisoners from the police courts to jail. The French call a mud—barge a “Marie—salope.” The tradition is that the van referred to was so called from Maria Lee, a negress, who kept a sailors' boarding house in Boston. She was a woman of such great size and strength that the unruly stood in dread of her, and when constables required help, it was a common thing to send for Black Maria, who soon collared the refractory and led them to the lock—up. So a prison—van was called a “Black Maria.”

Black Monday

Easter Monday, April 14th, 1360, was so called. Edward III. was with his army lying before Paris, and the day was so dark, with mist and hail, so bitterly cold and so windy, that many of his horses and men died. Monday after Easter holidays is called “Black Monday,” in allusion to this fatal day. Launcelot says:

“It was not for nothing that my nose fell a— bleeding on Black Monday last, at six o'clock i' the morning.”—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 5.

February 27th, 1865, was so called in Melbourne from a terrible sirocco from the N.N.W., which produced dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black Monday.

In schoolboy phraseology is the first Monday after the holidays are over, when lessons begin again.

Black Money

Base coin brought to England by foreigners, and prohibited by Edward III.

Black Ox

The black ox has trod on his foot— i.e. misfortune has come to him. Black oxen were sacrificed to Pluto and other infernal deities.

Black Parliament

The Parliament held by Henry VIII. in Bridewell.

Black Prince

Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was “styled black by terror of his arms” (c. 169). Strutt confirms this saying: “for his martial deeds surnamed Black the Prince” (Antiquities). Meyrick says there is not the slightest proof that Edward, Prince of Wales. ever wore black armour (vol. ii.); indeed, we have much indirect proof against the supposition. Thus Shaw (vol. i. plate 31) gives a facsimile from a picture on the wall of St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, in which the prince is clad in gilt armour. Stothard says “the effigy is of copper gilt.” In the British Museum is an illumination of Edward III. granting to his son the duchy of Aquitaine, in which both figures are represented in silver armour with gilt joints. The first mention of the term “Black Prince” occurs in a parliamentary paper of the second year of Richard II.; so that Shakespeare has good reason for the use of the word in his tragedy of that king:—

“Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men, From forth the ranks of many thousand French.”

Richard II.,

ii. 3.

“That black name, Edward, black Prince of Wales.”— Henry V. ii. 4.

Black Republicans

The Republicans were so called by the pro—slavery party of the States, because they resisted the introduction of slavery into any State where it was not already recognised.

Black Rod

i.e. “Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,” so called from his staff of office— a black wand surmounted by a lion.

Black Rood of Scotland

The “piece of the true cross” or rood, set in an ebony crucifix, which Margaret, the wife of King Malcolm, left at death to the Scottish nation. It passed into various hands, but was lost at the Reformation.

Black Russia

Central and Southern Russia is so called from its black soil

“The winter crops in the whole of European Russia are very good, especially in the black—earth regions. In the government of Northern Russia the condition is less favourable.”— Newspaper paragraph, December, 1893.

Black Saturday

August 4th, 1621; so called in Scotland, because a violent storm occurred at the very moment the Parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sea

So called from the abounding black rock in the extensive coal—fields between the Bosphorus and Heracle'a.

Black Sheep [Kârâ—Koin—loo]. A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. This tribe was extirpated by the White Sheep (q.v.).

A Black Sheep. A disgrace to the family; a mauvais sujet; a workman who will not join in a strike. Black sheep are looked on with dislike by shepherds, and are not so valuable as white ones.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Black Standard

The dress, turbans, and standards of the Abbasside caliphs were all black. (D'Herbelot.)

Black Strap

Bad port wine. A sailor's name for any bad liquor. In North America, "Black—strap" is a mixture of rum and molasses, sometimes vinegar is added.

Black—thorn Winter

(The). The cold weather which frequently occurs when the black—thorn is in blossom. (See Borrowed Days .)

Black Thursday

February 6th, 1851; so called in the colony of Victoria, from a terrible bush—fire which then occurred.

Black Tom

The Earl of Ormonde, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth; so called from his ungracious ways and "black looks."

"He being very stately in apparel, and erect in port, despite his great age, yet with a dark, dour, and menacing look upon his face, so that all who met his gaze seemed to quake before the same."— Hon. Emily Lawless: With Essex in Ireland, p. 105.

Black Watch

Companies employed to watch the Islands of Scotland. They dressed in a "black" or dark tartan (1725). Subsequently they were enrolled into the 42nd regiment, under the Earl of Crawford, in 1737. Their tartan is still called "The Black Watch Tartan." The regiment is now called "The Royal Highlanders."

Black...White

To swear black is white. To persist in an obvious untruth. The French locution, Si vous lui dites blanc, il répondra noir, means, He will contradict what you say point blank.

Blacks

Mutes at funerals, who wore a black cloak; sometimes called the Black Guards.

"I do pray ye

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To give me leave to live a little longer.

You stand about me like my Blacks.”

Beaumont and Fletcher: Mons. Thomas, iii. 1.

Blacks

Blackacre (Widow). The best of Wycherley’s comic characters; she is a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, head—strong woman. (The Plain Dealer .)

Blackamoor

Washing the blackamoor white— i.e. engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of Æsop’s fables so entitled.

Blackness

All faces shall gather blackness (Joel ii. 6)— i.e. be downcast in consequence of trouble.

Blacksmith

The learned blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, U.S. (1811—1879.)

Bladamour

The friend of Paridel in Spenser’s Faërie Queene. The poet had his eye upon the Earl of Northumberland, one of the leaders in the northern insurrection of 1569. (See Paridel .)

Blade

A knowing blade, a sharp fellow; a regular blade, a buck or fop. (Anglo—Saxon, blad or blæd, a branch or sprig.)

Blæd

= “branch,” whence “fruit, prosperity, glory,” etc. The compound, Blæd—daeg = a prosperous day; blæd—gifa, a glory—giver, i.e. a king, a “regular blade.”

Bladud

A mythical king of England, and father of King Lear. He built the city of Bath, and dedicated the medicinal springs to Minerva. Bladud studied magic, and, attempting to fly, fell into the temple of Apollo and was dashed to pieces. (Geoffrey of Monmouth .)

“Inexhaustible as Bladud’s well.”— Thackeray.

Blanchefleur

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The heroine of Boccaccio's prose romance called Il Filocopo. Her lover, Flores, is Boccaccio himself, and Blanchefleur was a young lady passionately beloved by him, the natural daughter of King Robert. The story of Blanchefleur and Flores is substantially the same as that of Dorigen and Aurelius by Chaucer, and that of Dianora and Ansaldo in the Decameron. (See Dianora and Dorigen.)

Blandiman

The faithful manservant of fair Bellisant (q.v.), who attended her when she was divorced. (Valentine and Orson.)

Blaney

A wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation, in Crabbe's Borough.

Blank Practice

Shooting for practice with blank cartridges.

Blank Verse

English verse without rhyme.

Blanket

The wrong side of the blanket. A love—child is said to come of the wrong side of the blanket.

“He grew up to be a fine waule fallow, like mony ane that comes o' the wrang side o' the blanket.”— Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxiv.

A wet blanket.

A discouragement, a marplot. A person is a wet blanket who discourages a proposed scheme.

“Treated with a wet blanket,” discouraged. “A wet blanket influence,” etc. A wet blanket is used to smother fire, or to prevent one escaping from a fire from being burnt.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Blanketeers

The Coxeyites were so called in 1894. “General” Coxey of the United States induced 50,000 persons to undertake a 700 miles' march to Washington, with blankets on their backs, to terrorise Congress into finding work for the unemployed.

Previous to this, the word had been applied to some 5,000 Radical operatives who assembled on St. Peter's Field, near Manchester, March 10, 1817. They provided themselves with blankets and rugs, intending to march to London, to lay before the Prince Regent a petition of grievances. Only six got as far as Ashbourne Bridge, when the expedition collapsed.

“The Americans have no royal dukes, no bench of bishops, no House of Lords, no effete monarchy; but they have Home Rule, one man one vote, and Coxey with his blanketeers.”— Liberty Review, May 5th, 1894, p. 354.

Blare

To cry with a great noise, like a child in a tricky temper; to bellow. (Latin, ploro, to weep with noise.)

Blarney

None of your blarney. Soft, wheedling speeches to gain some end; sugar—words. Cormack Macarthy held the castle of Blarney in 1602, and concluded an armistice with Carew, the Lord President, on condition of surrendering the fort to the English garrison. Day after day his lordship looked for the fulfilment of the terms, but received nothing except protocols and soft speeches, till he became the laughing—stock of Elizabeth's ministers, and the dupe of the Lord of Blarney.

To kiss the Blarney Stone.

Whoever does this shall be able to persuade to anything. The Blarney Stone is triangular, lowered from the north angle of the castle, about twenty feet from the top, and containing this inscription: “Cormac Mac Carthy fortis me fieri fecit, A.D. 1446.” Blarney is near Cork.

Blase

(pronounce blah—zay). Surfeited with pleasure. A man blasé is one who has had full swing to all the pleasures of life, and has no longer any appetite for any of them. A worn out debauchée (French, blaser, to exhaust with enjoyment).

Blasphemous Balfour

Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called because of his apostasy. He died 1583.

Blast

In full blast. In the extreme. In America will be heard such a sentence as this: “When she came to the meeting in her yellow hat and feathers, wasn't she in full blast?” A metaphor from the blast furnace in full operation.

Blast

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To strike by lightning; to make to wither. The “blasted oak.” This is the sense in which the word is used as an exclamation.

“If it [the [ghost] assume my noble father's person,

I'll cross it, though it blast me.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet,

i. 1.

Blatant Beast

(The). “A dreadful fiend of gods and men, ydrad,” type of “Common Rumour” or “Slander.” He has 100 tongues and a sting; with his tongues he speaks things “most shameful, most unrighteous, most untrue;” and with his sting “steeps them in poison.” Sir Calidore muzzled the monster, and drew him with a chain to Faërie Land. After a time the beast broke his chain and regained his liberty. (Saxon, blæton, to bellow.) (Spenser: Faërie Queene, books v. vi.)

Blayney's Bloodhounds

The old 89th Foot; so called because of their unerring certainty, and untiring perseverance in hunting down the Irish rebels in 1798, when the corps was commanded by Lord Blaney. This regiment is now called “the Second Battalion of the Princess Victoria's Irish Fusiliers.” The first battalion is the old 87th Foot.

Blaze

A white mark in the forehead of a horse. (Icelandic, blesi, a white star on the forehead of a horse; German, blasz, pale.)

A star is a sort of white diamond in the forehead. A blaze is an elongated star or dash of white.

To blaze a path.

To notch trees as a clue. Trees so notched are called in America “blazed trees,” and the white wood shown by the notch is called “a blaze.” (See above.)

“Guided by the blazed trees ... they came to the spot.”— Goulding: The Young Marooners, 118.

“They buried him where he lay, a blazed tree marking his last resting—place.”— Adventures in Mashonaland, p. 158.

Blaze

(To). To blaze abroad. To noise abroad is the German verb blasen, to blow or sound. Shakespeare uses the noun blazon:

“But this eternal blazon must not be

To ears of flesh and blood.”

Hamlet, i. 5.

Blazer

(A). A boatman's jacket. Properly and originally applied to the Johnian crew (Camb.), whose boat jackets are the brightest possible scarlet.

“A blazer is the red flannel boating jacket worn by the Lady Margaret, St. John's College, Cambridge, Boat Club.”— Daily News, August 22nd, 1889.

Blazon

[Blazonry]. To blazon is to announce with a trumpet, hence the Ghost in Hamlet says, “But this eternal blazon must not be to ears of flesh and blood,” i.e. this babbling about eternal things, or things of the other world, must not be made to persons still in the flesh. Knights were wont to be announced by the blast of a trumpet on their entrance into the lists; the flourish was answered by the heralds, who described aloud the arms and devices borne by the knight; hence, to blazon came to signify to “describe the charges borne”; and blazonry is “the science of describing or deciphering arms.” (German, blasen, to blow.)

Ble

Manger son blé en herbe (French), to eat the calf before it is cast; to spend your fortune before it comes to you; to spend your income in advance. Literally, to feed off your green wheat.

Blear—eyed

(The). Aurelius Brandolini, the Italian poet, called Il Lippo (1440—1497).

Bleed

To make a man bleed is to make him pay dearly for something; to victimise him. Money is the life—blood of commerce.

It makes my heart bleed.

It makes me very sorrowful.

“She found them indeed,

But it made her heart bleed.”

Little Bo—Peep.

Bleeding of a Dead Body

(The). It was at one time believed that, at the approach of a murderer, the blood of the murdered body gushed out. If in a dead body the slightest change was observable in the eyes, mouth, feet, or hands, the murderer was supposed to be present. The notion still survives in some places.

Blefuscus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An island severed from Lilliput by a channel 800 yards wide, inhabited by pigmies. Swift meant it for France. (Gulliver's Travels.)

Bleidablik [vast splendour]. The abode of Baldur, the Scandinavian Apollo.

Blemmyes

(of Africa). Men said to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed in the breast. (See Acephalites; Caora.)

Blenheim Dog

A small spaniel; so called from Blenheim Palace in Oxfordshire, where the breed has been preserved ever since the palace was built.

Blenheim House

(Oxfordshire). The house given by the nation to the Duke of Marlborough, for his victory over the French at Blenheim, in Bavaria, in the reign of Queen Anne (1704).

“When Europe freed confessed the saving power

Of Marlborough's hand, Britain. who sent him forth, Chief of confederate hosts, to fight the cause

Of liberty and justice, grateful raised

This palace, sacred to the leader's fame.”

Littleton: Blenheim.

Blenheim Steps

Once noted for an anatomical school, over which Sir Astley Cooper presided. Here “resurrectionists” were sure to find a ready mart for their gruesome wares, for which they received sums of money varying from 10, and sometimes more. Such phrases as “going to Blenheim Steps,” meant going to be dissected, or unearthed from one's grave.

“The body—snatchers, they have come,

And made a snatch at me;

˘Tis very hard them kind of men

Won't let a body be.

The cock it crows— I must be gone—

My William, we must part;

But I'll be yours in death although

Sir Astley has my heart.”

Hood: Mary's Ghost.

Bless

He has not a [sixpence] to bless himself with, i.e. in his possession; wherewith to make himself happy. This expression may probably be traced to the time when coins were marked with a deeply—indented cross. Cf. To keep the devil out of one's pocket.

Blessing

with three fingers is symbolical of the Trinity, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Blest

I'll be blest if I do it. I am resolved not to do it. A euphemism for curst. Blikiandabol [splendid misery]. The canopy of the goddess Hel or Hela (q.v.).

Blimber

(Miss). A blue—stocking, who knows the dead languages, and wears learned spectacles. She is the daughter of Dr. Blimber, a fossil school—master of the high and dry grammar type (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Blind

That's a mere blind. A pretence; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The metaphor is from window—blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

Blind as a bat.

A bat is not blind, but when it enters a room well lighted, it cannot see, and blunders about. It sees best, like a cat, in the dusk. (See Similes.)

Blind as a beetle. Beetles are not blind, but the dor—beetle or hedge—chafer, in its rapid flight, will occasionally bump against one as if it could not see.

Blind as a mole.

Moles are not blind, but as they work underground, their eyes are very small. There is a mole found in the south of Europe, the eyes of which are covered by membranes, and probably this is the animal to which Aristotle refers when he says, “the mole is blind.” (See Similes.)

Blind as an owl.

Owls are not blind, but being night birds, they see better in partial darkness than in the full light of day. (See Similes.)

You came on his blind side.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

His soft or tender—hearted side. Said of persons who wheedle some favour out of another. He yielded because he was not wide awake to his own interest.

“Lincoln wrote to the same friend that the nomination that the democrats on the blind side.”— Nicolay and Hay: Abraham Lincoln, vol. i. chap. xv. p. 275.

Blind leaders of the blind.

The allusion is to sect of the Pharisees, who were wont to shut their eyes when they walked abroad, and often ran their heads against a wall or fell into a ditch. (Matt xv. 14.)

The Blind

Francesco Bello, called Il Cieco.

Luigi Grotto, called Il Cieco, the Italian poet. (1541—1585.) Lieutenant James Holman, The Blind Traveller. (1787—1857.) Ludwig III Emperor of Germany, L'Aveugle. (880, 890—934.)

Blind Alley

(A). A “cul de sac,” an alley with no outlet. It is blind because it has no “eye” or passage through it.

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green

(The). A public—house sign in the Whitechapel Road. (Hotten History of Sign—Boards.) (See Beggar.)

Blind Department

(The). In Post Office parlance, means that department where letters with incoherent, insufficient, or illegible addresses are examined, and, if possible, put upon the proper track for delivery. The clerk so employed is called “The Blind Man.”

“One of these addresses was “Santlings, Hilewite” (St. Helen's, Isle of Wight). I, myself, had one from France addressed, ‘A Mons. E. Cobham, brasseur, Angleterre,’ and it reached me. Another address was ‘Haselfeach in no famtshare’ (Hazelbeach, Northamptonshire).”

Blind Ditch

(A). One which cannot be seen. Here blind means obscure, as a blind village.

Blind Harper

(The). John Parry, who died 1739.

Blind Harry

A Scotch minstrel of the fifteenth century. His epic of Sir William Wallace runs to 11,861 lines.

Blind Hedge

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A hawhaw hedge, not easily seen. Milton uses the word blind for concealed, as “In the blind mazes of this tangled wood.” (Comus, line 181.)

Blind old Man of Scio's rocky Isle

Homer is so called by Byron in his Bride of Abydos.

Blind Magistrate

(The). Sir John Fielding, knighted in 1761, was born blind. He was in the commission of the Peace for Middlesex, Surrey, Essex, and the liberties of Westminster.

Blindman's Holiday

The hour of dusk, when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles.

Blindman's Lantern (The), or “Eyes to the Blind.” A walking stick with which a blind man guides his way. In French argot bougie means a walking stick.

Blindmen's Dinner

(The). A dinner unpaid for. A dinner in which the landlord is made the victim. Eulenspiegel being asked for alms by twelve blind men, said, “Go to the inn; eat, drink, and be merry, my men; and here are twenty florins to pay the fare.” The blind men thanked him; each supposing one of the others had received the money. Reaching the inn, they told the landlord of their luck, and were at once provided with food and drink to the amount of twenty florins. On asking for payment, they all said, “Let him who received the money pay for the dinner,” but none had received a penny.

Blinkers

Spectacles; the allusion is to a horse's blinkers.

Block

To block a Bill. In parliamentary language means to postpone or prevent the passage of a Bill by giving notice of opposition, and thus preventing its being taken after half—past twelve at night.

“By blocking the Bill [he] denied to two million persons the right of having votes.”— Contemporary Review, August, 1884, p. 171.

Blockhead

A stupid person; one without brains. The allusion is to a wig maker's dummy or tête à perruque, on which he fits his wigs.

Your wit will not so soon out as another man's will, `tis strongly wedged up in a block—head” — Shakespeare Coriolanus, ii. 3.

Blood

A buck, an aristocratic rowdy. A term taken from blood horses.

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“A blood or dandy about town.”— Thackeray: Vanity Fair, chap. x. p. 49.

Blood

Family descent.

And hath made of one blood all nations of men.”— Acts xvii. 26.

Blood thicker than water.

Relationship has a claim which is generally acknowledged. It is better to seek kindness from a kinsman than from a stranger. Water soon evaporates and leaves no mark behind; not so blood. So the interest we take in a stranger is thinner and more evanescent than that which we take in a blood relation.

“Weel! blude's thicker than water. She's welcome to the cheeses and the hams just the same.”— Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering.

A Prince of the Blood. One of the Royal Family. Bad blood. Anger, quarrels; as, It stirs up bad blood. It provokes to ill—feeling and contention. Blue blood. (See under Blue.)

Young blood.

Fresh members; as, “To bring young blood into the concern.” In cold blood. Deliberately; not in the excitement of passion or of battle. It makes one's blood boil. It provokes indignation and anger.

It runs in the blood.

It is inherited or exists in the family race.

“It runs in the blood of our family.”— Sheridan: The Rivals, iv. 2.

My own flesh and blood. My own children, brothers, sisters, or other near kindred. Laws written in blood. Demades said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punished by death.

The field of blood.

Aceldama (Acts i. 19), the piece of ground purchased with the blood—money of our Saviour, and set apart for the burial of strangers.

The field of the battle of Cannæ, where Hannibal defeated the Romans, B.C. 216.

Blood of our Saviour.

An order of knighthood in Mantua; so called because their special office was to guard “the drops of the Saviour's blood” preserved in St. Andrew's church, Mantua.

Blood and iron policy— i.e.

war policy. No explanation needed.

Blood—guiltiness

The guilt of murder.

Blood—horse

(A). A thorough—bred.

Bloodhound

Figuratively, one who follows up an enemy with pertinacity. Bloodhounds used to be employed for tracking wounded game by the blood spilt; subsequently they were employed for tracking criminals and slaves who had made their escape, and were hunters of blood, not hunters by blood. The most noted breeds are the African, Cuban, and English.

Blood Money

Money paid to a person for giving such evidence as shall lead to the conviction of another; money paid to the next of kin to induce him to forego his “right” of seeking blood for blood; money paid to a person for betraying another, as Judas was paid blood—money for showing the band the place where Jesus might be found.

Blood Relation

(A). One in direct descent from the same father or mother; one of the same family stock.

Blood—thirsty

Eager for shedding blood.

Blood of the Grograms

(The). Taffety gentility; make—believe aristocratic blood. Grogram is a coarse silk taffety stiffened with gum (French, grosgrain).

“Our first tragedian was always boasting of his being ‘an old actor,’ and was full of the ‘blood of the Grograms.’” — C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 200.

Bloody

used as an expletive in such phrases as “A bloody fool,” “Bloody drunk,” etc., arose from associating folly and drunkenness, etc., with what are called “Bloods,” or aristocratic rowdies. Similar to “Drunk as a lord.”

“It was bloody hot walking to—day.” — Swift: Journal de Stella, letter xxii.

Bloody

(The). Otho II., Emperor of Germany. (955, 973—983.)

The Bloody Eleventh.

The old 11th Foot was so called from their having been several times nearly annihilated, as at Almanza, Fontenoy, Roucoux, Ostend, and Salamanca (1812), in capturing a French standard. Now called “The Devonshire Regiment.”

Bloody Assizes

The infamous assizes held by Judge Jeffreys in 1685. Three hundred were executed, more whipped or imprisoned, and a thousand sent to the plantations for taking part in Monmouth's rebellion.

Bloody Bill

The 31 Henry VIII., c. 14, which denounced death, by hanging or burning, on all who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Bloody—Bones A hobgoblin; generally “Raw—head and Bloody—Bones.”

Bloody Butcher

(See Butcher .)

Bloody Hand

A man whose hand was bloody, and was therefore presumed to be the person guilty of killing the deer shot or otherwise slain. (Cf. RED HAND.) Also the badge of a baronet.

Bloody Wedding

St. Bartholomew's slaughter in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage feast of Henri (afterwards Henri IV.,) and Marguerite (daughter of Catherine).

Bloody Week

(The). The week ending on Sunday, May 28th, 1871, when Paris was burning, being set on fire by the Communists in hundreds of places. The destruction was frightful, but Nôtre Dame, the Hôtel Dieu, and the magnificent collection of pictures in the Louvre, happily escaped demolition.

Bloom

From bloom to bloom. A floral rent. The Lord of the Manor received and rose or gillyflower, on the Feast of John the Baptist, yearly (July 5th, O. S.). (See Notes and Queries, Feb. 13th, 1886, p. 135.)

Bloomerism

A female costume; so called from Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, of New York, who tried in 1849 to introduce the fashion. The dress consisted of a short skirt and loose trousers gathered closely round the ankles— becoming enough to young ladies in their teens, but ridiculous for “the fat and forty.”

Blount

(Charles). Author of some deistical writings in the time of Charles II. (1654—1693.)

“He heard of Blount, etc.” Crabbe: Borough.

Blouse

A short smock—frock of a blue colour worn commonly by French workmen. Bleu is French argot for manteau.

“A garment called bliaut or bliaus, which appears to have been another name for a surcoat. ... In this bliaus we may discover the modern French blouse, a ... smock—frock.”— Planché: British Costume.

1. Blow

(To). As the wind blows; or to blow with the breath. (Anglo—Saxon, blawan, to blow or breathe.) It will soon blow over. It will soon be no longer talked about; it will soon come to an end, as a gale or storm blows over or ceases.

To blow off is another form of the same phrase.

To blow great guns.

The wind blows so violently that its noise resembles the roar of artillery. To blow hot and cold, (or) To blow hot and cold with the same breath. To be inconsistent. The allusion is to the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a satyr. Being cold, the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation, turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.

To blow off the steam.

To get rid of superfluous energy. The allusion is to the forcible escape of superfluous steam no longer required.

2. Blow

(To). To sound a trumpet.

“But when the blast of war blows in our ears,

Let us be tigers in our fierce deportment.”

Shakespeare: Henry V., iii. 1.

To blow.

To inform against a companion; to “peach.” The reference is to the announcing of knights by blast of trumpet.

3. Blow (To). To blast as with gunpowder.

I will blow him up sky high.

Give him a good scolding. A regular blowing up is a thorough jobation. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.

But to blow up a bladder, etc., means to inflate it.

4. Blow.

A stroke. (German, bläuen, to beat or strike.)

At one blow.

By one stroke.

The first blow is half the battle.

Well begun is half done. Pythagoras used it. say, "The beginning is half the whole." "Incipe: Dimidium facti est coepisse" (Ausonius). "Dimidium facti, qui coepit, habet" (Horace). "Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte."

Without striking a blow.

Without coming to a contest.

Blow a Cloud

To smoke a cigar or pipe. This term was in use in Queen Elizabeth's reign.

Blow Me

(an oath). You be blowed (an oath), a play on the word Dash me, which is a euphemism for a more offensive oath.

"`Well, if you won't stand a pint,' quoth the tall man, `I will, that's all, and blow temperance.'"— Kingsley: Alton Locke, chap. ii.

Blow out

(A). A "tuck in," or feast which swells out the paunch.

Blow—point

A game similar to our pea—puffing, only instead of peas small wooden skewers or bits of pointed wood were puffed through the tube. The game is alluded to by Florio, Strutt, and several other authors.

Blown

in the phrase "fly—blown," has nothing to do with the verb to blow (as the wind blows). It means that flies have deposited their eggs and tainted the article. In French, deposer des oeufs de mouches sur ... and a fly—blow is un oeuf de mouche. The word seems to be connected with blot, the egg of a moth or other insect.

Blown Herrings

are bloated herrings. The French bouffi (blown) is analogous to both expressions. Blown herrings are herrings bloated, swollen, or cured by smoking.

Blown upon

Made the subject of a scandal. His reputation has been blown upon, means has been the subject of talk wherein something derogatory was hinted at or even asserted. Blown upon by the breath of slander.

“Blown,” meaning stale, tainted, is probably the same as the above; but blown upon cannot be.

Blowzelinda

A country maiden in Gay's pastoral called The Shepherd's Week.

“Sweet is toil when Blowzelind is near;

Of our bereft, 'tis winter all the year

Come Blowzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,

My summer's shadow and my winter's fire.”

Pastoral i.

Blowzy

Coarse, red—faced, bloated; applied to women. The word is allied to blush, blaze, etc. (Dutch, bloozen and blaazen; Danish, blusser, to blaze.)

Blubber

To cry like a child, with noise and slaving. Connected with slobber, slaver.

“I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom.”

Otway: Venice Preserved,

i. 1.

Blubber Cheeks

Fat, flabby cheeks, like whale's blubber. “The blubber cheeks of my friend the baronet.”

Bluchers

Half boots; so called after Field—Marshal von Blucher (1742—1819).

Blue

or Azure is the symbol of Divine eternity and human immortality. Consequently, it is a mortuary colour— hence its use in covering the coffins of young persons. When used for the garment of an angel, it signifies faith and fidelity. As the dress of the Virgin, it indicates modesty. In blazonry, it signifies chastity, loyalty, fidelity, and a spotless reputation.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The Covenanters wore blue as their badge, in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Numb. xv. 38, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments ... and that they put upon the fringe ... a ribband of blue."

(See Colours for its symbolisms.)

Blue

(A), or a "staunch blue," descriptive of political opinions, for the most part means a Tory, for in most counties the Conservative colour is blue. (See True Blue.)

"This was a blue demonstration, a gathering of the Conservative clans."—Holme Lee.

A blue. (See Blue Stocking.) A dark blue. An Oxford man or Harrow boy. A light blue. A Cambridge man or Eton boy. An old blue. One who has pulled in a University boat—race, or taken part in any of their athletic contests.

"There were five old blues playing."—Standard, May 8th, 1883.

True blue.

This is a Spanish phrase, and refers to the notion that the veins shown in the skin of aristocratic families are more blue than that of inferior persons. (See Sang.)

True blue will never stain.

A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons and blouses worn by butchers, which do not show blood—stains.

True as Coventry blue.

The reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made at Coventry, noted for its permanent dye.

'Twas Presbyterian true blue

(Hudibras, i. 1). The allusion is to the blue apron which some of the Presbyterian preachers used to throw over their preaching—tub before they began to address the people. In one of the Rump songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says—

"Where I a tub did view, Hung with an apron blue; 'Twas the preacher's, I conjecture."

To look blue.

To be disconcerted. He was blue in the face. Aghast with wonder. The effect of fear and wonder is to drive the colour from the cheeks, and give them a pale—bluish tinge.

Blue—apron Statesman

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A lay politician, a tradesman who interferes with the affairs of the nation. The reference is to the blue apron once worn by almost all tradesmen, but now restricted to butchers, poulterers, fishmongers, and so on.

Blue Beans

Bullets. Lead is blue.

“Many a valiant Gaul had no breakfast that morning but what the Germans call ‘blue beans,’ i.e. bullets.”— W. Maccall: My School Days, 1885.

Three blue beans in a blue bottle or bladder. (See under Beans.)

Bluebeard

A bogey, a merciless tyrant, in Charles Perrault's Contes du Temps. The tale of Bluebeard (Chevalier Raoul) is known to every child, but many have speculated on the original of this despot. Some say it was a satire on Henry VIII., of wife—killing notoriety. Dr. C. Taylor thinks it is a type of the castle lords in the days of knight—errantry. Holinshed calls Giles de Retz, Marquis de Laval, the original Bluebeard. This Giles or Gilles who lived at Machecoul, in Brittany, was accused of murdering six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled and burnt in 1440.

“The Bluebeard chamber of his mind, into which no eye but his own must look.”— Carlyle.

Campbell has a Bluebeard story in his Tales of the Western Highlands, called The Widow and her Daughters. A similar one is No. 39 of Visentini's collection of Italian stories. So is No. 3 of Bernoni's collection.

Bluebeard's Key

When the blood stain of this key was rubbed out on one side, it appeared on the opposite side; so prodigality being overcome will appear in the form of meanness; and friends, over—fond, will often become enemies.

Blue Billy

(A). A blue neckcloth with white spots, worn by William Mace. More likely the allusion is to the bill or nose. (See Billy .)

Blue Blood

(See page 149, True Blue.)

Blue Boar

A public—house sign; the cognisance of Richard III. In Leicester is a lane in the parish of St. Nicholas, called the Blue Boar Lane, because Richard slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field.

“The bristly boar, in infant gore,

Wallows beneath the thorny shade.”

Gray: The Bard.

Blue Bonnets

(The). The Scotch Highlanders; the Scotch generally. So called from the blue woollen cap at one time in very general use in Scotland, and still far from uncommon.

“England shall many a day

Tell of the bloody fray,

When the blue bonnets came over the border.” Sir W. Scott.

Blue Books

In England, parliamentary reports and official publications presented by the Crown to both Houses of Parliament. Each volume is in folio, and is covered with a blue wrapper.

Short Acts of Parliament, etc., even without a wrapper, come under the same designation. In America, the “Blue Books” (like our “Red Books”) contain lists of those persons who hold government appointments. The official colour of Spain is red, of Italy green, of France yellow, of Germany and Portugal white.

Blue Bottle

A beadsman, a policeman; so called from the colour of his dress. Shakespeare makes Doll Tearsheet denounce the beadle as a “blue—bottle rogue.”

“You proud varlets, you need not be ashamed to wear blue, when your master is one of your fellows.”—Dekker: The Honest Whore (1602).

“I’ll have you soundly swung for this, you blue—bottle rogue.”—Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., act v. 4.

Blue Caps

or Blue Bonnets. The Scotch.

“He is there, too, ... and a thousand blue caps more.”—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Blue—coat School

Christ’s Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue coat girded at the loins with a leather belt. Some who attend the mathematical school are termed King’s boys, and those who constitute the highest class are Grecians.

Founded by Edward VI. in the year of his death. There are several other blue—coat schools in England besides Christ’s Hospital.

Blue Devils

or A fit of the blues. A fit of spleen, low spirits. Roach and Esquirol affirm, from observation, that indigo dyers are especially subject to melancholy; and that those who dye scarlet are choleric. Paracelsus also asserts that blue is injurious to the health and spirits. There may, therefore, be more science in calling melancholy blue than is generally allowed. The German blei (lead) which gives rise to our slang word blue or blucy (lead) seems to bear upon the “leaden down—cast eyes” of melancholy.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Blue eyed Maid

(The). Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, is so called by Home.

“Now Prudence gently pulled the poet's ear,

And thus the daughter of the Blue—eyed Maid, In Mattery's coating sounds, divinely said,

‘O Peter, eldest—born of Phoebus, hear.’ “

Peter Pindar: A Falling Minister.

Blue Fish

(The). The shark, technically called Carcharias glaucus, the upper parts of which are blue.

Blue Flag

He has hoisted the blue flag. He has turned publican or fishmonger, in allusion to the blue apron at one time worn by publicans, and still worn by fishmongers.

Blue Gown

(A). A harlot. Nares cells us that “a blue gown was a dress of ignominy for a harlot in the House of Correction. (See below.)

Blue—gowns

The bedesmen, to whom the kings of Scotland distributed certain alms. Their dress was a cloak or gown of coarse blue cloth, with a pewter badge. The number of these bedesmen was equal to that of the king's years, so that an extra one was added every returning birthday. These paupers were privileged to ask alms through the whole realm of Scotland. No new member has been added since 1833. (See Gaberlunzie .)

Blue Guards

(The). So the Oxford Blues, now called the Royal Horse Guards, were called during the campaign in Flanders (1742 1745).

Blue Hen

Captain Caldwell used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen. As Caldwell commanded the 1st Delaware regiment in the war, the State of Delaware was nicknamed Blue Hen.

Your mother was a blue hen, no doubt.

A reproof give to a braggart. (See above.)

Blue—jackets

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Sailors; so called because the colour of their jackets is blue.

Blue John

(A). A petrefaction of blue fluor—spar, found in the Blue John mine of Tre Cliff, Derbyshire; and so called to distinguish it from the Black Jack, an ore of zinc. Called John from John Kirk, a miner, who first noticed it.

Blue Laws

(The). These were puritanical laws enacted in 1732, at New Haven, Connecticut, in the United States of America. Their object was to stamp out “heresy,” and enforce a strict observance of the Sunday. Many persons insist that they are apocryphal; but in October, 1891, the German American Lincoln Club protested against their enforcement by a democratic judge, and resolved—

“To call upon all right-thinking citizens to assist in an effort to have the laws repealed, by supporting and voting only for such candidates for the legislature as would pledge themselves to vote for their repeal.”

Blue—light Federalists

A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made friendly (“blue—light”) signals to British ships in the war. (1812.)

Blue—mantle

The English pursuivant at arms is so called from his official robe.

Blue Monday

The Monday before Lent, spent in dissipation. (German, der blaue Montag.) It is said that dissipation gives everything a blue tinge. Hence “blue” means tipsy. (See Blue Devils .)

“Drink till all is blue.

Cracking bottles till all is blue.”

Fraser's Magazine, xvii. (1838).

Blue Moon

Once in a blue moon. Very rarely indeed. On December 10th, 1883, we had a “blue moon.” The winter was unusually mild.

Blue Mould

Applied to cheese which has become the bed of a fungus, technically called Aspergillus glaucus. The blue mould of bread, paste, jams, etc., is the fungus called Mucor Mucedo.

Blue Murder

To shout blue murder. Indicative more of terror or alarm than of real danger. It appears to be a play on the French exclamation morbleu; there may also be a distinct allusion to the common phrase “blue ruin.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Blue—noses

The Nova Scotians.

“Pray, sir,' said one of my fellow—passengers, `can you tell me the reason why the Nova Scotians are called “Blue—noses”?’

“`It is the name of a potato,' said I, `which they produce in the greatest perfection, and boast to be the best in the world. The Americans have, in consequence, given them the nickname of Blue Noses. ’”— Haliburton: Sam Slick.

Blue Peter

A flag with a blue ground and white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that the ship is about to sail. Peter is a corruption of the French partir (leave or notice of departure). The flag is hoisted to give notice to the town that any person having a money—claim may make it before the ship starts, and that all about to sail are to come on board.

According to Falconer, it is a corruption of the “blue repeater.”

In whist, it is a “call for trumps”; that is, laying on your partner's card a higher one than is required.

To hoist the blue Peter.

To leave.

“`When are you going to sail?’

“`I cannot justly say. Our ship's bound for America next voyage ... but I've got to go to the Isle of Man first ... And I may have to hoist the blue Peter any day.’”— Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, chap. xiii.

Blue—pigeon Flyer

A man who steals the lead off of a house or church. “Bluey” is slang for lead, so called from its colour. To “pigeon” is to gull, cheat, or fub. Hence, blue—pigeon, one who cheats another of his lead, or fubs his lead. “Flyer,” of course, is one who flies off with the stolen lead.

Blue Ribbon

(The). “To be adorned with the blue ribbon,” to be made knight of the garter, or adorned with a blue ribbon at the knee. Blue ribbon is also a temperance badge. (See Cordon Bleu .)

“Lord Lansdown is to be made Knight of the Garter ... though there is no vacancy. Lord Derby received the Blue Ribbon in 1859, although there was no vacancy.”— Truth: March, 1894.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf.

The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud, and found to his vexation that one of the horses sold won the Derby a few months afterwards. Bewailing his ill—luck, he said to Disraeli,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Ah! you don't know what the Derby is.” “Yes, I do,” replied Disraeli; “it is the blue ribbon of the turf,” alluding to the term cordons bleus (q.v.); or else to the blue garter, the highest of all orders.

“The blue ribbon of the profession” is the highest point of honour attainable therein. The blue ribbon of the Church is the Archbishopric of Canterbury, that in law is the office of Lord Chancellor.

Blue Ribbon

“‘Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours, you monkey?’ answered Orestes; ‘because, if you do, the hippopotamus hide hangs ready outside.’”—Wingsley: Hypatia, chap. iv.

Blue Ruin

Gin. Called blue from its tint, and ruin from its effects.

Blue Squadron

(The). One of the three divisions of the British Fleet in the seventeenth century. (See Admiral Of The Blue .)

Blue Stocking

A female pedant. In 1400 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed at Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings, and called della calza. It lasted till 1590, when it appeared in Paris and was the rage among the lady savantes. From France it came to England in 1780, when Mrs. Montague displayed the badge of the Bas—bleu club at her evening assemblies. Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet was a constant attendant of the soirées. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, who died 1840.

“‘You used to be fond enough of books ... a regular blue—stocking Mr. Bland called you.’”—

E. S. Phelps: The Gates Ajar, chap. iv.

Blue Talk

Indecent conversation, from the French, Bibliothèque Bleue. (Harlots are called “Blues” from the blue gown they were once compelled to wear in the House of Correction.)

Blue Wonder

(A). The German Blaues Wunder, which means “a queer story,” as Du sollst dein blaues wunder sehen, You will be filled with amazement (at the queer story I have to relate). A “blue wonder” is a cock and bull story, an improbable tale, something to make one stare. The French, contes bleus.

Blue

and Red, in public—house signs, are heraldic colours, as the Blue Pig, the Blue Cow, the Red Lion, the Red Hart, etc.

Blue and Yellow

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). The Edinburgh Review; so called from its yellow and blue cover. The back is yellow, the rest of the cover is blue.

Blues (The), applied to troops.

The Oxford Blues.

The Royal Horse Guards were so called in 1690, from the Earl of Oxford their commander and the blue facings. Wellington, in one of his despatches, writes:—“I have been appointed colonel of the Blues.”

“It was also known as the ‘Blue Guards’ during the campaign in Flanders (1742—1745).”— Trimen: Regiments of the British Army.

Bluff

(To), in the game called Poker, is to stake on a bad hand. This is a dodge resorted to by players to lead an adversary to throw up his cards and forfeit his stake rather than risk them against the “bluffer.”

“The game proceeded. George, although he affected no ignorance of the ordinary principles of poker, played like a novice— that is to say, he bluffed extravagantly on absurdity low hands.”— Truth: Queer Stories, Sept. 3rd, 1885 or Hal. Henry VIII., so called from his bluff and burly manners (1491, 1509—1547.)

Bluff Harry

Blunderbore

A giant, brother of Cormoran, who put Jack the Giant Killer to bed and intended to kill him; but Jack thrust a billet of wood into the bed, and crept under the bedstead. Blunderbore came with his club and broke the billet to pieces, but was much amazed at seeing Jack next morning at breakfast—time. When his astonishment was abated he asked Jack how he had slept. “Pretty well,” said the Cornish hero, “but once or twice I fancied a mouse tickled me with its tail.” This increased the giant's surprise. Hasty pudding being provided for breakfast, Jack stowed away such huge stores in a bag concealed within his dress that the giant could not keep pace with him. Jack cut the bag open to relieve “the gorge,” and the giant, to effect the same relief, cut his throat and thus killed himself. (See Giants .)

Blunderbuss

A short gun with a large bore. (Dutch, donderbus, a thunder—tube.)

Blunt

Ready money.

Blunt

(Major — General). An old cavalry officer, rough in speech, but very brave and honest, of good understanding, and a true patriot. (Shadwell: The Volunteers.)

Blurt out

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(To). To tell something from impulse which should not have been told. To speak incautiously, or without due reflection. Florio makes the distinction, to “flurt with one's fingers, and blurt with one's mouth.”

Blush

At the first blush. At the first glance; speaking off—hand without having given the subject mature deliberation. The allusion is to blushing at some sudden or unexpected allusion; the first time the thought has flashed into your mind.

To put to the blush.

To make one blush with shame, annoyance, or confusion.

“England might blush in 1620, when Englishmen trembled at a fool's frown [i.e. James I.], but not in 1649, when an enraged people cut off his son's [Charles I.] head.”— Wendell Phillips: Orations, p. 419.

Bo

or Boh, in old Runic, was a fierce Gothic captain, son of Odin. His name was used by his soldiers when they would take the enemy by surprise. (Sir William Temple.)

From this name comes our bogie, a hobgoblin or little Bo. Gifford Castle is called Bo Hall, being said to have been constructed by bogies or magic. Compare Greek, boi, bah! verb, boaô, to shout out; Latin, böo, to bellow like a bull (bos). (See Bogie.)

You cannot say Bo! to a goose— i.e.

you are a coward who dare not say bo! even to a fool. When Ben Jonson was introduced to a nobleman, the peer was so struck with his homely appearance that he exclaimed, “What! are you Ben Jonson? Why, you look as if you could not say Bo! to a goose.” “Bo!” exclaimed the witty dramatist, turning to the peer and making his bow. (Latin, bo—are; Greek, boa—ein, to cry aloud.)

Bo—tree A corruption of bodhi or bodhiruma (the tree of wisdom), under which Sakyamuni used to sit when he concocted the system called Buddhism.

Boa

Pliny says the word is from bos (a cow), and arose from the supposition that the boa sucked the milk of cows.

Boanerges

(sons of thunder). A name given to James and John, the sons of Zebedee, because they wanted to call down “fire from heaven” to consume the Samaritans for not “receiving” the Lord Jesus. (Luke ix. 54; see Mark iii. 17.)

Boar

The Boar. Richard III.; so called from his cognisance.

“The wretched, bloody, and usurping boar

That spoiled your summer fields and fruitful vines;

... This foul swine ... lies now ...

Near to the town of Leicester, as we learn.”

Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3.

The bristled Baptist boar.

So Dryden denominates the Anabaptists in his Hind and Panther.

“The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he [the ape],

But whitened with the foam of sanctity,

With fat pollutions filled the sacred place,

And mountains levelled in his furious race.”

Part i. 43—6.

The wild boar of Ardennes [Le sanglier des Ardennes].

Guillaume, Comte de la Marck, so called because he was fierce as the wild boar, which he delighted to hunt. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott as William, Count of la Marck, in Quentin Durward.

Boar

(The), eaten every evening in Valhalla by the Æsir, was named SAEHRIMNIR. It was eaten every evening and next morning was restored whole again.

Boar's Flesh

Buddha died from a meal of dried boar's flesh. Mr. Sinnett; tells us that the “boar” referred to was the boar avatar of Vishnu, and that “dried boar's flesh” means esoteric knowledge prepared for popular use. None but Buddha himself must take the responsibility of giving out occult secrets, and he died while so occupied, i.e. in preparing for the general esoteric knowledge. The protreptics of Jamblicus are examples of similar interpretations. (See Nineteenth Century, June, 1893, p. 1021.)

Boar's Head

[The Christmas dish.] Freyr, the Scandinavian god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Gullinbursti; his festival was held at Yuletide (winter solstice), when a boar was sacrificed to his honour.

The Boar's Head.

This tavern, made immortal by Shakespeare, used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Board

To run aboard of.

To run foul of [another ship]. 3. To board. To feed and lodge together, is taken from the custom of the university members, etc., dining together at a common table or board.

Board

To accost. (French, aborder, to accost.)

“I'll board her, though she chide as loud

As thunder.”

Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew,

i. 2.

(See also Hamlet, ii. 2.)

Board of Green Cloth

So called because the lord steward and his board sat at a table covered with green cloth. It existed certainly in the reign of Henry I., and probably earlier, and was abolished in 1849.

“Board of Green Cloth, June 12th, 1681. Order was this day given that the Maides of Honour should have cherry—tarts instead of gooseberrytarts, it being observed that cherrys are three—pence a pound.”

Board School (A)

An undenominational elementary school managed by a School Board, and supported by a parliamentary grant collected by a rate.

Boarding School

Boards

He is on the boards, i.e. an actor by profession.

Boast

(The). The vainglory, the ostentation, that which a person boasts of, or is proud of.

“The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,

Awaits [sic] alike the inevitable hour.”

Gray: The Elegy, stanza 9.

Boast of England

(The). Tom Thumb or Tom—a—lin. Richard Johnson, in 1599, published a “history of this ever—renowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed The Boast of England, showing his honorable victories in foreign countries, with his strange fortunes in Faëry Land, and how he married the fair Anglittera, daughter of Prester John. ...”

Boat

Both in the same boat. Both treated alike; both placed in the same conditions. The reference is to the boat launched when a ship is wrecked. To be represented in a boat is the ordinary symbol of apotheosis. Many sovereigns are so represented on coins.

Boatswain

The officer who has charge of the boats, sails, rigging, anchors, cordage, cables, and colours. Swain is the Saxon swein (a boy, servant), Swedish sven. Hence, a shepherd is a swain, and a sweetheart is a woman's servant or swain.

Boatswain.

The name of Byron's favourite dog, buried in Newstead Abbey garden.

Boaz and Jachin. The names of the two brazen pillars set up by Solomon at the entrance of his temple— Boaz (strength) on the left hand, and Jachin (stability) on the right. (1 Kings vii. 21.)

“Two pillars raising by their skill profound.

Boaz

and Jachin, thro' the East renowned.” Crabbe: Borough

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bob

A shilling. A “bender” is a sixpence. (Compare BAWBEE.)

Bob.

A set of changes rung on [church] bells: as a “bob major,” a “bob—minor,” a “triple bob.” To give the bob to any one. To deceive, to balk. This word is a corruption of pop. The bob of a pendulum or mason's plumb—line is the weight that pops backwards and forwards. The bob of a fishing—line pops up and down when fish nibble at the bait. To bob for apples or cherries is to try and catch them while they swing backwards and forwards. As this is very deceptive, it is easy to see how the word signifies to balk, etc.

To bob means also to thump, and a bob is a blow.

“He that a fool doth very wisely hit,

Doth very foolishly, although he smart,

Not to seem senseless of the bob.”

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Bear a bob.

Be brisk. The allusion is to bobbing for apples, in which it requires great agility and quickness to catch the apple.

A bob wig.

A wig in which the bottom locks are turned up into bobs or short curls.

Bobadil

A military braggart of the first water. Captain Bobadil is a character in Ben Jonson's comedy of Every Man in his Humour. This name was probably suggested by Bobadilla, first governor of Cuba, who sent Columbus home in chains. (See Vincent .)

“Bobadil is the author's best invention, and is worthy to march in the same regiment with Bessus and Pistol, Parolles, and the Copper Captain” (q.v.).— B. W. Procter.

See all these names in their proper places.

Bobbery

as “Kicking up a bobbery,” making a squabble or tumult, kicking up a shindy. It is much used in India, and Colonel Yule says it is of Indian origin.

Bobbish

Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob, brisk. (See above.) A very ancient expression.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bobbit

If it isn't weel bobbit we'll bob it again. If it is not done well enough, we will try again. To bob is to dance, and literally the proverb means, "If it is not well danced, we will dance over again."

Bobby

A policeman; so called because Sir Robert Peel introduced the force, at least into Ireland. (See Peeler .)

"But oh! for the grip of the bobby's hand

Upon his neck that day."

Punch:

July 26, 1884.

Boccus

(King). A kind of Solomon, who not only drank strong poison "in the name of the Trinite" without hurt; but also answered questions of wisdom, morality, and natural science. (The History of King Boccus and Sydrack, from the French.)

Bockland

or Bookland. Land severed from the folcland, and converted into a private estate of perpetual inheritance by a short and simple deed or bock.

Bod

The divinity invoked by Indian women who desire fecundity. Children born after an invocation to Bod must be redeemed, or else serve in the temple of the goddess. (Indian mythology.)

Boden—See

The Lake of Constance; so called because it lies in the Boden, or low country at the foot of the Alps. (Latin, Senus Bodamicus.)

Bodies

Compound bodies, in chemical phraseology, mean those which have two or more simple bodies or elements in their composition, as water.

Simple bodies,

in chemical phraseology, mean the elements. The heavenly bodies. The sun, moon, stars, and so on.

The seven bodies

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(of alchemists). The seven metals supposed to correspond with the seven “planets.”

Planets. Metals.

1. Apollo, or the Sun Gold.
2. Diana, or the Moon Silver.
3. Mercury Quicksilver.
4. Venus Copper.
5. Mars Iron.
6. Jupiter Tin.
7. Saturn Lead.

Bodkin

A dagger. (Welsh, bodegy a small dagger.)

Bodkin

When he himself might his quietus make with a bare bodkin. (Hamlet, iii. 1). A stiletto worn by ladies in the hair, not a dagger. In the Seven Champions, Castria took her silver bodkin from her hair, and stabbed to death first her sister and then herself. Prexida stabbed herself in a similar manner. Shakespeare could not mean that a man might kill himself with a naked dagger, but that even a hair—pin would suffice to give a man his quietus.

Bodkin

To ride bodkin. To ride in a carriage between two others, the accommodation being only for two. Dr. Payne says that bodkin in this sense is a contraction of bodykin, a little body, which may be squeezed into a small space.

“If you can bodkin the sweet creature into the coach.”— Gibbon.

“There is hardly room between Jos and Miss Sharp, who are on the front seat, Mr. Osborne sitting bodkin opposite, between Captain Dobbin and Amelia.”— Thackeray: Vanity Fair.

Bodle A Scotch coin, worth the sixth of a penny; so called from Bothwell, a mint—master.

“Fair play, he car'd na deils a boddle.”

Burns: Tam o' Shanter,

line 110.

To care not a bodle

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

= our English phrase, "Not to care a farthing."

Bodleian Library

(Oxford). So called because it was restored by Sir Thomas Bodley in 1597.

Body

(Anglo—Saxon, bodig.)

A regular body,

in geometry, means one of the five regular solids, called "Platonic" because first suggested by Plato. (See Platonic Bodies.)

To body forth.

To give mental shape to an ideal form.

"Imagination bodies forth

The forms of things unknown."

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v.1

Body and Soul

To keep body and soul together. To sustain life; from the notion that the soul gives life. The Latin anima, and the Greek psyche, mean both soul and life; and, according to Homeric mythology, the departed soul retains the shape and semblance of the body, hence the notion of ghosts. Indeed, if the soul is the "principle of life," it must of necessity be the facsimile of every living atom of the body. (See Astral Body

.)

Body—colour

(A). Is a paint containing a body or consistency. In water—colours it is mixed with white lead and laid on thickly.

Body Corporate

(A). An aggregate of individuals legally united into a corporation.

Body Politic

(A). A whole nation considered as a political corporation; the state. In Latin, totum corpus reipublicae.

Body—snatcher

(A). One who snatches or purloins bodies, newly buried, to sell them to surgeons for dissection. By a play on the words, a bum—bailiff was so called, because his duty was to snatch or capture the body of a delinquent.

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The first instance of body—snatching on record was in 1777. It was the body of Mrs. Jane Sainsbury from the burial ground near Gray's Inn Lane. The men, being convicted, were imprisoned for six months.

Boemond

The Christian King of Antioch, who tried to teach his subjects arts, laws, and religion. Pyrrhus delivered to him a fort, by which Antioch was taken by the Christians after an eight months' siege. Boemond and Rogero were two brothers, the sons of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

Boeotia

According to fable it is so—called because Cadmus was conducted by an ox (Greek bous) to the spot where he built Thebes; but, according to fact, it was so called because it abounded in cattle. (Greek, Boiotia.)

Boeotian

A rude, unlettered person, a dull blockhead. The ancient Boeotians loved agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so the Athenians used to say they were dull and thick as their own atmosphere; yet Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, were all Boeotians.

Boeotian Ears

Ears unable to appreciate music or rhetoric.

“Well, friend, I assure thee thou hast not got Boeotian ears [because you can appreciate the beauties of my sermons].”—Le Saye: Gill Blas, vii. 3.

Boethius

Last of the Latin authors, properly so called (470—524). Alfred the Great translated his De Consolatione Philosophiae into Anglo—Saxon.

Bogie

A scarecrow, a goblin. (Bulgarian, bog, a god; Salvonic, bogu; Welsh, bwg, a goblin, our bugbear.) The Assyrian mothers used to scare their children with the name of Narsës (Gibbon); the Syrians with that of Richard Coeur de Lion; the Dutch with Boh, the Gothic general (Warton); the Jews with Lilith; the Turks with Mathias Corvinus, the Hungarian king; and the English with the name of Lunsfort (q.v.). (See Bo.)

Bogio

(in Orlando Furioso). One of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six moons, but was slain by Dardinello.

Bogle Swindle

A gigantic swindle concocted in Paris by fourteen persons, who expected to net at least a million sterling. It was exposed in the Times.

Bogomili

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A religious sect of the twelfth century, whose chief seat was Thrace. So called from their constant repetition of the words, "Lord, have mercy upon us," which, in Bulgarian, is bog (Lord), milui (have mercy).

Bogtrotters

Irish tramps; so called from their skill in crossing the Irish bogs, from tussock to tussock, either as guides or to escape pursuit.

Bogus

Bogus currency. Forged or sham bills. Bogus transactions. Fraudulent transactions. The word is by some connected with bogie.

Lowell (Biglow Papers) says, "I more than suspect the world to be a corruption of the French bagasse." In French argot is another word (bogue), the rind of a green chestnut, or case of a watch; a bogus chestnut or watch.

Boheme

(La). A Bohemian, that is, one living on his wits, such as a penny—a—liner, journalist, politician, artist, dancer, or in fact any chevalier of unsettled habits and no settled home. From the French, Bohémien, a gipsy.

Une maison de Bohême means a house where no regularity is observed, but all things are at sixes and sevens.

Bohemia

The Queen of Bohemia. A public—house sign in honour of Lady Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James

I., who was married to Frederick, elector palatine, for whom Bohemia was raised into a separate kingdom. It is through this lady that the Brunswick family succeeded to the throne of Great Britain.

Bohemian

A gipsy, an impostor. The first gipsies that entered France came from Bohemia, and appeared before Paris in 1427. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle St. Denis.

A slang term applied to literary men and artists of loose and irregular habits, living by what they can pick up by their brains.

"Never was there an editor with less about him of the literary Bohemian. A strong contrast to his unhappy contemporary, Chatterton."— Fortnightly Review: Paston Letter.

Bohemian Brethren

A religious sect formed out of the remnants of the Hussites. They arose at Prague in the fifteenth century, and were nicknamed Cave—dwellers, because they lurked in caves to avoid persecution.

Bohemian Life

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). An irregular, restless way of living, like that of a gipsy.

Bohort

(Sir). A knight of Arthur's Round Table, brother of Sir Lionel, and nephew of Lancelot of the Lake. Also called Sir Bors.

Boies

(2 syl.). Priests of the savages of Florida. Each priest has his special idol, which must be invoked by the fumes of tobacco. (American Indian mythology.)

Boiling—point

He was at boiling—point. Very angry indeed. Properly the point of heat at which water, under ordinary conditions, boils. (212 Fahrenheit, 100 Centigrade, 80 Réamur.)

Boiley or Boily. Bread soaked in water. A word used in baby—farming establishments (French, boullie). (Pall Mall Budget, Aug. 22, 1889.)

Boisserean Collection

A collection at Stuttgart of the early specimens of German art, made by the three brothers Boisseree.

Bolay

or Boley. The giant which the Indians say conquered heaven, earth, and the inferno. (Indian mythology.)

Bold

Bold as Beauchamp (Beech—um). It is said that Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, with one squire and six archers, overthrew 100 armed men at Hogges, in Normandy, in 1346:

This exploit is not more incredible than that attributed to Captal—de—Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meau of the insurgents called “La Jacquerie,” 7,000 of whom were slain by this little band, or trampled to death in the narrow streets as they fled panic—struck (1358).

Bold as brass.

Downright impudent without modesty. Similarly, we say “brazen—faced.” I make bold to say. I take the liberty of saying; I venture to say.

Bolerium Promontory

$$$ End.

Bolero

A Spanish dance; so called from the name of the inventor.

Bolingbroke

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Henry IV of England; so called from Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, where he was born. (1366, 1399—1413.)

Bollandists

Editors of the Acta Sanctorum begun by John Bolland (1596—1665); the sixty—first folio volume was published in 1875.

Bollen

Swollen. (Anglo Saxon, bolla, a bowl.) Hence “joints bolne—big” (Golding), and “bolne in pride” (Phaer). The seed capsule or pod of flax is called a “boll.”

“The barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled.”— Exod. ix. 31.

Bologna Stone

A variety of barite, found in masses near Bologna. After being heated, powdered, and exposed to the light it becomes phosphorescent in the dark.

Bolognese School

There were three periods to the Bolognese School in painting— the Early, the Roman, and the Eclectic. The first was founded by Marco Zoppo, in the fifteenth century, and its best exponent was Francia. The second was founded in the sixteenth century by Bagnacavallo, and its chief exponents were Primaticio, Tibaldi, and Nicolo dell' Abate. The third was founded by the Carracci, at the close of the sixteenth century, and its best masters have been Domenichino, Lanfranco, Guido, Schidone, Guercino, and Albani.

Bolt

An arrow, a shaft (Anglo—Saxon, bolta; Danish, bolt; Greek, ballo, to cast; Latin, pello, to drive). A door bolt is a shaft of wood or iron, which may be shot or driven forward to secure a door. A thunderbolt is an hypothetical shaft cast from the clouds; an aerolite. Cupid's bolt is Cupid's arrow.

The fool's bolt is soon spent.

A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.

I must bolt.

Be off like an arrow. To bolt food. To swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it. To bolt out the truth. To blurt it out; also To bolt out, to exclude or shut out by bolting the door. To bolt. To sift, as flour is bolted. This has a different derivation to the above (Low Latin, bult—ella, a boulter, from an Old French word for coarse cloth).

“I cannot bolt this matter to the bran,

As Bradwarden and holy Austin can.”

Dryden's version of the Cock and Fox.

Bolt from the Blue

(A). There fell a bolt from the blue. A sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe or event occurred, like a “thunderbolt” from the blue sky, or flash of lightning without warning and wholly unexpected.

“Namque Diespiter

Igni corusco nubila dividens,

Plerumque, per purum tonantes

Egit equos volucremque currum. ...”

Horace: 1 Ode xxxiv. 5, etc.

“On Monday, Dec. 22nd [1890], there fell a bolt from the blue. The morning papers announced that the men were out [on strike].”—Nineteenth Century, February, 1891, p. 246.

In this phrase the word “bolt” is used in the popular sense for lightning the Latin fulmen, the French foudre and tonnerre, in English sometimes for an aerolite. Of course, in strict scientific language, a flash of lightning is not a thunderbolt. Metaphorically, it means a sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe, like a thunderbolt [flash of lightning] from a blue or serene sky.

German:

Wie ein Blitzstrahl aus blauem Aether. Italian: Comme un fulmine a ciel sereno. Latin: Audiit et coeli genitor de parte serena intonuit haevum. (Virgil: Aeneid, ix. 630.)

Bolt in Tun

a public—house sign, is heraldic. In heraldry it is applied to a bird—bolt, in pale, piercing through a tun. The punning crest of Serjeant Bolton, who died 1787, was “on a wreath a tun erect proper, transpierced by an arrow fesseways or.” Another family of the same name has for crest “a tun with a bird—bolt through it proper.” A third, harping on the same string, has “a bolt gules in a tun or.” The public—house sign distinguished by this device or name adopted it in honour of some family claiming one of the devices mentioned above.

Bolt Upright

Straight as an arrow. A bolt is an arrow with a round knob at the end, used for shooting at rooks, etc.

Bolted

Bolted out. Either ran off suddenly, or being barred out of the house.

The horse bolted.

The horse shot off like a bolt or arrow.

Bolted Arrow

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A blunt arrow for shooting young rooks with a cross—bow; called “bolting rooks.” A gun would not do, and an arrow would mangle the little things too much.

Bolton

The Bolton Ass. This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff. (Dr. Doran.)

Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton.

Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong. Ray says that a collection of proverbs were once presented to the Virgin Queen, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the Queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, “Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton,” a proverb omitted in the compilation. John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII., and flattered the king by asking him to allow him an ace or some advantage in the game.

Bolus An apothecary. Apothecaries are so called because they administer boluses. Similarly Mrs. Suds is a washer—woman; Boots is the shoeblick of an inn, etc.

George Colman adopts the name for his apothecary, who wrote his labels in rhyme, one of which was—

“When taken,

To be well shaken”;

but the patient being shaken, instead of the mixture, died.

Bomb

A shell filled with gunpowder. (Greek, bombos; Latin, bombus, any deep noise. Thus Festus says:

“Bombus, sonus non apium tantum, aut poculi bilbientis, sed etiam tonitrŝ.” And Catullus applies it to the blast of a trumpet, “efflabant cornua bombis,” lxiiv. 263.)

Bomba

King Bomba. A nickname given to Ferdinand II., King of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messina in 1848, in which the slaughter and destruction of property was most wanton. Bomba II. was the nickname given to his son Francis II. for bombarding Palermo in 1860. He was also called Bombalino (Little Bomba).

Another meaning equally applicable is Vox et praterea nihil, Bomba being the explosion made by puffing out the cheeks, and causing them suddenly to collapse. Liar, break—promise, worthless.

Bombast

literally means the produce of the bombyx (Middle Latin bombax, Greek bombux), and applied to cotton—wool used for padding. The head of the cotton plant was called “bombast” or “bombace” in the sixteenth century. Bombast was much used in the reign of Henry VIII. for padding, and hence inflated language was so called.

“We have received your letters full of love, ...

And in our maiden council rated them ...

As bombast and as lining to the time.”

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost,

v. 2.

Bombastes Furioso

One who talks big and uses long sesquipedalian words; the ideal of bombast. He is the hero of a burlesque opera so called, by William Barnes Rhodes. (1790.)

Bombastus

The family name of Aureolus Paracelsus (1493—1541). He is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword.

“Bombastus kept a devil's bird

Shut in the pommel of his sword,

That taught him all the cunning pranks

Of past and future mountebanks.”

S. Butler: Hudibras,

part ii. 3.

Bon Gaultier Ballads

Parodies of modern poetry by W.E. Aytoun and Theodore Martin (Sir).

Bon gre mal gre

Willing or unwilling, willy nilly, nolens volens.

Bon Mot

(French). A good or witty saying; a pun; a clever repartee.

Bon Ton

(French). Good manners, or manners accredited by good society.

Bon Vivant

(French). A free liver; one who indulges in the “good things of the table.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bona Fide Without subterfuge or deception; really and truly. Literally, in good faith (Latin).

Bona—roba

A courtesan (Italian); so called from the smartness of their robes or dresses.

“We knew where the bona—robas were.”

Shakespeare:

2 Henry IV., iii. 2.

Bonduca

= Boadicea. (Fletcher's Tragedy, 1647.)

Bone

Bred in the bone. A part of one's nature. “What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh.” A natural propensity cannot be repressed. Naturam furcâ expellas, autem usque redibit.

Bone in my Throat

I have a bone in my throat. I cannot talk; I cannot answer your question. I have a bone in my leg. An excuse given to children for not moving from one's seat Similarly, “I have a bone in my arm,” and must be excused using it for the present.

Bone of Contention

A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The metaphor is taken from the proverb about “Two dogs fighting for a bone,” etc.

Bones

Deucalion, after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother, i.e. the stones of mother earth. Those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women. Pindar suggests that laas, a stone, is a pun on laos, the people. Both words, in the genitive case singular, are alike laou. (Olythics, ix. 66.)

Bone to pick

(A). A sop to Cerberus. A lucrative appointment given to a troublesome opponent in order to silence him. Thus Chisholm Anstey was sent to Hong—Kong as a judge to keep him away from the House of Commons. Of course the allusion is to throwing a bone to a dog barking at you.

“In those days the usual plan to get rid to an oratorical patriot in the House was to give him `a bone to pick.’” — Anthony Collins.

I have a bone to pick with you. An unpleasant matter to settle with you. At the marriage banquets of the Sicilian poor, the bride's father, after the meal, used to hand the bridegroom a bone, saying, “Pick this bone, for you have taken in hand a much harder task.”

Bone

(See Albadara; Luz; Os Sacrum .)

Bone

(To). To filch, as, I boned it. Shakespeare (2 Henry VI., act i. 3) says, “By these ten bones, my lord ...” meaning his ten fingers; and (Hamlet, iii. 2) calls the fingers “pickers and stealers.” Putting the two together there can be no doubt that “to bone” means to finger, that is, “to pick and steal.”

“You thought that I was buried deep

Quite decent—like and chary,

But from her grave in Mary—bone,

They've come and boned your Mary!”

Hood: Mary's Ghost.

Bone—grubber

(A). A person who grubs about dust—bins, gutters, etc., for refuse bones, which he sells to bone—grinders, and other dealers in such stores.

Bone—lace

Lace woven on bobbins made of trotter—bones.

Bone—shaker (A). A four—wheel cab; also an old bicycle.

“A good swift hansom is worth twice as much as a `bone—shaker' any day.”— Nineteenth Century, March, 1893, p. 473.

Boned

I boned him. Caught or seized him. (See above, Bone .)

Bones

The man who rattles or plays the bones in nigger troupes.

To make no bones about the matter, i.e.

no difficulty, no scruple. Dice are called “bones,” and the French, flatter le dé (to mince the matter), is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to flatter, or “make much of,” or humour the dice in order to show favour.

Napier's bones.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(See under Napier.) Without more bones. Without further scruple or objection. (See above, "Make no bones," etc.)

Bonese

(2 syl.). The inhabitants of Boni, one of the Celebes.

Bonfire

Ignis ossium. The Athenæum shows that the word means a fire made of bones; one quotation runs thus, "In the worship of St. John, the people ... made three manner of fires: one was of clean bones and no wood, and that is called a bonfire; another of clean wood and no bones, and that is called a woodfire ... and the third is made of wood and bones, and is called 'St. John's fire'" (Quatuor Sermones, 1499). Certainly bone (Scotch, bane) is the more ancient way of spelling the first syllable of the word; but some suggest that

"bon—fire" is really "boon—fire."

"In some parts of Lincolnshire ... they make fires in the public streets ... with bones of oxen, sheep, etc. ... heaped together ... hence came the origin of bonfires."—Leland, 1552.

Whatever the origin of the word, it has long been used to signify either a beacon fire, or a boon fire, i.e. a fire expressive of joy. We often find the word spelt "bane—fire," where bane may mean "bone" or beacon. Welsh ban, lofty; allied to the Norwegian baun, a beacon or cresset.

Bonhomie'

Kindness; good nature; free and easy manners; cordial benevolence. (French.)

"I never knew a more prepossessing man. His bonhomie was infectious."—C. D. Warner: Little Journey, chap. vi.

Bonhomme

(Un). A goody man; according to Dr. Young's line, "What is mere good nature, but a fool?" The word, divided into two, is used in a good sense, as Etre un bon homme. Jacques Bonhomme means a peasant.

Jacques Bonhomme

(French). A peasant who ventures to interfere in politics. Hence, the peasants' rebellion in 1358 was called La Jacquerie. The term means "James Goodfellow"; we also often address the poor as

"My good fellow."

Boniface

A sleek, good—tempered, jolly landlord. From Farquhar's comedy of The Beaux' Stratagem.

"A regular British Boniface."—The John Bull.

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, an Anglo—Saxon whose original name was Winifrid or Winfrith. (680—750.)

St. Boniface's cup.

An extra cup of wine (to the health of the Pope). Pope Boniface, we are told in the Ebrietatis Encomium, instituted an indulgence to those who drank his good health after grace, or the health of the Pope of the time being. An excuse for an extra glass.

Bonne (French). A nursemaid, a nursery governess.

Bonne Bouche

(A). delicious morsel; a tit—bit (tid—bit).

“Now I'll give you a real bonne—bouche. This is a bottle of the famous comet port of 1811.”— The Epicure.

Bonnet

A pretended player at a gaming—table, or bidder at an auction, to lure others to play; so called because he blinds the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had struck their bonnet over their eyes.

“A man who sits at a gaming table, and appears to be playing against the table; when a stranger appears the Bonnet generally wins.”— The Times

Bonnet

Braid Bonnet. The old Scotch cap, made of milled woolen, without seam or lining. Glengarry Bonnet. The Highland bonnet, which rises to a point in front.

He has a green bonnet.

Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the seventeenth century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonnet (cloth cap).

He has a bee in his bonnet.

(See Bee.)

Bonnet Lairds

Local magnates of Scotland, who wore the Braid Bonnet.

Bonnet—piece

A gold coin of James V. of Scotland, the king's head on which wears a bonnet.

Bonnet Rouge

The red cap of Liberty worn by the leaders of the French revolution. It is the emblem of Red Republicanism.

Bonnie Dundee

John Graham, of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee (1650—1689).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bonnyclabber

A drink made of beer and buttermilk. (Irish, bainne, milk; claba, thick or thickened.)

“With beer and buttermilk, mingled together, ...

To drink such ... bonny—clapper.”

Ben Jonson: The New Inn,

i. 3.

Bono Johnny

John Bull is so called in the East Indies.

Bontemps

Roger Bontemps (French). The personification of “Never say die.” The phrase is from Béranger.

“Vous pauvres, pleins d'envie;

Vous riches, desireux;

Vous, dont le char dévie

Après un cours heureux;

Vous, qui perdrez peut-être

Des titres éclatans,

Eh! gai! prenez pour maître

Le gros Roger Bontemps.” Béranger.

Ye poor, with envy goaded;

Ye rich, for more who long;

Ye who by fortune loaded,

Find all things going wrong

Ye who by some disaster

See all your cables break,

From henceforth for your master

Bluff Roger Bontemps take. E. C. B.

Bonus

A bounty over and above the interest of a share in any company. (Latin, bonus quaestus, a good profit or bounty. The interest or fruit of money put out in an investment was by the Romans called the quaestus.)

Bonus Homerus. (See Homer.)

Bonzes

(sing. Bonze). Indian priests. In China they are the priests of the Fohists; their number is 50,000, and they are represented as idle and dissolute. In Japan they are men of rank and family. In Tonquin every pagoda has at least two bonzes, and some as many as fifty.

Booby

A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. In England the Solan goose is called a booby or noddy. (Spanish, bobo; German, bube.)

A booby will never make a hawk.

The bird called the booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.

Booby

(Lady). A caricature on Richardson's Pamela. A vulgar upstart, who tries to seduce Joseph Andrews. (Fielding: Joseph Andrews.)

Booby—trap

(A). A pitcher of water, book, or something else, balanced gingerly on the top of a door set ajar, so that when the booby or victim is enticed to pass through the door, the pitcher or book falls on him.

Book

(Ang.—Saxon, boc; Danish, beuke; German, buche, a beech—tree). Beechbark was employed for carving names on before the invention of printing.

“Here on my trunk's surviving frame,

Carved many a long—forgotten name. ...

As love's own altar, honour me:

Spare, woodman, spare the beechen tree.”

Campbell: Beech Tree's Petition.

Book

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The dearest ever sold. A Mazarin Bible at the Thorold sale, in 1884, bought by Mr. Quaritch, book—seller, Piccadilly, London, for 3,400 for a copy.

Book

The oldest in the world. That by Ptah—Hotep, the Egyptian, compiled in the reign of Assa, about B.C. 3366. This MS. is preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. It is written on papyrus in hieratic characters, and is a compilation of moral, political, and religious aphorisms. It strongly insists on reverence to women, politeness, and monotheism. Ptah—Hotep was a prince of the blood, and lived to the age of 110 years.

Book.

Logistilla gave Astolpho, at parting, a book which would tell him anything he wanted to know, and save him from the power of enchantment. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, book viii)

Beware of a man of one book.

Never attempt to controvert the statement of any one in his own special subject. A shepherd who cannot read will know more about sheep than the wisest book—worm. This caution is given by St. Thomas Aquinas.

That does not suit my book.

Does not accord with my arrangements. The reference is to betting—books, in which the bets are formally entered.

To bring him to book.

To make him prove his words; to call him to account. Make him show that what he says accords with what is written down in the indentures, the written agreement, or the book which treats of the subject.

To book it.

To take down an order; to make a memorandum; to enter in a book. To speak by the book. With minute exactness. To speak literatim, according to what is in the book. To speak like a book. To speak with great precision and accuracy; to be full of information.

To speak without book.

Without authority; from memory only, without consulting or referring to the book. Bell, book, and candle. (See under Bell.)

Book of Books

(The). The Bible.

Book of Life (The). In Bible language, is a register of the names of those who are to inherit eternal life. (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. xx. 12.)

Books

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

He is in my books, or in my good books. The former is the older form; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used more widely, a single sheet, or even a list being called a book. To be in my books is to be on my list of friends.

“I was so much in his books, that at his decease he left me his lamp.”— Addison.

“If you want to keep in her good books, don't call her ‘the old lady.’”— Dickens.

He is in my black (or bad) books. In disfavour. (See Black Books.)

On the books.

On the list of a club, on the list of candidates, on the list of voters, etc. In the universities we say, “on the boards.”

Out of my books.

Not in favour; no longer in my list of friends.

The battle of the books.

The Boyle controversy (q.v.). (See Battle.) To take one's name off the books. To withdraw from a club. In the passive voice it means to be excluded, or no longer admissible to enjoy the benefits of the institution. The university phrases are “to keep my name on the boards”; “to take my name off the boards,” etc.

Book—keeper

One who borrows books, but does not return them.

Book—keeping

The system of keeping the debtor and creditor accounts of merchants in books provided for the purpose, either by single or by double entry.

Waste—book.

A book in which items are not posted under heads, but are left at random, as each transaction occurred.

Day—book.

A book in which are set down the debits and credits which occur day by day. These are ultimately sorted into the ledger.

Ledger

(Dutch, leggen, to lay). The book which is laid up in counting—houses. In the ledger the different items are regularly sorted according to the system in use. (LEDGER—LINES.)

By single entry.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Book—keeping in which each debit or credit is entered only once into the ledger, either as a debit or credit item, under the customer's or salesman's name.

By double entry.

By which each item is entered twice into the ledger, once on the debit and once on the credit side.

Bookworm

One always poring over his books; so called in allusion to the insect that eats holes in books, and lives both in and on its leaves.

Boom

A sudden and great demand of a thing, with a corresponding rise in its price. The rush of a ship under press of sail. The word arises from the sound of booming or rushing water.

“The boom was something wonderful. Everybody bought, everybody sold.”— Mark Twain: Life on the Mississippi, chap. 57.

Boom—Passenger

(A). A convict on board ship, who was chained to the boom when made to take his daily exercise.

Boon Companion

(A). A convivial companion. A bon vivant is one fond of good living. “Who leads a good life is sure to live well.” (French, bon, good.)

Boot I will give you that to boot, i.e. in addition. The Anglo—Saxon boot or bot means “compensation.” (Gothic, bôta, profit.)

“As anyone shall be more powerful ... or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every misdeed.”— Laws of King Ethelred.

Boot—jack

(See under Jack.)

Boots

Seven—leagued boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called The Seven—leagued Boots. These boots would stride over seven leagues at a pace.

I measure five feet ten inches without my boots.

The allusion is to the chopine or high—heeled boot, worn at one time to increase the stature. Hamlet says of the lady actress, “You are nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine.” (ii. 2.)

Boots

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(an instrument of torture). They were made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a competent length to fit the leg. The leg being placed therein, wedges were inserted till the sufferer confessed or fainted.

“All your empirics could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England or your Scotch boots.”—Marston: The Malcontent.

Boots

The youngest bishop of the House of Lords, whose duty it is to read prayers; so called because he walks into the house in a dead man's shoes or boots, i.e. he was not in the house till some bishop there died, and left a vacancy.

Boots

To go to bed in his boots. To be very tipsy.

Boots at an Inn

A servant whose duty it is to clean the boots. The Boots of the Holly—tree Inn, a Christmas tale by Charles Dickens (1855).

Bootless Errand

An unprofitable or futile message. The Saxon bot means “reparation”—“overplus to profit”; as “I will give you that to boot”; “what boots it me?” (what does it profit me?).

“I sent him

Bootless home and weather—beaten back.”

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., iii. 1.

Bootes

(Bo—o'—tees), or the ox—driver, a constellation. According to ancient mythology, Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it “the wagoner.”

“Wide o'er the spacious regions of the north,

That see Boötes urge his tardy wain.”

Thomson: Winter, 834—5.

Booth

Husband of Amelia. (Fielding: Amelia.)

Boozy

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Partly intoxicated. (Russian, busa, millet—beer; Latin, buza, from buo, to fill; Welsh, bozi; Old Dutch, buyzen, to tittle; Coptic, bouza, intoxicating drink.)

“In Egypt there is a beer called ‘Boozer,’ which is intoxicating.”—Morning Chronicle, Aug. 27th, 1852.

Bor

(in Norfolk) is a familiar term of address to a lad or young man; as, “Well, bor, I saw the moither you spoke of”—i.e. “Well, sir, I saw the lass. ...” “Bor” is the Dutch boer, a farmer; and “mor” the Dutch moer, a female.

Borachio

A drunkard. From the Spanish borachoe or borrach'o, a bottle made of pig's skin, with the hair inside, dressed with resin and pitch to keep the wine sweet. (Minsheu.)

Borachio.

A follower of Don John, in Much Ado About Nothing, who thus plays upon his own name:—

“I will, like a true drunkard [borachio], utter all to thee.”— Act iii. 5.

Borak

or Al Borak (the lightning). The animal brought by Gabriel to carry Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light. This creature was received into Paradise. (See Animals, Camel.)

Bord Halfpenny

A toll paid by the Saxons to the lord for the privilege of having a bord or bench at some fair for the sale of articles.

Bordarii

or Bordmen. A class of agriculturists superior to the Villani, who paid their rent by supplying the lord's board with eggs and poultry. (Domesday Book.)

Border

(The). The frontier of England and Scotland, which, from the eleventh to the fifteenth century, was the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between North and South Britain.

“March, march, Etrick and Teviotdale;

Why the deil dinna—ye march forward in order? March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale—

All the Blue Bonnets are bound for the border.”

Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery.

Border Minstrel

Sir Walter Scott, because he sang of the border. (1771—1832.)

Border States

(The). The five “slave” states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri) which lay next to the “free states” were so called in the Civil War, 1861—1865.

Bordlands

Lands kept by lords in Saxon times for the supply of their own board or table. (Anglo—Saxon, bord, a table.)

Bordlode

Service paid for the land.

Bore

(A). A person who bestows his tediousness on you; one who wearies you with his prate, his company, or his solicitations. Verb bear, bore, borne, to endure. A bore is someone we bore with or endured.

“At this instant

He bores me with some trick.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., i. 1.

Bore

A tidal wave.

The most celebrated bores are those of the Brahmaputra, Ganges, Hooghly, Indus, and Tsintang (in China). Bores occur regularly in the Bristol Channel and Solway Frith; occasionally (in high tides), in the Clyde, Dee (Cheshire), Dornoch Frith, Lune, Severn, Trent (eygre), and Wye. The bore of the Bay of Fundy is caused by the collision of the tides. (Icelandic bára, a wave or billow.)

Bore

(in pugilistic language) is one who bears or presses on a man so as to force him to the ropes of the ring by his physical weight; figuratively, one who bears or presses on you by his pertinacity.

“All beggars are liable to rebuffs, with the certainty besides of being considered bores.”— Prince Albert, 1859.

Boreal Northern.

“In radiant streams,

Bright over Europe, bursts the Boreal morn.”

Thomson Autumn, 98.

Boreas

The north wind. According to mythology, he was the son of Astræus, a Titan, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave of Mount Hæmus, in Thrace. (Greek, boros, voracious; Boreas, the north wind; Russian, boria, storm.)

“Cease, rude Boreas! blustering railer.”

Geo. Alex. Stevens.

“Omnia pontus haurit saxa vorax,” Lucan.

Borghese

(Bor—ga'—zy). The Princess Borghese pulled down a church contiguous to her palace, because the incense turned her sick and the organ made her head uneasy.

Borgia

(See Lucrezia.)

Born

Not born yesterday. Not to be taken in; worldly wise.

Born Days

In all my born days. Ever since I was born.

Born in the Purple

(a translation of porphyrogenitus). The infant of royal parents in opposition to born in the gutter, or child of beggars. This has nothing to do with the purple robes of royalty. It refers to the chamber lined with porphyry by one of the Byzantine empresses for her accouchement. (See Nineteenth Century, March, 1894, p. 510.)

“Zoe, the fourth wife of Leo VI., gave birth to the future Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus in the purple chamber of the imperial palace.”— Finlay: History of the Byzantine and Greek Empires, vol. i.

Born with a Silver Spoon or Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to good luck; born with hereditary wealth. The reference is to the usual gift of a silver spoon by the godfather or godmother of a child. The lucky child does not need to wait for the gift, for it is born with it in its mouth or inherits it from infancy.

Borough English

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is where the youngest son inherits instead of the eldest. It is of Saxon origin, and is so called to distinguish it from the Norman custom.

“The custom of Borough English abounds in Kent, Sussex, Surrey, the neighbourhood of London, and Somerset. In the Midlands it is rare, and north of the Humber ... it does not seem to occur.”— F. Pollock: Macmillan's Magazine, xlvi. (1882).

Borowe

St. George to borowe, i.e. St. George being surety. (Danish, borgen, bail, Swedish, borgan, a giving of bail.)

Borr

Son of Ymer, and father of Odin, Ville, Ve, and Hertha or Earth. The Celtic priests claimed descent from this deity. (Celtic mythology.)

Borrow A pledge. To borrow is to take something which we pledge ourselves to return. (Anglo—Saxon, borg, a loan or pledge; verb borg—ian.)

“Ye may retain as borrows my two priests.”— Scott: Ivanhoe, chap. xxxiii.

Borrowed days of February

(The). 12th, 13th and 14th of February, said to be borrowed from January. If these days prove stormy, the year will be favoured with good weather; but if fine, the year will be foul and unfavourable. These three days are called by the Scotch Faoilteach, and hence the word faoilteach means execrable weather.

Borrowed days of March

The last three days of March are said to be “borrowed from April.”

““March said to Aperill,

I see 3 hoggs [hoggets, sheep] upon a hill;

And if you'll lend me dayes 3

I'll find a way to make them dee [die].

The first o' them wus wind and weet,

The second o' them wus snaw and sleet,

The third o' them wus sic a freeze

It froze the birds' nebs to the trees.

When the 3 days were past and gane

The 3 silly hoggs came hirpling [limping] hame.”

Bortell

The bull, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Heinrich von Alkman.)

Bos

[ei] in lingua. He is bribed to silence; he has a coin (marked with a bull's head) on his tongue. Adalardus, in Statutis Abbatiae Corbeiensis (bk. i. c. 8), seems to refer to the bos as a coin. "Boves et reliquam pecuniam habeat ... unde et ipse et omnis familia ejus vivere possit" (i.e. plenty of gold and silver ...). Plautus, however, distinctly says (Persa, ii. 5, 16), "Boves bini hic sunt in crumena" (Two bulls in a purse.) The Greeks had the phrase bouz epi glwthz. Servius tells us that even the Romans had a coin with a bull stamped on it. (See Pliny, 18, 3.) Presuming that there was no such coin, there cannot be a doubt that the word Bos was used as the equivalent of the price of an ox.

Bosh

A Persian word meaning nonsense. It was popularised in 1824 by James Morier in his Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan, a Persian romance. (Turkish, bosh lakerdi, silly talk.)

"I always like to read old Darwin's Loves of the Plants; bosh as it is in a scientific point of view."— Kingsley: Two Years Ago (chap. x.).

Bosky

On the verge of drunkenness. University slang, from bosko, to pasture, to feed. Everyone will remember how Sir John Falstaff made sack his meat and drink.

Bosom Friend

(A). A very dear friend. Nathan says, "It lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter." (2 Sam. xii. 3.) Bosom friend, amie du cœur. St. John is represented in the New Testament as the "bosom friend" of Jesus.

Bosom Sermons

Written sermons, not extemporary ones or from notes. Does it not mean committed to memory or learnt by heart?

"The preaching from 'bosom sermons,' or from writing, being considered a lifeless practice before the Reformation."— Blunt: Reformation in England, p. 179.

Bosphorus

=Ox ford. The Thracian Bosphorus, or Bosporus, unites the Sea of Marmora with the Euxine (2 syl.) or Black Sea. According to Greek fable, Zeus (Jupiter) greatly loved Io, and changed her into a white cow or heifer from fear of Hera or Juno; to flee from whom she swam across the strait, which was thence called bos poros, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, who was made to wander, in a state of phrenzy, from land to land. The wanderings of Io were a favourite subject of story with the ancients. Ultimately, the persecuted Argive princess found rest on the banks of the Nile.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

and Valerius Flaccus give this account, but Accarion says it was a ship, with the prow of an ox, sent by some Thracians through the straits, that gave name to this passage.

Boss

a master, is the Dutch baas, head of the household. Hence the great man, chief, a masher, a swell.

“Mr. Stead calls Mr. O'Connor the ‘Boss of the House.’ “

Bossum

One of the two chief deities of the negroes on the Gold Coast, the other being Demonio. Bossum, the principle of good, is said to be white; and Demonio, the principle of evil, black. (African mythology.)

Bostal

or Borstall. A narrow road—way up the steep ascent of hills or downs. (Anglo—Saxon biorh, a hill; stigelë, a rising path; our stile.)

Botanomancy Divination by leaves. Words were written on leaves which were exposed to the wind. The leaves left contained the response. (See Botany .)

Botany

means a treatise on fodder (Greek, botane, fodder, from boskin, to feed). The science of plants would be “phytology,” from phyton—logos (plant—treatise).

Botch

A patch. Botch and patch are the same word; the older form was bodge, whence boggle. (Italian pezzo, pronounced patzo.)

Bother

i.e. pother (Hibernian). Halliwell gives us blother, which he says means to chatter idly.

“ ‘Sir,’ cries the umpire, ‘cease your pother,

The creature's neither one nor t'other.’ “

Lloyd: The Chameleon.

The Irish bódhar (buaidhirt, trouble), or its cognate verb, to deafen, seems to be the original word.

Bothie System

The Scotch system of building, like a barrack, all the outhouses of a farmstead, as the byres, stables, barns, etc. The farm menservants live here. (Gaelic, bothag, a cot or hut, our booth.)

“The bothie system prevails, more or less, in the eastern and north—eastern districts.”—J. Begg, D.D.

Botley Assizes

The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When the assizes are coming on?" and an innuendo is supposed to be implied to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Bottes

A propos de bottes. By the by, thus: Mais, Mons., à propos de bottes, comment se porte madame votre mère?

"That venerable personage [the Chaldæan Charon] not only gives Izdubar instructions how to regain his health, but tells him, somewhat a propos des bottes ... the long story of his perfidious adventure."—Nineteenth Century, June, 1891, p. 911.

Bottle

Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things. Bottle is a diminutive of the French botte, a bundle; as botte de foin, a bundle of hay.

Hang me in a bottle.

(See Cat.)

Bottle—chart

A chart of ocean surface currents to show the track of sealed bottles thrown from ships into the sea.

Bottle—holder

One who gives moral but not material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize—fighting, where each combatant has a bottle—holder to wipe off blood, refresh with water, and do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win.

"Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle—holder of oppressed States. ... He was the stead—fast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world."—The Times.

Bottle—imps

The Hebrew word for familiar spirits is oboth, leather bottles, to indicate that the magicians were wont to imprison in bottles those spirits which their spells had subdued.

Bottle—washer (Head). Chief agent; the principal man employed by another; a factotum. Head waiter or butler (botteller).

Bottled Beer

is said to have been discovered by Dean Nowell as a most excellent beverage. The Dean was very fond of fishing, and took a bottle of beer with him in his excursions. One day, being disturbed, he buried his bottle under the grass, and when he disinterred it some ten days afterwards, found it so greatly improved that he ever after drank bottled beer.

Bottled Moonshine

Social and benevolent schemes, such as Utopia, Coleridge's Pantisocracy, the dreams of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, the New Republic, and so on.

“Godwin! Hazlitt! Coleridge! Where now are their `novel philosophies and systems'? Bottled moonshine, which does not improve by keeping.”— Birrell: Obiter Dicta, p. 109 (1885).

Bottom

A ship's bottom is that part which is used for freight or stowage. Goods imported in British bottoms are those which come in our own vessels. Goods imported in foreign bottoms are those which come in foreign ships. A full bottom is where the lower half of the hull is so disposed as to allow large stowage. A sharp bottom is when a ship is capable of speed.

At bottom.

Radically, fundamentally: as, the young prodigal lived a riotous life, but was good at bottom, or below the surface.

At the bottom.

At the base or root.

“Pride is at the bottom of all great mistakes.”— Ruskin: True and Beautiful, p. 426.

From the bottom of my heart.

Without reservation. (Imo corde.)

“If one of the parties ... be content to forgive from the bottom of his heart all that the other hath trespassed against him.”— Common Prayer Book.

He was at the bottom of it. He really instigated it, or prompted it. Never venture all in one bottom — i.e. one ship. “Do not put all your eggs into one basket.”

“My ventures are not in one bottom trusted.”— Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

To have no bottom.

To be unfathomable. To get to the bottom of the matter. To ascertain the entire truth; to bolt a matter to its bran. To stand on one's own bottom. To be independent. “Every tub must stand on its own bottom.” To touch bottom. To reach the lowest depth.

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

Bottom

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Nick), the weaver. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than anyone else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self—conceit. He is in one part of Midsommer Night's Dream represented with an ass's head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell, caresses him as an Adonis.

The name is very appropriate, as the word bottom means a ball of thread used in weaving, etc. Thus in Clark's Heraldry we read, "The coat of Badland is argent, three bottoms in fess gules, the thread or."

"When Goldsmith, jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted, said, 'I can do that,' he was but playing Bottom."—R. G. White.

Bottomless The bottomless pit. An allusion to William Pitt, who was remarkably thin.

Botty

Conceited. The frog that tried to look as big as an ox was a "botty" frog (Norfolk). A similar word is

"swell," though not identical in meaning. "Bumpkin" and "bumptious" are of similar construction. (Welsh, bot, a round body, our bottle; both, the boss of a shield; bothel, a rotundity.)

Boucan

Donner un boucan. To give a dance. Boucan or Bocan was a musician and dancing master in the middle of the seventeenth century. He was alive in 1645.

"Thibaut se dit estre Mercure,

Et Porgueilleux Colin nous jure

Qu'il est aussi bien Apollon

Que Boccan est bon violon."

Sieur de St. Amant (1661).

"Les musiciens qui jouent au ballet du roi sont appelés 'disciples de Bocan.'"—Histoire Comique de Francion (1635).

Bouders

or Boudons. A tribe of giants and evil genii, the guard of Shiva. (Indian mythology.)

Boudoir

properly speaking, is the room to which a lady retires when she is in the sulks. (French, bouder, to pout or sulk.)

The first boudoirs were those of the mistresses of Louis XV. (See Bower.)

Boues de St. Amand

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Les). The mud baths of St. Amand (that is, St. Amand — les — Eaux, near Valenciennes, famous for its mineral waters). These mud — baths are a “sorte de limon qui se trouve près des eaux minérales.” By a figure of speech, one says, by way of reproof, to an insolent, foul—mouthed fellow, “I see you have been to the mud—baths of St. Amand.”

Bought and Sold

or Bought, sold, and done for. Ruined, done for, outwitted.

“Jocky of Norfolk, be not too bold,

For Diccon, thy master, is bought and sold.”

Shakespeare: Richard III., act v. 3.

“It would make a man mad as a buck to be so bought and sold.”— Comedy of Errors, iii. 1.

Bougie

A wax candle; so called from Bougiah, in Algeria, whence the wax was imported. A medical instrument used for dilating strictures or removing obstructions.

Boule

or Boule—work (not Buhl). A kind of marquetry; so called from André Charles Boule, a cabinetmaker, to whom Louis XIV. gave apartments in the Louvre. (1642—1732.)

Bouljanus

An idol worshipped at Nantes, in ancient Gaul. An inscription was found to this god in 1592. (Celtic mythology.)

Bouncer

That's a bouncer. A gross exaggeration, a braggart's lie. (Dutch, bonz, verb bonzen, to bounce or thump. A bouncing lie is a thumping lie, and a bouncer is a thumper.)

“He speaks plain cannon, fire, and smoke, and bounce.”— Shakespeare: King John, ii. 2.

Bounty

Queen Anne's Bounty. The produce of the first—fruits and tenths due to the Crown, made over by Queen Anne to a corporation established in the year 1704, for the purpose of augmenting church livings under 50 a year.

Bouquet

French for nosegay.

“Mr. Disraeli was able to make a financial statement burst into a bouquet of flowers.”— McCarthy: Our Own Times, vol. iii. chap. xxx. p. 11.

The bouquet of wine,

also called its nosegay, is its aroma.

Bourbon

So named from the castle and seigniorship of Bourbon, in the old province of Bourbonnais. The Bourbon family is a branch of the Capet stock, through the brother of Philippe le Bel.

Bourgeois

(French), our burghess. The class between the “gentleman” and the peasantry. It includes all merchants, shopkeepers, and what we call the “middle class.”

Bourgeoisie

(French). The merchants, manufacturers, and master—tradesmen considered as a class. Citoyen is a freeman, a citizen of the State; bourgeois, an individual of the Bourgeoisie class. Molière has a comedy entitled Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.

“The commons of England, the Tiers—Etat of France, the bourgeoisie of the Continent generally, are the descendants of this class [artisans] generally.”— Mill: Political Economy (Prelim, p. 12).

Bouse

(See Boozy.)

Boustrap'a

Napoleon III. The word is compounded of the first syllables Bou—logne, Stra—sbourg, Pa—ris, and alludes to his escapades in 1836 and 1840.

Boustrophedon

A method of writing or printing, alternately from right to left and left to right, like the path of oxen in ploughing. (Greek, bous—strepho, ox—turning.)

Bouts—rimes

[rhymed—endings]. A person writes a line and gives the last word to another person, who writes a second to rhyme with it, and so on. Dean Swift employs the term for a poem, each stanza of which terminates with the same word. He has given a poem of nine verses, each of which ends with Domitilla, to which, of course, he finds nine rhymes. (French.)

Bovey Coal

A lignite found at Bovey Tracy, in Devonshire.

Bow

(to rhyme with flow). (Anglo—Saxon, boga; verb, bogan or bugan, to arch.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Draw not your bow till your arrow is fixed.

Have everything ready before you begin. He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

He has two strings to his bow.

Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of the British bowmen carrying a reserve string in case of accident.

To draw a bow at a venture.

To attack with a random remark; to make a random remark which may hit the truth.

“A certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote the King of Israel.”— 1 Kings xxii. 34.

To draw the long bow.

To exaggerate. The long—bow was the famous English weapon till gunpowder was introduced, and it is said that a good archer could hit between the fingers of a man's hand at a considerable distance, and could propel his arrow a mile. The tales told about long—bow adventures are so wonderful that they fully justify the phrase given above.

To unstring the bow will not heal the wound

(Italian). René of Anjou, king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabeau of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, and with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, “Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction.”

Bow (to rhyme with now). The fore—end of a boat or ship. (Danish and Norwegian, boug or bov, a shoulder; Icelandic, bogr.)

On the bow.

Within a range of 45 on one side or the other of the prow.

Bow Bells

Born within sound of Bow bells. A true cockney. St. Mary—le—Bow has long had one of the most celebrated bell—peals in London. John Dun, mercer, gave in 1472 two tenements to maintain the ringing of Bow bell every night at nine o'clock, to direct travellers on the road to town; and in 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of “sounding a retreat from work.” Bow church is nearly the centre of the City. (This bow rhymes with flow.)

Bow—catcher

(A). A corruption of “Beau Catcher,” a love—curl, termed by the French an accroche coeur. A love—curl worn by a man is a Bell—rope, i.e. a rope to pull the belles with.

Bow—hand

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The left hand; the hand which holds the bow. (This bow rhymes with flow.) To be too much of the bow—hand. To fail in a design; not be sufficiently dexterous.

Bow—street Runners

Detectives who scoured the country to find criminals, before the introduction of the police force. Bow Street, near Covent Garden, London, is where the principal police—court stands. (This bow rhymes with flow.)

Bow—window in Front

(A) A big corporation.

“He was a very large man, ... with what is termed a considerable bow—window in front.”— Capt. Marryat: Poor Jack, i.

Bow—wow Word

A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, whip—poor—will, etc. (Max Müller.)

Bowden

Not every man can be vicar of Bowden. Not everyone can occupy the first place. Bowden is one of the best livings in Cheshire. (Cheshire proverb.)

Bowlerise

(To). To expurgate a book in editing it. Thomas Bowdler, in 1818, gave to the world an expurgated edition of Shakespeare's works. We have also Bowdlerite, Bowdlerist, Bowdleriser, Bowdlerism, Bowdlerisation, etc. (See Grangerise.)

Bowels of Mercy

Compassion, sympathy. The affections were at one time supposed to be the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as the bile, the kidneys, the heart, the head, the liver, the bowels, the spleen, and so on. Hence such words and phrases as melancholy (black bile); the Psalmist says that his reins, or kidneys, instructed him (Psa. x. 7), meaning his inward conviction; the head is the seat of understanding; the heart of affection and memory (hence “learning by heart”), the bowels of mercy, the spleen of passion or anger, etc.

His bowels yearned over him

(upon or towards him). He felt a secret affection for him.

“Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother.”— Gen. xliii. 30; see also 1 Kings iii. 26.

Bower

A lady's private room. (Anglo—Saxon bur, a chamber.) (To rhyme with flower.) (See Boudoir.)

“By a back staircase she slipped to her own bower.”— Bret Harte: Thankful Blossoms, part ii.

Bower Anchor

An anchor carried at the bow of a ship. There are two: one called the best bower, and the other the small bower. (To rhyme with flower.)

“Starboard being the best bower, and port the small bower.”— Smyth: Sailor's Word—book.

Bower—woman

(A). A lady's maid and companion. The attendants were admitted to considerable freedom of speech, and were treated with familiarity and kindness. (“Bower” to rhyme with flower.)

“This maiden,' replied Eveline, `is my bower—woman, and acquainted with my most inward thoughts. I beseech you to permit her presence at our conference.”— Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. xi.

Bower of Bliss

in Wandering Island, the enchanted residence of Acrasia, destroyed by Sir Guyon. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book ii.) (“Bower” to rhyme with flower.)

Bowie Knife

A long, stout knife, carried by hunters in the Western States of America. So called from Colonel James Bowie, one of the most daring characters of the States. Born in Logan, co. Kentucky. A bowie knife has a horn handle, and the curved blade is 15 in. long, and 1 1/4 wide at the hilt. (“Bowie” to rhyme with showy.)

Bowing

We uncover the head when we wish to salute anyone with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, etc., uncover their feet. The reason is this: With us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head; but in the East it is putting on the slippers. To take off our symbol of honour is to confess we are but

“the humble servant” of the person whom we thus salute. (“Bowing” to rhyme with ploughing or plowing.)

Bowled

He was bowled out. A term in cricket. (Pronounce bold.)

Bowling

Tom Bowling. The type of a model sailor in Smollett's Roderick Random. (To rhyme with rolling.) The Tom Bowling referred to in Dibdin's famous sea—song was Captain Thomas Dibdin, brother of Charles Dibdin, who wrote the song, and father of Dr. Dibdin, the bootlegbooksc.

“Here a sheer hulk lies poor Tom Bowling,

The darling of the crew.” Dibdin.

Bowls

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

They who play bowls must expect to meet with rubbers. Those who touch pitch must expect to defile their fingers. Those who enter upon affairs of chance, adventure, or dangerous hazard must make up their minds to encounter crosses, losses, or difficulties. Those who play with edged instruments must expect to get cut. Soldiers in battle must look out for wounds, gamblers for losses, libertines for diseases.

“Bowls” to rhyme with rolls.

Bowse

(See Browse.)

Bowyer God

The same as the “archer god,” meaning Cupid. (“Bower” to rhyme with grower.)

Box

I've got into the wrong box. I am out of my element. Lord Lyttelton used to say he ought to have been brought up to some business; that whenever he went to Vauxhall and heard the mirth of his neighbours, he used to fancy pleasure was in every box but his own. Wherever he went for happiness, he somehow always got into the wrong box. (See Christmas Box.)

Box and Cox

The two chief characters in John M. Morton's farce, usually called Box and Cox.

Box the Compass

Repeat in order the 32 points. (Spanish, boxar, to sail round.)

Box Days

Two days in spring and autumn, and one at Christmas, during vacation, in which pleadings may be filed. This custom was established in 1690, for the purpose of expediting business. Each judge has a private box with a slit, into which informations may be placed on box days, and the judge, who alone has the key, examines the papers in private.

Box Harry

(To), among commercial travellers, is to shirk the table d'hôte and take something substantial for tea, in order to save expense. Halliwell says, “to take care after having been extravagant.” To box a tree is to cut the bark to procure the sap, and these travellers drain the landlord by having a cheap tea instead of an expensive dinner. To “box the fox” is to rob an orchard.

Boxing—Day

(See Christmas Box.)

Boy

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

in sailor language has no reference to age, but only to experience in seamanship. A boy may be fifty or any other age. A crew is divided into able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys or greenhorns. A “boy” is not required to know anything about the practical working of the vessel, but an “able seaman” must know all his duties and be able to perform them.

“A boy does not ship to know anything.”

Boy Bachelor

William Wotton, D.D., was admitted at St. Catherine's Hall before he was ten, and took his B.A. when he was twelve and a half. (1666—1726.)

Boy Bishop

St. Nicholas. From his cradle he is said to have manifested marvellous indications of piety, and was therefore selected for the patron saint of boys. (Fourth century.)

Boy Bishop.

The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir, etc., on St. Nicholas Day (December 6th), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honour for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died during the time of his prelacy, he was buried in pontificalibus. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the Temple among the doctors while He was a boy. The custom was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII.

Boy in buttons

(A). (See Buttons.)

Boycott

(To). To boycott a person is to refuse to deal with him, to take any notice of him, or even to sell to him. The term arose in 1881, when Captain Boycott, an Irish landlord, was thus ostracised by the Irish agrarian insurgents. The custom of ostracising is of very old standing. St. Paul exhorts Christians to “boycott” idolaters (2 Cor. vi. 17); and the Jews “boycotted” the Samaritans. The French phrases, Damner une boutique and Damner une ville, convey the same idea; and the Catholic Church anathematizes and interdicts freely.

“One word as to the way in which a man should be boycotted. When any man has taken a farm from which a tenant has been evicted, or is a grabber, let everyone in the parish turn his back on him; have no communication with him, have no dealings with him. You need never say an unkind word to him; but never say anything at all to him. If you must meet him in fair, walk away from him silently. Do him no violence, but have no dealings with him. Let every man's door be closed against him; and make him feel himself a stranger and a castaway in his own neighbourhood.”—J. Dillon, M.P. (Speech to the Land League, Feb. 26, 1881).

Boyle Controversy

A book—battle between the Hon. Charles Boyle, third Earl of Orrery, and the famous Bentley, respecting the Epistles of Phalaris. Charles Boyle edited the Epistles of Phalaris in 1695. Two years later Bentley published his celebrated Dissertation, to prove that the epistles were not written till the second century after Christ instead of six centuries before that epoch. In 1699 he published another rejoinder, and utterly annihilated the Boyleists.

Boyle's Law

“The volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure.” If we double the pressure on a gas, its volume is reduced to one—half; if we quadruple the pressure, it will be reduced to one—fourth; and so on; so called from the Hon. Robert Boyle. (1627—1691.)

Boyle Lectures

Eight sermons a year in defence of Christianity, founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle.

Boz

Charles Dickens (1812—1870).

“Boz, my signature in the Morning Chronicle, ” he tells us, “was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honour of the Vicar of Wakefield, which, being pronounced Bozes, got shortened into Boz. “

“Who the dickens `Boz' could be

Puzzled many a learned elf;

But time revealed the mystery,

For `Boz' appeared as Dickens' self”

Epigram in the Carthusian.

Bozzy

James Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson (1740—1795).

Brabanconne

A Belgian patriotic song, composed in the revolution of 1830, and so named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Brabancons

Troops of adventurers and bandits, who made war a trade and lent themselves for money to anyone who would pay them; so called from Brabant, their great nest. (Twelfth century.)

Brace

The Brace Tavern, southeast corner of King's Bench; originally kept by two brothers named Partridge, i.e. a brace of birds.

Brace of Shakes

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In a brace of shakes. Very soon. (See Shakes.) Similar phrases are: “In the twinkling of an eye.” (See Eye.) “In the twinkling of a bed—post.” (See Bed—Post.) or Bradamante. Sister of Rinaldo, in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. She is represented as a most wonderful Christian Amazon, possessed of an irresistible spear, which unhorsed every knight that it touched. The same character appears in the Orlando Innamorato of Bojardo.

Bradamant

Bradshaw's Guide

was started in 1839 by George Bradshaw, printer, in Manchester. The Monthly Guide was first issued in December, 1841, and consisted of thirty—two pages, giving tables of forty—three lines of English railway.

Bradwardine

(Rose). The daughter of Baron Bradwardine, and the heroine of Scott's Waverley. She is in love with young Waverley, and ultimately marries him.

Brag

A game at cards: so called because the players brag of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bragging that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying “I brag,” and staking a sum of money on the issue. (Hoyle.)

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better.

Talking is all very well, but doing is far better. Jack Brag. A vulgar, pretentious braggart, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook's novel of the same name.

“He was a sort of literary Jack Brag.”—T. H. Burton.

Braggadochio A braggart. One who is very valiant with his tongue, but a great coward at heart. A barking dog that bites not. The character is from Spenser's Faërie Queene, and a type of the “Intemperance of the Tongue.” After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadochio is stripped of all his “glories”: his shield is claimed by Sir Marinel; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florimel; his horse is claimed by Sir Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his squire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of everyone. It is thought that the poet had Felipe of Spain in his eye when he drew this character.

(Faërie Queene, iii. 8, 10; v. 3.)

Bragi

Son of Odin and Frigga. According to Scandinavian mythology, he was the inventor of poetry; but, unlike Apollo, he is always represented as an old man with a long white beard. His wife was Iduna.

Bragi's Apples

An instant cure of weariness, decay of power, ill temper, and failing health. These apples were inexhaustible, for immediately one was eaten its place was supplied by another.

Bragi's Story

Always enchanting, but never coming to an end.

“But I have made my story long enough; if I say more, you may fancy that it is Bragi who has come among you, and that he has entered on his endless story.”— Keary: Heroes of Asgard, p. 224.

Bragmardo

When Gargantua took the bells of Notre Dame de Paris to hang about the neck of his horse, the citizens sent Bragmardo to him with a remonstrance. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel.)

Brahma

(Indian). The self—existing and invisible Creator of the universe; represented with four heads looking to the four corners of the world. The divine triad is Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Brahma.

One of the three beings created by God to assist in the creation of the world. The Brahmins claim him as the founder of their religious system.

“Whate'er in India holds the sacred name

Of piety or lore, the Brahmins claim;

In wildest rituals, vain and painful, lost,

Brahma, their founder, as a god they boast.”

Camoens: Lusiad, book vii.

Brahmi

One of the three goddess—daughters of Vishnu, representing “creative energy.”

Brahmin

A worshipper of Brahma, the highest caste in the system of Hinduism, and of the priestly order.

Bramble (Matthew). A testy, gouty, benevolent, country squire, in Smollett's novel of Humphrey Clinker. Colman has introduced the same character as Sir Robert Bramble in his Poor Gentleman. Sheridan's “Sir Anthony Absolute” is of the same type.

“A'n't I a baronet? Sir Robert Bramble at Blackberry Hall, in the county of Kent? `Tis time you should know it, for you have been my clumsy, two—fisted valet—de—chambre these thirty years.”— The Poor Gentleman, iii. 1.

Bran

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

If not Bran, it is Bran's brother. If not the real "Simon Pure," it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran was Fingal's dog, a mighty favourite.

Bran—new or Brand—new. (Anglo—Saxon, brand, a torch.) Fire new. Shakespeare, in Love's Labour Lost, i. 1, says, "A man of fire—new words." And again in Twelfth Night, iii. 2, "Fire—new from the mint"; and again in King Lear, v. 3, "Fire—new fortune"; and again in Richard III., act i. 3, "Your fire—new stamp of honour is scarce current." Originally applied to metals and things manufactured in metal which shine. Subsequently applied generally to things quite new.

Brand

The Clicquot brand, etc., the best brand, etc. That is the merchant's or excise mark branded on the article itself, the vessel which contains the article, the wrapper which covers it, the cork of the bottle, etc., to guarantee its being genuine, etc. Madame Clicquot, of champagne notoriety, died in 1866.

He has the brand of villain in his looks.

It was once customary to brand the cheeks of felons with an F. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

Brandenburg

Confession of Brandenburg. A formulary or confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg, by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the confession of Augsburg.

Brandimart

in Orlando Furioso, is Orlando's brother—in—law.

Brandon

the juggler, lived in the reign of Henry VIII.

Brandons

Lighted torches. Dominica de brandonibus (St. Valentine's Day), when boys used to carry about brandons (Cupid's torches).

Brandy is Latin for Goose

Here is a pun between anser, a goose, and answer, to reply. What is the Latin for goose? Answer [anser] brandy. (See Tace The Latin For candle.)

Brandy Nan

Queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy (1664, 1702—1714). On the statue of Queen Anne in St. Paul's Churchyard a wit wrote—

"Brandy Nan, Brandy Nan, left in the lurch,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Her face to the gin—shop, her back to the church.”

A “gin palace” used to stand at the south corner of St. Paul's Churchyard.

Branghtons

(The). Vulgar, malicious, jealous women. The characters are taken from Miss Burney's novel called Evelina. One of the brothers is a Cockney snob.

Brank

A gag for scolds. (Dutch, prang, a fetter; German, pranger, Gælic, brancas, a kind of pillory.)

Brasenose (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose, the arms of the college; but the word is a corruption of brasnhuis, a brasserie or brewhouse. (Latin, brasinium.)

Brass

Impudence. A lawyer said to a troublesome witness, “Why, man, you have brass enough in your head to make a teakettle.” “And you, sir,” replied the witness, “have water enough in yours to fill it.”

Sampson Brass.

A knavish attorney; servile, affecting sympathy, but making his clients his lawful prey. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Brat

A child; so called from the Welsh, brat, a child's pinafore; and brat is a contraction of brattach, a cloth, also a standard.

“Every man must repair to the brattach of his tribe.”— Scott.

“O Israel! O household of the Lord!

O Abraham's brats! O brood of blessed seed!” Gascoigne: De Profundis.

Brave

The Brave.

Alfonso IV. of Portugal (1290, 1324—1357). John Andr. van der Mersch, patriot, The brave Fleming (1734—1792).

Bravery

Finery is the French braverie. The French for courage is bravoure.

“What woman in the city do I name

When that I say the city woman bears

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders?

Who can come in and say that I mean her? ...

Or what is he of basest function

That says his bravery is not of my cost?"

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Bravest of the Brave

Marshal Ney. So called by the troops of Friedland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. Napoleon said of him, "That man is a lion." (1769—1815.)

Brawn

The test of the brawn's head. A little boy one day came to the court of King Arthur, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, declared, "There's never a cuckold's knife can carve this head of brawn." No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat. (Percy's Reliques.)

Bray

(See Vicar.)

Brazen Age

The age of war and violence. It followed the silver age.

"To this next came in course the brazen age,

A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody rage,

Not impious yet. Hard steel succeeded then,

And stubborn as the metal were the men."

Dryden: Metamorphoses, i.

Brazen—faced

Bold (in a bad sense), without shame.

"What a brazen—faced varlet art thou!"

Shakespeare: King Lear,

ii, 2.

Brazen Head

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The following are noted:— One by Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years' labour, and was broken into a thousand pieces by Thomas Aquinas, his disciple. One by Friar Bacon.

“Bacon trembled for his brazen head.”

Pope: Dunciad,

iii. 104.

“Quoth he, `My head's not made of brass,

As Friar Bacon's noddle was.' “

S. Butler: Hudibras,

ii. 2.

The brazen head of the Marquis de Villena, of Spain.

Another by a Polander, a disciple of Escotillo, an Italian. It was said if Bacon heard his head speak he would succeed; if not, he would fail. Miles was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the Head spoke thrice: “Time is”; half an hour later it said, “Time was.” In another half—hour it said, “Time's past,” fell down, and was broken to atoms. Byron refers to this legend.

“Like Friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken, `Time is,' `Time was,' `Time's past.' “

Don Juan,

i. 217.

Brazen Head.

A gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Ferragus, of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, past, present, or to come. (Valentine and Orson.)

Brazen out

(To). To stick to an assertion knowing it to be wrong; to outface in a shameless manner; to disregard public opinion.

Breaches

meaning creeks or small bays, is to be found in Judges v. 17. Deborah, complaining of the tribes who refused to assist her in her war with Sisera, says Reuben continued in his sheepfolds, Gilead remained beyond Jordan, Dan in ships, and Asher in his breaches, that is, creeks on the seashore.

Bread

To break bread. To partake of food. Common in Scripture language. Breaking of bread. The Eucharist.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“They continued ... in breaking of bread, and in prayers.”— Acts ii. 42; and again verse 46.

Bread

He took bread and salt, i.e. he took his oath. Bread and salt were formerly eaten when an oath was taken.

Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days

(Eccles. xi. 1). When the Nile overflows its banks the weeds perish and the soil is disintegrated. The rice—seed being cast into the water takes root, and is found in due time growing in healthful vigour.

Don't quarrel with your bread and butter.

Don't foolishly give up the pursuit by which you earn your living. To know which side one's bread is buttered. To be mindful of one's own interest.

To take the bread out of one's mouth.

To forestall another; to say something which another was on the point of saying; to take away another's livelihood. (See under Butter.)

Bread—basket

(One's). The stomach.

Bread and Cheese

The barest necessities of life.

Break

(To). To become a bankrupt. (See Bankrupt.)

To break a bond.

To dishonour it. To break a journey. To stop before the journey is accomplished. To break a matter to a person. To be the first to impart it, and to do so cautiously and by piecemeal. To break bread. To partake of the Lord's Supper.

“Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them.”— Acts xx. 7.

To break one's fast.

To take food after long abstinence; to eat one's breakfast after the night's fast. To break one's neck. To dislocate the bones of one's neck.

To break on the wheel.

To torture one on a “wheel” by breaking the long bones with an iron bar. (Cf. COUP)

DE GRÂCE.)

To break a butterfly on a wheel.

To employ superabundant effort in the accomplishment of a small matter.

“Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel,

Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel.”

Pope: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 307—8.

To break out of bounds.

To go beyond the prescribed limits.

Break Cover (To). To start forth from a hiding—place.

Break Down

(To). To lose all control of one's feelings.

Break Faith

(To). To violate one's word or pledge.

Break Ground

(To). To commence a new project. As a settler does.

Break In

(To). To interpose a remark. To train a horse to the saddle or to harness.

Break of Day

Day—break.

“At break of day I will come to thee again.”

Wordsworth: Pet Lamb,

stanza 15.

Break the Ice

(To). To prepare the way; to cause the stiffness and reserve of intercourse with a stranger to relax; to impart to another bit by bit distressing news or a delicate subject.

Break your Back

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(To). Make you bankrupt. The metaphor is from carrying burdens on the back.

Break up Housekeeping

(To). To discontinue keeping a separate house.

Break with One

(To). To cease from intercourse.

“What cause have I given him to break with me?”—Florence Marryat.

Breakers Ahead

Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in the open sea always announce sunken rocks, sandbanks, etc.

Breaking a Stick

Part of the marriage ceremony of the American Indians, as breaking a wine—glass is part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews. (Lady Augusta Hamilton. Marriage Rites, etc., 292, 298.)

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitor of the Virgin Mary breaking his stick. This alludes to the legend that the several suitors were each to bring an almond stick, which was to be laid up in the sanctuary over—night, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor which God approved of. It was thus that Joseph became the husband of Mary. (Pseudo—Matthew's Gospel, 40, 41.)

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on Joseph's back.

Breast

To make a clean breast of it. To make a full confession; concealing nothing.

Breath

All in a breath. Without taking breath. (Latin, continenti spiritu.)

It takes away one's breath.

The news is so astounding it causes one to hold his breath with surprise. Out of breath. Panting from exertion; temporarily short of breath.

Save your breath to cool your porridge.

Don't talk to me, it is only wasting your breath.

“You might have saved your breath to cool your porridge.”—Mrs. Gaskell: Libbie Marsh (Era 111).

To catch one's breath.

To check suddenly the free act of breathing.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“‘I see her,’ replied I, catching my breath with joy.”— Capt. Marryat: Peter Simple.

To hold one's breath. Voluntarily to cease breathing for a time. To take breath. To cease for a little time from some exertion in order to recover from exhaustion of breath. Under one's breath. In a whisper or undertone of voice.

Breathe

To breathe one's last. To die.

Breche de Roland

A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenees, some three hundred feet in width, between two precipitous rocks. The legend is that Roland, the paladin, cleft the rock in two with his sword Durandal, when he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvalles.

“Then would I seek the Pyrenean breach

Which Roland clove with huge two—handed sway.” Wordsworth.

Breeches

To wear the breeches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Similar to The grey mare is the better horse. (See Grey.)

The phrase is common to the French, Dutch, Germans, etc., as Elle porte les braies. Die vrouw die hosen anhaben. Sie hat die Hösen.

Breeches Bible

(See Bible.)

Breeze

House—sweepings, as fluff, dust, ashes, and so on, thrown as refuse into the dust—bin. We generally limit the meaning now to small ashes and cinders used for coals in burning bricks. The word is a corruption of the French, débris (rubbish, or rather the part broken or rubbed off by wear, tear, and stress of weather). The French, braise, older form brese, means small coke or charcoal.

The Breeze—fly.

The gad—fly; so called from its sting. (Anglo—Saxon, briose; Gothic, bry, a sting.)

Breeze

A gentle wind or gale. (French, brise, a breeze.) Figuratively, a slight quarrel.

Breidablik

[wide—shining]. The palace of Baldur, which stood in the Milky Way. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Brennus

A Latin form of the Kymric word Brenhin (a war—chief). In times of danger the Druids appointed a brenn to lead the confederate tribes to battle.

Brent

Without a wrinkle. Burns says of John Anderson, in his prime of life, his “locks were like the raven,” and his “bonnie brow was brent” (without a wrinkle).

Brent—goose

(A). Properly a brant—goose, the branta bernicla, a brownish—grey goose of the genus branta.

“For the people of the village

Saw the flock of brant with wonder.”

Longfellow: Hiawatha, part xvi. stanza 32.

Brent—hill

means the eyebrows.

Looking

or gazing from under brent—hill. In Devonshire means “frowning at one;” and in West Cornwall to brend means to wrinkle the brows. It is very remarkable that the word should have such opposite meanings.

Brentford

Like the two kings of Brentford smelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to an old farce called The Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham.

“The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand,” and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter “smelling at one nosegay” (act ii. s. 2).

Bressommer or Brest—summer. (French, sommier, a lintel or bressummer.) A beam supporting the whole weight of the building above it; as, the beam over a shop—front, the beam extending over an opening through a wall when a communication between two contiguous rooms is required. Sometimes these beams support a large superstructure. (The word bress, brest, or breast, in carpentry, means a rafter, and the German brett = a plank.)

Bretwalda

(ruler of Britain). The chief of the kings of the heptarchy who exercised a certain undefined power over the other rulers; something like that of Hugues Capet over his peers.

“The office of Bretwalda, a kind of elective chieftainship, of all Britain, was held by several Northumbrian kings, in succession.”— Earle: English Tongue, p. 26.

Brevet Rank

is rank one degree higher than your pay. Thus, a brevet—major has the title of major, but the pay of captain. (French, brevet, a patent, a concession.)

Breviary

An epitome of the old office of matins and lauds for daily service in the Roman Catholic Church. The Breviary contains the daily “Divine Office,” which those in orders in the Catholic Church are bound to recite. The office consists of psalms, collects, readings from Scripture, and the life of some saint or saints.

Brew

Brew me a glass of grog, i.e. mix one for me. Brew me a cup of tea, i.e. make one for me. The tea is set to brew, i.e. to draw. The general meaning of the word is to boil or mix; the restricted meaning is to make malt liquor.

Brewer

The Brewer of Ghent. James van Artevelde. (Fourteenth century.) It may here be remarked that it is a great error to derive proper names of any antiquity from modern words of a similar sound or spelling. As a rule, very few ancient names are the names of trades; and to suppose that such words as Bacon, Hogg, and Pigg refer to swineherds, or Gaiter, Miller, Tanner, Ringer, and Bottles to handicrafts, is a great mistake. A few examples of a more scientific derivation will suffice for a hint:—

BREWER. This name, which exists in France as Bruhière and Brugière, is not derived from the Saxon briwan (to brew), but the French bruyère (heath), and is about tantamount to the German “Plantagenet”

(broom—plant). (See Rymer's Fædera, William I.)

BACON is from the High German verb began (to fight), and means “the fighter.” PIGG and BIGG are from the old High German pichan (to slash).

HOGG is the Anglo—Saxon hyge (scholar), from the verb hogan (to study). In some cases it may be from the German hoch (high).

BOTTLE is the Anglo—Saxon Bod'—el (little envoy). Norse, bodi; Danish, bud. GAITER is the Saxon Gaid—er (the darter). Celtic, gais, our goad.

MILLER is the old Norse, melia, our mill and maul, and means a “mauler” or “fighter.” RINGER is the Anglo—Saxon hring gar (the mailed warrior)

SMITH is the man who smites.

TANNER (German Thanger, old German Danegaud) is the Dane—Goth. This list might easily be extended.

Briareos

or Ægeon. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Briareos, but men called him Ægeon. (Iliad, i. 403.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Not he who brandished in his hundred hands

His fifty swords and fifty shields in fight,

Could have surpassed the fierce Argantes' might.” Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, book vii.

The Briareus of languages.

Cardinal Mezzofanti, who knew fifty—eight different tongues. Byron called him

“a walking polyglot; a monster of languages; a Briareus of parts of speech.” (1774—1849.) Generally pronounced Bri'—a—ruce.

Bold Briareus. Handel (1685—1756).

Briar—root Pipe

A pipe made from the root—wood of the large heath (bruyère), which grows in the south of France.

Briboci

Inhabitants of part of Berkshire and the adjacent counties referred to by Cæsar in his Commentaries.

Bric—a—brac

Odds and ends of curiosities. In French, a marchand de bric—à—brac is a seller of rubbish, as old nails, old screws, old hinges, and other odds and ends of small value; but we employ the phrase for odds and ends of vertu. (Bricoler in archaic French means Faire toute espèce de metier, to be Jack of all trades. Brac is the ricochet of bric, as fiddle—faddle and scores of other double words in English.)

“A man with a passion for bric—a—brac is always stumbling over antique bronzes, intaglios, mosaics, and daggers of the time of Benvenuto Cellini.”— Aldrich: Miss Mehetable's Son, chap. ii.

Brick

A regular brick. A jolly good fellow. (Compare tetragwnoz anhr; “square”; and “four—square to all the winds that blow.”)

“A fellow like nobody else, and, in fine, a brick.”— George Eliot: Daniel Deronda, book ii. chap. 16.

Brick—and—mortar Franchise

A Chartist phrase for the 10 household system, now abolished.

Brickdusts

The 53rd Foot; so called from the brickdust—red colour of their facings. Also called Five—and—thre'pennies, a play on the number and daily pay of the ensigns.

Now called the 1st battalion of the “King's Shropshire Light Infantry.” The 2nd battalion is the old 85th.

Brick—tea

The inferior leaves of the tea—plant mixed with sheep's blood and pressed into cubes; the ordinary drink of the common people south of Moscow.

“The Tartars swill a horrible gruel, thick and slab, of brick—tea, suet, salt, pepper, and sugar, boiled in a chaldron (sic).”— The Daily Telegraph, Friday, October 16th, 1891.

Bride

The bridal wreath is a relic of the corona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride Cake

A relic of the Roman Confarreatio, a mode of marriage practised by the highest class in Rome. It was performed before ten witnesses by the Pontifex Maximus, and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake made of salt, water, and flour (far) Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride

or Wedding Favours represent the true lover's knot, and symbolise union.

Bride of Abydos

Zuleika, daughter of Giaffir, Pacha of Abydos. As she was never wed, she should be called the affianced or betrothed. (Byron.)

Bride of Lammermoor

Lucy Ashton. (Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

Bride of the Sea

Venice; so called from the ancient ceremony of the Doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic, saying, “We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination.”

Bridegroom is the old Dutch gom (a young man). Thus, Groom of the Stole is the young man over the wardrobe. Groom, an ostler, is quite another word, being the Persian garma (a keeper of horses), unless, indeed, it is a contracted form of stable—groom (stable—boy). The Anglo Saxon Bryd—guma (guma = man) confused with groom, a lad.

Bridegroom's Men

In the Roman marriage by confarreatio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by bachelors, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of gold and silver. (See Bride Cake .)

Bridewell

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The city Bridewell, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, was built over a holy well of medical water, called St. Bride's Well, where was founded a hospital for the poor. After the Reformation, Edward VI. chartered this hospital to the city. Christ Church was given to the education of the young; St. Thomas's Hospital to the cure of the sick; and Bridewell was made a penitentiary for unruly apprentices and vagrants.

Bridge of Gold

According to a German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, to bless the vineyards and cornfields.

“Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,

Upon thy bridge of gold.”

Longfellow: Autumn

Made a bridge of gold for him; i.e.

enabling a man to retreat from a false position without loss of dignity.

Bridge of Jehennam

(See Serat.)

Bridge of Sighs

which connects the palace of the Doge with the state prisons of Venice. Over this bridge the state prisoners were conveyed from the judgment—hall to the place of execution.

“I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs,

A palace and a prison on each hand.”

Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv. 1:

Waterloo Bridge, in London, used, some years ago, when suicides were frequent there, to be called The Bridge of Sighs.

Bridgewater Treatises

Instituted by the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, in 1825. He left the interest of 8,000 to be given to the author of the best treatise on “The power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in creation.” Eight are published by the following gentlemen:— (1) The Rev. Dr. Chalmers, (2) Dr. John Kidd, (3) the Rev. Dr. Whewell, (4) Sir Charles Bell, (5) Dr. Peter M Roget, (6) the Rev. Dr. Buckland, (7) the Rev. W. Kirby, and (8) Dr. William Prout.

Bridle

To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. The bridle was an instrument for punishing a scold; to bite on the bridle is to suffer this punishment.

Bridle Road

or Way. A way for a riding—horse, but not for a horse and cart.

Bridle up

(To). In French, se rengorger, to draw in the chin and toss the head back in scorn or pride. The metaphor is to a horse pulled up suddenly and sharply.

Bridlegoose

(Judge), or Bridoie, who decided the causes brought to him by the throw of dice. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iii. 39.)

Bridport Stabbed with a Bridport dagger, i.e. hanged. Bridport, in Dorsetshire, was once famous for its hempen goods, and monopolised the manufacture of ropes, cables, and tackling for the British navy. The hangman's rope being made at Bridport gave birth to the proverb. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Brigadore

(3 syl.). (See Horse.)

Brigand

properly means a seditious fellow. The Brigands were light—armed, irregular troops, like the Bashi—Bazouks, and like them were addicted to marauding. The Free Companies of France were Brigands. (Italian, brigante, seditious; briga, variance.)

Brigandine

The armour of a brigand, consisting of small plates of iron on quilted linen, and covered with leather, hemp, or something of the kind.

Brigantine

(3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two—masted vessel with a brig's foremast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Bright's Disease

A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Brigians

The Castilians; so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix or Brigus, said by monkish fabulists to be the grandson of Noah.

“Edward and Pedro, emulous of fame ...

Thro' the fierce Brigians hewed their bloody way, Till in a cold embrace the striplings lay.”

Camoens: Lusiad, v.

Brigliadoro

(See Horse.)

Brilliant Madman

(The). Charles XII. of Sweden. (1682—1697—1718.)

“Macedonia's madman or the Swede.”

Johnson: Vanity of Human Wishes.

Briney

or Briny. I'm on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Bring About

(To). To cause a thing to be done.

Bring Down the House

(To). To cause rapturous applause in a theatre.

Bring into Play

(To). To cause to act, to set in motion.

Bring Round (To). To restore to consciousness or health; to cause one to recover [from a fit, etc.].

Bring To

(To). To restore to consciousness; to resuscitate. Many other meanings.

“ ‘Ill bring her to,’ said the driver, with a brutal grin; ‘Ill give her something better than camphor.’ ”— Mrs. Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Bring to Bear

(To). To cause to happen successfully.

Bring to Book

(To). To detect one in a mistake.

Bring to Pass

(To). To cause to happen.

Bring to the Hammer

(To). To offer or sell by public auction.

Bring Under

(To). To bring into subjection.

Bring Up

(To Brioche (2 syl.). A sort of bun or cake common in France, and now pretty generally sold in England. When Marie Antoinette was talking about the bread riots of Paris during the 5th and 6th October, 1789, the Duchesse de Polignac naïvely exclaimed, “How is it that these silly people are so clamorous for bread, when they can buy such nice brioche for a few sous?” This was in spirit not unlike the remark of our own Princess Charlotte, who avowed “that she would for her part rather eat beef than starve, “ and wondered that the people should be so obstinate as to insist upon having bread when it was so scarce.

Bris

Il conte di San Bris, governor of the Louvre, was father of Valentina, and leader of the St. Bartholomew massacre. (Meyerbeer's Opera: Gli Ugonotti.)

Briseis

(3 syl.). The patronymic name of Hippodamia, daughter of Briseus (2 syl.). A concubine of Achilles, to whom he was greatly attached. When Agamemnon was compelled to give up his own concubine, who was the daughter of a priest of Apollo, he took Briseis away from Achilles. This so annoyed the hero that he refused any longer to go to battle, and the Greeks lost ground daily. Ultimately, Achilles sent his friend Patroclos to supply his place. Patroclos was slain, and Achilles, towering with rage, rushed to battle, slew Hector, and Troy fell.

Brisingamen

Freyja's necklace made by the fairies. Freyja left her husband Odin in order to obtain this necklace; and Odin deserted her because her love was changed into vanity. It is not possible to love Brisingamen and Odin too, for no one can serve two masters.

As a moral tale this is excellent. If Freyja personifies “the beauty of the year,” then the necklace means the rich autumn tints and flowers, which (soon as Freyja puts on) her husband leaves her—that is, the fertility of the genial year is gone away, and winter is at hand.

Brisk as a Bee

(See Similes.)

Brissotins

A nickname given to the advocates of reform in the French Revolution, because they were “led by the nose” by Jean Pierre Brissot. The party was subsequently called the Girondists.

Bristol Board

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A stiff drawing—paper, originally manufactured at Bristol.

Bristol Boy

(The

“The marvellous boy The sleepless soul that perished in his pride.” Wordsworth: Resolution and Independence.

Bristol Diamonds

Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, Clifton, near Bristol.

Bristol Fashion

(In). Methodical and orderly. More generally “Shipshape and Bristol fashion.”

“In the great mass meeting, October 18th, 1884, a route of above three miles was observed in one unbroken line. No cheering disturbed the stately solemnity; no one ran to give any direction; no noise of any kind was heard, but on, in one unbroken line, steady and stately, marched the throng in `Bristol fashion.’”—Daily News, October 20th, 1884.

Bristol Milk

Sherry sack, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

“This metaphorical milk, whereby Xeres or Sherry—sack is intended.”—Fuller. Worthies.

Bristol Waters

Mineral waters of Clifton, near Bristol, with a temperature not exceeding 74; formerly celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption. They are very rarely used now.

Britain

By far the most probable derivation of this word is that given by Bochart, from the Phoenician Baratanic (country of tin), contracted into B'ratan'. The Greek Cassiterides (tin islands) is a translation of Baratanic, once applied to the whole known group, but now restricted to the Scilly Isles. Aristotle, who lived some 350 years before the Christian era, calls the island Britannic, which is so close to B'ratanic that the suggestion of Bochart can scarcely admit of a doubt. (De Mundo, sec. 3.)

Pliny says, “Opposite to Celtiberia are a number of islands which the Greeks called `Cassiterides' ” (evidently he means the British group). Strabo says the Cassiterides are situated about the same latitude as Britain.

Great Britain

consists of “Britannia prima” (England), “Britannia secunda” (Wales), and “North Britain” (Scotland), united under one sway.

Greater Britain.

The whole British empire.

Britannia

The first known representation of Britannia as a female figure sitting on a globe, leaning with one arm on a shield, and grasping a spear in the other hand, is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died A.D. 161. The figure reappeared on our copper coin in the reign of Charles II., 1665, and the model was Miss Stewart, afterwards created Duchess of Richmond. The engraver was Philip Roetier, 1665. In 1825 W. Wyon made a new design.

“The King's new medall, where, in little, there is Mrs. Stewart's face, ... and a pretty thing it is, that he should choose her face to represent Britannia by,”— Pepys' Diary (25 Feb.).

British Lion

(The). The pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to the John Bull, which symbolises the substantiality, solidity, and obstinacy of the people, with all their prejudices and national peculiarities.

To rouse the British Lion is to flourish a red flag in the face of John Bull; to provoke him to resistance even to the point of war.

“To twist the lion's tail” is a favourite phrase and favourite policy with some rival unfriendly powers.

Britomart

[sweet maid] (see below). Daughter of King Ryence of Wales, whose desire was to be a heroine. She is the impersonation of saintly chastity and purity of mind. She encounters the “savage, fierce bandit and mountaineer” without injury; is assailed by “hag and unlaid ghost, goblin, and swart fairy of the mine,” but “dashes their brute violence into sudden adoration and blank awe.” Britomart is not the impersonation of celibacy, as she is in love with an unknown hero, but of “virgin purity.” (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iii. Her marriage, book v. 6.)

“She charmed at once and tamed the heart,

Incomparable Britomart.” Scott.

Britomartis

A Cretan nymph, very fond of the chase. King Minos fell in love with her, and persisted in his advances for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea. (Cretan, britus—martis, sweet maiden.)

Briton

(Like a). Vigorously, perseveringly. “To fight like a Briton” is to fight with indomitable courage. “To work like a Briton” is to work hard and perseveringly. Certainly, without the slightest flattery, dogged courage and perseverance are the strong characteristics of John Bull. A similar phrase is “To fight like a Trojan.”

Brittany

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The damsel of Brittany. Eleanora, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II., King of England and Duke of Brittany. At the death of Prince Arthur she was the real heir to the crown, but John confined her in the castle of Bristol till death (1241).

Broach

To broach a new subject. To start one in conversation. The allusion is to beer tubs. If one is flat, another must be tapped. A broach is a peg or pin, and to broach a cask is to bore a hole in the top for the vent—peg.

“I did broach this business to your highness.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII.,

ii. 4.

Broad as Long

'Tis about as broad as it is long. One way or the other would bring about the same result.

Broad Arrow

on Government stores. It was the cognisance of Henry, Viscount Sydney, Earl of Romney, master—general of the ordnance. (1693—1702.)

It seems like a symbol of the Trinity, and Wharton says, “It was used by the Kelts to signify holiness and royalty.”

Broad Bottom Ministry

(1744). Formed by a coalition of parties: Pelham retained the lead; Pitt supported the Government; Bubb Doddington was treasurer of the navy.

Broadcloth

The best cloth for men's clothes. So called from its great breadth. It required two weavers, side by side, to fling the shuttle across it. Originally two yards wide, now about fifty—four inches; but the word is now used to signify the best quality of (black) cloth.

Broadside

Printed matter spread over an entire sheet of paper. The whole must be in one type and one measure, i.e. must not be divided into columns. A folio is when the sheet is folded, in which case a page occupies only half the sheet.

“Pamphlets and broadsides were scattered right and left.”— Fiske: American History, chap.

vii. p. 341.

In naval language, a broadside means the whole side of a ship; and to “open a broadside on the enemy” is to discharge all the guns on one side at the same moment.

Brobdingnag

The country of gigantic giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy “not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid.”

“You high church steeple, you gawky stag,

Your husband must come from Brobdingnag.” Kane O'Hara: Midas.

Brobdingnagian

Colossal; tall as a church steeple. (See above.)

“Limbs of Brobdingnagian proportions.”— The Star.

Brocken

The spectre of the Brocken. This is the shadow of men and other objects greatly magnified and reflected in the mist and cloud of the mountain opposite. The Brocken is the highest summit of the Harz range.

Brocklehurst

(The Rev. Robert). A Calvinistic clergyman, the son of Naomi Brocklehurst, of Brocklehurst Hall, part founder of Lowood Institution, where young ladies were boarded, clothed, and taught for 15 a year, subsidised by private subscriptions. The Rev. Robert Brocklehurst was treasurer, and half starved the inmates in order to augment his own income, and scared the children by talking to them of hell—fire, and making capital out of their young faults or supposed shortcomings. He and his family fared sumptuously every day, but made the inmates of his institution deny themselves and carry the cross of vexation and want. (C. Brontë: Jane Eyre.)

Brogue

(1 syl.) properly means the Irish brog, or shoe of rough hide. The application of brog to the dialect or manner of speaking is similar to that of buskin to tragedy and sock to comedy.

“And put my clouted brogues from off my feet.”

Shakespeare: Cymbeline,

iv. 2.

Brogues

(1 syl.). Trousers. From the Irish brog, resembling those still worn by some of the French cavalry, in which trousers and boots are all one garment.

Broken Feather

(A). A broken feather in his wing. A scandal connected with one's character.

“If an angel were to walk about, Mrs. Sam Hurst would never rest till she had found out where he came from; and perhaps whether he had a broken feather in his wing.”— Mrs. Oliphant: Phoebe.

Broken Music

A “consort” consisted of six viols, usually kept in one case. When the six were played together it was called a “whole consort,” when less than the six were played it was called “a broken consort.” Sometimes applied to open chords or arpeggios.

“Here is good broken music.”

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida,

iii. 1.

Lord Bacon in his Sylva Sylvarum gives a different explanation: he says certain instruments agree together and produce concordant music, but others (as the virginal and lute, the Welsh and Irish harps) do not accord.

Broken on the Wheel

(See Break.)

Broker

Properly speaking, is one who sells refuse. In German, called mäklers, that is, “sellers of damaged stores.” (Teutonic, brak or wrak, refuse, allied with German brauchen.)

Generally some special word is prefixed as bill—broker, cotton—broker, ship—broker, stock—broker, etc.

Brontes

(2 syl.). A blacksmith personified, one of the Cyclops. The name signifies Thunder.

“Not with such weight, to frame the forky brand,

The ponderous hammer falls from Brontes' hand.” Hoole: Jerusalem Delivered, book xx.

Bronzomarte (See Horse.)

Brook

(Master). The name assumed by Ford when he visits Sir John Falstaff. The amorous knight tells Master Brook all about his amour with Mrs. Ford, and how he duped her husband by being stowed into a basket of dirty linen.

“Ford. I'll give you a pottle of burnt sack to give me recourse to him, and tell him my name is Brook, only for a jest.

“Host. My hand, bully. Thou shalt have egress and regress, ... and thy name shall be Brook.”— Shakespeare. Merry Wives of Windsor, II. 1.

Brooks of Sheffield

An imaginary individual mentioned in David Copperfield. (See Harris, Mrs.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Broom

A broom is hung at the mast—head of ships about to be sold, to indicate that they are to be swept away. The idea is popularly taken from Admiral Tromp; but probably this allusion is more witty than true. The custom of hanging up something to attract notice seems very common. Thus an old piece of carpet from a window indicates household furniture for sale; a wisp of straw indicates oysters for sale; a bush means wine for sale; an old broom, ships to sell, etc. etc. (See Pennant.)

A new broom.

One fresh in office.

New brooms sweep clean.

Those newly appointed to an office find fault and want to sweep away old customs.

Brosier

Eating one out of house and home. At Eton, when a dame keeps an unusually bad table, the boys agree together on a day to eat, pocket, or waste everything eatable in the house. The censure is well understood, and the hint is generally effective. (Greek, broso, to eat.)

Brother

or Frère. A friar not in orders. (See Father.)

Brother

(So—and—so). A fellow—barrister. Brother Benedict. A married man. (See Benedict.) Brother Birch. A fellow—school—master. Brother Blade. A fellow—soldier, properly; but now anyone of the same calling as yourself. Brother Brush. A fellow—painter.

Brother Bung.

A fellow—tapster. Brother Buskin. A fellow—comedian or actor. A Brother Chip. A fellow—carpenter.

A Brother Clergyman.

A fellow—clergyman. A Brother Crispin. A fellow—shoemaker.

A Brother Mason.

A fellow—Freemason. A Brother Quill. A fellow—author.

A Brother Salt.

A fellow—seaman or sailor. A Brother Shuttle. A fellow—weaver.

A Brother Stitch.

A fellow—tailor. A Brother String. A fellow—violinist. A Brother Whip. A fellow coachman.

B

Brother German

A real brother. (Latin, germanus, of the same stock; germen, a bud or sprout.)

“Te in germani fratris dilexi loco.”— Terence Andria, I. 5, 58.

A uterine brother is a brother by the mother's side only. (Latin, uterinus, born of the same mother, as “frater uterius,” uterus.)

Brother Jonathan

When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. “We must consult brother Jonathan,” said the general, meaning his excellency, Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the State of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. To consult brother Jonathan then became a set phrase, and brother Jonathan grew to be the John Bull of the United States. (J. R. Bartlett: Dictionary of Americanisms.)

Brother Sam

The brother of Lord Dundreary (q.v.), the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E. A. Sothorn and T. B. Buckstone. (Supplied by T. B. Buckstone, Esq.)

Browbeat

To beat or put a man down by knitting the brows.

Brown

A copper coin, a penny; so called from its colour. Similarly a sovereign is a “yellow boy.” (See Blunt.

To be done brown.

To be roasted, deceived, taken in.

Brown as a Berry

(See Similes.)

Brown, Jones, and Robinson

Three Englishmen who travel together Their adventures were published in Punch, and were the production of Richard Doyle. They typify the middle—class English abroad; and hold up to ridicule their gaucherie and contracted notions, their vulgarity and extravagance, their conceit and snobbism.

Brown Bess

means brown barrel. The barrels were browned to keep them from rusting. (Dutch, bus, a gun—barrel; Low German, büsse; Swedish, byssa. Our arquebus, blunderbuss.) In 1808 a process of browning was introduced, but this has, of course, nothing to do with the distinctive epithet. Probably Bess is a companion word to Bill.

(See below.)

Brown Bill

A kind of halbert used by English foot—soldiers before muskets were employed. We find in the mediæval ballads the expressions, “brown brand,” “brown sword,” “brown blade,” etc. Sometimes the word rusty is substituted for brown, as in Chaucer: “And in his side he had a rousty blade”; which, being the god Mars, cannot mean a bad one. Keeping the weapons bright is a modern fashion; our forefathers preferred the honour of blood stains. Some say the weapons were varnished with a brown varnish to prevent rust, and some affirm that one Brown was a famous maker of these instruments, and that Brown Bill is a phrase similar to Armstrong gun and Colt's revolver. (See above.)

“So, with a band of bowmen and of pikes,

Brown bills and targetiers.”

Marlowe: Edward II.

(1622.)

Brown also means shining (Dutch, brun), hence, “My bonnie brown sword,” “brown as glass,” etc., so that a “brown bill” might refer to the shining steel, and “brown Bess” to the bright barrel.

Brown Study

Absence of mind; apparent thought, but real vacuity. The corresponding French expression explains it—sombre rêverie. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

“Invention flags, his brain grows muddy,

And black despair succeeds brown study.”

Congreve: An Impossible Thing.

Browns

To astonish the Browns. To do or say something regardless of the annoyance it may cause or the shock it may give to Mrs. Grundy.

Anne Boleyn had a whole host of Browns, or “country cousins,” who were welcomed at Court in the reign of Elizabeth. The queen, however, was quick to see what was gauche, and did not scruple to reprove the Browns if she noticed anything in their conduct not comme il faut. Her bluntness of speech often “astonished the Browns.”

Brownie

The house spirit in Scottish superstition. He is called in England Robin Goodfellow. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favourite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair or elegant ones. (See Fairies.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“It is not long since every family of considerable substance was haunted by a spirit they called Brownny, which did several sorts of work and this was the reason why they gave him offerings ... on what they called ‘Brownny's stone.’”—Martin: Scotland.

Brownists

Followers of Robert Brown, of Rutlandshire, a violent opponent of the Established Church in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The present “Independents” hold pretty well the same religious tenets as the Brownists. Sir Andrew Aguecheek says:

“I'd as lief be a Brownist as á politician.” Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

Browse his Jib

(To). A sailor's phrase, meaning to drink till the face is flushed and swollen. The jib means the face, and to browse here means “to fatten.”

The only correct form of the phrase, however, is “to bowse his jib.” To bowse the jib means to haul the sail taut; and as a metaphor signifies that a man is “tight.”

Bruel

The goose, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word means little—roarer.

Bruin

One of the leaders arrayed against Hudibras. He was Talgol, a Newgate butcher, who obtained a captain's commission for valour at Naseby. He marched next Orsin (Joshua Gosling, landlord of the bear—gardens at Southwark).

Sir Bruin.

The name of the bear in the famous German beast—epic, called Reynard the Fox. (Dutch for brown.)

Brumaire

The celebrated 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9th, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brummagem

Worthless or very inferior metallic articles made in imitation of better ones. Birmingham is the great mart and manufactory of gilt toys, cheap jewellery, imitation gems, mosaic gold, and such—like. Birmingham was called by the Romans “Bremenium.”

Brums

In Stock Exchange phraseology this means the “London and North—Western Railway shares.” The Brum, i.e. the Birmingham line.

Brunehild

B

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.) or Brunehilda. Daughter of the King of Issland, beloved by Günther, one of the two great chieftains of the Nibelungenlied or Teutonic Iliad. She was to be carried off by force, and Günther asked his friend Siegfried to help him. Siegfried contrived the matter by snatching from her the talisman which was her protector, but she never forgave him for his treachery. (Old German, bruni, coat of mail; hilt, battle.)

Brunello

(in Orlando Furioso). A deformed dwarf of Biserta, to whom King Agramant gave a ring which had the virtue to withstand the power of magic (book ii.). He was leader of the Tingitanians in the Saracen army. He also figures in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato.

Brunswicker

A native of Brunswick. (See Black Brunswicker.)

Brunt

To bear the brunt. To bear the stress, the heat, and collision. The same word as “burn.” (Icelandic, bruni, burning heat, brun; Anglo—Saxon, brenning, burning.) The “brunt of a battle” is the hottest part of the fight. (Compare “fire—brand.”)

Brush

The tail of a fox or squirrel, which is brushy.

Brush away.

Get along. Brush off. Move on.

He brushed by me. He just touched me as he went quickly past. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish. All these are metaphors from brushing with a brush.

Give it another brush.

A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it; return it to the file for a little more polish.

Brush up

(To). To renovate or revive; to bring again into use what has been neglected, as, “I must brush up my French.” When a fire is slack we brush up the hearth and then sweep clean the lower bars of the stove and stir the sleepy coals into activity.

Brut

A rhyming chronicle, as the Brut d'Angleterre and Le Roman de Brut, by Wace (twelfth century). Brut is the Romance word bruit (a rumour, hence a tradition, or a chronicle based on tradition). It is by mere accident that the word resembles “Brute” or “Brutus,” the traditional king. (See next column.)

Brut d'Angleterre

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A chronicle of the achievements of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Arthur is described as the natural son of Uther, pendragon (or chief) of the ancient Britons. He succeeded his father, in 516, by the aid of Merlin, who gave him a magic sword, with which he conquered the Saxons, Picts, Scots, and Irish. Besides the Brut referred to, several other romances record the exploits of this heroic king.

(See Arthur.)

Brute

in Cambridge University slang, is a man who has not yet matriculated. The play is evident. A “man,” in college phrase, is a collegian; and, as matriculation is the sign and seal of acceptance, a scholar before that ceremony is not a “man,” and therefore only a “biped brute.”

Brute

(Sir John). A coarse, pot—valiant knight, ignobly noted for his absurdities. (Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife.) or Brutus, in the mythological history of England, the first king of the Britons, was son of Sylvius (grandson of Ascanius and great grandson of Æneas). Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece and then in Britain. In remembrance of Troy, he called the capital of his kingdom Troy—novant (New Troy), now London.

Brute

The pedigree was as follows:— (1) Æneas, (2) Ascanius, (3) Silvius, (4) Brutus. (See Troy—Novant.)

Brutum Fulmen

(Latin). A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt.

“His [the Pope's] denunciations are but a brutum fulmen.”— The Standard.

Brutus

(Junius), the first consul of Rome. He condemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore to the throne the banished Tarquin.

“The public father [Brutus], who the private quelled,

And on the dread tribunal sternly sat.”

Thomson: Winter.

The Spanish Brutus.

Alphonso Perez de Guzman (1258—1320). While he was governor, Castile was besieged by Don Juan, who had revolted from his brother, Sancho IV. Juan, who held in captivity one of the sons of Guzman, threatened to cut his throat unless Guzman surrendered the city. Guzman replied, “Sooner than be a traitor, I would myself lend you a sword to slay him,” and he threw a sword over the city wall. The son, we are told, was slain by the father's sword before his eyes.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Brutus

(Marcus). Cæsar's friend, joined the conspirators to murder him, because he made himself a king.

“And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart,

Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urged,

Lifted the Roman steel against thy friend.”

Thomson: Winter, 524—6.

Et tu, Brute.

What! does my own familiar friend lift up his heel against me? The reference is to that Marcus Brutus whose “bastard hand stabbed Julius Cæsar.” (Suetonius.)

Bruxellois

The inhabitants of Brussels or Bruxelles.

Brydport Dagger

(See Bridport.)

Bub

Drink. (Connected with bubble — Latin, bibo, to drink; our imbibe.) (See Grub.)

“Drunk with Helicon's waters and double—brewed bub.”— Prior: To a Person who wrote ill.

Bubastis

The Diana of Egyptian mythology; the daughter of Isis and sister of Horus.

Bubble

(A

“The whole scheme [the Fenian raid on British America] was a collapsed bubble.”— The Times.

The Bubble Act, 6 George I., cap. 18; published 1719, and repealed July 5th, 1825. Its object was to punish the promoters of bubble schemes.

A bubble company. A company whose object is to enrich themselves at the expense of subscribers to their scheme.

A bubble scheme. A project for getting money from subscribers to a scheme of no value.

Bubble and Squeak

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cold boiled meat and greens fried. They first bubbled in water when boiled, and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying—pan.

Something pretentious, but of no real value, such as “rank and title,” or a bit of ribbon in one's button hole.

Bucca

A goblin of the wind, supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks.

Buccaneer'

means sellers of smoke—dried meat, from the Caribbean word boucan, smoke—dried meat. The term was first given to the French settlers in Hayti, whose business it was to hunt animals for their skins. The flesh they smoke—dried and sold, chiefly to the Dutch.

When the Spaniards laid claim to all America, many English and French adventurers lived by buccaneering, and hunted Spaniards as lawful prey. After the peace of Ryswick this was no longer tolerated, and the term was then applied to any desperate, lawless, piratical adventurer.

Bucentaur

A monster, half—man and half—ox. The Venetian state—galley employed by the Doge when he went on Ascension Day to wed the Adriatic was so called. (Greek, bous, ox; centauros, centaur.)

Bucephalos

[bull—headed]. A horse. Strictly speaking, the charger of Alexander the Great, bought of a Thessalian for thirteen talents (3,500).

“True, true; I forgot your Bucephalos.”— Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary.

Buchanites

(3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who appeared in the west of Scotland in 1783. They were named after Mrs. or Lucky Buchan, their founder, who called herself “Friend Mother in the Lord,” claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xii., and maintaining that the Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the “man—child.”

“I never heard of alewife that turned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the West.”— Scott: St. Ronan's Well, c. ii.

Buck

A dandy. (See below.)

“A most tremendous buck he was, as he sat there serene, in state, driving his greys.”— Thackeray: Vanity Fair, chap. vi.

Buck—basket

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A linen—basket. To buck is to wash clothes in lye; and a buck is one whose clothes are buck, or nicely got up. When Cade says his mother was “descended from the Lacies,” two men overhear him, and say,

“She was a pedlar's daughter, but not being able to travel with her furred pack, she washes bucks here at home.” (2 Henry VI., iv. 2.) (German, beuchen, to steep clothes in lye; beuche, clothes so steeped. However, compare “bucket,” a diminutive of the Anglo—Saxon buc.)

Buck—bean

A corruption of bog—bean, a native of wet bog—lands.

Buck—rider

(A). A dummy fare who enables a cabman to pass police—constables who prevent empty cabs loitering at places where cabs will be likely to be required, as at theatres, music—halls, and large hotels. A cabman who wants to get at such a place under hope of picking up a fare gives a “buck” a shilling to get into his cab that he may seem to have a fare, and so pass the police.

“Constables are stationed at certain points to spot the professional ‘buck—riders.’” — Nineteenth Century (March, 1893, p. 576).

Buck—tooth

A large projecting front—tooth. (See Butter Tooth .)

Buckwheat

A corruption of boc. German, buche, beech—wheat; it is so called because it is triangular, like beech—mast. The botanical name is Fagopyrum (beech—wheat).

“The buckwheat

Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers
The August wind.”

Bryant: The Fountain,

stanza 7.

Buckhorse A severe blow or slap on the face. So called from a boxer of that name.

Buckingham

(Saxon, boccen—ham, beech—tree village.) Fuller, in his Worthies, speaks of the beech—trees as the most characteristic feature of this county.

Bucklaw

or rather Frank Hayston, lord of Bucklaw, a wealthy nobleman, who marries Lucia di Lammermoor (Lucy Ashton), who had pledged her troth to Edgar, master of Ravenswood. On the wedding—night Lucy murders him, goes mad, and dies. (Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor. Sir Walter Scott's Bride of Lammermoor.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Buckle

I can't buckle to. I can't give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one's armour or belt.

To cut the buckle.

To caper about, to heel and toe it in dancing. In jigs the two feet buckle or twist into each other with great rapidity.

“Throth, it wouldn't lave a laugh in you to see the parson dancin' down the road on his way home, and the ministher and methodist praicher cuttin' the buckle as they went along.”— W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 98 (see also p. 196).

To put into buckle.

To put into pawn at the rate of 40 per cent. interest. To talk buckle. To talk about marriage.

“I took a girl to dinner who talked buckle to me.”— Vera, 154.

Buckler

(See Shield.)

Bucklersbury

(London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says—

“I cannot cog, and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lispin' hawthorn buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple time.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 3.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry

The 3rd West India Regiment was so called from Buckmaster, the tailor, who used to issue “Light Infantry uniforms” to the officers of the corps without any authority from the Commander—in—Chief.

Buckra

Superior, excellent. That's buckra. A buckra coat is a smart coat; a buckra man, a man of consequence. This word among the West Indians does the service of burra among the Anglo—Indians: as burra saib (great master, i.e. white man), burra khana (a magnificent spread or dinner).

Buckshish

or Baksheesh. A gratuity, pour boire. A term common to India, Persia, and indeed all the East.

Buddha

means the Wise One. From the Indian word budh, to know. The title was given to Prince Siddhartha, generally called Saky'a—muni, the founder of Buddhism. His wife's name was Gopa.

Buddhism

A system of religion established in India in the third century. The general outline of the system is that the world is a transient reflex of deity; that the soul is a “vital spark” of deity; and that after death it will be bound to matter again till its “wearer” has, by divine contemplation, so purged and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

Buddhist

One whose system of religion is Buddhism.

Bude or Gurney Light. The latter is the name of the inventor, and the former the place of his abode. (Goldsworthy Gurney, of Bude, Cornwall.)

Budge

is lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edge of capes, bachelors' hoods, and so on. Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so—called because it was chiefly occupied by budge—makers.

“O foolishness of men! that lend their ears

To those budge—doctors of the stoic fur.”

Milton: Comus, 706, 767.

Budge

(To) is the French bouger, to stir.

Budge Bachelors

A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lambs' wool, who used to accompany the Lord Mayor of London at his inauguration.

Budget

The statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays before the House of Commons every session, respecting the national income and expenditure, taxes and salaries. The word is the old French bougette, a bag, and the present use arose from the custom of bringing to the House the papers pertaining to these matters in a leather bag, and laying them on the table. Hence, to open the budget or bag, i.e. to take the papers from the bag and submit them to the House.

A budget of news is a bagful of news, a large stock of news. Cry Budget. A watchword or shibboleth. Thus Slender says to Shallow—

“We have a nay—word how to know one another. I come to her in white and cry mum; she cries budget: and by that we know one another.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 2.

Buff

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Buff is a contraction of buffle or buffalo; and buff skin is the skin of the buffalo prepared. “To stand in buff” is to stand without clothing in one's bare skin. “To strip to the buff” is to strip to the skin. The French for “buff” is buffle, which also means a buffalo.

To stand buff,

also written bluff, meaning firm, without flinching. Sheridan, in his School for Scandal, ii. 3, says, “That he should have stood bluff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last.” It is a nautical term; a “bluff shore” is one with a bold and almost perpendicular front. The word buff, a blow or buffet, may have got confounded with bluff, but without doubt numerous instances of “buff” can be adduced.

“And for the good old cause stood buff, `Gainst many a bitter kick and cuff.”

Butler: Hudibras's Epitaph.

“I must even stand buff and outface him.”— Fielding.

BUFF in “Blind—man's buff,” the well—known game, is an allusion to the three buffs or pats which the “blind—man” gets when he has caught a player. (Norman—French, buffe, a blow; Welsh, paff, verb, paffio, to thump; our buffet is a little slap.)

Buffalo Bill

Colonel Cody.

Buffalo Robe

(A). The skin of a bison dressed without removing the hair, and used as a travelling rug. The word “robe” is often omitted.

“The large and roomy sleigh was decked with buffalo robes, red—bound, and furnished with sham eyes and ears.”— The Upper Ten Thousand, p. 4.

“Leaving all hands under their buffaloes.”— Kane: Arctic Expedition.

Buffer

of a railway carriage is an apparatus to rebuff or deaden the force of collision.

Buffer

(A). A chap. The French bouffer (older form, bauffer) meant to eat, as il bauffera tout seul. If this is the basis of the word, a buffer is one who eats with us, called a Commoner in our universities.

“I always said the old buffer would.”— Miss Braddon: Lady Audley's Secret.

Buffoon

means one who puffs out his cheeks, and makes a ridiculous explosion by causing them suddenly to collapse. This being a standing trick with clowns, caused the name to be applied to low jesters. The Italian baffare is

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“to puff out the cheeks for the purpose of making an explosion;” our puff. (Italian buffone, a buffoon; French bouffon.)

Buffoons Names synonymous with Buffoon: —

Bobèche.

A clown in a small theatre in the Boulevard du Temple, Paris. (1815—1825.)

Galimafré.

A contemporary and rival of the former.

Tabarin.

(Of the seventeenth century.)

Bruscambille.

Grimaldi.

(1779—1837.) (See Scaramouch.)

Bufs

The old 3rd regiment of foot soldiers. The men's coats were lined and faced with buff, they also wore buff waistcoats, buff breeches, and buff stockings. These are the “Old Bufs,” raised in 1689.

At one time called the Buff Howards, from Howard their colonel (1737—1749). The “Young Bufs” are the old 31st Foot raised in 1702; now called the “Huntingdonshire Regiment,” whose present uniform is scarlet with buff facings.

The Rothshire Bufs.

The old 78th, now the second battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders.

Bugaboo

A monster, or goblin, introduced into the tales of the old Italian romancers. (See below.)

Bugbear

A scarecrow. Bug is the Welsh bwg, a hobgoblin, called in Russia buka. Spenser says, “A ghastly bug doth greatly them affear” (book ii. canto 3); and Hamlet has “bugs and goblins” (v. 2).

“Warwick was a bug that feared us all.”

Shakespeare:

3 Henry IV., v. 3.

“To the world no bug bear is so great

As want of figure and a small estate.”

Pope: Satires, iii. 67—68.

The latter half of this word is somewhat doubtful. The Welsh bár =ire, fury, wrath, whence barog, spiteful, seems probable.

Buggy

A light vehicle without a hood, drawn by one horse. (Hindustani, baghi.)

Buhl—work

Cabinet—work, inlaid with brass; so called from Signor Boule, the inventor, who settled in Paris during the reign of Louis XIV. (The word should be spelt BOULE—WORK.)

Build

for make, as, A man of strong build, a man of robust make. The metaphor is evident.

Build

Applied to dress. Not so bad a build after all, not badly made.

Builder's Square

Emblematic of St. Thomas, patron of architects.

Bulbul

The nightingale. A Persian word, familiarised by Tom Moore.

“’Twas like the notes, half—ecstasy, half—pain, The bulbul utters.”

Moore: Lalla Rookh

(Veiled Prophet, part 1, stanza 14).

Bulis

metamorphosed into a drake; and his son, Egypios, into a vulture.

Bull One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (April 20 to May 21). The time for ploughing, which in Egypt was performed by oxen or bulls.

“At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,

And the bright Bull receives him.”

Thomson: Spring, 26, 27.

Bull.

A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial. The British Apollo, 1740, says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London, in the reign of Henry VII., whose blundering in this way was notorious.

Bull

is a five—shilling piece. “Half a bull” is half—a—crown. From bullā, a great leaden seal. Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a crier who, being apprehended, “swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull.”

The pope's bull.

So called from the bullā or capsule of the seal appended to the document. Subsequently the seal was called the bullā, and then the document itself.

The edict of the Emperor Charles IV. (1356) had a golden bullā, and was therefore called the golden bull. (See Golden Bull.)

Bull

A public—house sign, the cognisance of the house of Clare. The bull and the boar were signs used by the partisans of Clare, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester (Richard III.).

Bull

A bull in a china shop. A maladroit hand interfering with a delicate business; one who produces reckless destruction.

A brazen bull.

An instrument of torture. (See Phalaris.)

He may bear a bull that hath borne a calf (Erasmus: Proverbs)

— “He that accustometh hym—selfe to lytle thynges, by lytle and lytle shalbe able to go a waye with greater thynges (Taverner).

To take the bull by the horns.

To attack or encounter a threatened danger fearlessly; to go forth boldly to meet a difficulty. The figure is taken from bull—fights, in which a strong and skilful matadore will grasp the horns of a bull about to toss him and hold it prisoner.

John Bull.

An Englishman. Applied to a native of England in Arbuthnot's ludicrous History of Europe. This history is sometimes erroneously ascribed to Dean Swift. In this satire the French are called Lewis Baboon, and the Dutch Nicholas Frog.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“One would think, in personifying itself, a nation would ... picture something grand, heroic, and imposing, but it is characteristic of the peculiar humour of the English, and of their love for what is blunt, comic, and familiar, that they have embodied their national oddities in the figure of a sturdy, corpulent old fellow ... with red waistcoat, leather breeches, and a stout oaken cudgel ... [whom they call] John Bull.”— Washington Irving.

Bull and Gate. Bull and Mouth

Public—house signs. A corruption of Boulogne Gate or Mouth, adopted out of compliment to Henry VIII., who took Boulogne in 1544.

Bull—dog

(A). A man of relentless, savage disposition is sometimes so called. A “bull—dog courage” is one that flinches from no danger. The “bull—dog” was the dog formerly used in bull—baiting.

Bull—dogs

in University slang, are the two myrmidons of the proctor, who attend his heels like dogs, and are ready to spring on any offending undergraduate like bull—dogs. (See Myrmidons .)

Bull—necked

The Bull—necked Forger. Cagliostro, the huge impostor, was so called. (1743—1795.)

Bull—ring

(See Mayor Of the Bullring .)

Bull's Eye A small cloud suddenly appearing, seemingly in violent motion, and growing out of itself. It soon covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain. (1 Kings xviii. 44.) Bull's Eye. The inner disc of a target.

“A little way from the centre there is a spot where the shots are thickly gathered; some few have hit the bull's—eye.”— Fiske: Excursions, etc., chap. vi. p. 178.

To make a bull's eye.

To gain some signal advantage; a successful coup. To fire or shoot an arrow right into the centre disc of the target.

Bulls

in Stock Exchange phraseology, means those dealers who “bull,” or try to raise the price of stock, with the view of effecting sales. A bull—account is a speculation made under the hope that the stock purchased will rise before the day of settlement. (See Bear .)

Bullet

Every bullet has its billet. Nothing happens by chance, and no act is altogether without some effect.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“There is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we will.” Another meaning is this: an arrow or bullet is not discharged at random, but at some mark or for some deliberate purpose.

“Let the arrow fly that has a mark.”— Caesar borgia chap. xx.

Bulletin

French for a certificate. An official report of an officer to his superior, or of medical attendants respecting the health of persons of notoriety; so called because they were authenticated by an official *bull*a or seal. (Spanish, botetin, a warrant; Italian, bulletino, a roll.)

Bulling the Barrel

is pouring water into a rum cask, when it is nearly empty, to prevent its leaking. The water, which gets impregnated with the spirit and is very intoxicating, is called bull.

Seamen talk of bulling the teapot (making a second brew), bulling the coffec, etc.

Bullion

properly means the mint where *bol*la, little round coins, are made. Subsequently the metal in the mint.

Bully

To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. (Anglo—Saxon, bulgian, to bellow like a bull.) It is often used, without any mixture of reproof, as a term of endearment, as:—

“O sweet bully Bottom.”— Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 4.

“Bless thee, bully doctor.”— Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

Bully—boy

(A). A jolly companion, a “brick.” (German, buhle, a lover; buhler, a gallant.)

“We be three poor mariners

Newly come from the seas,

We spend our lives in jeopardy,

While others live at ease;

Shall we go dance the round, the round,

Shall we go dance the round?

And he that is a bully boy

Come pledge me on this ground.”

Deuteromelia. (1609.)

Bully—rook

A blustering cheat. Like bully, it is sometimes used without any offensive meaning. Thus the Host, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, addresses Sir John Falstaff, Ford, and Page, etc., as bully—rook — “How now, my bully—rook?” equal to “my fine fellow.”

A bully rake is “one who fights for fighting's sake.” To bully—rag is to intimidate; bully—ragging is abusive intimidation. According to Halliwell, a rag is a scold, and hence a “ragging” means a scolding. Connected with rage.

Bum—bailiff

The French pousse—cul seems to favour the notion that bum —bailiff is no corruption. These officers are frequently referred to as bums.

“Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard, like a bum—bailiff.”

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night,

iii. 4.

Bum—boat

A small wide boat to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore. Also called “dirt—boats,” being used for removing filth from ships lying in the Thames. (Dutch, bumboot, a wide fishing boat. In Canada a punt is called a bun. A bun is a receptacle for keeping fish alive.)

Bumble

A beadle. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dicken's Oliver Twist.

Bumbledom

The dominion of an overbearing parish officer, the arrogance of parish authorities, the conceit of parish dignity. (See above.)

Bummarees

A class of middlemen or fish—jobbers in Billingsgate Market, who get a living by bummareeing,

i.e.

buying parcels of fish from the salesmen, and then retailing them. A corruption of bonne marée, good fresh fish, or the seller thereof. According to the Dictionnaire de l'Académie, marée means toute sorte de poisson de mer que n'est pas salé. Bonne marée, marée fraîche.

Bumper

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A full glass, generally connected with a “toast.” Dr. Arn says a bumper is when the surface of the wine bumps up in the middle. (French, bomber, to render convex, to bulge or swell out.)

“A fancied connection with bump, a swelling, has not only influenced the form of the word, but [has] added the notion of fulness.”— Skeat: Etymological Dictionary.

Bumpkin

A loutish person. (Dutch, boomken, a sprout, a fool.) This word very closely resembles the word “chit.” (See Chitty.)

Bumptious

Arrogant, full of mighty airs and graces; apt to take offence at presumed slights. A corruption of presumptuous, first into “sumptious,” then to bumptious.

Bun

A small cake. (Irish, boinneog, Scotch, bannock.)

In regard to “hot cross buns” on Good Friday, it may be stated that the Greeks offered to Apollo, Diana, Hecate, and the Moon, cakes with “horns.” Such a cake was called a bous, and (it is said) never grew mouldy. The “cross” symbolised the four quarters of the moon.

“Good Friday comes this month: the old woman runs

With one a penny, two a penny `hot cross buns,' Whose virtue is, if you believe what's said, They'll not grow mouldy like the common bread.” Poor Robin: Almanack, 1733.

Bunch of Fives

A slang term for the hand or fist.

Buncle

(John). “A prodigious hand at matrimony, divinity, a song, and a peck.” He marries seven wives, loses all in the flower of their age, is inconsolable for two or three days, then resigns himself to the decrees of Providence, and marries again. (The Life and Opinions of John Buncle, Esq., by Thomas Amory.)

“John is a kind of innocent Henry VIII. of private life.”— Leigh Hunt.

Bundle

Bundle off. Get away. To bundle a person off, is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundle of Sticks AEsop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is, that “Union gives strength.”

“They now lay to heart the lesson of the bundle of sticks.”— The Times.

Bundschuh

[highlows]. An insurrection of the peasants of Germany in the sixteenth century. So called from the highlows or clouted shoon of the insurgents.

Bung

A cant term for a toper. "Away, ... you filthy bung," says Doll to Pistol. (2 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Brother Bung.

A cant term for a publican.

Bung up.

Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungalow

(Indian). The house of a European in India, generally a ground floor with a verandah all round it, and the roof thatched to keep off the hot rays of the sun. There are English bungalows at Birchington and on the Norfolk coast near Cromer. A dâkbungalow is a caravansary or house built by the Government for the use of travellers. (Hindustani, bangla.)

Bungay

Go to Bungay with you! — i.e. get away and don't bother me, or don't talk such stuff. Bungay, in Suffolk, used to be famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones, or to have their old ones newseated, went or sent to Bungay for that purpose. Hence rose the cant saying, "Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended," shortened into "Go to Bungay with you!"

Bungay

My castle of Bungay. (See under Castle .)

Bunkum

Claptrap. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a flowery and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, "I was not speaking to the House, but to Buncombe," which he represented (North Carolina).

"America, too, will find that caucuses, stumporatory, and speeches to Buncombe will not carry men to the immortal gods."— Carlyle: Latter-day Pamphlets (parliaments, p. 93).

Bunny

A rabbit. So called from the provincial word bun, a tail. The Scotch say of the hare, "she cocks her bun." Bunny, a diminutive of bun, applied to a rabbit, means the animal with the "little tail."

"Bunny, lying in the grass,

Saw the shiny column pass.”

Bret Harte: Battle Bunny, stanza 1

Bunsby

(Jack). Captain Cuttle's friend; a Sir Oracle of his neighbours; profoundly mysterious, and keeping his eye always fixed upon invisible dreamland somewhere beyond the limits of infinite space. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Bunting

In Somersetshire bunting means sifting flour. Sieves were at one time made of a strong gauzy woollen cloth, which being tough and capable of resisting wear, was found suitable for flags, and now has changed its reference from sieves to flags. A “bunt—mill” is a machine for sifting corn.

“Not unlike ... a baker's bunt, when he separates the flour from the bran.”— Stedman.

Buphagos

Pausanias (viii. 24) tells us that the son of Japhet was called Buphagos (glutton), as Hercules was called Adephagus, because on one occasion he ate a whole ox (Athenæos x.). The French call the English “Beefeaters,” because they are eaters of large joints of meat, and not of delicate, well—dressed viands. Neither of these has any relation to our Yeomen of the Guards. (See Beefeaters , page 115.)

Burbon

A knight assailed by a rabble rout, who batter his shield to pieces, and compel him to cast it aside. Talus renders him assistance, and is informed by the rescued knight that Fourdelis, his own true love, had been enticed away from him by Grantorto. When the rabble is dispersed, and Fourdelis recovered, Burbon places her on his steed, and rides off as fast as possible. Burbon is Henri IV. of France; Fourdelis, the kingdom of France; the rabble rout, the Roman Catholic party that tried to set him aside; the shield he is compelled to abandon is Protestantism; his carrying off Fourdelis is his obtaining the kingdom by a coup after his renunciation of the Protestant cause. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 11.)

Burchardise

To speak ex cathedra; to speak with authority. Burchard (who died 1026) compiled a volume of canons of such undisputed authority, that any sentence it gave was beyond appeal.

Burchell

(Mr.). A baronet who passes himself off as a poor man, his real name and title being Sir William Thornhill. His favourite cant word is “Fudge.” (Goldsmith. Vicar of Wakefield.)

Burd

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Helen). The Scotch female impersonation of the French preux or prudhomme, with this difference, that she is discreet, rather than brave and wise.

Burden of a Song

The words repeated in each verse, the chorus or refrain. It is the French bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double—diapason of an organ, used in fortè parts and choruses.

Burden of Isaiah.

The “measure” of a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those against whom the burden is uttered. (Isa. xiii. 1, etc.)

The burden of proof.

The obligation to prove something.

“The burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative” [because no one can prove a negative, except by reductio ad absurdum].— Greenleaf: On Evidence (vol. i. part 2, chap. iii.

p. 105).

Bure

(2 syl.). The first woman, and sister of Borr, the father of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bureaucracy

A system of government in which the business is carried on in bureaux or departments. The French bureau means not only the office of a public functionary, but also the whole staff of officers attached to the department. As a word of reproach, bureaucracy has nearly the same meaning as Dickens's word, red—tapeism (q.v.).

Burglar

[burg—larron]. The robber of a burgh, castle, or house. Burglary is called, in ancient law—books, hamesecken or hám—secn, house—violation.

Burgundian

A Burgundian blow, i.e. decapitation. The Duc de Biron, who was put to death for treason by Henri IV., was told in his youth, by a fortune—teller, “to beware of a Burgundian blow.” When going to execution, he asked who was to be his executioner, and was told he was a man from Burgundy.

Burial of an Ass

No burial at all.

“He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.”— Jer. xxii. 19.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Buridan's Ass A man of indecision; like one “on double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglects.” Buridan the scholastic said: “If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two hay—stacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other.”

Burke

To murder by placing something over the mouth of the person attacked to prevent his giving alarm. So called from Burke, an Irishman, who used to suffocate his victims and murder them for the sole purpose of selling the dead bodies to surgeons for dissection. Hanged at Edinburgh, 1829.

To burke a question.

To strangle it in its birth. The publication was burked suppressed before it was circulated.

Burkers

Body—snatchers; those who kill by burking.

Burl, Burler

In Cumberland, a burler is the master of the revels at a bidden—wedding, who is to see that the guests are well furnished with drink. To burl is to carouse or pour out liquor. (Anglo—Saxon, byrlan.)

“Mr. H. called for a quart of beer. He told me to burl out the beer, as he was in a hurry, and I burlled out the glass and gave it to him.”— The Times: Law Reports.

Burlaw

or Byrlaw. A sort of Lynchlaw in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws for their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Burlaw—man, to carry out the pains and penalties. The word is a corrupt form of byr—law, byr=a burgh, common in such names as Derby, the burgh on the Derwent; Grimsby (q.v.), Grims—town.

Burlesque

Father of burlesque poetry. Hipponax of Ephesus. (Sixth century B.C.)

Burlond

A giant whose legs Sir Tryamour cut off. (Romance of Sir Tryamour.)

Burn

His money burns a hole in his pocket. He cannot keep it in his pocket, or forbear spending it.

To burn one's boats.

To cut oneself off from all means or hope of retreat. The allusion is to Julius Caesar and other generals, who burned their boats or ships when they invaded a foreign country, in order that their soldiers might feel that they must either conquer the country or die, as retreat would be impossible.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To burn one's fingers.

To suffer loss by speculation or interference. The allusion is to taking chestnuts from the fire.

“He has been bolstering up these rotten iron—works. I told him he would burn his fingers.”—Mrs. Lynn Linton.

You cannot burn the candle at both ends. You cannot do two opposite things at one and the same time; you cannot exhaust your energies in one direction, and yet reserve them unimpaired for something else. If you go to bed late you cannot get up early. You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot serve God and Mammon. You cannot serve two masters. Poursuis deux lièvres, et les manques. (La Fontaine.) Simul sorbere ac flare non possum.

We burn daylight. We waste time in talk instead of action. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.)

Burn

a stream. A variant of bourn (Anglo—Saxon, burne, a brook, as in Winterbourne, Burnham, Swinburn, etc.).

Burning Crown

(A). A crown of red—hot iron set on the head of regicides.

“He was adjudged

To have his head seared with a burning crown.” Tragedy of Hoffmann. (1631.)

Burnt

The burnt child dreads the fire. Once caught, twice shy. “What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?”

Burnt Candlemas Day

Feb. 2, 1355—6, when Edward III. marched through the Lothians with fire and sword. He burnt to the ground Edinburgh and Haddington, and then retreated from want of provisions. The Scots call the period “Burnt Candlemas.” (See “Epochs of History,” England under the Plantagenets; and Macmillan's series, Little History of Scotland, edited by Prof. Freeman.)

Bursa

(a bull's hide). So the citadel of Carthage was called. The tale is that when Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives “as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide.” The agreement was made, and Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficient for a citadel.

The following is a similar story: The Yakutsk granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the port and town of Yakutsk.

The Indians have a somewhat similar tradition. The fifth incarnation of Vishnu was in the form of a dwarf called Vamen. Vamen, presenting himself before the giant Baly, asked as a reward for services as much land as he could measure in three paces to build a hut on. Baly laughed at the request, and freely granted it.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Whereupon the dwarf grew so prodigiously large that, with three paces, he strode over the whole world.

(Sonnerat: Voyages, vol. i. p. 24.)

Burst

To inform against an accomplice. Slang variety of “split” (turn king's evidence, impeach). The person who does this splits or breaks up the whole concern.

Bury the Hatchet

Let by—goners be by—goners. The “Great Spirit” commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked the calumet or peacepipe, to bury their hatchet, scalping—knives, and war—clubs in the ground, that all thought of hostility might be buried out of sight.

“It is much to be regretted that the American government, having brought the great war to a conclusion, did not bury the hatchet altogether.”— The Times.

“Buried was the bloody hatchet;

Buried was the dreadful war—club;

Buried were all warlike weapons,

And the war—cry was forgotten;

Then was peace among the nations.”

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xiii.

Burying

Cremation. The Parsees neither bury or burn their dead, because they will not defile the elements (fire and earth). So they carry their dead to the Tower of Silence, and leave the body there to be devoured by vultures. (See Nineteenth Century, October, 1893, p. 611.)

Burying at Cross Roads

(See Cross—Roads .)

Bus

A contraction of Omnibus. Of course, Omnibi, as a plural, though sometimes used, is quite absurd.

Busby

(A). A frizzled wig. Doctor Busby, master of Westminster school, did not wear a frizzled wig, but a close cap, somewhat like a Welsh wig. (See Wigs .)

Busby The tall cap of a hussar, artillery—man, etc., which hangs from the top over the right shoulder.

Bush

One beats the bush, but another has the hare, i.e. one does the work, but another reaps the profit. The Latins said, Sic vos non vobis. The allusion is to beating the bush to start game. (See Beating .)

Good wine needs no bush.

A good article will make itself known without being puffed. The booths in fairs used to be dressed with ivy, to indicate that wine was sold there, ivy being sacred to Bacchus. An ivy—bush was once the common sign of taverns, and especially of private houses where beer or wine could be obtained by travellers. In France, a peasant who sells his vineyard has to put a green bush over his door.

The proverb is Latin, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. "Vino vendibili hedera non opus est" (Columella). It was also common to France. "Au vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre."

"If it be true that good wine needs no bush, 'tis true that a good play needs no prologue." Shakespeare: As You Like It (Epilogue).

To take to the bush.

To become bushrangers, like runaway convicts who live by plunder. The bush in this case means what the Dutch call bosch, the uncleared land as opposed to towns and clearings.

"Everything being much cheaper in Toronto than away in the bush."— Geikie: Life in the Woods.

Bushel

To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To make oneself the standard of right and wrong; to appraise everything as it accords or disagrees with one's own habits of thought and preconceived opinions; to be extremely bigoted and self—opiniated.

Under a bushel.

Secretly; in order to hide it.

"Do men light a candle and put it under a bushel?"— Matt. v. 15.

Bushman

(Dutch, Boschjesman). Natives of South Africa who live in the "bush"; the aborigines of the Cape; dwellers in the Australian "bush;" a bush farmer.

"Bushmen ... are the only nomades in the country. They never cultivate the soil, nor rear any domestic animal save wretched dogs."— Livingstone: Travels, chap. ii. p. 55.

Bushrangers

Escaped convicts who have taken refuge in the Australian "bush," and subsist by plunder.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The bushrangers at first were absentees [i.e. escaped convicts] who were soon allured or driven to theft and violence. So early as 1808 they had, by systematic robbery, excited feelings of alarm.”— West: Tasmania.

Business, Busy Saxon, bysgian, the verb, bysig (busy); Dutch, bezigen; German, besorgniss (care, management); sorge (care); Saxon, seogan (to see). From the German sorgen we get the French soigner (to look after something), soigne, and be—sogne (business, or that which is our care and concern), with be—soin (something looked after but not found, hence “want”); the Italian besognio (a beggar).

Business To—morrow

When the Spartans seized upon Thebes, they placed Archias over the garrison. Pelopidas, with eleven others, banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter containing full details of the plot was given to the Spartan polemarch at the banquet table; but Archias thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, “Business tomorrow.” But long ere that sun arose he was numbered with the dead.

Busirane

(3 syl.). An enchanter bound by Britomart. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iii. 11, 12.)

Busiris

A king of Egypt, who used to immolate to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him; and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slew the inhospitable king.

Busiris,

according to Milton, is the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

“Vex'd the Red—Sea coast, whose waves o'er—threw Busiris and his Memphian chivalry.”

Paradise Lost,

book i. 306, 307.

Buskin

Tragedy. The Greek tragic actors used to wear a sandal some two or three inches thick, to elevate their stature. To this sole was attached a very elegant buskin, and the whole was called cothurnus. (See Sock .)

“Or what (though rare) of later age

Ennobled hath the buskined stage.”

Milton: Il Penseroso, 79, 80.

Buss

To kiss. (Welsh, bus, the human lip; Gaelic, bus, the mouth; French, baiser, a kiss.)

“You towers, whose wanton tops do buss the clouds,
Must kiss their own feet.”

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida,

iv. 5.

Busterich

A German god. His idol may still be seen at Sondershusa, the castle of Schwartzenburg.

Busy as a Bee

The equivalent Latin phrase is “Satagis tamquam mus in matella.” (See Similes .)

Butcher

The Butcher. Achmed Pasha was called djezzar (the butcher), and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives. He is famous for his defence of Acre against Napoleon I.

The Butcher.

John, ninth lord Clifford, also called The Black, died 1461. The Bloody Butcher. The Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II. So called from his barbarities in suppressing the rebellion of the young Pretender.

The Royalist Butcher.

Blaise de Montluc, distinguished for his cruelties to the Protestants in the reign of Charles IX. of France (1502—1572).

Butcher Boots

The black boots worn en petite tenue in the hunting field.

Butter

Soft soap, soft solder (pron. saw—der), “wiping down” with winning words. Punch expressively calls it “the milk of human kindness churned into butter.” (Anglo—Saxon, butere or butyre, Latin, butyrum, Greek, boutyron, i.e. bou—turos, cow—cheese, as distinguished from goat— or ewe—butter.)

Soft words butter no parsnips.

Saying ” `Be thou fed,' will not feed a hungry man.” Mere words will not find salt to our porridge, or butter to our parsnips.

“Fine words, says our homely old proverb, butter no parsnips.”— Lowell.

He looks as if butter would not melt in his mouth. He looks like a dolt. He looks quite harmless and expressly made to be played upon. Yet beware, and “touch not a cat but a glove.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“She smiles and languishes, you'd think that butter would not melt in her mouth.”— Thackeray: Pendennis, ix.

He knows on which side his bread is buttered.

He knows his own interest. Scit uti foro. He that has good store of butter may lay it thick on his bread. Cui multum est piperis, etiam oleribus immiscet.

To butter one's bread on both sides.

To be wastefully extravagant and luxurious.

Butter—fingers

Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hand. His fingers are slippery, and things slip from them as if they were greased with butter. Often heard on the cricket field.

“I never was a butter—fingers, though a bad batter.”— H. Kingsley.

Butter—tooth

(A). A wide front tooth. (See Buck—Tooth .)

Buttered Ale

A beverage made of ale or beer (without hops) mixed with butter, sugar, and cinnamon.

Buttercups

So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter of milk. No doubt those cows give the best milk that pasture in fields where buttercups abound, not because these flowers produce butter, but because they grow only on sound, dry, old pastures, which afford the best food. Miller, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says they were so called “under the notion that the yellow colour of butter is owing to these plants.”

Butterflies

in the cab trade, are those drivers who take to the occupation only in summer—time, and at the best of the season. At other times they follow some other occupation.

“The feeling of the regular drivers against these ‘butterflies’ is very strong.”— Nineteenth. Century (March, 1893, p. 177).

Butterfly Kiss

(A). A kiss with one's eyelashes, that is, stroking the cheek with one's eyelashes.

Button

A decoy in an auction— room; so called because he buttons or ties the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what else would slip away.

The button of the cap.

The tip—top. Thus, in Hamlet, Guildenstern says: “On fortune's cap we are not the very button” (act ii. sc. 2), i.e. the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. Thus, in China to the present hour, the first grade of literary honour is the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, a custom adopted in several collegiate schools of England. This gives the expression quoted a further force. Also, the several grades of mandarins are distinguished by a different coloured button on the top of their cap.

Button (of a foil).

The piece of cork fixed to the end of a foil to protect the point and prevent injury in fencing.

Buttons

The two buttons on the back of a coat, in the fall of the back, are a survival of the buttons on the back of riding—coats and military frocks of the eighteenth century, occasionally used to button back the coat—tails.

A boy in buttons. A page, whose jacket in front is remarkable for a display of small round buttons, as close as they can be inserted, from chin to waist.

“The titter [tingle] of an electric bell brought a large fat buttons, with a stage effect of being dressed to look small.”— Howell: Hazard of New Fortunes, (vol. i. part i. chap. vii. p. 58).

He has not all his buttons.

He is half—silly; “not all there”; he is “a button short.” Dash my buttons. Here, “buttons” means lot or destiny, and “dash” is a euphemistic form of a more offensive word.

The buttons come off the foils.

Figuratively, the courtesies of controversy are neglected.

“Familiarity with controversy ... will have accustomed him to the misadventures which arise when, as sometimes will happen in the heat of fence, the buttons come off the foils.”— Nineteenth Century (June, 1891, p. 925).

‘Tis in his buttons.

He is destined to obtain the prize; he is the accepted lover. It is still common to hear boys count their buttons to know what trade they are to follow, whether they are to do a thing or not, and whether some favourite favours them. (See Bachelor.)

“‘Tis in his buttons: he will carry't.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 2.

'Tis not in his buttons.

'Tis not in his power, 'tis not in his lot.

To have a soul above buttons.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To be worthy of better things; to have abilities too good for one's present employment. This is explained by George Colman in Sylvester Daggerwood: "My father was an eminent button—maker ... but I had a soul above buttons ... and panted for a liberal profession."

To put into buttons.

To dress a boy as a "page," with a jacket full in the front with little buttons, generally metallic and very conspicuous.

To take by the button.

To detain one in conversation; to apprehend, as, "to take fortune by the button." The allusion is to a custom, now discontinued, of holding a person by the button or button—hole in conversation.

Button—hole

To button—hole a person. To bore one with conversation. The French have the same locution: Serrer le bouton [á quel qu'un].

"He went about button—holing and boring everyone."— H. Kingsley: Mathilde.

To take one down a button—hole. To take one down a peg; to lower one's conceit.

"Better mind yerselves, or I'll take ye down a button—hole lower."— Mrs. B. Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin, iv.

Button—hole

(A). A flower inserted in the button—hole of a coat.

"In fine weather he [the driver of a hansom] will sport a button—hole— generally a dahlia, or some flower of that ilk."— Nineteenth Century (March, 1893, p. 473).

Buy in

(To). To collect stock by purchase; to withhold the sale of something offered at auction, because the bidding has not reached the "reserve price."

Buy Off

(To). To give a person money to drop a claim or put an end to contention, or to throw up a partnership.

Buy Out

(To). To redeem or ransom.

"Not being able to buy out his life ...

Dies ere the weary sun set."

Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, i.2.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Buy Over

(To). To induce one by a bribe to renounce his claim; to gain over by bribery.

To buy over a person's head.

To outbid another.

Buy Up

(To). To purchase stock to such an amount as to obtain a virtual monopoly, and thus command the market; to make a corner, as "to buy up corn," etc.

Buying a Pig in a Poke

(See Pig , etc.)

Buzfuz

(Serjeant). A driving, chaffing, masculine bar orator, who twists "Chops and Tomato Sauce" into a declaration of love. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Buzz

Empty the bottle. A corruption of bouse (to drink).

"In bousing a bout `twas his gift to excel

And of all jolly toppers he bore off the bell."

(See Boozy.)

Buzz

(A). A rumour, a whispered report.

"Yes, that, on every dream,

Each buzz, each fancy ...

He may enguard his dotage."

Shakespeare: King Lear, i. 4.

Buzzard

(The) is meant for Dr. Burnett, whose figure was lusty.

"The noble Buzzard ever pleased me best."

Dryden: Hind and Panther,

part iii. 1121.

Buzzard called hawk by courtesy.

It is a euphemism— a brevet rank— a complimentary title.

“Of small renown, 'tis true; for, not to lie,

We call [your buzzard] “hawk” by courtesy.”

Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 1122—3.

Between hawk and buzzard.

Not quite a lady or gentleman, nor quite a servant. Applied to tutors in private houses, bear—leaders, and other grown—up persons who are allowed to come down to dessert, but not to be guests at the dinner—table.

By

Meaning against. “I know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby justified.” (1 Cor. iv. 4.)

By—and—by now means a little time hence, but when the Bible was translated it meant instantly. “When persecution ariseth ... by—and—by he is offended” (Matt. xiii. 21); rendered in Mark iv. 17 by the word “immediately.” Our presently means in a little time hence, but in French présentement means now, directly. Thus in France we see, These apartments to be let presently, meaning now — a phrase which would in English signify by—and—by.

Bygones

Let bygones be bygones. Let old grievances be forgotten and never brought to mind.

By—laws

Local laws. From by, a borough. Properly, laws by a Town Council, and bearing only on the borough or company over which it has jurisdiction.

By—road

(A). Not a main road; a local road.

By—the—by

En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. “By—play” is side or secondary play; “By—lanes and streets” are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first “by” means passing from one to another, as in the phrase “Day by day.” Thus “By—the—by” is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By—the—way

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Byron

The Polish Byron. Adam Mickiewicz (1798—1855).

The Russian Byron.

Alexander Sergeivitch Puschkin (1799—1837)

Byrsa (See page 191, col. 1, Bursa .)

Byzantine Art

That symbolical system which was developed by the early Greek or Byzantine artists out of the Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, dome, and round arch; and its chief symbols the lily, cross, vesica, and nimbus. St. Sophia, at Constantinople, and St. Mark, at Venice, are excellent examples.

Byzantine Empire

(The). The Eastern or Greek Empire from 395 to 1453.

Byzantine Historians

Certain Greek historians who lived under the Eastern empire between the sixth and fifteenth centuries. They may be divided into three groups:— (1) Those whose works form a continuous history of the Byzantine empire, from the fourth century to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks; (2) general chroniclers who wrote histories of the world from the oldest period; and (3) writers on Roman antiquities, statistics, and customs.

Byzantines

(3 syl.). Coins of the Byzantine empire, generally called Besants.

C

This letter is the outline of the hollow of the hand, and is called in Hebrew caph (the hollow of the hand).

C.

The French, c, when it is to be sounded like s, has a mark under it ; this mark is called a cedilla. (A diminutive of z; called zeta in Greek, ceda in Spanish.)

C

There is more than one poem written of which every word begins with C. For example: (1) One composed by HUEBALD in honour of Charles le Chauve. It is in Latin hexameters and runs to somewhat more than a hundred lines, the last two of which are

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Conveniet claras claustris componere cannas

Completur clarus carmen cantabile CALVIS.”

(2) One by HAMCONIUS, called “Certamen catholicum cum Calvinistis.” (3) One by HENRY HARDER, of 100 lines in Latin, on “Cats,” entitled: “Canum cum Catis certamen carmine compositum currente calamo C. Catulli Caninii.” The first line is—

“Cattorum canimus certamina clara canumque.”

Cats' canine caterwauling contests chant.

See

M and P for other examples.

Ca Ira

(it will go). Called emphatically Le Carillon National of the French Revolution (1790). It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming on her harpsichord.

“Ca Ira”

was the rallying cry borrowed by the Federalists from Dr. Franklin of America, who used to say, in reference to the American revolution, “Ah! ah! ca ira, ca ira!” (‘twill be sure to do). The refrain of the carillon is—

Ha! ha! It will speed, it will speed, it will speed! Resistance is vain, we are sure to succeed.

Caaba

(3 syl.). The shrine of Mecca, said by the Arabs to be built on the exact spot of the tabernacle let down from heaven at the prayer of repentant Adam. Adam had been a wanderer for 200 years, and here received pardon. The shrine was built, according to Arab tradition, by Ishmael, assisted by his father Abraham, who inserted in the walls a black stone “presented to him by the angel Gabriel.”

Cab

A contraction of cabriolet (a little caperer), a small carriage that scampers along like a kid.

Cabal A junto or council of intriguers. One of the Ministries of Charles II. was called a cabal (1670), because the initial letters of its members formed this acrostic: Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. This accident may have popularised the word, but, without doubt, we borrowed it from the French cabale, “an intriguing faction,” and Hebrew cabala, “secret knowledge.” A junto is merely an assembly; Spanish, junta, a council. (See Notarica; Tammany Ring .)

“In dark cabals and mighty juntos met.”

Thomson.

“These ministers were emphatically called the Cabal, and they soon made the appellation so infamous that it has never since ... been used except as a term of reproach.”— Macaulay: England, vol. i. chap. ii. p. 165.

Cabala

The oral law of the Jews delivered down from father to son by word of mouth. Some of the rabbins say that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it, the angel Japhiel instructed Shem, and the angel Zedekiel instructed Abraham; but the more usual belief is that God instructed Moses, and Moses his brother Aaron, and so on from age to age.

N.B.— The promises held out by the cabala are: the abolition of sin and sickness, abundant provision of all things needful for our well-being during life, familiar intercourse with deity and angels, the gift of languages and prophecy, the power of transmuting metals, and also of working miracles.

Cabalist

A Jewish doctor who professed the study of the Cabala, a mysterious science said to have been delivered to the Jews by revelation, and transmitted by oral tradition. This science consisted mainly in understanding the combination of certain letters, words, and numbers, said to be significant.

Cabalistic

Mystic word—juggling. (See Cabalist .)

Caballero

A Spanish dance, grave and stately; so called from the ballad—music to which it was danced. The ballad begins—

“Esta noche le mataron al caballero.”

Cabbage

It is said that no sort of food causes so much thirst as cabbage, especially that called colewort. Pausanias tells us it first sprang from the sweat of Jupiter, some drops of which fell on the earth. Coelius, Rhodiginus, Ovid, Suidas, and others repeat the same fable.

“Some drops of sweat happening to light on the earth produced what mortals call cabbage.”—

R. ibelais: Pantagruel, book iv. (Prologue).

Cabbage

(To). To filch. Sometimes a tailor is called “cabbage,” from his pilfering cloth given him to make up. Thus in Motteux's Rabelais, iv. 52, we read of “Poor Cabbage's hair.” (Old French, cabas, theft, verb cabasser; Dutch, kabassen; Swedish, grabba; Danish, griber, our grab.)

“Your tailor, instead of shreds, cabbages whole yards of cloth.”— Arbuthnot's John Bull.

Cabbage is also a common schoolboy term for a literary crib, or other petty theft.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cabinet Ministers

The chief officers of state in whom the administrative government is vested. It contains the First Lord of the Treasury (the Premier), the Lord High Chancellor, Lord President of the Council, Lord Privy Seal, Chancellor of the Exchequer, six Secretaries of State, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, President of the Board of Trade, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the President of the Board of Agriculture. The five Secretaries of State are those of the Home Department, Foreign Affairs, Colonies, War, India, and Chief—Secretary to the Lord—Lieutenant of Ireland. Sometimes other members of the Government are included, and sometimes one or two of the above left out of the Cabinet. These Ministers are privileged to consult the Sovereign in the private cabinet of the palace.

Cabiri

Mystic divinities worshipped in ancient Egypt, Phoenicia, Asia Minor, and Greece. They were inferior to the supreme gods, (Phoenician, kabir, powerful.)

Cable's Length

100 fathoms.

Some think to avoid a difficulty by rendering Matthew xix. 24 “It is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle ...”, but the word is , and the whole force of the passage rests on the “impossibility” of the thing, as it is distinctly stated in Mark x. 24, “How hard is it for them that trust in [their] riches, epi toiz crhmasiu... “ It is impossible by the virtue of money or by bribes to enter the kingdom of heaven. (See page 205, col. 1, Camel.)

Cabochon

(En). Uncut, but only polished; applied to emeralds, rubies, and other precious stones. (French, cabochon.)

Cachecope Bell

A bell rung at funerals, when the pall was thrown over the coffin. (French, cache corps, cover over the body.)

Cachet

(pron. cahshay). Lettres de cachet (letters sealed). Under the old French régime, carte—blanche warrants, sealed with the king's seal, might be obtained for a consideration, and the person who held them might fill in any name. Sometimes the warrant was to set a prisoner at large, but it was more frequently for detention in the Bastille. During the administration of Cardinal Fleury 80,000 of these cachets were issued, the larger number being against the Jansenists. In the reigns of Louis XV. and XVI. fifty—nine were obtained against the one family of Mirabeau. This scandal was abolished January 15th, 1790.

Cacodæ'mon

An evil spirit. Astrologers give this name to the Twelfth House of Heaven, from which only evil prognostics proceed. (Greek, kakos daimon.)

“Hie thee to hell for shame, and leave the world,

Thou cacodemon.”

Shakespeare: Richard III.,

i.3.

Cacoethes

(Greek). A “bad habit.”

Cacoethes loquendi.

A passion for making speeches or for talking.

Cacoethes scribendi.

The love of rushing into print; a mania for authorship.

Cacus

A famous robber, represented as three-headed, and vomiting flames. He lived in Italy, and was strangled by Hercules. Sancho Panza says of the Lord Rinaldô and his friends, “They are greater thieves than Cacus.” (Don Quixote.)

Cad

A low, vulgar fellow; an omnibus conductor. Either from cadet, or a contraction of cadger (a packman). The etymology of cad, a cadendo, is only a pun. N.B.—The Scotch cadie or cawdic (a little servant, or errand-boy, or carrier of a sedan-chair), without the diminutive, offers a plausible suggestion.

“All Edinburgh men and boys know that when sedan-chairs were discontinued, the old cadies sank into ruinous poverty, and became synonymous with roughs. The word was brought to London by James Hannay, who frequently used it.”—M. Pringle.

Caddice

or Caddis. Worsted galloon, crewel. (Welsh, cadas, brocade; cadach is a kerchief; Irish, cadan.)

“He hath ribands of all the colours i' the rainbow; ... caddisses, cambrics, lawns.”—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Caddice—garter.

A servant, a man of mean rank. When garters were worn in sight, the gentry used very expensive ones, but the baser sort wore worsted galloon ones. Prince Henry calls Poina a “caddice—garter.” (1 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

“Dost hear,

My honest caddis—garter?”

Glaphorne: Wit in a Constable, 1639.

Caddy

A ghost, a bugbear. A caddis is a grub, a bait for anglers.

“Poor Mister Leviathan Addy!

Lo! his grandeur so lately a sun,

Is sinking (sad fall!) to a caddy.”

Peter Pindar: Great Cry and Little Wool, epistle 1.

Cade

Jack Cade legislation. Pressure from without. The allusion is to the insurrection of Jack Cade, an Irishman, who headed about 20,000 armed men, chiefly of Kent, “to procure redress of grievances” (1450).

“You that love the commons, follow me;

Now show yourselves men; 'tis for liberty.

We will not leave one lord, one gentleman:

Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon.”

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iv. 2.

Cader Idris

or Arthur's Seat. If any man passes the night sitting on this “chair,” he will be either a poet or a madman.

Cadessia

(Battle of) gave the Arabs the monarchy of Persia. (A.D. 636.)

Cadet

Younger branches of noble families are called cadets, because their armorial shields are marked with a difference called a cadency.

Cadet

is a student at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, or in one of her Majesty's training ships, the Excellent and the Britannia. From these places they are sent (after passing certain examinations) into the army as ensigns or second lieutenants, and into the navy as midshipmen. (French, cadet, junior member of a family.)

Cadger

One who carries butter, eggs, and poultry to market; a packman or huckster. From cadge (to carry). Hence the frame on which hawks were carried was called “a cadge,” and the man who carried it, a “cadger.” A man of low degree.

“Every cadger thinks himself as good as an earl.”— McDonald: Malcolm, part ix. chap. xiv. p. 183.

Cadi

among the Turks, Arabs, etc., is a town magistrate or inferior judge. “Cadi Lesker” is a superior cadi. The Spanish Alcaydë is the Moorish al cadi. (Arabic, the judge.)

Cadmean Letters

(The). The simple Greek letters introduced by Cadmus from Phoenicia. (Greek myth.)

Cadmean Victory (Greek, Kadmeia nike; Latin, Cadmea Victoria). A victory purchased with great loss. The allusion is to the armed men who sprang out of the ground from the teeth of the dragon sown by Cadmus. These men fell foul of each other, and only five of them escaped death.

Cadmeans

The people of Carthage are called the Gens Cadmea, and so are the Thebans.

Cadmus

having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dircë, in Boeotia, sowed the teeth of the monster, when a number of armed men sprang up and surrounded Cadmus with intent to kill him. By the counsel of Minerva, he threw a precious stone among the armed men, who, striving for it, killed one another. The foundation of the fable is this: Cadmus having slain a famous freebooter that infested Boeotia, his banditti set upon him to revenge their captain's death; but Cadmus sent a bribe, for which they quarrelled and slew each other.

Cadogan

(Ca—dug'—an). A club of hair worn by young French ladies; so called from the portrait of the first Earl of Cadogan, a print at one time very popular in France. The fashion was introduced at the court of Montbéliard by the Duchesse de Bourbon.

Caduceus

(4 syl.). A white wand carried by Roman officers when they went to treat for peace. The Egyptians adorned the rod with a male and female serpent twisted about it, and kissing each other. From this use of the rod, it became the symbol of eloquence and also of office. In mythology, a caduceus with wings is placed in the hands of Mercury, the herald of the gods; and the poets feign that he could therewith give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it “his opiate rod” in Paradise Lost, xi. 133.

“So with his dread caduceus Hermès led

From the dark regions of the imprisoned dead;

Or drove in silent shoals the lingering train

To Night's dull shore and Pluto's dreary reign.” Darwin: Loves of the Plants, ii. 291.

Cadurci

The people of Aquitania. Cahors is the modern capital.

Cædmon

Cowherd of Whitby, the greatest poet of the Anglo—Saxons. In his wonderful romance we find the bold prototype of Milton's Paradise Lost. The portions relating to the fall of the angels are most striking. The hero encounters, defeats, and finally slays Grendel, an evil being of supernatural powers.

Cærite Franchise

(The). The franchise of a Roman subject in a præfecture. These subjects had the right of self—government, and were registered by the Roman censor as tax—payers; but they enjoyed none of the privileges of a Roman citizen. Cære was the first community placed in this dependent position, whence the term Cærite franchise.

Caerleon

on the Usk, in Wales. The habitual residence of King Arthur, where he lived in splendid state, surrounded by hundreds of knights, twelve of whom he selected as Knights of the Round Table.

Caesar was made by Hadrian a title, conferred on the heir presumptive to the throne (A.D. 136). Diocletian conferred the title on the two viceroys, calling the two emperors Augustus (sacred majesty). The German Emperor still assumes the title of kaiser (q.v.).

“Thou art an emperor, Cæsar, keisar, and Pheezar.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor,

i.3.

“No bending knees shall call thee Caesar now.”

Shakespeare:

3 Henry VI., iii. 1.

Caesar, as a title, was pretty nearly equivalent to our Prince of Wales and the French dauphin.

Caesar's wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pompeia having been mixed up with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her; not because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not even be suspected of crime. (Suetonius: Julius Cæsar, 74.)

Cæsar. (See page 76, 2, Aut Cæsar.)

Julius Cæsar's sword.

Crocea Mors (yellow death). (See page 76, 2, Sword.) Julius Cæsar won 320 triumphs.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cæsarian Operation

or Cesarean Operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting the abdomen (Latin, cæso, cut from the womb). Julius Caesar is said to have been thus brought into the world.

Cæ'sarism

The absolute rule of man over man, with the recognition of no law divine or human beyond that of the ruler's will. (See Chauvinism .)

Cæteris paribus

(Latin). Other things being equal; presuming all other conditions to be equal.

Caf

(Mount). In Mohammedan mythology is that huge mountain in the middle of which the earth is sunk, as a night light is placed in a cup. Its foundation is the emerald Sakhtrat, the reflection of which gives the azure hue to the sky.

Caftan

A garment worn in Turkey and other Eastern countries. It is a sort of under—tunic or vest tied by a girdle at the waist.

“Picturesque merchants and their customers, no longer in the big trousers of Egypt, but [in] the long caftans and abas of Syria.”— B. Taylor. Lands of the Saracen, chap. ix. p. 122.

Cag Mag

Offal, bad meat; also a tough old goose; food which none can relish. (Gaelic and Welsh, cag magu.)

Cage

To whistle or sing in the cage. The cage is a jail, and to whistle in a cage is to turn Queen's evidence, or peach against a comrade.

Cagliostro

Conte de Cagliostro, or Giuseppe Balsamo of Palermo, a charlatan who offered everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret (1743—1795).

Cagots

A sort of gipsy race in Gascony and Bearne, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome. (See Caqueux, Colliberts .)

“Cagoti non fuerunt monachi, anachoritæ, aut leprosi; ... sed genus quoddam hominum cæteris odiosum. Vasconibus Cagots, nonnullis Capoti, Burdegalentibus Gaheti, Vascis et Navarris Agoti, dicuntur.”—

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Ducange: Glossarium Manuale, vol. ii. pp. 23, 24.

Cahors Usuriers de Cahors. In the thirteenth century there was a colony of Jewish money—lenders settled at Cahors, which was to France what Lombard Street was to London.

Caiaphas

The country—house of Caiaphas, in which Judas concluded his bargain to betray his Master, stood on “The Hill of Evil Counsel.”

Cain—coloured Beard

Yellow, symbolic of treason. In the ancient tapestries Cain and Judas are represented with yellow beards. (See Yellow .)

“He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow heard, a Cain—coloured beard.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 4.

Cainites

(2 syl.). Disciples of Cain, a pseudo—Gnostic sect of the second century. They renounced the New Testament, and received instead The Gospel of Judas, which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus. This sect maintained that heaven and earth were created by the evil principle, and that Cain with his descendants were the persecuted party.

Cairds

or Jockeys. Gipsy tribes. Halliwell tells us “Caird” in Northumberland = tinker, and gipsies are great menders of pots and pans. (Irish, ceard, a tinker; Welsh, cordd, art or craft.)

“Donald Caird's come again.” Popular Song.

Caius

(Dr.). A French physician in Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.

“The clipped English of Dr. Caius.”— Macaulay.

Caius College (Cambridge). Elevated by Dr. John Key (Caius), of Norwich, into a college, being previously only a hall called Gonville. Called Keys. (1557.)

Cake

A fool, a poor thing. (Cf. HALF—BAKED.)

Cake

To take the cake. To carry off the prize. The reference is to the prize—cake to the person who succeeded best in a given competition. In Notes and Queries (Feb. 27th, 1892, p. 176) a correspondent of New York tells us of a “cake walk” by the Southern negroes. It consists of walking round the prize cake in pairs, and umpires decide which pair walk the most gracefully. In ancient Greece a cake was the award of the toper who held out the longest.

In Ireland the best dancer in a dancing competition was rewarded, at one time, by a cake.

“A churn—dish stuck into the earth supported on its flat end a cake, which was to become the prize of the best dancer. ... At length the competitors yielded their claims to a young man ... who, taking the cake, placed it gallantly in the lap of a pretty girl to whom ... he was about to be married.”— Bartlett and Coyne: Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 64.

You cannot eat your cake and have it too.

You cannot spend your money and yet keep it. You cannot serve God and Mammon.

Your cake

[or my cake] is dough. All my swans are turned to geese. Occisa est res tua [or mea]. Mon affaire est manquée; my project has failed.

Cake ... Dough

I wish my cake were dough again. I wish I had never married. Bellenden Ker says the proverb is a corruption of Ei w'hissche my keke was d'how en geen, which he says is tantamount to “Something whispers within me—repentance, would that my marriage were set aside.”

Cakes Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

“Land o' cakes and brither Scots.” Burns.

Calabash

A drinking cup or waterholder; so called from the calabash nut of which it is made.

Calamanco Cat

(A). A tortoise—shell cat. Calamanco is a glossy woollen fabric, sometimes striped or variegated. It is the Spanish word Calamáco.

Calamity

The beating down of standing corn by wind or storm. The word is derived from the Latin calamus (a stalk of corn). Hence, Cicero calls a storm Calamitosa tempestas (a corn—levelling tempest).

“Another ill accident is drought, and the spoiling of the corn; inasmuch as the word `calamity' was first derived from calamus (stalk), when the corn could not get out of the ear.”— Bacon.

Calandrino

A typical simpleton frequently introduced in Boccaccio's Decameron; expressly made to be befooled and played upon.

Calatrava

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Calauri'a

Pro Delo Calauria (Ovid: Metamorphoses, vii. 384). Calauria was an island in the Sinus Saronicus which Latona gave to Neptune in exchange for Delos. A quid pro quo.

Calceolaria

Little—shoe flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers. (Latin, calceolus.)

Calceos mutavit

He has changed his shoes, that is, has become a senator. Roman senators were distinguished by their shoes, which were sandalled across the instep and up the ankles.

Calculate

is from the Latin calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the abacus, the round balls were called calculi, and it was by this instrument the Roman boys were taught to count and calculate. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn—a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was “calculating” the number of voters. (See page 2, col. 1, Abacus .)

I calculate.

A peculiarity of expression common in the western states of North America. In the southern states the phrase is “I reckon,” in the middle states “I expect,” and in New England “I guess.” All were imported from the mother country by early settlers.

“Your aunt sets two tables, I calculate; don't she?”—Susan Warner: Queechy (vol. i. chap.

xix.)

Calculators

(The Jedediah Buxton, of Elmeton, in Derbyshire. (1705—1775.) George Bidder and Zerah Colburn (an American), who exhibited publicly.

“Buxton, being asked ‘How many cubical eighths—of—an—inch there are in a body whose three sides are 23,145,786 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards?’ replied correctly without setting down a figure.”

“Colburn, being asked the square root of 106,929 and the cube root 268,336,125, replied before the audience had set the figures down.”—Price: Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 570.

Cale

[See Kale .]

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Caleb The enchantress who carried off St. George in infancy.

Caleb,

in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Lord Grey of Wark (Northumberland), one of the adherents of the Duke of Monmouth.

“And, therefore, in the name of dulness, be

The well—hung Balaam [Earl of Huntingdon] and old Caleb free.” Lines 512—13.

Caleb Quotem

A parish clerk or jack—of—all—trades, in Colman's play called The Review, or Wags of Windsor, which first appeared in 1808. Colman borrowed the character from a farce by Henry Lee (1798) entitled Throw Physic to the Dogs.

“I resolved, like Caleb Quotem, to have a place at the review.”— Washington Irving.

Caledon

Scotland. (See next article.)

“Not thus, in ancient days of Caledon,

Was thy voice mute amid the festal crowd.”

Sir W. Scott.

Caledonia

Scotland. A corruption of Celyddon, a Celtic word meaning “a dweller in woods and forests.” The word Celt is itself a contraction of the same word (Celyd), and means the same thing.

“Sees Caledonia in romantic view.”

Thomson.

“O Caledonia, stern and wild,

Meet nurse for a poetic child”

Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Calembour

(French). A pun, a jest. From the “Jester of Kahlenberg,” whose name was Wigand von Theben; a character introduced in Tyll Eulenspiegel, a German tale. Eulenspiegel (a fool or jester) means Owl's looking—glass, and may probably have suggested the title of the periodical called the Owl, the witty but satirical “looking—glass” of the passing follies of the day. The jester of Calembourg visited Paris in the reign of Louis XV., and soon became noted for his blunders and puns.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Calendar

The Julian Calendar, introduced B.C. 46. It fixed the ordinary year to 365 days, with an extra day every fourth year (leap year). This is called "The Old Style."

The Gregorian Year.

A modification of the Julian Calendar, introduced in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII., and adopted in Great Britain in 1752. This is called "the New Style."

The Mohammedan Calendar,

used in Mohammedan countries, dates from July 16th, 622, the day of the Hegira. It consists of 12 lunar months (29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes). A cycle is 30 years.

The Revolutionary Calendar

was the work of Fabre d'Eglantine and Mons. Romme.

Calendar

A Newgate Calendar or "Malefactors' Bloody Register," containing the biography, confessions, dying speeches, etc., of notorious criminals. Began in 1700.

Calendars

(The Three Arabian Nights.)

Calends The first of every month was so called by the Romans. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling together or assembling the people on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the nones, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till A.U.C. 450, when the fasti or calendar was posted in public places. (See Greek Calends

.)

Calepin

(A). A dictionary. (Italian, calepino.) Ambrosio Calepino, of Calepio, in Italy, was the author of a dictionary, so that "my Calepin," like my Euclid, my Johnson, according to Cocker, etc., have become common nouns from proper names. Generally called Calepin, but the subjoined quotation throws the accent on the le.

"Whom do you prefer

For the best linguist? And I seelily

Said that I thought Calepine's Dictionary."

Dr. Donne: Fourth Satire.

Caleys

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A Stock Exchange term). Caledonian Railway Ordinary Stock. A contraction of Cale—donians. (See Stock Exchange Slang .)

Calf—love

Youthful fancy as opposed to lasting attachment.

“I thought it was a childish besotment you had for the man—a sort of calf—love. ...”— Rhoda Broughton.

Calf—skin

Fools and jesters used to wear a calf—skin coat buttoned down the back. In allusion to this custom, Faulconbridge says insolently to the Archduke of Austria, who had acted most basely to Richard Coeur—de—Lion—

“Thou wear a lion's hide! Doff it, for shame,

And hang a calf—skin on those recreant limbs.” Shakespeare: King John, iii. 1.

Caliban

Rude, uncouth, unknown; as a Caliban style, a Caliban language. The allusion is to Shakespeare's Caliban (The Tempest new creation, but also a new language).

“Satan had not the privilege, as Caliban, to use new phrases, and diction unknown.”— Dr. Bentley.

Coleridge says, “In him [Caliban], as in some brute animals, this advance to the intellectual faculties, without the moral sense, is marked by the appearance of vice.”

(Caliban is the “missing link” between brute animals and man.)

Calibre

[kal'i—ber]. A mind of no calibre: of no capacity. A mind of great calibre: of large capacity. Calibre is the bore of a gun, and, figuratively, the bore or compass of one's intelligence.

“The enemy had generally new arms ... of uniform caliber.”— Grant: Memoirs, vol. i. chap.

xxxix. p. 572.

“We measure men's calibre by the broadest circle of achievements.”— Chapin: Lessons of Faith, p. 16.

Caliburn Same as Excalibur, King Arthur's well—known sword. (See Sword .)

“Onward Arthur paced, with hand

On Caliburn's resistless brand.”

Scott: Bridal of Triermain.

Calico

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

So called from Calicut, in Malabar, once the chief port and emporium of Hindustan.

Calidore

(3 syl.). Sir Calidore is the type of courtesy, and hero of the sixth book of Spenser's Faërie Queene. He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the "all—beloved." The model of the poet was Sir Philip Sidney. His adventure is against the Blatant Beast, whom he muzzles, chains, and drags to Faërie Land.

"Sir Gawain was the Calidore of the Round Table."— Southey.

Caligorant

An Egyptian giant and cannibal who used to entrap strangers with a hidden net. This net was made by Vulcan to catch Mars and Venus, Mercury stole it for the purpose of catching Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anubis; Caligorant stole it thence. At length Astolpho blew his magic horn, and the giant ran affrighted into his own net, which dragged him to the ground. Whereupon Astolpho made the giant his captive, and despoiled him of his net. This is an allegory. Caligorant was a great sophist and heretic in the days of Ariosto, who used to entangle people with his talk; but being converted by Astolpho to the true faith, was, as it were, caught in his own net, and both his sophistry and heresy were taken from him. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso .)

Caligula

A Roman emperor; so called because he wore a military sandal called a caliga, which had no upper leather, and was used only by the common soldiers. (12, 37—41.)

"`The word caligæ, however,' continued the Baron ... `means, in its primitive sense, sandals; and Caius Cæsar ... received the cognomen of Caligula, a caligis, sive caligis levio'—ribus, quibus adolescentior non fuerat in exercitu Germanici patris sui. And the caligoe were also proper to the monastic bodies; for we read in the ancient Glossarium, upon the rule of St. Benedict ... that caligoe were tied with latchets."— Scott: Waverley.
xlvi.

Caligula's Horse

Incitatus. It was made a priest and consul, had a manger of ivory, and drank wine from a golden goblet. (See Horse.)

Caliph

or Calif. A title given to the successors of Mahomet. Among the Saracens a caliph is one vested with supreme dignity. The caliphate of Bagdad reached its highest splendour under Haroun al Raschid, in the ninth century. For the last 200 years the appellation has been swallowed up in the titles of Shah, Sultan, Emir, and so on. (Arabic, Khalifah, a successor; khalafa, to succeed.)

Calista

The heroine of Rowe's Fair Penitent.

Calisto and Arcas

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Calisto was an Arcadian nymph metamorphosed into a she—bear by Jupiter. Her son Arcas having met her in the chase, would have killed her, but Jupiter converted him into a he—bear, and placed them both in the heavens, where they are recognised as the Great and Little Bear.

Calixtines

(3 syl.). A religious sect of Bohemians in the fifteenth century; so called from Calix (the chalice), which they insisted should be given to the laity in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as well as the bread or wafer.

Call

(A). A “divine” summons or invitation, as “a call to the ministry.”

A call before the curtain.

An applause inviting a favourite actor to appear before the curtain, and make his bow to the audience.

A Gospel call.

The invitation of the Gospel to men to believe in Jesus to the saving of their souls. A morning call. A short morning visit.

A call on shareholders.

A demand to pay up a part of the money due for shares allotted in a company. Payable at call. To be paid on demand.

Call Bird

(A). A bird trained as a decoy.

Call—boy

(The). A boy employed in theatres to “call” or summon actors, when it is time for them to make their appearance on the stage.

Call of Abraham

The invitation or command of God to Abraham, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of being made a great nation.

Call of God

An invitation, exhortation, or warning, by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii. 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii. 1).

Call of the House

An imperative summons sent to every Member of Parliament to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole House is required. At the muster the names of the members are called over, and defaulters reported.

Call to Arms

(To). To summon to prepare for battle. "Ad arma vocare."

Call to the Bar

The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. The names of those qualified are called over. (See page 94, col. 1, Bar.)

Call to the Pastorate

An invitation to a minister by the members of a Presbyterian or Nonconformist church to preside over a certain congregation.

Call to the Unconverted

An invitation accompanied with promises and threats, to induce the unconverted to receive the gospel. Richard Baxter wrote a book so entitled.

Call

(To). I call God to witness. I solemnly declare that what I state is true.

To call.

To invite: as, the trumpet calls.

"If honour calls, where'er she points the way,

The sons of honour follow and obey."

Churchill: The Farewell, stanza 7.

To call

[a man] out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man's honour to come forth and fight a duel. To call in question. To doubt the truth of a statement; to challenge the truth of a statement. "In dubium vocare."

To call over the coals. (See Coals.)

To call to account.

To demand an explanation; to reprove.

Called

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

He is called to his account. He is removed by death. Called to the judgment seat of God to give an account of his deeds, whether they be good, or whether they be evil. (See page 202, col. 1, Calling.)

Callabre

or Calaber. A Calabrian fur. Ducange says, "At Chichester the `priest vicars' and at St. Paul's the `minor canons' wore a calabre amyce;" and Bale, in his Image of Both Churches, alludes to the "fair rochets of Raines (Rennes), and costly grey amicës of calaber and cats' tails."

"The Lord Mayor and those aldermen above the chair ought to have their coats furred with grey amis, and also with changeable taffeta; and those below the chair with calabre and with green taffeta."—Hutton: New View of London.

Caller Herrings

Fresh herrings. Hence "caller air." (Anglo—Saxon, calian, to cool.)

Calligraphy

(The art of). Writing very minutely and yet clearly. Peter Bale, in the sixteenth century, wrote in the compass of a silver penny the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, two Latin prayers, his own name, the day of the month and date of the year since the accession of Queen Elizabeth, and a motto. With a glass this writing could be read. By photography a sheet of the Times newspaper has been reduced to a smaller compass. (Greek, calos—grapho, I write beautifully.)

Callimachos

The Italian Callimachos. Filippo Buonaccorsi (1437—1496).

Calling

A vocation, trade, or profession. The allusion is to the calling of the apostles by Jesus Christ to follow Him. In the legal profession persons must still be called to the bar before they can practise.

Effectual calling.

An invitation to believe in Jesus, rendered effectual by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

Calliope [Kal'—li—o—pe, 4 syl., Greek, kaloz, py beautiful voice]. The muse of epic or heroic poetry. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets. The painting of this Muse by Ercolana Ercolanetti (1615—1687) and her statue by Clementi (who died in 1580) are very celebrated.

The Greek word is Kallioph, in which the i is short. Erroneously called "Calilope."

Callipolis

A character in the Battle of Alcazar (1594) by George Peele. It is referred to by Pistol in 2 Henry

IV.,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

act ii. 4; and Sir W. Scott uses the word over and over again as the synonym of lady—love, sweetheart, charmer. Sir Walter always spells the word Callipolis, but Peele calls it Calipolis. The drunken Mike Lambourne says to Amy Robsart —

“Hark ye, most fair Callipolis, or most lovely countess of clouts, and divine duchess of dark corners.”—Kenilworth, chap. xxxiii.

And the modest Roland Græme calls the beautiful Catherine his “most fair Callipolis.” (The Abbot, chap. xi.)

Callippic Period

The correction of the Metonic cycle by Callippos. In four cycles, or seventy—six years, the Metonic calculation was seven and a—half in excess. Callippos proposed to quadruple the period of Meton, and deduct a day at the end of it: at the expiration of which period Callippos imagined that the new and full moons returned to the same day of the solar year.

Callirrhoe

(4 syl.). The lady—love of Chæ'reas, in Chariton's Greek romance, entitled the Loves of Chæ'reas and Callirrhoë, written in the eighth century.

Calomel

Hooper says—

“This name, which means `beautiful black,' was originally given to the Æthiop's mineral, or black sulphuret of mercury. It was afterwards applied in joke by Sir Theodore Mayerne to the chloride of mercury, in honour of a favourite negro servant whom he employed to prepare it. As calomel is a white powder, the name is merely a jocular misnomer.”—Medical Dictionary.

Greek, kaloz beautiful ,melaz black.

Caloyers

Monks in the Greek Church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into cenobites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorites, who live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms. (Greek, kaloz and gerwu, beautiful old man.)

Calpe

(2 syl.). Calpë and Abyla. The two pillars of Hercules. According to one account, these two were originally only one mountain, which Hercules tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately, and poured the sea between them.

“Heaves up huge Abyla on Afric's sand,

Crowns with high Calpë Europe's salient strand, Crests with opposing towers the splendid scene, And pours from urns immense the sea between. Darwin: Economy of Vegetation.

Calumet

[the peace — pipe]. When the North American Indians make peace or form an alliance, the high contracting parties smoke together to ratify the arrangement.

The peace—pipe is about two and a—half feet long, the bowl is made of highly—polished red marble, and the stem of a reed, which is decorated with eagles' quills, women's hair, and so on.

“The Great Spirit at an ancient period called the Indian nations together, and standing on the precipice of the red pipe—stone rock, broke off a piece which he moulded into the bowl of a pipe, and fitting on it a long reed, filled the pipe with the bark of red willow, and smoked over them, turning to the four winds. He told them the red colour of the pipe represented their flesh, and when they smoked it they must bury their war—clubs and scalping—knives. At the last whiff the Great Spirit disappeared.”

To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and good—will; to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

“Wash the war—paint from your faces,

Wash the war—stains from your fingers,

Bury your war—clubs and your weapons; ...

Smoke the calumet together,

And as brothers live henceforward.”

Longfellow: Hiawatha, i.

Calvary

[bare skull], Golgotha [skull]. The place of our Lord's crucifixion; so called from some fanciful resemblance which it bore to a human skull. The present church of “the Holy Sepulchre” has no claim to be considered the site thereof; it is far more likely that the “mosque of Omar,” or the dome of the rock, occupies the real site.

A Calvary.

A representation of the successive scenes of the Passion of Christ in a series of pictures, etc., in a church. The shrine containing the representations.

Calvary Clover

said to have sprung up in the track made by Pilate when he went to the cross to see his “title affixed” [Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews]. It is a common trefoil, probably a native of India or Turkey. Each of the three round leaves has a little carmine spot in the centre. In the daytime the three leaves of the trefoil form a sort of cross; and in the flowering season the plant bears a little yellow flower, like a “crown of thorns.” Julian tells us that each of the three leaves had in his time a white cross in the centre, and that the centre cross lasts visible longer than the crosses of the other two leaves. (See Christian Traditions .)

Calvary Cross

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A Latin cross mounted on three steps (or grises).

Calvert's Entire

The 14th Foot. Called Calvert from their colonel, Sir Harry Calvert (1806—1826), and entire, because three entire battalions were kept up for the good of Sir Harry, when adjutant—general. The term is, of course, a play on Calvert's malt liquor. The regiment is now called The Prince of Wales's Own (West Yorks. Regiment).

Calves

The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight are so called from a legendary joke which states that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and, instead of breaking up the pale, the farm—man cut off the calf's head.

Calves gone to Grass

(His). Said of a spindle—legged man. And another mocking taunt is, “Veal will be dear, because there are no calves.”

Calves' Head

There are many ways of dressing a calf's head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing; a simpleton has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won't do we must try another. The allusion is to the great Calves' Head Club banquet, when the board was laden with calves' heads cooked in sundry ways and divers fashions.

Calves' Head Club

Instituted in ridicule of Charles I. The great annual banquet was held on the 30th January, and consisted of a cod's head, to represent the person of Charles Stuart, independent of his kingly office; a pike with little ones in its mouth, an emblem of tyranny; a boar's head with an apple in its mouth to represent the king preying on his subjects; and calves' heads dressed in sundry ways to represent Charles in his regal capacity. After the banquet, the king's book (Icon Basilikē) was burnt, and the parting cup was, “To those worthy patriots who killed the tyrant.”

Calvinism The five chief points of Calvinism are: (1) Predestination, or particular election.

(2) Irresistible grace.

(3) Original sin, or the total depravity of the natural man, which renders it morally impossible to believe and turn to God of his own free will.

(4) Particular redemption.

(5) Final perseverance of the saints.

Calydon

A forest supposed, in the romances relating to King Arthur, to occupy the northern portion of England.

Calypso

in Fénelon's Télémaque, is meant to represent Madame de Montespan. In fairy mythology, she was queen of the island Ogygia on which Ulysses was wrecked, and where he was detained for seven years.

Calypso's Isle

Gozo, near Malta. Called in classic mythology Ogygia.

Cam and Isis

The universities of Cambridge and Oxford; so called from the rivers on which they stand.

“May you, my Cam and Isis, preach it long, `The right divine of kings to govern wrong.’ “

Pope: Dunciad; iv. 187.

Cama

The God of love and marriage in Indian mythology.

Camacho

, “richest of men,” makes grand preparations for his wedding with Quiteria, “fairest of women”; but, as the bridal party were on their way, Basilius cheats him of his bride by pretending to kill himself. As he is supposed to be dying, Quiteria is given to him in marriage as a mere matter of form; but, as soon as this is done, up jumps Basilius, and shows that his wounds were a mere pretence. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, pt. ii. bk. 2, ch. 3,4.)

Camal dolites

(4 syl.). A religious order of great rigidity of life, founded in the vale of Camaldoli, in the Tuscan Apennines, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine. (Eleventh century.)

Camaralzaman

(Prince) fell in love with Badoura, Princess of China, the moment he saw her. (Arabian Nights Prince Camaralzaman.)

Camarilla

(Spanish). A clique; the confidants or private advisers of the sovereign. It literally means a small private chamber, and is in Spain applied to the room in which boys are flogged.

“Encircled with a dangerous camarilla.” — The Times.

Camarina

Ne moveas Camarinam (Don't meddle with Camarina). Camarina was a lake in Sicily, which, in time of drought, yielded a pestilential stench. The inhabitants consulted an oracle about draining it, and Apollo replied, “Don't meddle with it.” Nevertheless, they drained it, and ere long an enemy marched an army over the bed of the lake and plundered the city. The proverb is applied to those who remove one evil, but thus give place to a greater. The Channel may be an evil to those who suffer sea—sickness, but it is a million times better to endure this evil than to make it a high road to invaders. The application is very extensive, as: Don't kill the small birds, or you will be devoured by insects. One pest is a safeguard against a greater one.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A similar Latin phrase is Anagyris movëre.

“When the laird of Ellangowan drove the gipsies from the neighbourhood, though they had been allowed to remain there undisturbed hitherto, Dominie Sampson warned him of the danger by quoting the proverb. ‘Ne moveas Camarinam.’” — Sir IV. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. vii.

Cambalo's Ring

Given him by his sister Canacë. It had the virtue of healing wounds. (See Cambel .) (Spenser: Faërie Queene, bk. iv.)

“Well mote ye wonder how that noble knight,

After he had so often wounded been,

Could stand on foot now to renew the fight ...

All was through virtue of the ring he wore:

The which, not only did not from him let

One drop of blood to fall, but did restore

His weakened powers, and dulled spirits whet.” Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 3.

Cambel

Called by Chaucer, Cambalo; brother of Canacë, a female paragon. He challenged every suitor to his sister's hand, and overthrew all except Triamond, who married the lady. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iv.)

(See Canace .)

Camber

Second son of King Brute, to whom Wales was left, whence its name of Cambria. (British fable.)

Cambria

The ancient name of Wales, the land of the Cimbri or Cymry.

“Cambria's fatal day.”

Gray: Bard.

Cambrian

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Pertaining to Wales; Welsh. (See above.)

“The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds,

That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.”

Thomson: Spring, 961—62.

Cambrian Series

(in geology). The earliest fossiliferous rocks in North Wales. So named by Professor Sedgwick.

Cambric

A kind of very fine white linen cloth, so named from Cambray or Cameryk, in Flanders, where it is still the chief manufacture.

“He hath ribbons of all the colours of the rainbow; inkles, caddises, cambricks, and lawns.” — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Cambuscan'

King of Sarra, in the land of Tartary; the model of all royal virtues. His wife was Elfeta; his two sons, Algarsife and Cambalo; and his daughter, Canacë. On her birthday (October 15th) the King of Arabia and India sent Cambuscan a “steed of brass, which, between sunrise and sunset, would carry its rider to any spot on the earth.” All that was required was to whisper the name of the place in the horse's ear, mount upon his back, and turn a pin set in his ear. When the rider had arrived at the place required, he had to turn another pin, and the horse instantly descended, and, with another screw of the pin, vanished till it was again required. This story is told by Chaucer in the Squire's Tale, but was never finished. Milton (Il Penseroso) accents the word Cambus'—can.

The story of Cambuscan bold.”

(See Canace.)

Cambyses

(3 syl.). A pompous, ranting character in Preston's lamentable tragedy of that name.

“Give me a cup of sack, to make mine eyes look red: for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Cambyses' vein.” — Shakespeare: I Henry IV., ii. 4.

Camden Society

for the publication of early historic and literary remains, is named in honour of William Camden, the historian.

Camel

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The name of Mahomet's favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it knelt when Mahomet fled from Mecca. Mahomet considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The swiftest of his camels was Al Adha.

Camel.

The prophet Mahomet's camel performed the whole journey from Jerusalem to Mecca in four bounds, for which service he had a place in heaven with Alborak (the prophet's "horse"), Balaam's ass, Tobit's dog, and Ketmir (the dog of the seven sleepers). (Curzon.)

Camel.

"It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 24). In the Koran we find a similar expression: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." In the Rabbinical writings we have a slight variety which goes to prove that the word "camel" should not be changed into

"cable," as Theophylact suggests: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pampeditians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle." (See Cable.)

"It is as hard to come, as for a camel

To thread the postern of a needle's eye."

Shakespeare: Richard II., v. 5.

Camellia

The technical name of a genus, and the popular name of the species of evergreen shrubs; so named in honour of G. J. Kamel (Latin Camellius), a Spanish Jesuit. Introduced into England in 1739.

Camelot

(Somersetshire), where King Arthur held his court. (See Winchester.)

Camelote

(2 syl.). Fustian, rubbish, trash. The cloth so called ought to be made of goats' hair, but is a mixture of wool and silk, wool and hair, or wool, silk, and hair, etc. (French, camelot; Arabic, camlat.) (See page 206, Camlet.)

Cameo

An anaglyph on a precious stone. The anaglyph is when the figure is raised in relief; an intaglio is when the figure is hollowed out. The word cameo means an onyx, and the most famous cameo in the world is the onyx containing the apotheosis of Augustus. These precious stones have two layers of different colours, one serving for the figure, and the other for the ground.

Cameron Highlanders

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The 79th Regiment of Infantry, raised by Allan Cameron, of Errock, in 1793. Now called "The Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders."

Cameronian Regiment

The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Cameronians (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1688. Now the 1st Battalion of the Scottish Rifles; the 2nd Battalion is the old No. 90.

Cameronians The strictest sect of Scotch Presbyterians, organised in 1680, by Richard Cameron, who was slain in battle at Aird's Moss in 1680. He objected to the alliance of Church and State. In 1876 most of the Cameronians were merged in the Free Church. In history the Cameronians are generally called the Covenanters.

Camilla

Virgin queen of the Volscians. Virgil (Aeneid, vii. 809) says she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

"Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,

Flies o'er the unbending corn and skims along the main." Pope: Essay on Criticism, 372—3.

Camillus

five times Dictator of Rome, was falsely accused of embezzlement, and went into voluntary exile; but when the Gauls besieged Rome, he returned and delivered his country.

"Camillus, only vengeful to his foes."

Thomson: Winter.

Camisard

In French history, the Camisards are the Protestant insurgents of the Cevennes, who resisted the violence of the dragonnades, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Their leader was Cavalier, afterwards Governor of Jersey.

Camisarde

or Camisado. A night attack; so called because the attacking party wore a camise or peasant's smock over their armour, both to conceal it, and that they might the better recognise each other in the dark.

Camisole

(3 syl.). A loose jacket worn by women when dressed in negligée (French).

Camisole de Force

A strait—waist—coat. Frequently mentioned in accounts of capital punishments in France.

Camlan

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Battle of, Cornwall), which put an end to the Knights of the Round Table. Here Arthur received his death wound from the hand of his nephew Modred. (A.D. 542.)

Camlet

is not connected with the word camel; it is a fine cloth made of goats' hair, called Turkish yarn, and is from the Arabic word camlat, which Littré says is so called from seil el camel (the Angora goat).

Cammock

As crooked as a cammock. The cammock is a piece of timber bent for the knee of a ship; a hockey—stick; a shinny—club. (Anglo—Saxon.)

“Though the cammock, the more it is bowed the better it is; yet the bow, the more it is bent the weaker it waxeth.” — Lily.

Camorra

A secret society of Italy organised early in the nineteenth century. It claimed the right of settling disputes, etc.

Camorrist

One of the desperadoes belonging to the Camorra. “Camorrist,” the gospel of the league.

Camp Candlestick

(A). A bottle, or a soldier's bayonet.

Camp—followers

Non—combatants (such as servants, carriers, hostlers, suttlers, laundresses, and so on), who follow an army. We are told that in 1859 as many as 85,000 camp—followers were in attendance on 15,000 combatants in a Bengal army.

Campaign Wig (A), imported from France. It was made very full, was curled, and was eighteen inches in length in the front, with drop locks. In some cases the back part of the wig was put in a black silk bag. Of course the campaign referred to the victories of Marlborough. (Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne, chap.

xii.)

There were also campaign coats, campaign lace, campaign shoes, campaign shirts, campaign gowns, campaign waistcoats, etc.

Campania

Properly the Terra di Lavoro of Italy, i.e. the plain country about Capua.

“Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains.”

Thomson: Summer.

Campaspe

(3 syl.). A beautiful harlot, whom Alexander the Great handed over to Apellês. Apelles drew her in the nude.

“When Cupid and Campaspe played

At cards for kisses, Cupid paid.”

Lily.

Campbells are Coming

(The). This soul—stirring song was composed in 1715, when the Earl of Mar raised the standard for the Stuarts against George I. John Campbell was Commander—in—Chief of his Majesty's forces, and the rebellion was quashed. The main interest now attached to the famous song is connected with the siege of Lucknow in the Indian rebellion, 1857. Nana Sahib had massacred women and children most foully, and while the survivors were expecting instant death, a Scotch woman lying ill on the ground heard the pibroch, and exclaimed, “Dinna ye hear it? Dinna ye hear it? The pipes o' Havelock sound.” And soon afterwards the rescue was accomplished. The first verse runs thus:—

“The Campbells are coming, O—ho! O—ho!

The Campbells are coming, O—ho!

The Campbells are coming to bonnie Loch Leven,

The Campbells are coming, O—ho!

Campbellite

(3 syl.). A follower of John McLeod Campbell, who taught the universality of the atonement, for which, in 1831, he was deposed.

Campceiling

A ceiling sloping on one side from the vertical wall towards a plane surface in the middle. A corruption of cam (twisted or bent) ceiling. (Halliwell gives cam, “awry.”)

Campeador

(cam—pa'—dor). The Cid (q.v.).

Canace

(3 syl.). A paragon of women, the daughter of King Cambuscan', to whom the King of Arabia and India sent as a present a mirror and a ring. The mirror would tell the lady if any man on whom she set her heart would prove true or false, and the ring (which was to be worn on her thumb) would enable her to understand the language of birds and to converse with them. It would also give the wearer perfect knowledge of the medicinal properties of all roots. Chaucer never finished the tale, but probably he meant to marry Canacë to some knight who would be able to overthrow her two brothers, Cambalo and Algarsife, in the tournament. (Squire's Tale.) (See below.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Canacë was courted by a crowd of suitors, but her brother, Cambalo or Cambel, gave out that anyone who pretended to her hand must encounter him in single combat and overthrow him. She ultimately married Triamond, son of the fairy Agapë. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, bk. iv. 3.) (See Cambel.)

Canache (3 syl.). One of Actæon's dogs. (Greek, "the clang of metal falling.")

Canada Balsam

Made from the Pinus balsamea, a native of Canada.

Canaille

(French, can—nay'e). The mob, the rabble (Italian, canaglia, a pack of dogs, from Latin canis, a dog).

Canard

A hoax. Cornelissen, to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another, then a third, and so on till nineteen were cut up; and as the nineteenth was gobbled up by the surviving duck, it followed that this one duck actually ate nineteen ducks — a wonderful proof of duck voracity. This tale had the run of all the papers, and gave a new word to the language. (French, cane, a duck.) (Quetelet.)

Canary

(A). Slang for "a guinea" or "sovereign." Gold coin is so called because, like a canary, it is yellow.

Canary—bird

(A). A jail—bird. At one time certain desperate convicts were dressed in yellow; and jail was the cage of these "canaries."

Cancan

To dance the cancan. A free—and—easy way of dancing quadrilles invented by Rigolboche, and adopted in the public gardens, the opera comique, and the casinos of Paris. (Cancan familiarity, tittle—tattle.)

"They were going through a quadrille with all those supplementary gestures introduced by the great Rigolboche, a notorious danseuse, to whom the notorious cancan owes its origin." — A. Egmont Hake: Paris Originals (the Chiffonier).

Cancel

to blot out, is merely "to make lattice—work." This is done by making a cross over the part to be omitted. (Latin, cancello, to make trellis.) (See Cross It Out .)

Cancer

(the Crab) appears when the sun has reached his highest northern limit, and begins to go backward towards the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways (June 21st to July 23rd). According to fable, Cancer was the animal which Juno sent against Hercules, when he combated the Hydra of Lernê. Cancer bit the hero's foot, but Hercules killed the creature, and Juno took it up to heaven, and made it one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Candaules

(3 syl.). King of Lydia, who exposed the charms of his wife to Gy'gës; whereupon the queen compelled Gyges to assassinate her husband, after which she married the murderer, who became king, and reigned twenty—eight years. (716—678.)

Candidate

(3 syl.) means “clothed in white.” Those who solicited the office of consul, quæstor, prætor, etc., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might show the people their scars, and white in sign of fidelity and humility. (Latin, candidus, whence candidati, clothed in white, etc.)

Candide (2 syl.). The hero of Voltaire's novel so called. All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him, and he bears them all with cynical indifference.

Candle

Bell, Book, and Candle. (See page 120, col 1, Bell , etc.)

Fine

(or Gay) as the king's candle. “Bariolé comme la chandelle des rois,” in allusion to an ancient custom of presenting, on January 6th, a candle of various colours to the three kings of Cologne. It is generally applied to a woman overdressed, especially with gay ribbons and flowers. “Fine as five—pence.”

The game is not worth the candle

(Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle). Not worth even the cost of the candle that lights the players.

To burn the candle at both ends.

In French, “Brûler la chandelle par les deux bouts.” To indulge in two or more expensive luxuries or dissipated habits at the same time; to haste to rise up early and late take rest, eating the bread of carefulness.

To hold a candle to the devil.

To aid or countenance that which is wrong. The allusion is to the practice of Roman Catholics, who burn candles before the image of a favourite saint, carry them in funeral processions, and place them on their altars.

When Jessica (in the Merchant of Venice, ii. 6) says to Lorenzo: “What, must I hold a candle to my shame?” she means, Must I direct attention to this disguise, and blazon my folly abroad? Why, “Cupid himself would blush to see me thus transformed to a body.” She does not mean, Must I glory in my shame?

To sell by the candle.

A species of sale by auction. A pin is thrust through a candle about an inch from the top, and bidding goes on till the candle is burnt down to the pin, when the pin drops into the candlestick, and the last bidder is declared the purchaser. This sort of auction was employed in 1893, according to the Reading Mercury (Dec. 16), at Aldermaston, near Reading.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The Council thinks it meet to propose the way of selling by `inch of candle,' as being the most probable means to procure the true value of the goods.” — Milton: Letters, etc.

To smell of the lamp

(or candle). To betray laborious art, but the best literary work is the art of concealing art; to manifest great pains and long study by night.

To vow a candle to the devil.

To propitiate the devil by a bribe, as some seek to propitiate the saints in glory by a votive candle.

What is the Latin for candle?— Tacë.

Here is a play of words: tace means hold your tongue, don't bother me. (See Goose.)

Candles

used by Roman Catholics at funerals are the relic of an ancient Roman custom.

Candle—holder

An abettor. The reference is to the practice of holding a candle in the Catholic Church for the reader, and in ordinary life to light a workman when he requires more light.

“I'll be candle—holder and look on.”— Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

Candles of the Night

The stars are so called by Shakespeare, in the Merchant of Venice, v. 1. Milton has improved upon the idea:—

“Else, O thievish Night,

Why shouldst thou, but for some felonious end, In thy dark lantern thus close up the stars

That Nature hung in heaven, and filled their lamps With everlasting oil, to give due light

To the misled and lonely traveller?”

Comus,

200—206.

Candlemas Day The feast of the purification of the Virgin Mary, when Christ was presented by her in the Temple. February 2nd, when, in the Roman Catholic Church, there is a candle procession, to consecrate all the candles which will be needed in the church during the year. The candles symbolise Jesus Christ, called “the light of the world,” and “a light to lighten the Gentiles.” It was the old Roman custom of burning candles to the goddess Februa, mother of Mars, to scare away evil spirits.

“On Candlemas Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Candles and candlesticks throw all away.”

Candour

(Mrs.). A type of female backbiters. In Sheridan's comedy of The School for Scandal.

“The name of `Mrs. Candour' has become one of those formidable by—words, which have had more power in putting folly and ill—nature out of countenance than whole volumes of remonstrance.”— T. Moore.

Canens

A nymph, wife of Picus, King of the Laurentes. When Circê had changed Picus into a bird, Canens lamented him so greatly that she pined away, till she became a vox et prætorca nihil. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, 14 fab. 9.)

Canephoræ

(in architecture). Figures of young persons of either sex bearing a basket on their head. (Latin, canephoræ, plural; singular, Greek, kaghjoroz.) The English singular is “canephor” (3 syl.).

Canicular Days

The dog—days, corresponding with the overflow of the Nile. From the middle of July to the beginning of the second week in September. (Latin, canicula, diminutive of canis, a dog.)

Canicular Period

A cycle of 1461 years or 1460 Julian years, called a “Sothic period.” When it was supposed that any given day had passed through all the seasons of the year.

Canicular Year

The ancient Egyptian year, computed from one heliacal rising of the Dog—star (Sirius) to the next.

Canidia

A sorceress, who could bring the moon from heaven. Alluded to by Horace. (Epodes, v.)

“Your ancient conjurors were wont

To make her [the moon] from her sphere dismount, And to their incantations stoop.”

Butler: Hudibras,

part ii. 3.

Canister

The head (pugilistic term). “To mill his canister” is to break his head. A “canister cap” is a covering for the head, whether hat or cap. A “canister” is a small coffer or box, and the head is the “canister” or coffer of man's brains.

Canker

The briar or dog—rose.

“Put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,

And plant this thorn, this canker, Bolingbroke.” Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. 3.

Cannæ

The place where Hannibal defeated the Romans under L. Æmilius Paulus. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general's prosperity is called his Cannæ. Thus, we say, “Moscow was the Cannæ of Napoleon Bonaparte.”

Cannel Coal A corruption of candle coal, so called from the bright flame, unmixed with smoke, which it yields in combustion.

Cannibal

A word applied to those who eat human flesh. The usual derivation is Caribbee, corrupted into Canibbee, supposed to be man—eaters. Some of the tribes of these islands have no r.

“The natives live in great fear of the canibals (i.e. Caribals, or people of Cariba).”— Columbus.

Cannon

(in billiards). A corruption of carrom, which is short for carambole. A cannon is when the player's ball strikes the adversary's ball in such a way as to glance off and strike a second ball.

Canoe'

(2 syl.). A boat. (Spanish, canóa, a canoe; Dutch, cano; German, kahn, a boat; Old French, cane, a ship, and canot, a boat; Latin, canna, a hollow stem or reed; our cane, can = a jug; cannon, canal, etc.)

Canon

The canons used to be those persons who resided in the buildings contiguous to the cathedral, employed either in the daily service, or in the education of the choristers. The word is Greek, and means a measuring rod, the beam of a balance; then, a roll or register containing the names of the clergy who are licensed to officiate in a cathedral church.

Canon.

A divine or ecclesiastical law.

“Or that the Everlasting had not flxed

His canon 'gainst self—slaughter.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.

Canon Law

A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. (See below.)

Canonical

Canon is a Greek word, and means the index of a balance, hence a rule or law. (See above.) The sacred canon means the accepted books of Holy Scripture, which contain the inspired laws of salvation and morality; also called The Canonical Books.

Canonical Dress

The costume worn by the clergy according to the direction of the canon. Archdeacons, deans, and bishops wear canonical hats.

Canonical Epistles

The seven catholic epistles, i.e. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The epistles of Paul were addressed to specific churches or to individuals.

“The second and third epistles of John are certainly not catholic. One is to a specific lady and her children; and the other is to Gaius. If the word “canonical” in this phrase means appointed to be read in church, then the epistles of Paul are canonical. In fact there are only five canonical epistles.

Canonical Hours

The times within which the sacred offices may be performed. In the Roman Catholic Church they are seven—viz. matins, prime, tierce, sext, nones, vespers, and compline. Prime, tierce, sext, and nones are the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. Compline is a corruption of completorium (that which completes the services of the day). The reason why there are seven canonical hours is that David says, “Seven times a day do I praise thee” (Psalm cxix. 164).

In England the phrase means the time of the day within which persons can be legally married, i.e. from eight in the morning to three p m.

Canonical Obedience The obedience due by the inferior clergy to the superior clergy set over them. Even bishops owe canonical obedience to the archbishop of the same province.

Canonical Punishments

are those punishments which the Church is authorised to inflict.

Canonicals

The pouch on the gown of an M.D., designed for carrying drugs. The coif of a serjeant—at—law, designed for concealing the tonsure.

The lamb—skin on a B A hood, in imitation of the toga candida of the Romans. The strings of an Oxford undergraduate, to show the wearer is still in leading strings. At Cambridge, however, the strings are the mark of a graduate who has won his ribbons.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The tippet on a barrister's gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in. The proctors' and pro—proctors' tippet, for papers— a sort of sabretache.

Canopic Vases

Used by the Egyptian priests for the viscera of bodies embalmed, four vases being provided for each body. So called from Canopus, in Egypt, where they were first used.

Canopus

The Egyptian god of water. The Chaldeans worshipped fire, and sent all the other gods a challenge, which was accepted by a priest of Canopus. The Chaldeans lighted a vast fire round the god Canopus, when the Egyptian deity spouted out torrents of water and quenched the fire, thereby obtaining the triumph of water over fire.

Canopy

properly means a gnat curtain. Herodotus tells us (ii. 95) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept securely, as gnats will not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the tester of a bed was so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings. (Greek, kwuwy, a gnat; kwiwpeiou, a gnat—curtain; Latin, conopeum, a gnatcurtain.)

Canossa

Canossa, in the duchy of Modena, is where (in the winter of 1076—7) Kaiser Heinrich IV. went to humble himself before Pope Gregory VII. (Hildebrand).

Has the Czar gone to Canossa?

Is he about to eat humble pie?

When, in November, 1887, the Czar went to Berlin to visit the Emperor of Germany, the Standard asked in a leader, "Has the Czar gone to Canossa?"

Cant

A whining manner of speech; class phraseology, especially of a religious nature (Latin, canto, to sing, whence chant). It is often derived from a proper name. We are told that Alexander and Andrew Cant maintained that all those who refused the "Covenant" ought to be excommunicated, and that those were cursed who made use of the prayer—book. These same Cants, in their grace before meat, used to "pray for all those who suffered persecution for their religious opinions." (Mercurius Publicus, No. ix., 1661.)

The proper name cannot have given us the noun and verb, as they were in familiar use certainly in the time of Ben Jonson, signifying "professional slang," and "to use professional slang."

"The doctor here,

When he discourses of dissection,

Of vena cava and of vena porta ...

What does he do but cant? Or if he run

To his judicial astrology,

And trowl out the trine, the quartile, and the sextile, Does he not cant?"

Ben Jonson

(1574—1637): Andrew Cant died 1664.

Cantabrian Surge

The Bay of Biscay. So called from the Cantabri who dwelt about the Biscayan shore. Suetonius tells us that a thunderbolt fell in the Cantabrian Lake (Spain) "in which twelve axes were found."

(Galba, viii.)

"She her thundering army leads

To Calpê [Gibraltar] ... or the rough

Cantabrian Surge."

Akenside: Hymn to the Naiades.

Cantate Sunday

Fourth Sunday after Easter. So called from the first word of the introit of the mass: "Sing to the Lord." Similarly "Laetate Sunday" (the fourth after Lent) is so called from the first word of the mass.

Canteen'

means properly a wine—cellar. Then a refreshment—house in a barrack for the use of the soldiers. Then a vessel, holding about three pints, for the use of soldiers on the march. (Italian, cantina, a cellar.)

Canterbury

Canterbury is the higher rack, but Winchester the better manger. Canterbury is the higher see in rank, but Winchester the one which produces the most money. This was the reply of William Edington, Bishop of Winchester, when offered the archbishopric of Canterbury (1366). Now Canterbury is 6,500.

Canterbury Tales

Chaucer supposed that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas à Becket. The party assembled at an inn in Southwark, called the Tabard, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best tale was to be treated with a supper on the homeward journey. The work is incomplete, and we have none of the tales told on the way home.

A Canterbury Tale.

A cock—and—bull story; a romance. So called from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

Canting Crew

(The). Beggars, gipsies, and thieves, who use what is called the canting lingo.

Canucks

The Canadians. So called in the United States of America.

Canvas

means cloth made of hemp. To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it; and to canvass a borough is to sift the votes. (Latin, cannabis, hemp.)

Canvas City

(A). A military encampment.

“The Grand Master assented, and they proceeded accordingly, ... avoiding the most inhabited parts of the canvas city.”— Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. x.

“In 1851, during the gold rush, a town of tents, known as Canvas Town, rose into being on the St. Kilda Road, Melbourne. Several thousand inhabitants lived in this temporary settlement, which was laid out in streets and lasted for several months.”— Cities of the World; Melbourne.

Caora

A river, on the banks of which are a people whose heads grow beneath their shoulders. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. (Hakluyt: Voyages, 1598.) Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana, gives a similar account of a race of men. (See Blemmyes .)

“The Anthropophagi and men whose heads

Do grow beneath their shoulders.”

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Cap

Black cap (See page 140, Black Cap .)

Cater cap.

A square cap or mortar—board. (French, quartier.)

College cap. A trencher like the caps worn at the English Universities by students and bachelors of art, doctors of divinity, etc.

Fool's cap.

A cylindrical cap with feather and bells, such as licensed Fools used to wear. Forked cap. A bishop's mitre. For the paper so called, see Foolscap.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

John Knox cap

(A). A cap made of black silk velvet.

“A cap of black silk velvet, after the John Knox fashion.”— Edinburgh University Calendar.

Monmouth cap (A). (See Monmouth.)

Phrygian cap

(A). Cap of liberty (q.v.).

Scotch cap. A cloth cap worn commonly in Scotland. Cap and bells. The insignia of a professional fool or jester. A feather in one's cap. An achievement to be proud of; something creditable. Square cap. A trencher or “mortar—board,” like the University cap.

Statute cap.

A woollen cap ordered by statute to be worn on holidays by all citizens for the benefit of the woollen trade. To a similar end, persons were obliged to be buried at death in flannel.

“Well, better wits have worn plain statute caps.”— Shakespeare: Love's Labour Lost, v 2.

Trencher cap, or mortar—board. A cap with a square board, generally covered with black cloth. I must put on my considering cap. I must think about the matter before I give a final answer. The allusion is to a conjurer's cap.

If the cap fits, wear it.

If the remark applies to you, apply it to yourself. Hats and caps differ very slightly in size and appearance, but everyone knows his own when he puts it on.

Setting her cap at him.

Trying to catch him for a sweetheart or a husband. The lady puts on the most becoming of her caps, to attract the attention and admiration of the favoured gentleman.

To gain the cap.

To obtain a bow from another out of respect.

“Such gains the cap of him that makes them fine,

But keeps his book uncrossed.”

Shakespeare: Cymbeline,

iii. 3.

To pull caps.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To quarrel like two women, who pull each other's caps.

Your cap is all on one side.

The French have the phrase Mettre son bonnet de travers, meaning "to be in an ill—humour." M. Hilaire le Gai explains it thus: "La plupart des tapageurs de profession portent ordinairement le chapeau sur l'oreille." It is quite certain that workmen, when they are bothered, push their cap on one side of the head, generally over the right ear, because the right hand is occupied.

Cap

(the verb).

I cap to that, i.e.

assent to it. The allusion is to a custom observed in France amongst the judges in deliberation. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify it by lifting their toque from their heads.

To cap.

To excel.

"Well, that caps the globe."— C. Bronte: Jane Eyre.

Cap Verses

(To). Having the metre fixed and the last letter of the previous line given, to add a verse beginning with the given letter (of the same metre or not, according to prearrangement) thus:

English.

The way was long, the wind was cold (D).

Dogs with their tongues their wounds do heal(L). Like words congealed in northern air(R).

Regions Caesar never knew (W).

With all a poet's ecstasy(Y).

You may deride my awkward pace, etc. etc.

Latin.

Nil pictis timidus navita puppibus(S).

Sunt quos curriculo pulverem Olympicum(M). Myrtoum pavidus nauta secet mare(E).

Est qui nec veteris pocula Massici(I).

Illum, si proprio condidit horreo(O).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

O, et presidium ... (as long as you please).

It would make a Christmas game to cap proper names: as Plato, Otway, Young, Goldsmith, etc., or to cap proverbs, as: "Rome was not built in a day"; "Ye are the salt of the earth"; "Hunger is the best sauce";

"Example is better than precept"; "Time and tide wait for no man"; etc.

Cap and Bells

Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters formerly attached to noblemen's establishments. Their headgear was a cap with bells.

"One is bound to speak the truth ... whether he mounts the cap and bells or a shovel hat [like a bishop]."—Thackeray.

Cap and Feather Days

The time of childhood.

"Here I was got into the scenes of my cap—and—feather days."—Cobbett.

Cap and Gown The full academical costume of a university student, tutor, or master, worn at lectures, examinations, and after "hall" (dinner).

"Is it a cap and gown affair?"—C. Bede: Verdant Green.

Cap in Hand

Submissively. To wait on a man cap in hand is to wait on him like a servant, ready to do his bidding.

Cap of Fools

(The). The chief or foremost fool; one that exceeds all others in folly.

"Thou art the cap of all the fools alive."

Shakespeare: Timon of Athens,

iv. 3.

Cap of Liberty

When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small red cloth cap, called pileus, was placed on his head. As soon as this was done, he was termed libertinus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city tribes. When Saturninus, in 263, possessed himself of the capitol, he hoisted a cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free. When Marius incited the slaves to take up arms against Sylla, he employed the same symbol; and when Caesar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body, with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty (See Liberty .)

Cap of Maintenance

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A cap of dignity anciently belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord Mayor of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. Maintenance here means defence.

Cap of Time

They wear themselves in the cap of time. Use more ceremony, says Parolles, for these lords do “wear themselves in the cap of time,” i.e. these lords are the favours and jewels worn in the cap of the time being, and have the greatest influence. In the cap of time being, they are the very jewels, and most honoured. (Shakespeare: All's Well, etc., ii. 1.)

Cap—acquaintance

(A), now called a bowing acquaintance. One just sufficiently known to bow to.

Cap—money

Money collected in a cap or hat; hence an improvised collection.

Cap—a—pie

The general etymology is the French cap à pied, but the French phrase is de pied en cap.

“Armed at all points exactly cap—a—pie.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet,

i. 2.

“I am courtier, cap—a—pe.”

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale,

iv. 3.

We are told that cap à pie is Old French, but it would be desirable to give a quotation from some old French author to verify this assertion. I have hunted in vain for the purpose. Again, is pie Old French for pied? This is not a usual change. The usual change would be pied into pie. The Latin might be De capi te ad pedem.

Capfull of Wind

Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, King of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap the wind would blow, and for this he was called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds; but, even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomona (Orkney Islands), helped out her living by selling favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence. (See Mont St. Michel .)

Cape Spirit of the Cape. (See page 14, col. 1, Adamastor .)

Cape of Storms

(See Storms .)

Capel Court

A speculation in stocks of such magnitude as to affect the money market. Capel Court is the name of the place in London where transactions in stocks are carried on.

Caper

The weather is so foul, not even a caper would venture out. A Manx proverb. A caper is a fisherman of Cape Clear in Ireland, who will venture out in almost any weather.

Caper Merchant

A dancing—master who cuts “capers.” (See Cut Capers .)

Capet

(Cap—pay). Hugues, the founder of the French monarchy, was surnamed Capetus (clothed with a capot or monk's hood), because he always wore a clerical costume as abbot of St. Martin de Tours. This was considered the family name of the kings of France; hence, Louis XVI. was arraigned before the National Convention under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital

Money or money's worth available for production.

“His capital is continually going from him [the merchant] in some shape, and returning to him in another.”—Adam Smith: Wealth of Nations, vol. i. book ii. chap. i. p. 276.

Active capital.

Ready money or property readily convertible into it.

Circulating capital.

Wages, or raw material. This sort of capital is not available a second time for the same purpose.

Fixed capital.

Land, buildings, and machinery, which are only gradually consumed. Political capital is something employed to serve a political purpose. Thus, the Whigs make political capital out of the errors of the Tories, and vice versa.

“He tried to make capital out of his rival's discomfiture.”—The Times.

Capital Fellow

(A). A stock—jobber, in French called Un Capitaine, par allusion aux capitaux sur lesquels un agiote habituellement. A good—tempered, jovial, and generous person.

Capitals

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To speak in capitals. To emphasise certain words with great stress. Certain nouns spelt with a capital letter are meant to be emphatic and distinctive.

Capite Censi

The lowest rank of Roman citizens; so called because they were counted simply by the poll, as they had no taxable property.

Capitulars

The laws of the first two dynasties of France were so called, because they were divided into chapters. (French, capitulaire.)

Capon

Called a fish out of the coop by those friars who wished to evade the Friday fast by eating chickens instead of fish. (See Yarmouth .)

Capon

(A). A castrated cock.

A Crail's capon.

A dried haddock.

A Severn capon.

A sole.

A Yarmouth capon.

A red herring.

We also sometimes hear of a Glasgow capon, a salt herring.

Capon

(A). A love—letter. In French, poulet means not only a chicken but also a love—letter, or a sheet of note—paper. Thus Henri IV., consulting with Sully about his marriage, says: “My niece of Guise would please me best, though report says maliciously that she loves poulets in paper better than in a fricasee.”

“Boyet ... break up this capon [i.e. open this love—letter].”— Shakespeare. Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 1.

Capricorn

Called by Thomson, in his Winter, “the centaur archer.” Anciently, the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn; but the stars, having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter solstice now falls at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius (the centaur archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we vulgarly retain the ancient classical manner of speaking. Capricornus is the tenth, or, strictly speaking, the eleventh sign of the zodiac. (Dec. 21—Jan. 20.) According to classic mythology, Capricorn was Pan, who, from fear of the great Typhon, changed himself into a goat, and was made by Jupiter one of the signs of the zodiac.

Captain

Capitano del Popolo, i.e. Garibaldi (1807—1882). The Great Captain (el gran capitano). Gonzalvo di Cordova (1453—1515.) Manuel Comnenus of Trebizond (1120,1143—1180)

Captain Cauf's Tail

The commander—in—chief of the mummers of Plough Monday.

Captain Copperthorne's Crew

All masters and no men.

Captain Podd

A showman. So called from “Captain” Podd, a famous puppet—showman in the time of Ben Jonson.

Captain Stiff

To come Captain Stiff over one. To treat one with cold formality.

“I shouldn't quite come Captain Stiff over him.”— S. Warren: Ten Thousand a Year.

Captious

Fallacious, deceitful; now it means ill—tempered, carping. (Latin, captiosus.)

“I know I love in vain, strive against hope;

Yet in this captious and intenable sieve

I still pour in the waters of my love.”

Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well, i. 3.

Capua

Capua corrupted Hannibal. Luxury and self—indulgence will ruin anyone. Hannibal was everywhere victorious over the Romans till he took up his winter quarters at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy. When he left Capua his star began to wane, and, ere long, Carthage was in ruins and himself an exile.

Capua was the Cannæ of Hannibal.

As the battle of Cannæ was most disastrous to the Roman army, so was the luxury of Capua to Hannibal's army. We have a modern adaptation to this proverb: “Moscow was the Austerlitz of Napoleon.”

Capuchin

A friar of the order of St. Francis, of the new rule of 1528; so called from their “capuce” or pointed cowl.

Capulet

A noble house in Verona, the rival of that of Montague (3 syl.); Juliet is of the former, and Romeo of the latter. Lady Capulet is the beau—ideal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century. The expression so familiar, “the tomb of all the Capulets,” is from Burke. (Shakespeare Romeo and Juliet.)

Caput Mortuum

Latin for head of the dead, used by the old chemists to designate the residuum of chemicals, when all their volatile matters had escaped. Anything from which all that rendered it valuable has been taken away. Thus, a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French Directory, towards its close, was a mere caput mortuum of a governing body.

Caqueux

A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the Cagots of Gascony, and Colliberts of Poitou.

Carabas

He is a Marquis of Carabas. A fossil nobleman, of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would fain restore the slavish foolery of the reign of Louis XIV.; one with Fortunatus's purse, which was never empty. The character is taken from Perrault's tale of Puss in Boots.

“Prêtres que nous vengeons

Levez la drine et partageons;

Et toi, peuple animal,

Porte encor le bât feodal. ...

Chapeau bas! Chapeau bas!

Gloire au marquis de Carabas!”

Béranger, 1816.

Caracalla

[long—mantle]. Aurelius Antoninus was so called because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga. It was a large, close—fitting, hooded mantle, reaching to the heels, and slit up before and behind to the waist. Aurelius was himself born in Gaul, called Caracal in Ossian. (See Curtmantle

.)

Caracci

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(pron. Kar—rah'—che). Founder of the eclectic school in Italy. Luis and his two cousins Augustin and Annibale founded the school called Incamminati (progressive), which had for its chief principle the strict observance of nature. Luis (1554—1619), Augustin (1558—1601), Annibale (1560—1609).

The Caracci of France.

Jean Jouvenet, who was paralysed on the right side, and painted with his left hand.

(1647—1707.)

The Annibale Caracci of the Eclectic School.

Bernardino Campi, the Italian, is so called by Lanzi (1522—1590).

Carack

or Carrack. A ship of great bulk, constructed to carry heavy frieghts. (Spanish, caraca.)

“The rich—laden carack bound to distant shores.”

Pollok: Course of Time, book vii. line 60.

Caradoc

A Knight of the Round Table, noted for being the husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear “the mantle of matrimonial fidelity.” Also in history, the British chief whom the Romans called Caractacus.

Caraites

A religious sect among the Jews, who rigidly adhered to the words and letters of Scripture, regardless of metaphor, etc. Of course, they rejected the rabbinical interpretations and the Cabala. The word is derived from Caraim, equivalent to scripturarii (textualists). Pronounce Carry—ites.

Caran D'Ache

The pseudonym of M. Emanuel Poirié, the French caricaturist.

Carat of Gold

So called from the carat bean, or seed of the locust tree, formerly employed in weighing gold and silver. Hence the expressions “22 carats fine,” “18 carats fine,” etc., meaning that out of 24 parts, 22 or 18 are gold, and the rest alloy.

“Here's the note

How much your chain weighs to the utmost carat.” Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

Caraway

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Latin, carum, from Caria in Asia Minor, whence the seeds were imported.

“Nay, you shall see my orchard, where in an arbour we will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting, with a dish of caraways.”— Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 3 (Justice Shallow to Falstaff).

Carbineer

or Carabineer. Properly a skirmisher or light horseman, from the Arabic carabine. A carbine is the light musket used by cavalry soldiers.

“He ... left the Rhinegrave, with his company of mounted carbineers, to guard the passage.” Motley: Dutch Republic (vol. i. part i. chap. ii. p. 179).

Carbonado

A chop; mince meat. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the gridiron. (Latin, carbo, a coal.)

“If he do come in my way, so; if he do not— if

I come in his willingly, let him make a carbonado of me.”— Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 3.

Carbonari

means charcoal—burners, a name assumed by a secret political society in Italy (organised 1808—1814). Their place of muster they called a “hut;” its inside, “the place for selling charcoal;” and the outside, the “forest.” Their political opponents they called “wolves.” Their object was to convert the kingdom of Naples into a republic. In the singular number, Carbonaro. (See Charbonnerie.)

Carbuncle of Ward Hill (The). A mysterious carbuncle visible enough to those who stand at the foot of the hill in May, June or July; but never beheld by anyone who has succeeded in reaching the hill top.

“I have distinguished, among the dark rocks, that wonderful carbuncle, which gleams ruddy as a furnace to them who view it from beneath, but has ever become invisible to him whose daring foot has scaled the precipice from which it darts its splendour.”— Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xix.

Dr. Wallace thinks it is water trickling from a rock, and reddened by the sun.

Carcenet

A small chain of jewels for the neck. (French, carcan, an iron collar.)

“Like captain jewels in a carcanet.”

Shakespeare: Sonnets.

Carcass

The shell of a house before the floors are laid and walls plastered; the skeleton of a ship, a wreck, etc. The body of a dead animal, so called from the Latin caro—cassa (lifeless flesh). (French, carcasse.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The Goodwins, I think they call the place; a very dangerous flat and fatal, where the carcasses of many a tall ship lie buried.”— Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii. 1.

Carcasses

Shells with three fuzeholes. They are projected from mortars (q.v.), howitzers (q.v.), and guns. They will burn furiously for eight or ten minutes, do not burst like shells, but the flames, rushing from the three holes, set on fire everything within their influence.

“Charlestown ... having been fired by carcass from Copp's Hill, sent up dense columns of smoke.”— Lessing: United States

Card

That's the card. The right thing; the ticket. The reference is to tickets of admission, cards of the races, and programmes.

“10s. is about the card.”— Mayhew: London Labour, etc.

A queer card. An eccentric person, “indifferent honest.” A difficult lead in cards to play to. A knowing card. A sharp fellow, next door to a sharper. The allusion is to card—sharper and their tricks.

“Whose great aim it was to be considered a knowing card.”— Dickens: Sketches, etc.

A great card. A big wig; the boss of the season; a person of note. A big card. A leading card. A star actor. A person leads from his strongest suit.

A loose card.

A worthless fellow who lives on the loose.

“A loose card is a card of no value, and, consequently, the properest to throw away.”— Hoyle: Games, etc.

A sure card. A person one can fully depend on; a person sure to command success. A project to be certainly depended on. As a winning card in one's hand.

He is the card of our house.

The man of mark, the most distingué. Osric tells Hamlet that Laertès is “the card and calendar of gentry” (v. 2). The card is a card of a compass, containing all its points. Laertès is the card of gentry, in whom may be seen all its points. We also say “a queer card,” meaning an odd fish.

That was my best trump card.

My best chance. The allusion is to loo, whist, and other games played with cards.

To play one's best card.

To do that which one hopes is most likely to secure success. To speak by the card. To speak by the book, be as precise as a map or book, be as precise as a map or book. A merchant's expression. The card is the document in writing containing the agreements made between a merchant and the captain of a vessel. Sometimes the owner binds himself, ship, tackle, and furniture for due performance, and the captain is bound to deliver the cargo committed to him in good condition. To speak by the card is to speak according to the indentures or written instructions. In some cases the reference is to the card of a mariner's compass.

“Law ... is the card to guide the world by.”— Hooker: Ecc. Pol., part ii. sec. 5.

“We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.”— Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Cards

It is said that there never was a good hand of cards containing four clubs. Such a hand is called “The Devil's Four—poster.”

Lieuben, a German lunatic, bet that he would succeed in turning up a pack of cards in a certain order stated in a written agreement. He turned and turned the cards ten hours a day for twenty years, and repeated the operation 4,246,028 times, when at last he succeeded.

In Spain, spades used to be columbines; clubs, rabbits; diamonds, pinks; and hearts, roses. The present name for spades is espados (swords); of clubs, bastos (cudgels); of diamonds, dineros (square pieces of money used for paying wages), of hearts, copas (chalices).

The French for spades is pique (pikemen or soldiers); for clubs, trèfle (clover, or husbandmen); of diamonds, carreaux (building tiles, or artisans); of hearts, choeur (choir—men, or ecclesiasties)

The English spades is the French form of a pike, and the Spanish name; the clubs is the French trefoil, and the Spanish name; the hearts is a corruption of choeur into coeur. (See Vierge.)

Court cards.

So called because of their heraldic devices. The king of clubs originally represented the arms of the Pope; of spades, the King of France; of diamonds, the King of Spain; and of hearts, the King of England. The French kings in cards are called David (spades), Alexander (clubs), Caesar (diamonds), and Charles (hearts)—representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine— i.e. Juno (hearts), Judith (clubs), Rachel (diamonds), and Pallas (spades) — representing royalty, fortitude, piety, and wisdom. They were likenesses of Marie d'Anjou, the queen of Charles VII., Isabeau, the queen—mother; Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress, and Joan d'Arc, the dame of spades, or war.

He felt that he held the cards in his own hands.

That he had the whip—end of the stick; that he had the upper hand, and could do as he liked. The allusion is to games played with cards, such as whist.

He played his cards well.

He acted judiciously and skilfully, like a whistplayer who plays his hand with judgment. To play one's cards badly is to manage a project unskilfully.

The cards are in my hands.

I hold the disposal of events which will secure success. The allusion is obvious.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The Vitelli busied at Arezzo; the Orsini irritating the French; the war of Naples imminent;— the cards are in my hands.”— Caesar Borgia, xxix.

On the cards.

Likely to happen, projected, and talked about as likely to occur. On the programme or card of the races; on the “agenda.”

To count on one's cards.

To anticipate success under the circumstances. The allusion is to holding in one's hand cards likely to win.

To go in with good cards.

To have good patronage; to have excellent grounds for expecting success. To throw up the cards. To give up as a bad job; to acknowledge you have no hope of success. In some games of cards, as loo, a player has the liberty of saying whether he will play or not, and if one's hand is hopelessly bad he throws up his cards and sits out till the next deal.

Cardinal Humours

Blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile.

Cardinal Numbers

Such numbers as 1, 2, 3, etc. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc., are ordinal numbers.

Cardinal Points of the Compass

Due north, west, east, and south. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones, such as N.E., N.W., N.N.E., etc., hinge or hang. (Latin, cardo, a hinge.)

Cardinal Signs

[of the Zodiac]. The two equinoctial and the two solstitial signs, Aries and Libra, Cancer and Capricornus.

Cardinal Virtues Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend.

Cardinal Winds

Those that blow due East, West, North, and South.

Cardinals

Hinges. (Latin, cardo.) The election of the Pope “hinges” on the voice of the sacred college, and on the Pope the doctrines of the Church depend; so that the cardinals are in fact the hinges on which the Christian Church turns. There may be six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons, who constitute the Pope's council, and who elect the Pope when a vacancy occurs.

Cardinal's Red Hat

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Some assert that Innocent IV. made the cardinals wear a red hat “in token of their being ready to lay down their life for the gospel.”

Carduel

or Kartel. Carlisle. The place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Care—cloth

(The). The fine linen cloth laid over the newly—married in the Catholic Church. (Anglo—Saxon, cear, large, as cear wúnd (a big wound), cear sorh (a great sorrow), etc.)

Care killed the Cat

It is said that “a cat has nine lives,” yet care would wear them all out.

Care Sunday

(the fifth Sunday in Lent). Professor Skeat tells us (Notes and Queries, Oct. 28th, 1893), that “care” means trouble, suffering; and that Care—Sunday means Passion—Sunday. In Old High German we have Kar—woche and Kar—fritag.

The Latin cura sometimes meant “sorrow, grief, trouble,” as “Curam et angorem animi levare.”—Cicero: Att. i. 15.

Careme

(2 syl.). Lent; a corruption of quadragesima.

Car—goose

(A) or Gargoose. The crested diver, belonging to the genus Colymbus. (Anglo—Saxon, gar and gos.)

Caricatures

mean “sketches overdrawn.” (Italian, caricatura,) from carica'rë, to load or burden.

Carillons

in France, are chimes or tunes played on bells; but in England the suites of bells that play the tunes. Our word carol approaches the French meaning nearer than our own. The best chimes in the world are those in Les Halles, at Bruges.

Carinae

Women hired by the Romans to weep at funerals; so called from Caria, whence most of them came.

Carle

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Carling Sunday [Pea Sunday]. The octave preceding Palm Sunday; so called because the special food of the day was carling—i.e. peas fried in butter. The custom is a continuation of the pagan bean—feast. The fifth Sunday in Lent.

Carlovingian Dynasty

So called from Carolus or Charles Martel.

Carludovica

A Panama hat, made of the Carludovica palmata; so called in compliment to Carlos IV. of Spain, whose second name was Ludovic.

Carmagnole

(3 syl.). A red Republican song and dance in the first French revolution; so called from Carmagnola, in Piedmont, the great nest of the Savoyards, noted for street music and dancing. The refrain of “Madame Veto,” the Carmagnole song, is “Dansons la Carmagnole— vive le son du canon!” The word was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs, such as Ça ira the Marseillaise, the Chant du Depart. Besides the songs, the word is applied to the dress worn by the Jacobins, consisting of a blouse, red cap, and tri—coloured girdle; to the wearer of this dress or any violent revolutionist; to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI, called by M Barrière des Carmagnoles; and, lastly, to the dance performed by the mob round the guillotine, or down the streets of Paris.

Carmelites

(3 syl.). An order of mendicant friars of Mount Carmel, the monastery of which is named Elias, from Elijah the prophet, who on Mount Carmel told Ahab that rain was at hand. Also called White Friars, from their white cloaks.

Carmilhan

The phantom ship on which the Kobold of the Baltic sits when he appears to doomed vessels.

Carminative

A charm medicine. Magic and charms were at one time the chief “medicines,” and the fact is perpetuated by the word carminative, among others. Carminatives are given to relieve flatulence. (Latin, carmen, a charm.)

Carmine

(2 syl). The dye made from the carmès or kermès insect, whence also crimson, through the Italian cremisino.

Carnation

“Flesh—colour.” (Latin, caro; genitive, carnis, flesh.)

Carney

To wheedle, to keep caressing.

Carnival

The season immediately preceding Lent; shrove—tide. Ducange gives the word carne—levale. (Modern Italian, carnovále; Spanish and French, carnaval.)

Italis, carnevale, carnovale, carnaval. Quidam scriptores Itali “carne—vale” dictum putant, quasi carne vale (good—by meat); sed id etymon non probat Octav. Ferrarius. Cangius ... appellasse Gallos existimat, carne—a—val, quod sonat caro abscedit ... [We are referred to a charter, dated 1195, in which occurs the word carne—lcvamen, and a quotation is given in which occurs the phrase in carnis levamen].—Ducange, vol. ii. p. 222.

Carotid Artery

An artery on each side of the neck, supposed by the ancients to be the seat of drowsiness, brought on by an increased flow of blood through it to the head. (Greek, caroticos, inducing sleep.)

Carouse (2 syl.). Mr. Gifford says the Danes called their large drinking cup a rouse, and to rouse is to drink from a rouse; ca—rouse is gar—rouse, to drink all up, or to drink all— i.e. in company.

“The king doth wake to—night, and takes his rouse.” Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 4.

Carouse the hunter's hoop.

Drinking cups were anciently marked with hoops, by which every drinker knew his stint. Shakespeare makes Jack Cade promise his friends that “seven halfpenny loaves shall be sold for a penny; and the three—hooped pot have ten hoops.” Pegs or pins (q.v.) are other means of limiting the draught of individuals who drank out of the same tankard.

Carpathian Wizard

Proteus (2 syl.), who lived in the island of Carpathos, between Rhodes and Crete. He was a wizard and prophet, who could transform himself into any shape he pleased. He is represented as carrying a sort of crook in his hand. Carpathos, now called Scarpanto.

“By the Carpathian wizard's hook.”

Milton: Comus,

893.

Carpe Diem

Enjoy yourself while you have the opportunity. Seize the present day. (Horace: 1 Odes, xi. 8.) “Dum vivimus, vivamus.”

Carpenter

is from the Low Latin carpentarius, a maker of carpenta (two—wheeled carts and carriages). The carpentum was used for ladies; the carpentum funebre or carpentum pompaticum was a hearse. There was also a carpentum (cart) for agricultural purposes. There is no Latin word for our “carpenter”; the phrase faber lignarius is used by Cicero. Our forefathers called a carpenter a “smith” or a “wood—smith.” (French, charpentér.)

Carpet

The magic carpet of Tangu. A carpet to all appearances worthless, but if anyone sat thereon, it would transport him instantaneously to the place he wished to go. So called because it came from Tangu, in Persia. It is sometimes termed Prince Housain's carpet, because it came into his hands, and he made use of it. (Arabian Nights: Prince Ahmed.) (See below.)

Solomon's carpet.

The Eastern writers say that Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was placed when he travelled. This carpet was large enough for all his forces to stand upon; the men and women stood on his right hand, and the spirits on his left. When all were arranged in order, Solomon told the wind where he wished to go, and the carpet, with all its contents, rose in the air and alighted at the place indicated. In order to screen the party from the sun, the birds of the air with outspread wings formed a canopy over the whole party. (Salé: Koran.) (See above.)

Such and such a question is on the carpet.

The French sur le tapis (on the table—cloth)—i.e. before the house, under consideration. The question has been laid on the table—cloth of the house, and is now under debate.

Carpet—bag Adventurer

(A). A passing adventurer, who happens to be on the road with his travelling or carpet—bag.

Carpet—bag Government

The government of mere adventurers. In America, a state in the South reorganised by “carpet—baggers,” i.e. Northern political adventurers, who sought a career in the Southern States after the Civil War of 1865. [It may be noted that in America members of Congress and the State legislatures almost invariably reside in the district which they represent.]

Carpet Knight

One dubbed at Court by favour, not having won his spurs by military service in the field. Mayors, lawyers, and other civilians knighted as they kneel on a carpet before their sovereign. “Knights of the Carpet,” “Knights of the Green Cloth,” “Knights of Carpentry.”

“The subordinate commands fell to young patricians, carpet—knights, who went on campaigns with their families and slaves.”—Froude: Caesar, chap. iv. p. 91.

Carpocratians

Gnostics; so called from Carpocrates, who flourished in the middle of the second century. They maintained that the world was made by angels,— that only the soul of Christ ascended into heaven,— and that the body will have no resurrection.

Carriage Company

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Persons who keep their private carriage

“Seeing a great deal of carriage company”— Thackeray.

Carriages

Things carried, luggage.

“And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.”— Acts xxi. 15.

Carronades

(3 syl.). Short, light iron guns. As they have no trunnions they differ in this respect from guns and howitzers (q.v.). They were invented in 1779 by Mr. Gascoigne, director of the Carron foundry, in Scotland, whence the name. Carronades are fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath, and are chiefly used in the arming of ships, to enable them to throw heavy shot at close quarters, without overloading the decks with heavy guns. On shore they are used as howitzers.

Carry Arms!

Hold your gun in the right hand, the barrel nearly perpendicular, and resting against the hollow of the shoulder, the thumb and forefinger embracing the guard. (A military command.) (See Carry Swords .)

Carry Coals

(See Coals .)

Carry Everything before One

(To). To be beyond competition; to carry off all the prizes. A military phrase. Similarly, a high wind carries everything before it.

Carry Fire in one Hand and Water in the other

(To). To say one thing and mean another; to flatter, to deceive; to lull suspicion in order the better to work mischief.

“Altera manu fert aquam, altera ignem. Altera manu fert lapidem, altera panem ostentat.” Plautus.

Carry One's Point

(To). To succeed in one's aim. Candidates in Rome were balloted for, and the votes were marked on a tablet by points. Hence, omne punctum ferre meant “to be carried nem. con.,” or to gain every vote; and “to carry one's point” is to carry off the points at which one aimed.

Carry Out

(To) or Carry through. To continue a project to its completion.

Carry out one's Bat

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(To). A cricketer is said to carry out his bat when he is not “out” at the close of the game.

Carry Swords!

Hold the drawn sword vertically, the blade against the shoulder (A military command.) (See above, Carry Arms .)

Carry the Day

(To). To win the contest; to carry off the honours of the day. In Latin, victoriam reportare.

Carry Weight (To), in races, etc., means to equalise the weight of two or more riders by adding weights to the lighter ones, till both (or all) the riders are made of one uniform weight.

“He carries weight! he rides a race! `Tis for a thousand pounds.”

Cowper: John Gilpin.

To carry weight. To have influence.

Cart before the Horse

To put the cart before the horse is to reverse the right order or allocation of things.

French:

“Mettre la charrette avant les boeufs.”

Latin:

“Currus bovem trahit Praepostere.”

Greek: “Hysteron proteron.”

German:

“Die pferde hinter den wagen spannen.”

Italian:

“Metter il carro inanzi ai buoi.”

Carte Blanche

(French). A blank cheque signed by the giver, but left to be filled in by the receiver, with a sum of money drawn on the bank—account of the giver. Power to act at discretion in an affair placed under your charge.

Carte de Visite

(French). A visiting card, a photographic likeness on a card for the albums of friends, etc. This custom originated, in 1857, with the Duke of Parma.

Cartesian Philosophy

The philosophical system of René Descartes (Latin, Cartesius), of La Haye, in Touraine. The basis of his system is cogito ergo sum. Thought must proceed from soul, and therefore man is not wholly material; that soul must be from some Being not material, and that Being is God. As for physical phenomena, they must be the result of motion excited by God, and these motions he termed vortices.

(1596—1650.)

Of course, he begs the whole question in his first assertion. (See Cogito.)

Carthage of the North

Lubeck was so called, when it was the head of the Hanseatic League.

Carthagena

Capital of New Granada, in South America, unsuccessfully attacked in 1747 by Admiral Vernon.

“Wasteful, forth

Walks the dire power of pestilent disease ...

Such as, of late, at Carthagena quenched

The British fire. You, gallant Vernon, saw

The miserable scene; you, pitying, saw

To infant—weakness sunk the warrior's arm.”

Thomson: Summer,

1034—43.

Carthaginem esse Delendam

(censeo) were the words with which Cato the Elder concluded every speech in the Roman senate. More usually quoted “Delenda est Carthago.” They are now proverbial, and mean, “That which stands in the way of our greatness must be removed at all hazards.”

Carthaginian Faith

Treachery. (See Punica Fides .)

Carthusians

Founded, in 1086, by St. Bruno, of Cologne, who, with six companions, retired to the solitude of La Chartreuse, near Grenoble, in Vienne.

Cartoons

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Designs drawn on cartone (pasteboard), like those of Raffaele, formerly at Hampton Court, but now at Kensington Museum. They were bought by Charles I., and are seven in number: “The Miraculous Draught of Fishes,” “Feed my Lambs,” “The Beautiful Gate of the Temple,” “Death of Ananias,” “Elymas the Sorcerer,” “Paul at Lystra,” and “Paul on the Mars Hill.”

“They were designs for tapestries to be worked in Flanders.”— Julia B. De Forest: Short History of Art, p. 246.

Cartridge Paper

was originally manufactured for soldiers' cartridges. The word is a corruption of cartouche, from carta (paper).

Caryates

or Caryatids. Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Caryae, in Arcadia, sided with the Persians in the battle of Thermopylae; in consequence of which the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxiteles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of these women, instead of columns. (See page 72, col. 2, Atlantes, page 208, col. 2, Canephorae .) or Caryatidic Order. Architecture in which Caryatids are introduced to support the entablature.

Caryatic Order

Casabianca

was the name of the captain of the French man—of—war, L'Orient. At the battle of Aboukir, having first secured the safety of his crew, he blew up his ship, to prevent it falling into the hands of the English. His little son, refusing to leave him, perished with his father. Mrs. Hemans has made a ballad, Casabianca, on this subject, modifying the incident. The French poets Lebrun and Chénier have also celebrated the occurrence.

Casca

A blunt—witted Roman, one of the conspirators against Julius Caesar. (Shakespeare: Julius Caesar.)

Case

(To). To skin an animal. In the Cookery by Mrs. Glasse is the direction, “Take your hare when it is cased, ... and make a pudding ...” The witticism, “First catch your hare,” may possibly have been suggested by this direction, but it is not in the Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy.

Case—hardened

Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to iron toughened by carbonising the surface in contact with charcoal in a case or closed box. It is done by heat.

Cashier'

(2 syl.). To dismiss an officer from the army, to discard from society. (French, casser, to break; Italian, cassa'rĕ, to blot out; Ger. kassiren.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The ruling rogue, who dreads to be cashiered,

Contrives, as he is hated, to be feared.”

Swift: Epistle to Mr. Gay, line 137.

Casino

Originally, a little casa or room near a theatre, where persons might retire, after the play was over, for dancing or music.

Casket Homer

Alexander the Great's edition, with Aristotle's corrections. After the battle of Arbela a golden casket, studded with jewels, was found in the tent of Darius. Alexander, being asked to what purpose it should be applied, made answer, “There is but one production in the world worthy of so costly a depository,” and placed therein his edition of Homer, which received from this circumstance the term of Casket Homer.

Caspar

A huntsman who sold himself to Zamiel, the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his lease of life he bargained for three years' respite on condition of bringing Max into the power of the evil one. Zamiel replied, “To—morrow either he or you.” On the day appointed for the trial—shot, Caspar places himself in a tree. Max is told by the prince to aim at a dove. The dove flies to the tree where Caspar is concealed. Max shoots at the dove, but kills Caspar, and Zamiel comes to carry off his victim. (Weber's Opera of Der Freischütz.)

Cassandra

Daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, brought it to pass that no one believed her predictions. (Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida.)

“Those who foresee and predict the downfall, meet with the fate of Cassandra.”— The Times.

Cassation

The court of cassation, in France, is the court which can casser (or quash) the judgment of other courts.

Cassi

Inhabitants of what is now Cassio hundred, Hertfordshire, referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Cassibelan

Great—uncle to Cymbeline. He granted Caesar a yearly tribute of £3,000. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Cassio

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(in Shakespeare's Othello). Michael Cassio was a Florentine, and Othello's lieutenant. Iago made him drunk, and then set on Roderigo to quarrel with him. Cassio wounded Roderigo, and a brawl ensued, which offended Othello. Othello suspended Cassio, but Iago induced Desdemona to plead for his restoration. This interest in Cassio, being regarded by the Moor as a confirmation of Desdemona's illicit love, hinted at broadly by Iago, provoked the jealousy of Othello. After the death of the Moor, Cassio was appointed governor of Cyprus.

Cassiopeia

[the lady in the chair]. The chief stars of this constellation form the outline of a chair. The lady referred to is the wife of Cepheus (2 syl.), King of Ethiopia. She boasted that the beauty of her daughter Andromeda surpassed that of the sea—nymphs. The sea—nymphs complained to the sea god of this affront, and Andromeda, to appease their wrath, was chained to a rock to be devoured by sea—monsters. Perseus (2 syl.) delivered her, and made her his wife. The vain mother was taken to heaven out of the way, and placed among the stars.

“That starred Ethiop queen that strove

To set her beauty's praise above

The sea—nymphs and their powers offended.

Milton: Il Penseroso

N.B.— “Her beauty's praise” means that of her beautiful daughter. Androméda was her mother's “beauty.”

Cassiterides

(5 syl.). The tin islands, generally supposed to be the Scilly Islands and Cornwall, but probably the isles in Vigo Bay are meant. It is said that the Veneti procured tin from Cornwall, and carried it to the Isles of Vigo Bay, but kept as a profound secret the place from which they obtained it. The Phoenicians were the chief customers of the Veneti.

Cast About

(To). To deliberate, to consider, as, “I am casting about me how I am to meet the expenses.” A sporting phrase. Dogs, when they have lost scent, “cast for it,” i.e. spread out and search in different directions to recover it.

Cast Accounts

(To). To balance or keep accounts. To cast up a line of figures is to add them together and set down the sum they produce. To cast or throw the value of one figure into another till the whole number is totalled.

Cast Anchor

(To). To throw out the anchor in order to bring the vessel to a standstill. (Latin, anchoram, jacere.)

Cast Aside

(To). To reject as worthless.

Cast Down

Dejected. (Latin, dejectus.)

Cast a Sheep's Eye at One

(To). To look askance or sideways at one; to look wantonly at one.

Cast beyond the Moon

To form wild conjectures. One of Heywood's proverbs. At one time the moon was supposed to influence the weather, to affect the ingathering of fruits, to rule the time of sowing, reaping, and slaying cattle, etc.

"I talke of things impossible, and cast beyond the moon." Heywood.

Cast in One's Lot

(To). To share the good or bad fortune of another.

Cast into One's Teeth

(To). To throw a reproof at one. The allusion is to knocking one's teeth out by stones.

"All my faults observed, set in a note book,

Learned and conned by rote, to cast into my teeth." Shakespeare: Julius Coesar.

Cast of the Eye

(A). A squint. One meaning of the word cast is to twist or warp. Thus, a fabric is said to "cast" when it warps; and seamen speak of "casting," or turning the head of a ship on the tack it is to sail. We also speak of a "casting" or turning vote.

"My goode bowe clene cast [twisted] on one side."—Ascham: Toxophilus.

Cast Pearls before Swine

(To). If pearls are cast to swine, the swine would only trample them under foot.

Casting Vote

The vote of the presiding officer when the votes of the assembly are equal. This final vote casts, turns, or determines the question.

Castagnette

(Captain). A hero noted for having his stomach replaced by Desgenettes by a leather one. His career is ended by a bomb, which blows him into fragments. An extravaganza from the French of Manuel.

Castaly

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A fountain of Parnassus sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

“The drooping Muses [Sir Industry]

Brought to another Castalie,

Where Isis many a famous nursling breeds,

Or where old Cam soft paces o'er the lea

In pensive mood.”

Thomson: Castle of Indolence,

ii. 21.

“Isis” means the University of Oxford, and “Cam” the University of Cambridge, so called from the respective rivers on which they stand.

Caste

(1 syl.), race. The Portuguese casta. In Sanskrit the word used for the same purpose is varna (colour). The four Hindu castes are Brahmins (the sacred order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaisy'a (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and mechanics). The first issued from the mouth of Brahma, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below these come thirty—six inferior classes, to whom the Vedas are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next. The Jews seem to have entertained the same notion respecting the common people, and hence the Sanhedrim say to the officers, “This people; who know not the law, are cursed.” (John vii. 49.)

To lose caste.

To lose position in society. To get degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle Builder

(A). One who entertains sanguine hopes. One who builds air—castles which have no existence except in a dreamy imagination. (See below.)

Castle in the Air

A splendid edifice, but one which has no existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word, and vanishing as soon, like that built for Aladdin by the Genius of the Lamp. These air—castles are called by the French Châteaux d'Espagne, because Spain has no châteaux. We also find the expression Châteaux en Asie for a similar reason. (See Chateaux .)

Castle of Bungay

(My).

“Were I in my Castle of Bungay

Vpon the riuer of Waueney,

I would ne care for the King of Cockney.”

Attributed to Lord Bigod of Bungay. The lines are in Camden's Britannia (edit. 1607). The events referred to in the ballad belong to the reign of Stephen or Henry II. (See Bar—Sur—Aube, page 100, col. 1.)

Castle of Indolence

In the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner of the castle was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free—will. (Thomson: Castle of Indolence.)

Castle Terabil

(or “Terrible”) in Arthurian legends stood in Launceston. It had a steep keep environed with a triple wall. Sometimes called Dunheved Castle. It was within ten miles of Tintagel.

Castor

A hat. Castor is the Latin for a beaver, and beaver means a hat made of the beaver's skin.

“Tom Trot

Took his new castor from his head.”

Randall: Diary.

Castor and Pollux

What we call comazants. Electric flames sometimes seen in stormy weather playing about the masts of ships. If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it Helen, and said that it portended that the worst of the storm was yet to come; but two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

But when the sons of Leda shed

Their star—lamps on our vessel's head,

The storm—winds cease, the troubled spray

Falls from the rocks, clouds flee away,

And on the bosom of the deep

In peace the angry billows sleep. E. C. B.

Horace: Odes

xii., 27—32.

Castor's Horse

Cyllaros. Virgil ascribes him to Pollux. (Geor., iii.) (See Horse .)

Casuist

(3 syl.). One who resolves casus conscientiae (cases of conscience). M. le Fevre calls casuistry “the art of quibbling with God.”

Casus Belli

(Latin). A ground for war; an occurrence warranting international hostilities.

Cat

Called a “familiar,” from the mediæval superstition that Satan's favourite form was a black cat. Hence “witches” were said to have a cat as their familiar.

Cat.

A symbol of liberty. The Roman goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken sceptre in the other, and with a cat lying at her feet. No animal is so great an enemy to all constraint as a cat.

Cat.

Held in veneration by the Egyptians under the name of Ælurus. This deity is represented with a human body and a cat's head. Diodorus tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death. According to Egyptian tradition, Diana assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

The London Review says the Egyptians worshipped the cat as a symbol of the moon, not only because it is more active after sunset, but from the dilation and contraction of its pupil, symbolical of the waxing and waning of the night—goddess. (See Puss.)

Hang me in a bottle like a cat.

(Much Ado about Nothing, i. I.) In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Steevens tells us of another sport: “A cat was placed in a soot bag, and hung on a line; the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag without getting besmudged, and he who succeeded in so doing was allowed to hunt the cat afterwards.

Some ... are mad if they behold a cat.

(Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.) Henri III. of France swooned if he caught sight of a cat, and Napoleon I. showed a morbid horror of the same; so did one of the Ferdinands, Emperor of Germany. (See Antipathy, page 53; Pig.)

Cat—call

A kind of whistle used at theatres by the audience to express displeasure or impatience. A hideous noise like the call or waul of a cat.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“I was very much surprised with the great consort of cat—calls ... to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together at a kind of caterwauling.”— Addison, Spectator, No. 361.

Cat—eyed

Able to see in the dark. Cat's eye is an opalescent mineral gem.

Cat Jumps

(The). See how the cat jumps, “which way the wind blows”; which of two alternatives is likely to be the successful one before you give any opinion of its merit or adhesion to it, either moral or otherwise. The allusion is to the game called tip—cat. Before you strike, you must observe which way the “cat” has jumped up.

We are told that our forefathers had a cruel sport, which consisted in placing a cat in a tree as a mark to shoot at. A wily sportsman would, of course, wait to see which way it jumped before he shot at her. This sort of sport was very like that of hanging two cats by their tails over a rope. (See page 224, Kilkenny Cat.)

“He soon saw which way the cat did jump,

And his company he offered plump.”

The Dog's—meat Man

(See Universal Songster, 1825.)

Cat Stane

Battle stone. A monolith in Scotland (sometimes wrongly called a Druidical stone). The Norwegian term, bauta stein, means the same thing. (Celtic, cath, battle.)

Cat and Dog

To live a cat and dog life. To be always snarling and quarrelling, as a cat and dog, whose aversion to each other is intense.

“There will be jealousies, and a cat—and—dog life over yonder worse than ever” — Carlyle: Frederick the Great (vol. ii. book ix. p. 346.).

It is raining cats and dogs.

Very heavily. We sometimes say, “It is raining pitchforks.” which is the French locution, “Il tombe des hallebardes”

. Next page

Cat and Fiddle

a public—house sign, is a corruption of Caton le fidele, meaning Caton, Governor of Calais.

Cat and Kittens

A public—house sign, alluding to the pewter—pots so called. Stealing these pots is termed “Cat and kitten sneaking.” We still call a large kettle a kitchen, and speak of a soldier's kit (Saxon, cytel, a pot, pan, or vessel generally.)

Cat and Tortoise

or Boar and Sow. Names given to the testudo.

Cat has nine Lives

(A). (See under Nine .)

Cat i' the Adage

(The). The adage referred to is, the cat loves fish, but does not like to wet her paws. Letting `I dare not' wait upon `I would,'

Like the poor cat i' the adage.”

Shakespeare Macbeth,

i.7

Cat may look at a King

(A). An insolent remark of insubordination, meaning, “I am as good as you”, or “Are you too mighty to be spoken to or looked at?” “You may wear stars and ribbons, and I may be dressed in hodden grey, but a man's a man for a' that.”

Cat—o'—nine—tails

A whip, first with three, then with six, and lastly with nine lashes, used for punishing offenders, and briefly called a cat. Lilburn was scourged, in 1637, with a whip having only three lashes, but there were twenty knots in each tail, and, as he received a lash every three paces between the Fleet and Old Palace Yard, Cook says that 60,000 stripes were inflicted. Titus Oates was scourged, in the reign of James II., with a cat having six lashes, and, between Newgate and Tyburn, received as many as 17,000 lashes. The cat—o'—nine—tails once used in the British army and navy is no longer employed there, but garotters and some other offenders are still scourged. Probably the punishment was first used on board ship, where ropes would be handy, and several ropes are called cats, as “cat—harpings,” for bracing the shrouds, “cat—falls,” which pass over the cat—head and communicate with the cat—block. etc. The French martinet (q.v.) had twelve leather thongs.

Cat Proverbs

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than other animals, because it generally lights upon its feet without injury, the foot and toes being padded so as to break the fall. (See Nine .)

“Tub What wouldst thou have with me?”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Mer.

Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives.” Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.

All cats love fish.

(See previous column, Cat I' The Adage.)

Before the cat can lick her ear — i.e.

before the Greek kalends. Never. No cat can lick her ear. (See Never.)

Care killed the cat. (See page 216, 2, Care.)

In the dark all cats are gray.

All persons are undistinguished till they have made a name. Not room to swing a cat. Swinging cats as a mark for sportsmen was at one time a favourite amusement. There were several varieties of this diversion. Sometimes two cats were swung by their tails over a rope. Sometimes a cat was swung to the bough of a tree in a bag or sack. Sometimes it was enclosed in a leather bottle.

Sick as a cat.

Cats are very subject to vomiting. Hence the vomit of a drunkard is called “a cat,” and the act of discarding it is called “shooting the cat.”

Let the cat out of the bag.

To disclose a secret. It was formerly a trick among country folk to substitute a cat for a sucking—pig, and bring it in a bag to market. If any greenhorn chose to buy a “pig in a poke” without examination, all very well; but if he opened the sack, “he let the cat out of the bag,” and the trick was disclosed.

“She let the cat out of her bag of verse ... she almost proposed to her hero in rhyme.” George Meredith: The Egotist, iii.

To bell the cat.

(See page 119, Bell.)

To turn cat—in—pan.

To turn traitor, to be a turncoat. The phrase seems to be the French tourner cote en peine (to turn sides in trouble). I do not think it refers to turning pancakes.

“When George in pudding—time came o'er

And moderate men looked big, sir.

I turned a cat—in—pan once more.

And so became a Whig, sir.”

Vicar of Bray.

Bacon says, "There is a cunning which we in England call the turning of the cat in the pan; which is, when that which a man says to another, he says it as if another had said it to him."

Touch not a cat but a glove.

Here "but" is used in its original meaning of "beout," i.e. without. (For another example of "but" meaning without, see Amos iii. 7.) The words are the motto of Mackintosh, whose crest is

"cat—a—mountain salient guardant proper"; supporters, two cats proper. The whole is a pun on the word Catti, the Teutonic settlers of Caithness, i.e. Catti—ness, and mean, "Touch not the clan Cattan or Mountain Cat without a glaive." The same words are the adopted motto of Grant of Ballindalloch, and are explained by the second motto, ensë et animo.

In French: On ne prend pas tel chat sans moufles.

What can you have of a cat but her skin?

The thing is useless for any purpose but one. In former times the cat's fur was used for trimming cloaks and coats, but the flesh is utterly useless.

Who ate the cat?

A gentleman who had his larder frequently assailed by bargees, had a cat cooked and placed there as a decoy. It was taken like the other foods, and became a standing jest against these larder pilferers.

A Cheshire cat. He grins like a Cheshire cat.

Cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire moulded like a cat. The allusion is to the grinning cheese—cat, but is applied to persons who show their teeth and gums when they laugh. (See Alice in Wonderland.)

A Kilkenny cat.

The story is that, during the rebellion of Ireland, Kilkenny was garrisoned by a troop of Hessian soldiers, who amused themselves in barracks by tying two cats together by their tails and throwing them across a clothes—line to fight. The officers, hearing of this, resolved to put a stop to the practice. The look—out man, enjoying the sport, did not observe the officer on duty approaching the barracks; but one of the troopers, more quick—sighted, seizing a sword, cut the two tails, and the cats made their escape. When the officer inquired the meaning of the two bleeding tails, he was coolly told that two cats had been fighting and had devoured each other all but the tails.

Whatever the true story, it is certain that the municipalities of Kilkenny and Irishtown contended so stoutly about their respective boundaries and rights to the end of the seventeenth century, that they mutually impoverished each other, leaving little else than "two tails" behind.

Whittington's cat.

A cat is a ship formed on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. It is strongly built, and used in the coal trade. Harrison speaks of it as a "cat" or “catch.” According to tradition, Sir Richard Whittington made his money by trading in coals, which he conveyed in his “cat” from Newcastle to London. The black faces of his coal—heavers gave rise to the tale about the Moors. In confirmation of this suggestion, it may be added that Whittington was Lord Mayor in 1397, and coal was first made an article of trade from Newcastle to London in 1381.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cat's Cradle

A child's play, with a piece of twine. Corrupt for cratchcradle or manger cradle, in which the infant Saviour was laid. Cratch is the French crèche (a rack or manger), and to the present hour the racks which stand in fields for cattle to eat from are called cratches.

Cat's Foot

To live under the cat's foot. To be under petticoat government; to be henpecked. A mouse under the paw of a cat lives but by sufferance and at the cat's pleasure.

Cat's Melody

(The). Squalling.

“The children were playing the cat's melody to keep their mother in countenance.” — W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 238.

Cat's Paw

To be made a cat's paw of, i.e. the tool of another, the medium of doing another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get from the fire some roasted chestnuts, and took the paw of the cat to get them from the hot ashes.

“I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to draw European chestnuts out of the fire.” — Com.

Rodgers.

At sea, light air during a calm causing a ripple on the water, and indicating a storm, is called by sailors a cat's paw, and seamen affirm that the frolics of a cat indicate a gale. These are relics of a superstition that cats are witches or demons in disguise.

Cat's Sleep

A sham sleep, like that of a cat watching a mouse.

Cats

Mistress Tofts, the singer, left legacies at death to twenty cats.

“Not Niobê mourned more for fourteen brats,

Nor Mistress Tofts, to leave her twenty cats.”

Peter Pindar: Old Simon.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Catacomb

A subterranean place for the burial of the dead. The Persians have a city they call Comb or Coom, full of mausoleums and the sepulchres of the Persian saints. (Greek, kata—kumbe, a hollow place underground.) (See Koom.)

“The most awful idea connected with the catacombs is their interminable extent, and the possibility of going astray in the labyrinth of darkness.” — Hawthorne: Marble Faun, iii.

Cataian

(3 syl.). A native of Cathay or China; outlandish, a foreigner generally, a liar.

“I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man.” — Shakespeare: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Catalogue Raisonne

(French). A catalogue of books arranged under subjects.

Catamaran

A scraggy old woman, a vixen; so called by a play on the first syllable. It properly means a raft consisting of three sticks, lashed together with ropes; used on the coasts of Coromandel and Madras.

“No, you old catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels. ...” — Thackeray: Lovel the Widower, chap. i.

Cataphrygians

Christian heretics, who arose in the second century; so called because the first lived in Phrygia. They followed the errors of Montanus.

Catarrh

A cold in the head. The word means a down—running; from the Greek katarrheo (to flow down).

Catastrophe

(4 syl.). A turning upside down. The termination of a drama is always a “turning upside down” of the beginning of the plot. (Greek, kata—strephe.)

Catch

To lie upon the catch. To lie in wait “Quid me captas?”

“They sent certain of the Pharisees ... to catch Him in His words.” — Mark xii. Here the Greek word is, to take by hunting. They were to lie upon the catch till they found occasion against Him.

You'll catch it.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

You'll get severely punished. Here "it" stands for the indefinite punishment, such as a whipping, a scolding, or other unpleasant consequence.

Catch a Crab

(To). In rowing, is to be struck with the handle of one's oar; to fall backwards. This occurs when the rower leaves his oar too long in the water before repeating the stroke. In Italian granchio is a crab, and pigliar il granchia is to "catch a crab," or a Tartar.

Catch a Tartar

The biter bit. Grose says an Irish soldier in the Imperial service, in a battle against the Turks, shouted to his comrade that he had caught a Tartar. "Bring him along, then," said his mate. "But he won't come," cried Paddy. "Then come along yourself," said his comrade. "Arrah!" replied Paddy, "I wish I could, but he won't let me."

"We are like the man who boasted of having caught a Tartar, when the fact was that the Tartar had caught him." — Cautions for the Times.

Catch as Catch can Get by hook or crook all you can.

"All must catch that catch can." — Johnson: Rambler, No. 197.

Catch Me at It!

Most certainly I shall never do what you say.

"`Catch me going to London!' exclaimed Vixen." — Miss Braddon: Vixen.

Catch the Speaker's Eye

(To). To find the eye of the Speaker fixed on you; to be observed by the Speaker. In the House of Commons the member on whom the eye of the Speaker is fixed has the privilege of addressing the House.

"He succeeded in catching the Speaker's eye." — A. Trollope.

Catch Out

(To). In cricket, is to catch the ball of a batsman, whereby the striker is ruled out, that is, must relinquish his bat.

Catch your Hare

(First). It is generally believed that "Mrs. Glasse," in her Cookery Book, gave this direction; but the exact words are, "Take your hare when it is cased, and make a pudding, ... etc." To "case" means to take off the skin. Thus, in All's Well that Ends Well, iii. 6, we have these words, "We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him." Scatch also means to skin, and this word gave rise to the misquoted catch. Though scatch and case both mean to skin, yet the word used in the book referred to is case, not scatch. Mrs. Glasse was the penname of Dr. John Hill (1716—1775), author of The Cookery Book. (See Case .)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bracton, however (book iv. tit. i. chap. xxi. sec. 4), has these words: "Vulgariter dicitur, quod primo oportet cervum capere, et postea (cum captus fuerit) illum excoriare."

The Welsh word cach = ordure, dung, and to cach (cachu) would be to clean and gut the hare.

Catch—Club

A member of the Catchclub. A bum—bailiff, a tipstaff, a constable. The pun is obvious.

Catchpenny

A worthless article puffed off to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy them.

Catchpole

A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. Pole or poll means head, person; and the word means one who catches persons by the poll or neck. This was done by means of an instrument something like a shepherd's crook.

"Cacchepoles, from catch and pole, because these officers lay hold of a man's neck." — Wiclif: New Testament (Acts xvi., Glossary).

Catch Weights

in racing, means without restrictions as to weight.

Catch—word

A popular cry, a word or a phrase adopted by any party for political or other purposes. "Three acres and a cow," "A living wage," are examples.

Catch—word

The first word on any page of a book or manuscript which is printed or written at the foot of the preceding page. In the early days of printing the catch—word was generally used, but for the last two hundred years the practice has been gradually dying out. Its purpose was, among other things, to enable the reader to avoid an awkward pause when turning over a leaf. The first book so printed was a Tacitus, by John de Spira, 1469.

Catch—word In theatrical parlance, is the last word or so of the previous speaker, which is the cue of the person who follows.

Catechumen

[kat'y—kumen]. One taught by word of mouth (Greek, katechoumenos). Those about to be baptised in the early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechised on their religious faith and duties.

Cater—cousin

An intimate friend; a remote kinsman. (French, quatre cousin, a fourth cousin).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“His master and he, saving your worship's reverence, are scarce cater—cousins.” — Shake— speare Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

Caterpillars

Soldiers. In 1745 a soldier, quartered at Derby, was desired by the landlord to call on him whenever he passed that way, for added Boniface, “I consider soldiers the pillars of the state.” When the rebellion was put down, it so happened that the same regiment was quartered in Derby, and the soldier called on his old host, but was very coldly and somewhat uncivilly received. The soldier reminded Boniface of what he said at parting — “I consider soldiers the pillars of the state.” “Did I say so?” said mine host, “Well, I meant cater—pillars.”

Caterwauling

The wawl or wrawl of cats, the er being either a plural, similar to “childer” (children), or a corrupted genitive.

“What a caterwauling do you keep here!” —

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night,

ii. 3.

Catgut

A contracted form of cattlegut, especially sheep. Another form is catling—gut, i.e. cattle—ing gut. In Gen. xxx. 40 we read that Jacob did separate “his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle [i.e. sheep].” Again, in xxxi. 9, Jacob said, “God hath taken away the cattle [sheep and lambs] of your father, and given them to me;” and verse 43 he says, “These cattle [sheep and lambs] are my cattle.”

Musical strings never were made from the gut of a cat.

Catgut Scraper

(A). A fiddler.

Cathari

Novatian heretics. The Waldenses were subsequently so called. (Ducange vol. ii. p. 288, col. 2.)

Catharine

To braid St. Catharine's tresses. To live a virgin.

“Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catha— rine's tresses” Longfellow Evangeline.

Catharine

(Knights of St), 1714. A Russian military order founded by Peter the Great after his naval victory of Aland, and so named in compliment to his wife Catharine.

Catharine of Russia

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A sutler. When Czar Peter wished to marry her, it was needful to make her of noble birth; so a private person was first converted into her brother, and then into a great lord by birth. Hence Catharine, being the sister of a “great lord,” was made fit to be the wife of the Czar. (De Cuisine Russia, chap.

iv.)

Catharine Theot (1725—1795). A visionary born at Avranches, who gave herself out to be (like Joanna Southcott) the mother of God, and changed her name Theot into Theos (God). She preached in Paris in 1794, at the very time that the worship of the Supreme Being was instituted, and declared that Robespierre was the forerunner of the WORD. The Comité de la Sûreté Générale had her arrested, and she was guillotined. Catharine Theot was called by Dom Gerle “la mère de dieu,” and Catharine called Robespierre “her wellbeloved son and chief prophet.”

Catharine Wheel

(A). A sort of firework. (See below.)

Catharine Wheels

To turn Catharine Wheels. To turn head over heels on the hands. Boys in the streets, etc., often do so to catch a penny or so from trippers and others.

A Catharine—wheel window.

A wheel—window, sometimes called a rose—window, with radiating divisions. St. Catharine was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the Emperor Maximinus, for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel like that of a chaff—cutter.

Catharine—wheel Politicians

Lovers of political changes.

Catharine—wheel Republics

“Republics,” says Mr. Lowell, “always in revolution while the powder lasts.”

Catharists

A sect of the Manicheans; so called from their professed purity of faith. (Greek, katharos, pure.) They maintained that matter is the source of all evil; that Christ had not a real body; that the human body is incapable of newness of life; and that the sacraments do not convey grace. (See Ducange: vol. ii. p. 289, col.

1.)

Cathay'

China, or rather Tartary, the capital of which was Albracca, according to Orlando Furioso. It was called Khita'i by the Tartars, and China was first entered by Europeans in the Middle Ages from the side of Tartary.

“Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." Tennyson: Locksley Hall.

Cathedræ Molles

(Latin). Luxurious women. Properly, soft chairs. The cathedra was a chair for women, like our ottoman: and Juvenal applies the soft chair used by women of dainty habits to the women who use them

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation

Those which have never been monastic, but which have ab initio been governed by a dean and chapter, with the statutable dignities of precentor, chancellor, and treasurer.

Catherans

or Caterans. Highland freebooters or marauders. (Lowland Scotch, catherein, peasantry.)

Catherine

(See Catharine .)

Catholic

(The). "Catholicus," a title inherited by the King of Spain; as the monarch of England is entitled "Fidei Defensor," and the King of France was styled "Christianissimus." (See page 228, Catholic Majesty .)

Catholic Association

(The), 1756. The first Catholic Association was formed for the purpose of obtaining relief from disabilities. In 1760 the association was re—established on a more representative basis, but it became moribund in 1763. Another association was organised in 1773, which fell under the control of Lord Kenmare; this society was broken up 1783. In 1793 a new society was formed on a still wider basis, and Wolfe Tone was elected secretary. In 1793 the Catholic Relief Bill received the Royal Assent. In Ireland, 1823; suppressed 1825 (6 Geo. iv. c. 4); dissolved itself February, 1829. The association was first suggested by Daniel O'Connell at a dinner—party given by Mr. O'Mara at Glancullen, and on Monday, May 12th, the first meeting of the association was held in Dempsey's Rooms, Sackville Street. It became one of the most powerful popular movements ever organised. The objects were: (1) to forward petitions to Parliament; (2) to afford relief to Catholics assailed by Orange lodges; (3) to support a Liberal press both in Dublin and London;

(4) to circulate cheap publications; (5) to aid the Irish Catholics of America; and (6) to aid English Catholics. Indirectly it undertook the repeal of the Union, and the redress of Irish grievances generally. Everyone who paid 1d. a month was a member. (See Catholic Emancipation.)

Catholic Church

(The). The Church considered as a whole, as distinguished from parish churches. When the Western Church broke off from the Eastern, the Eastern Church called itself the Orthodox Church, and the Western Church adopted the term Catholic. At the Reformation the Western Church was called by the Reformers the Roman Catholic Church, and the British Established Church was called the "Protestant Church," the "Reformed National Church," or the "Anglo—Catholic Church." It is foolish and misleading to call the Anglican Church the Catholic Church, as at most it is only a branch thereof. No Protestant would think of calling himself a Catholic.

Catholic Emancipation Act

(The). 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, April 13th, 1829, whereby Catholics were admitted to all corporate offices, and to an equal enjoyment of all municipal rights. The army and navy had been already opened to them. They were, however, excluded from the following offices: (1) Regent; (2) Chancellor of England or Ireland; (3) Viceroy of Ireland; (4) all offices connected with the Church, universities, and public schools; and (5) the disposal of Church patronage.

Catholic Epistles

(The) of the New Testament are those Epistles not addressed to any particular church or individual. Conventionally they are seven— viz. 1 James, 2 Peter, 1 Jude, and 3 John; but 2 John is addressed to a “lady,” and 3 John to Gaius, and, of course, are not Catholic Epistles either in matter or otherwise.

Catholic King

(The) or His Catholic Majesty. A title given by the Pope to Ferdinand, King of Aragon (1452, 1474—1516), for expelling the Moors from Spain. This was about as unwise as the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

Catholic League

(The), 1614. A confederacy of Catholics to counter—balance the Evangelic League (q.v.) of Bohemia. The two Leagues kept Germany in perpetual disturbance, and ultimately led to the Thirty Years' War (1618—1648).

Catholic Majesty

759. A title given by Gregory III. to Alfonso I., King of Asturias.

Catholic Relief

(See Catholic Association .)

Catholic Rent

(The), 1823. The subscription of 1d. per month towards the expenses of the Catholic Association (q.v.).

Catholic Roll

(The). A document which each Roman Catholic was obliged to swear to on taking his seat as a Member of Parliament. It was abolished, and a single oath prescribed to all members by the 29, 30 Victoria, c. 19 (1866).

Catholicon

A panacea'a. (Greek, katholicon iama, a universal remedy.)

“Meanwhile, permit me to recommend,

As the matter admits of no delay,

My wonderful catholicon.”

Longfellow: The Golden Legend, i.

Catholicos

The head of the Assyrian Nestorians. Now called the Patriarch of Armenia.

Catiline's Conspiracy Lucius Sergius Catilina, B.C. 64, conspired with a large number of dissolute young nobles to plunder the Roman treasury, extirpate the senate, and fire the capitol. Cicero, who was consul, got full information of the plot, and delivered his first Oration against Catiline November 8th, 63, whereupon Catiline quitted Rome. Next day Cicero delivered his second Oration, and several of the conspirators were arrested. On December 4th Cicero made his third Oration, respecting what punishment should be accorded to the conspirators. And on December 5th, after his fourth Oration, sentence of death was passed. Catiline tried to escape into Gaul, but, being intercepted, he was slain fighting, B.C. 64.

Catilines

and Cethegi (The). Synonyms for conspirators who hope to mend their fortunes by rebellion.

“The intrigues of a few impoverished Catilines and Cethegi.”— Motley: Dutch Republic.

Catius

In Pope's Moral Essays (Epist. i.), intended for Charles Dartineuf, a kind of Lucullus, who preferred “A rogue with venison to a rogue without.”

Catkins

The inflorescence of hazel, birch, willow, and some other trees; so called from their resemblance to a cat's tail.

“See the yellow catkins cover

All the slender willows over.”

Mary Howitt: Voice of Spring, stanza 2.

Cat—lap

Milk or weak tea, only fit for the cat to lap.

“A more accomplished old woman never drank cat—lap.”— Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xii.

Cato

He is a Cato. A man of simple life, severe morals, self—denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, and of undoubted patriotism, like the Roman censor of that name.

Cato—Street Conspiracy

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A scheme entertained by Arthur Thistlewood and his fellow—conspirators to overthrow the Government by assassinating the Cabinet Ministers. So called from Cato Street, where their meetings were held. (1820.)

The other names of these conspirators are Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, Monument, Tidd, and Wilson. All eight were sent to the Tower, March 3rd, 1820, by warrant of the Secretary of State.

Catsup

or Ketchup. The Eastern kitjap (soy sauce).

Catted

The anchor hung on the cathead, a piece of timber outside the ship to which the anchor is hung to keep it clear of the ship.

“The decks were all life and commotion; the sailors on the forecastle singing, ‘Ho! cheerly. men’ as they catted the anchor.”—H. Melville:

Omoo, xxxvi. p. 191.

Catual

Chief minister of the Zamorin or ancient sovereign of India.

“Begirt with high—plumed nobles, by the flood

The first great minister of India stood,

His name ‘the Catual’ in India’s tongue.”

Camoens: Lusiad, book vii.

Catum

(Al) [the strong]. A bow which fell into the hands of Mahomet when the property of the Jews of Medina was confiscated. In the first battle the prophet drew it with such force that it snapped in two.

Catwater

The estuary of the Plym (Plymouth). A corruption of château (chat—eau); as the castle at the mouth of the Plym used to be called.

Caucasians

according to Blumenbach’s ethnological system, represent the European or highest type of the human race, so called from Caucasus, the mountainous range. Whilst the professor was studying ethnology, he was supplied with a skull from these regions, which he considered the standard of the human type.

Caucus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A meeting of citizens in America to agree upon what members they intend to support, and to concert measures for carrying out their political wishes. The word arose from the caulkers of Boston, who had a dispute with the British soldiers a little before the Revolution. Several citizens were killed, and meetings were held at the caulkers' house or caulk—house, to concert measures for redress of grievances.

“The whole Fenian affair is merely a caucus in disguise.”— The Times.

“This day the caucus club meets ... in the garret of Tom Dawes, the adjutant of the Boston regiment.”— John Adams: Diary, vol. ii. p. 164, February, 1763.

Caudine Forks

A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius fell into the hands of the Samnites, and were made to pass under the yoke.

“Hard as it was to abandon an enterprise so very dear to him ... he did not hesitate to take the more prudent course of passing under (sic) the Caudine Forks of the Monroe doctrine, and leave Maximilian and the French bondholders to their fate.”— Standard, Nov. 17th, 1866.

Caudle

is any sloppy mess, especially that sweet mixture given by nurses to gossips who call to see the baby during the first month. The word simply means something warm. (Latin, calidus; French, chaudeau, Italian, caldo.)

Caudle

(Mrs.) A curtain lecturer. The term is derived from a series of papers by Douglas Jerrold, which were published in Punch. These papers represent Job Caudle as a patient sufferer of the curtain lectures of his nagging wife.

Caught Napping

(To be). To suffer some disadvantage while off one's guard. Pheasants, hares, and other animals are sometimes surprised “napping.” I have myself caught a cock—pheasant napping.

Caul

The membrane on the heads of some new—born infants, supposed to be a charm against death by drowning.

To be born with a caul was with the Romans tantamount to our phrase, “To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth,” meaning “born to good luck.” M. Francisque—Michel, in his Philologie—Comparée, p. 83, 4, says: “Calle, espèce de coiffure, est synonyme de coiffé,” and quotes the proverb, “Ste. Migorce! nous sommes nées coiffées.” (La Comédie des Proverbes, act ii. 4.)

Cauld—lad

(The) of Hilton Hall. A house—spirit, who moved about the furniture during the night. Being resolved to banish him, the inmates left for him a green cloak, and hood, before the kitchen—fire, which so delighted him that he never troubled the house any more; but sometimes he might be heard singing—

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Here's a cloak, and here's a hood,

The cauld—lad of Hilton will do no more good.”

Cauline

(Sir) (2 syl.). A knight who lived in the palace of the King of Ireland, and “used to serve the wine.” He fell in love with Christabelle, the king's daughter, who plighted her troth to him secretly, for fear of the king. The king discovered the lovers in a bower, and banished Sir Cauline. After a time an eldridge came, and demanded the lady in marriage. Sir Cauline slew the “Soldain,” but died of the wounds received in the combat; and the fair Christabelle died of grief, having “burst her gentle hearte in twayne.” (Percy's Reliques, iv.)

Caurus

or Corus. The west—north—west wind, which blew from Caurus (Argestes).

“The ground by piercing Caurus seared.”

Thomson: Castle of Indolence.

ii. 78.

Causa Causans

The initiating cause; the primary cause.

Causa Causata

The cause which owes its existence to the “causa causans”; the secondary cause. The vera causa is (a) the immediate predecessor of an effect; (b) a cause verifiable by independent evidence. (Mill.)

In theology God is the causa causans, and creation the causa causata. The presence of the sun above the horizon is the vera causa of daylight, and his withdrawal below the horizon is the vera causa of night.

Cause

(The). A mission; the object or project. To make common cause. To abet the same object. Here “cause” is the legal term, meaning pro or con, as it may be, the cause or side of the question advocated.

Cause Celebre

Any famous law case.

Causes

Aristotelian causes are these four: (1) The Efficient Cause. That which immediately produces the effect. (2) The Material Cause. The matter on which (1) works.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3) The Formal Cause. The Essence or "Form" (= group of attributes) introduced into the matter by the efficient cause. (4) The Final or Ultimate Cause. The purpose or end for which the thing exists or the causal change takes place. But God is called the ultimate Final Cause, since, according to Aristotle, all things tend, so far as they can, to realise some Divine attribute.

God is also called The First Cause, or the Cause Causeless, beyond which even imagination cannot go.

Cautelous

Cautious, cunning, treacherous. (Latin, cautela; French, cauteleux; Spanish, cauteloso.)

"Caught with cautelous baits."

Shakespeare: Coriolanus,

iv. 1.

"Swear priests and cowards and men cautelous."

Shakespeare Julius Cæsar,

ii. 1.

Cauther

(Al). The lake of Paradise, the waters of which are sweet as honey, cold as snow, and clear as crystal. He who once tastes thereof will never thirst again. (The Koran.)

Caution Money

A sum deposited before entering college, by way of security.

Cautser

(See Cauther .)

Cava

Cava's traitor sire. Cava or Florinda was the daughter of St. Julian. It was the violation of Cava by Roderick that brought about the war between the Goths and the Moors. St. Julian, to avenge his daughter, turned traitor to Roderick, and induced the Moors to invade Spain. King Roderick was slain Xeres on the third day. (A.D. 711.)

Cavalerie a Pied

The Zouaves (pronounce zwav) and Zephyrs of the French army are so called because of their fleetness and swiftness of foot.

Cavalier

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.). A horseman; whence a knight, a gentleman. (Latin, caballus, a horse.)

The Cavalier.

Eon de Beaumont, the French soldier; Chevalier d'Eon. (1728—1810.) Charles Breydel, the Flemish landscape painter. (1677—1744.) Francesco Cairo (Cavaliere del Cairo), historian. (1598—1674.)

Jean le Clerc, le chevalier. (1587—1633.)

J. Battista Marini, Italian poet; Il cavalier (1569—1656).

Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686—1743).

Cavalier

or Chevalier de St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called “the Pretender,” or “the Old Pretender” (1688—1765). The Young Cavalier or the Bonnie Chevalier. Edward, the “Young Pretender” (1720—1785).

Cavalier Servant

in Italian cicisbe'o, and in Spanish cortejo. A gentleman that chaperones married ladies.

“Coach, servants, gondola, he goes to call,

And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl.”

Byron: Beppo, st. xi.

Cavaliers

Adherents of Charles I. Those of the opposing Parliament party were called Roundheads (q.v.).

Cavall' “King Arthur's hound of deepest mouth.” (Idylls of the King; Enid.)

Cave—dwellers

(See page 157, col. 1, Bohemian Bretheren .)

Cave In

Shut up! have done! I'll cave in his head (break it). His fortune has caved in (has failed). The bank has caved in (come to a smash). The affair caved in (fell through). Common American expressions.

In the lead diggings, after a shaft has been sunk, the earth round the sides falls or caves in, unless properly boarded; and if the mine does not answer, no care is taken to prevent a caving in.

Cave ne literas Bellerophontis adferras

Take care that the letter you carry is not a warrant for your death. (See page 121, col. 1, Bellerophon .)

Cave of Achadh Aldai

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A cairn in Ireland, so called from Aldai, the ancestor of the Tuatha de Danaan kings.

Cave of Adullam

(The). (See page 17, col. 1, Adullamites .)

Cave of Mammon

The abode of the god of wealth in Spenser's Faërie Queene, ii. 7.

Caveat

(3 syl.) To enter a caveat. To give legal notice that the opponent is not to proceed with the suit in hand until the party giving the notice has been heard; to give a warning or admonition.

Caveat Emptor

The buyer must be responsible for his own free act. Let the buyer keep his eyes open, for the bargain he agrees to is binding. In English law, Chief Justice Tindal modified this rule. He said if the buyer gives notice that he relies on the vendor's judgment, and the vendor warrants the article, then the vendor is bound to furnish an article "reasonable and fit for the purpose required."

Cavell

or Cavel. A parcel or allotment of land measured by a cord or cable. (German, kabel, whence kaveln, to assign by lot.)

Cavendish Tobacco

An American brand of chewing or smoking tobacco, prepared for use by softening, sweetening with molasses, and pressing into plugs. Called "Cavendish" from the original manufacturer.

Caviare

(3 syl.). Caviare to the general. Above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people. Caviare is a kind of pickle made from the roe of sturgeons, much esteemed in Muscovy. It is a dish for the great, but beyond the reach of the general public. (Hamlet, ii. 2.)

"All popular talk about lacustrine villages and flint implements ... is caviare to the multitude."— Pall Mall Gazette.

Cavo—rilievo

"Relief," cut below the original surface, the highest parts of the figure being on a level with the surface. Also called Intaglio—rilievato (pronounce cah'—vo—rel—ye'—vo).

Caxon

A worn—out wig; also a big cauliflower wig, worn out or not. It has been suggested that the word is from the proper name, but nothing whatever is known about such a person.

“People scarce could decide on its phiz,
Which looked wisest— the caxon or jowl.

Peter Pindar: The Portfolio.

C.D

i.e. Cætera desunt (Latin). The rest [of the MS.] is wanting.

Cean

The Cean poet. Simonides, of Ceos.

“The Cean and the Teian muse.”

Byron: Don Juan (The Poet's Song).

Ceca to Mecca

(From). From one end of the world to the other; from pillar to post. It is a Spanish phrase meaning to roam about purposelessly. Ceca and Mecca are two places visited by Mohammedan pilgrims. (Compare: From Dan to Beersheba; and From Land's End to John o' Groat's.)

“`Let us return home,' said Sancho, `no longer ramble about from Ceca to Mecca.'” — Cervantes; Don Quixote, I. iii. 4.

Cecilia

(St.). A Roman lady who underwent martyrdom in the third century. She is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; she is also patroness of musicians, and “inventor of the organ.”

“At length divine Cecilia came,

Inventress of the vocal frame.”

Dryden: Alexander's Feast.

According to tradition, an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. Her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from Paradise. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honour, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers:

“He [Timotheus] raised a mortal to the skies,”

She [Cecilia] brought an angel down.”

Dryden: Alexander's Feast.

Cecil's Fast

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A dinner off fish. W. Cecil (Lord Burleigh) introduced a Bill to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days in order to restore the fish trade.

Ced

Kêd, or Ceridwen. The Arkite goddess or Ceres of the Britons.

“I was first modelled into the form of a pure man in the hall of Ceridwen, who subjected me to penance.”—Taliesin (Davies's Translation).

Cedar

Curzon says that Solomon cut down a cedar, and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda used to stand. A few days before the crucifixion, this cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was employed as the upright of the Saviour's cross. (Monasteries of the Levant.) (See Cross .)

Cedilla

The mark under a French sibilant c. This mark is the letter z, and the word is from the Italian zediglia (“zeticula,” a little z. (Greek, zeta; Spanish, ceda, with a diminutive.)

Ceelict

(St.) or St. Calixtus, whose day is the 14th of October, the day of the Battle of Hastings. Brown Willis tells us there was a tablet once in Battle parish church with these words:

“This place of war is Battle called, because in battle here

Quite conquered and o'erthrown the English nation were. This slaughter happenèd to them upon St. Ceelict's day,” etc.

Ceinture de la Reine

The octroi levied at Paris, which at one time was the queen's pin—money or private purse.

Celadon

The lover of Amelia, a “matchless beauty.” Being overtaken by a storm, Amelia became alarmed, but Celadon, folding her in his arms, exclaimed, “`Tis safety to be near thee, sure, and thus to clasp perfection.” As he spoke, a flash of lightning struck Amelia dead. (Thomson: The Seasons; Summer.)

Celandine a shepherdess in love with Marina. Finding his suit too easily granted, he waxed cold, and discarded the “matchless beauty.” (W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals; 1613.)

Celestial City

(The). Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress.

Celestial Empire

(The). China; so called because the first emperors were all celestial deities

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Celestians

Followers of Celestius, disciple of Pelagius. St. Jerome calls him “a blockhead swollen with Scotch pottage”—Scotch being, in this case, what we now call Irish.

Cella

[heavenliness]. Mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness. (Spenser Faërie Queene, bk. i. 10.)

Celia

or Cælia. A common poetical name for a lady or lady—love. Thus, Swift had an ode in which Strephon describes Cælia's dressing—room.

“Five hours, and who can do it less in

By haughty Cælia spent in dressing.”

Celt

A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge—like shape, with a cutting edge. Used, before the employment of bronze and iron, for knives, hatchets, and chisels.

Celts

(The), or The Kelts. This family of nations includes the Irish, Erse, Manx, Welsh, Cornish, and Low Bretons. According to historic fable, Celtina was the daughter of Britannus. She had a son by Hercules, named Celtus, the progenitor of the Celts.

Cemetery

properly means a sleeping—place. The Jews used to speak of death as sleep. The Persians call their cemeteries “The Cities of the Silent.” The Greeks thought it unlucky to pronounce the name of Death. (Greek, koiheterion.)

Cenobites

(3 syl.). Monks. So called because they live in common. Hermits and anchorites are not cenobites, as they live alone. (Greek, koihobioles)

Cenomanni

The inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Cenotaphs

The most noted in ancient times— ÆNEAS to Deiphobus (Æneid, 1. 6: v. 505).

ANDROMACHE (4 syl.) to Hector (Æneid. 1.3; v. 302) ARGENTIER to Kallaischros (Anthologia, bk. iii. 22).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

ARISTOTLE to Hermlas and Kubuios (Diogenes Laertius).

The ATHENIANS to the poet Euripides.

CALLIMACHOS to Sopolis, son of Dioclidês (Epigram of Callimachos, 22). CATULLUS to his brother (Epigram of Catullus, 103).

DIDO to Sichaeus (Justin, xviii. 6).

EUPOLIS and Aristodicê to their son Theotimos. GERMAIN DE BRIE to Hervé, the Breton, in 1512. ONESTOS to Timoclês (Anthologia, iii. p. 366).

The ROMANS to Drusus in Germany, and to Alexander Severus, the emp., in Gaul (Suetonius: Life of Claudius; and the Anthologia).

STATIUS to his father (The Sylvæ of Statius, v. Epicedium. 3.

TIMARES to his son Teleutagoras.

XENOCRATES to Lysidices (Anthologia).

A cenotaph (Greek, keuoz tafoz an empty tomb) is a monument or tablet to the memory of a person whose body is buried elsewhere. A mausoleum is an imposing monument enshrining the dead body itself.

Censorius et Sapiens

Cato Major was so called. (B.C. 234—149.)

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles

French imitations of Granucci, Malespini, and Campeggi, Italian tale—writers of the seventeenth century.

Centaur

(2 syl.). A huntsman. The Thessalian centaurs were half—horses, half—men. They were invited to a marriage feast, and, being intoxicated, behaved with great rudeness to the women. The Lapithæ took the women's part, fell on the centaurs, and drove them out of the country.

“Feasts that Thessalian centaurs never knew.”

Thomson: Autumn.

Cent—cyne

One of the upper ten; a person of high birth, a descendant of the race of kings. (Anglo—Saxon cyne, royal; cyne—dom, a kingdom; also noble, renowned, chief.)

“His wife, by birth a Cent—cyne, went out as a day—servant.”— Gaboriau: Promise of Marriage, chap. v.

Cento

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors. Ausonius has a nuptial idyll composed from verses selected from Virgil. (Latin, cento, patchwork.)

The best known are the Homero-centones (3 syl.), the Centio Virgilianus by Proba Falconia (4th century), and the Centio Nuptialis of Ausonius. Metellus made hymns out of the Odes of Horace by this sort of patchwork. Of modern centos, the Comédie des Comédies, made up of extracts from Balzac, is pretty well known.

Central Sun

That body or point about which our whole system revolves. Mädler believed that point to be eta in Taurus.

Centre

In the Legislative Assembly The Centre were the friends of order. In the Fenian rebellion, 1866, the chief movers were called Head Centres, and their subordinates Centres.

Centre of Gravity

That point on which a body acted on by gravity is balanced in all positions.

Centumviri

A court under whose jurisdiction the Romans placed all matters pertaining to testaments and inheritances.

Centurion

A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. His badge was a vine—rod. (Latin, centum, a hundred.)

Century White

John White, the Nonconformist lawyer. So called from his chief publication, The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, made and admitted into Benefices by the Prelates, etc.

(1590—1645).

Cephalus and Procris

Made familiar to us by an allusion to them in the play of Pyramus and Thisbê, where they are miscalled Shafalus and Procrus. Cephalus was the husband of Procris, who, out of jealousy, deserted him. Cephalus went in search of her, and rested a while under a tree. Procris, knowing of his whereabouts, crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him. Cephalus heard the noise, and thinking it to be made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew Procris. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin.

“Pyramus: Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.

Thisbe:

As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.” Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream. v. 1.

Cepheus

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(2 syl.). One of the northern constellations, which takes its name from Cepheus, King of Ethiopia, husband of Cassiopeia and father of Andromeda.

Cepola

Devices of Cépola. Quips of law are so called from Bartholomew Cépola whose law—quirks for prolonging lawsuits have been frequently reprinted.

Cequiel

(3 syl.). A spirit who transported Torralba from Valladolid' to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. (Pellicer.)

Ceraunium The opal. So called by the ancients from a notion that it was a thunder—stone. (Latin, ceraunium; Greek, keraios.)

Cerberus

A grim, watchful keeper, house—porter, guardian, etc. Cerberus, according to Roman mythology, is the three—headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. Hercules dragged the monster to earth, and then let him go again. (See Sop.)

Orpheus (2 syl.) lulled Cerberus to sleep with his lyre; and the Sibyl who conducted Æneas through the Inferno, also threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey.

The origin of the fable of Cerberus is from the custom of the ancient Egyptians of guarding graves with dogs.

The exquisite cameo by Dioscoridès, in the possession of the King of Prussia, and the painting of Hercules and Cerberus, in the Farnésé Gallery of Rome, are of world—wide renown.

Cerdonians

A sect of heretics, established by Cerdon of Syria, who lived in the time of Pope Hyginus, and maintained most of the errors of the Manichees.

Ceremonious

(The). Peter IV. of Aragon. (1319, 1336—1387.)

Ceremony

When the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albinus, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janiculum the Vestal virgins bending under their load, took them up and conveyed them to Cærë, in Etruria. Here they remained, and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called “Cære—monia.” (Livy, v.)

Scaliger says the word comes from cerus=sanctus. Cerus manus= Creator; and Cerco (according to Varro) is by metathesis for creo. Ceres, according to Scaliger, is also from creo. By this etymology, “Ceremony” means sacred rites, or solemn acts in honour of the Creator. The great objection to this etymology is that Cicero, Tacitus, and other classic authors spell the word Cære—monia and not Cere—monia.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Master of the Ceremonies. An officer, first appointed by James I., to superintend the reception of ambassadors and strangers of rank, and to prescribe the formalities to be observed in levees and other grand public functions.

Ceres

(2 syl.). Corn. Ceres was the Roman name of Mother—Earth, the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth.

“Dark frowning heaths grow bright with Ceres' store.” Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 27.

Cerinthians

Disciples of Cerinthus, a heresiarch of the first century. They denied the divinity of Christ, but held that a certain virtue descended into Him at baptism, which filled Him with the Holy Ghost.

Cerulean Brother of Jove

(The). Neptune. Here cerulean means green.

Cess

Measure, as ex—cess, excess—ive. Out of all cess means excessively, i.e. ex (out of all) cess.

“Poor jade, is wrung in the withers out of all cess.”—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 1.

Cess.

A tax, contracted from assessment (“sess”); as a “church—cess.” In Ireland the word is used sometimes as a contraction of success, meaning luck, as “bad cess to you!”

Cestui que Vie

is the person for whose life any lands or hereditaments may be held.

Cestui que use,

the person entitled to a use. Cestui que trust, the person for whose benefit a trust may be created.

Cestus in Homer, is the girdle of Venus, of magical power to move to ardent love. In Jerusalem Delivered, Armida wore a similar cestus.

Cf

Latin, confer = compare.

Chabouk

(See Chibouque , p. 245.)

Chabouk

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Chabuk. A long whip, or the application of whips and rods; a Persian and Chinese punishment. (Dubois.)

“Drag forward that fakir, and cut his robe into tatters on his back with your chabouks.”— Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter, c. xiv.

The criticism of the chabuk.

The application of whips or rods (Persian). (Dubois.)

“If that monarch did not give the chabuk to Feramorz, there would be an end to all legitimate government in Bucharria.”— T. Moore: Lalla Rookh.

Chacun a son Gout

“Everyone has (a) his taste”; or, “Everyone to (à) his taste.” The former is French, the latter is English—French. The phrase is much more common with us than it is in France, where we meet with the phrases— Chacun a sa chacunerie (everyone has his idiosyncrasy), and chacun a sa marotte (everyone has his hobby). In Latin sua cuique voluptas, “as the good—man said when he kissed his cow.”

Chad—pennies

Whitsuntide offerings at St. Chad's cathedral, Lichfield, for keeping it in repair.

Chaff

An old bird is not to be caught with chaff. An experienced man, or one with his wits about him, is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of bird—seed to allure birds. Hence—

You are chaffing me.

Making fun of me. A singular custom used to exist in Notts and Leicestershire some half a century ago. When a husband ill—treated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door, to intimate that “thrashing was done within,” which some think to be the origin of the word.

“To chaff,” meaning to banter, is a variant of chafe, to irritate.

Chair

(The). The office of chief magistrate in a corporate town.

Below the chair.

An alderman who has not yet served the mayoralty.

Passed the chair.

One who has served the chief office of the corporation. The word is also applied to the office of a professor, etc., as “The chair of poetry, in Oxford, is now vacant.” The word is furthermore applied to the president of a committee or public meeting. Hence—

To take the chair.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To become the chairman or president of a public meeting. The chairman is placed in a chair at the head of the table, or in some conspicuous place like the Speaker of the House of Commons, and his decision is absolutely final in all points of doubt. Usually the persons present nominate and elect their own chairman; but in some cases there is an ex officio chairman.

Chair

When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out “Chair,” they mean that the chairman is not properly supported, and his words not obeyed as they ought to be. Another form of the same expression is, “Pray support the chair.”

Groaning chair.

The chair in which a woman is confined or sits afterwards to receive congratulations. Similarly “groaning cake” and “groaning cheese” are the cake and cheese which used to be provided in “Goose month.”

“For a nurse, the child to dandle,

Sugar, soap, spiced pots, and candle

A groaning chair, and eke a cradle”

Poor Robin's Almanack,

1676.

Chair—days

Old age.

“I had long supposed that chair—days, the beautiful name for those days of old age ... was of Shakespeare's own invention ... but this is a mistake ... the word is current in Lancashire still.”— Trench: English Past and Present, v.

“In thy reverence and thy chair—days, thus

To die in ruffian battle.”

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI.,

act v. 2.

Chair of St. Peter

(The). The office of the Pope of Rome, said to be founded by St. Peter, the apostle; but St. Peter's Chair means the Catholic festival held in commemoration of the two episcopates founded by the apostle, one at Rome, and the other at Antioch (January 18th and February 22nd).

Chalcedony

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[kalcedony]. A precious stone, consisting of half — transparent quartz: so called from Chalcedon, in Asia Minor, where it was first found. Its chief varieties are agate, carnelian, cat's—eye, chrysoprase, flint, hornstone, onyx, plasma, and sard.

Albertus Magnus (book i. chap. 2) says: “It dispels illusions and all vain imaginations. If hung about the neck as a charm, it is a defence against enemies, and keeps the body healthful and vigorous.

Chaldee's

(Kal—dees). The Land of the Chaldees. Babylonia.

Chalk

I'll chalk out your path for you— i.e. lay it down or plan it out as a carpenter or ship—builder plans out his work with a piece of chalk.

I can walk a chalk as well as you.

I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to the ordeal on board ship of trying men suspected of drunkenness. They were required to walk along a line chalked on the deck, without deviating to the right or left.

The tapster is undone by chalk, i.e.

credit. The allusion is to scoring up credit on a tally with chalk. This was common enough early in the nineteenth century, when milk scores, bread scores, as well as beer scores were general.

Chalk it up.

Put it to his credit.

As good—humoured sarcasm, Chalk it up! is tantamount to saying, “What you have done so astonishes me that I must make some more or less permanent record of it.”

Chalk and Cheese

I know the difference between chalk and cheese. Between what is worthless and what is valuable, between a counterfeit and a real article. Of course, the resemblance of chalk to cheese has something to do with the saying, and the alliteration helps to popularise it.

“This Scotch scarecrow was no more to be compared to him than chalk was to cheese”— Sir

W. Scott: Woodstock, xxiv.

I cannot make chalk of one and cheese of the other.

I must treat both alike; I must show no favouritism. They are no more like than chalk is like cheese. There may be a slight apparent resemblance, but there is no real likeness.

Chalks

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

I beat him by long chalks. Thoroughly. In allusion to the ancient custom of making merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common.

Walk your chalks.

Get you gone. Lodgings wanted for the royal retinue used to be taken arbitrarily by the marshal and serjeant—chamberlain, the inhabitants were sent to the right about, and the houses selected were notified by a chalk mark. When Mary de Medicis, in 1638, came to England, Sieur de Labat was employed to mark “all sorts of houses commodious for her retinue in Colchester.” The same custom is referred to in the Life and Acts of Sir William Wallace, in Edinburgh. The phrase is “Walk, you're chalked,” corrupted into Walk your chalks.

In Scotland, at one time, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit by chalking the door.

“The prisoner has cut his stick, and walked his chalk, and is off to London.”— C. Kingsley.

Challenge to the Array

(A Challenge to the Polls (A). An objection or protest to certain persons selected for a jury. If a man is not qualified to serve, or if he is supposed to be biassed, he may be challenged. In capital cases a prisoner may challenge persons without assigning any reason, and in cases of treason as many as thirty—five. (22 Henry VIII., c. 14; 7, 8 George IV., c. 28, s. 3.)

Challenging a Jury

This may be to object to all the jurors from some informality in the way they have been “arrayed” or empanelled, or to one or more of the jurors, from some real or supposed disqualification or bias of judgment. The word “challenge” is Norman, and is exactly equivalent to “call out;” hence we say Captain A challenged or called out Captain B.

Cham

(kam). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written, “khan.”

“Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard.”— Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 1.

The great Cham of Literature.

Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709—1784).

Chambre Ardente

(French), “A lighted chamber” (A darkened court). Before the Revolution, certain offences in France were tried in a court from which daylight was excluded, and the only light admitted was by torches. These inquisitorial courts were devised by Cardinal Lorraine. The first was held in the reign of Francois I., for trying heretics. Brinvilliers and his associates were tried in a darkened court in 1680. Another was held in 1716, during the regency. When judges were ashamed to be seen, prisoners could not expect much leniency.

Chameleon

You are a chameleon, i.e. very changeable— shifting according to the opinions of others, as the chameleon changes its hue to that of contiguous objects.

“As the chameleon, who is known
To have no colours of its own,
But borrows from his neighbour's hue,
His white or black, his green or blue.”

Prior

Pliny tells us that Democritus wrote a book on superstitions connected with the chameleon.

C'est un cameleon.

One who shifts his opinions according to circumstances; a vicar of Bray. To chameleonise is to change one's opinions as a chameleon changes its colour.

Champ de Manoeuvre

(Le). The soldiers' exercise ground.

Champs de Mai

The same as the Champs de Mars (q.v.), transferred after 755 to the month of May. Napoleon I. revived these meetings during the “Hundred Days” (June 1st, 1815).

Champs de Mars

The March meetings held by Clovis and his immediate followers, sometimes as mere pageants for the amusement of the freedmen who came to offer homage to their lord, and pay their annual gifts; sometimes for business purposes, especially when the king wished to consult his warriors about some expedition.

Champak'

An Indian tree (Michelia Champaca). The wood is sacred to Buddha, and the strongly—scented golden flowers are worn in the black hair of Indian women.

“The Champak odours fail.”

Shelley: Lines to Indian Air.

Champerty

(Latin, campi partitio, division of the land) is a bargain with some person who undertakes at his own cost to recover property on condition of receiving a share thereof if he succeeds.

“Champerty is treated as a worse offence; for by this a stranger supplies money to carry on a suit, on condition of sharing in the land or other property.”—Parsons: Contracts (vol. ii. part

ii. chap. 3, page 264.)

Champion and Severall

A “champion” is a common, or land in allotments without enclosures. A “severall” is a private farm, or land enclosed for individual use. A champion also means one who holds a champion.

“The champion differs from severall much

For want of partition, closier, and such.”

Tusser: Five Hundred Points, etc. (Intro.).

Champion of England

A person whose office it is to ride up Westminster Hall on a Coronation Day, and challenge any one who disputes the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror, and was given to Marmion and his male descendants, with the manor of “broad Scrivelsby.” De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line; and in the reign of Richard II. Sir John Dymoke succeeded through the female line also. Since then the office has continued in the Dymoke family.

“These Lincoln lands the Conqueror gave,

That England's glove they might convey

To knight renowned amongst the brave—

The baron bold of Fonteney.”

An Anglo—Norman Ballad modernised.

Chance

(See Main Chance .)

Chancel

means a lattice—screen. In the Roman law courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen. (Latin, cancellus.)

Chancel of a church.

That part of a church which contains the altar, and the seats set apart for the choir. It is generally raised a step or more above the floor of the nave.

Chancellor

A petty officer in the Roman law courts stationed at the chancel (q.v.) as usher of the court. In the Eastern Empire he was a secretary or notary, subsequently invested with judicial functions. The office was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and under the Norman kings the chancellor was made official secretary of all important legal documents. In France, the chancellor was the royal notary, president of the councils, and keeper of the Great Seal.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Chancellor of England

(The). The Lord Chancellor, or the Lord High Chancellor. The highest judicial functionary of the nation, who ranks above all peers, except princes of the blood and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is “Keeper of the Great Seal,” is called “Keeper of His (or Her) Majesty's Conscience,” and presides on the Woolsack in the House of Lords.

Chancellor of the Exchequer

(The). The minister of finance in the Privy Council.

Chancery

The part of the Court occupied by the lawyers.

To get a man's head into chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting nature of a Chancery suit. If a man once gets his head there, the lawyers punish him to their heart's content.

“When I can perform my mile in eight minutes, or a little less, I feel as if I had old Time's head in chancery.”— Holmes: Autocrat, chap. vii. p. 191.

Chaneph

The island of religious hypocrites, inhabited by sham saints, tellers of beads, mumblers of ave marias, and friars who lived by begging. (The word meant hypocrite in Hebrew.) (See Rabelais: Pantagruel,

iv. 63, 64.)

Change

Ring the changes. Repeating the same thing in different ways. The allusion is to bell—ringing. To know how many changes can be rung on a peal of bells, multiply the known preceding number by the next subsequent one, thus: 1 bell no change; 2 bells, $1 \times 2 = 2$ changes; 3 bells, $2 \times 3 = 6$ changes; 4 bells, $6 \times 4 = 24$ changes; 5 bells, $24 \times 5 = 120$ changes; 6 bells, 720 changes, etc.

Take your change out of that.

Said to a person who insults you when you give him a quid pro quo, and tell him to take out the change. It is an allusion to shopping transactions, where you settle the price of the article, and put the surplus or change in your pocket.

Changeling

(2 syl.) A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never did kindly

“Oh, that it could be proved

That some night—tripping fairy had exchanged

In cradle—clothes our children as they lay,

And called mine Percy, his Plantagenet!

Then would I have his Harry, and he mine.”

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. 1.

Chant du Depart

After the Marseillaise, the most celebrated song of the first French Revolution. It was written by M. J. Chénier for a public festival, held June 11th, 1794, to commemorate the taking of the Bastille. The music is by Méhul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is, “We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic.” (See page 217, col. 1, Carmagnole.)

“La republique nous appelle,

Sachons vaincre on sachons perir,

Un Français doit vivre pour elle,

Pour elle un Français is doit mourir.”

M. J. Chenier.

The Republic invites,

Let us conquer or fall;

For her Frenchmen live,

And die at her call. E. C. B.

Chantage

A subsidy paid to a journal. Certain journals will pronounce a company to be a “bubble one” unless the company advertises in its columns; and at gaming resorts will publish all the scandals and mischances connected with the place unless the proprietors subsidise them, or throw a sop to Cerberus. This subsidy is technically known as Chantage in France and Italy.

Chanticleer

The cock, in the tale of Reynard the Fox, and in Chaucer's Nonne Prestes Tale. The word means “shrill—singer.” (French chanter—clair, to sing clairment, i.e. distinctly.)

“My lungs began to crow like chanticleer.”

Shakespeare: As you Like It,

ii. 7

Chaonian Bird

(The). The dove. So called because it delivered the oracles of Chaonia (Dodona).

“But the mild swallow none with toils infest,

And none the soft Chaonian bird molest.”

Ovid: Art of Love, ii.

Chaonian Food

Acorns. So called from the oak trees of Chaonia or Dodona. Some think beechnest is meant, and tell us that the bells of the oracle were hung on beech—trees, not on oaks.

The Greek word is fhgoz; Latin, fagus. Hence Strabo, Dwdwuhu, fhgou te Pelasgwu edrauou hkeu (He to Dodona came, and the hallowed oak or beech [fagus], the seat of the Pelasgi.) Now, “fagus” means the food—tree, and both acorns and mast are food, so nothing determinate can be derived from going to the root of the word, and, as it is extremely doubtful where Dodona was, we get no light by referring to the locality. Our text says Chaonia (in Epirus), others place it in Thessaly.

Chaos

(kaos). Confusion; that confused mass of elemental substances supposed to have existed before God reduced creation into order. The poet Hesiod is the first extant writer that speaks of it.

“Light, uncollected, through the chaos urged

Its infant way, nor order yet had drawn

His lovely train from out the dubious gloom.”

Thomson: Autumn, 732—4.

Chap

A man, properly a merchant. A chap—man is a merchantman or tradesman. “If you want to buy, I’m your chap.” A good chap—man or chap became in time a good fellow. Hence, A good sort of chap, A clever chap, etc. (Anglo—Saxon, ceap—mann.)

An awkward customer is an analogous phrase.

Chap—book

(A). A cheap little book containing tales, ballads, lives, etc., sold by chapmen.

Chapeau or Chapel de Roses. C'est un petit mariage, car quand on demande ce qu'un père donne à une fille, et qu'on veut répondre qu'il donne peu, on dit qu'il lui donne un chapeau de roses. Les roses sont consacrés à Venus, aux Grâces, et à l'Amour, (Les Origines de quelques Coutumes Anciennes, 1672.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

N.B.—“Chapel” we now call a chaplet.

Chapeau—bras

A soft hat which can be folded and carried under the arm (bras, French for arm). Strictly speaking, it should be a three—cornered hat.

Chapel

is the chest containing relics, or the shrine thereof (Latin, capella; French, chape, a cope). The kings of France in war carried St. Martin's cope into the field, and kept it in a tent as a talisman. The place in which the cope was kept was called the chappelle, and the keeper thereof the chapelain.

Chapel (A).

Either a place subsidiary to the parish church, or a place of worship not connected with the State, as a Methodist Chapel, a Baptist Chapel, etc.

Chapel

in printers' parlance, meant his workshop. In the early days of printing, presses were set up in the chapels attached to abbeys, as those of Caxton in Westminster Abbey. (See Monk, Friar , etc.)

Chapel.

The “caucus” of journeymen printers assembled to decide any point of common interest. The chairman is called the “father of the chapel.”

To hold a chapel.

To hold a printers' caucus.

Chapel—of—Ease

A place of worship for the use of parishioners residing at a distance from the parish church.

Chaperon

A lady's attendant and protector in public. So called from the Spanish hood worn by duennas. (English—French.) (See Tapisserie .)

To chaperone.

To accompany a young unmarried lady in loco parentis, when she appears in public or in society.

Chapter

To the end of the chapter. From the beginning to the end of a proceeding. The allusion is to the custom of reading an entire chapter in the first and second lesson of the Church service. This is no longer a general rule in the Church of England.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Chapter and Verse

To give chapter and verse is to give the exact authority of a statement, as the name of the author, the title of the book, the date thereof, the chapter referred to, and any other particular which might render the reference easily discoverable.

Chapter of Accidents

(A). Unforeseen events. To trust to the chapter of accidents is to trust that something unforeseen may turn up in your favour. The Roman laws were divided into books, and each book into chapters. The chapter of accidents is that under the head of accidents, and metaphorically, the sequence of unforeseen events.

Chapter of Possibilities

(The). A may—be in the course of events.

Character

In character. In harmony with a person's actions, etc.

Out of character.

Not in harmony with a person's actions, writings, profession, age, or status in society.

Character

(A). An oddity. One who has a distinctive peculiarity of manner: Sam Weller is a character, so is Pickwick. And Sam Weller's conduct in the law—court was “in character,” but had he betrayed his master it would have been “out of character.”

Charbonnerie Democratique

A new Carbonari society, founded in Paris on the principles of Babeuf. The object of these Republicans was to make Paris the centre of all political movements. (See page 214, col. 2, Carbonari .)

Charge

Curate in charge. A curate placed by a bishop in charge of a parish where there is no incumbent, or where the incumbent is suspended.

To charge oneself with.

To take upon oneself the onus of a given task. To give charge over. To set one in authority over.

“I gave my brother Hanani ... charge over Jerusalem.”—Nehemiah vii. 2.

To give in charge.

To hand over a person to the charge of a policeman. To have in charge. To have the care of something.

To take in charge.

To “take up” a person given in charge; to take upon oneself the responsibility of something.

Charge

(To). To make an attack or onset in battle. “To charge with bayonets” is to rush on the enemy with levelled bayonets.

To return to the charge.

To renew the attack.

Charge d'Affaires

The proxy of an ambassador, or the diplomatic agent where none higher has been appointed.

Charicleia

The lady—love of Theagenēs in the exquisite erotic Greek romance called The Loves of Theagenes and Charicleia, by Heliodoros, Bishop of Trikka, in the fourth century.

Charing Cross

Not from chère reine, in honour of Eleanor, the dear wife of Edward I., but la chère reine (the Blessed Virgin). Hence, in the Close Roll, Richard II, part I (1382), we read that the custody of the falcons at Charryng, near Westminster, was granted to Simon Burley, who was to receive 12d. a day from the Wardrobe. A correspondent in Notes and Queries, Dec. 28th, 1889, p. 507, suggests the Anglo—Saxon cérran (to turn), alluding to the bend of the Thames.

“Queen Eleanor died at Harby, Nottinghamshire, and was buried at Westminster. In every town where the corpse rested the king caused a cross ‘of cunning workmanship’ to be erected in remembrance of her. There were fourteen, some say fifteen, altogether. The three which remain are in capitals: Lincoln, Newark, Grantham, Leicester, Stamford, GEDDINGTON, NORTHAMPTON, Stony—Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, WALTHAM, West—Cheap (Cheapside), Charing, and (15th Herdly?)”

In front of the South Eastern Railway station (Strand) is a model, in the original dimensions, of the old cross, which was made of Caen stone, and was demolished in 1643.

Chariot

According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by Erichthonius to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

“Seated in car, by him constructed first

To hide his hideous feet.”

Rose: Orlando Furioso,

xxxvii. 27.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Chariot of the Gods

So the Greeks called Sierra Leone, in Africa, a ridge of mountains of great height. A sierra means a saw, and is applied to a ridge of peaked mountains.

“Her palmy forests, mingling with the skies,

Leona's rugged steep behind us flies.”

Camoens. Lusiad, book 5.

Chariots or Cars. That of ADME'TOS was drawn by lions and wild boars. BACCHUS by panthers.

CERES (2 syl.) by winged dragons.

CYB'ELE (3 syl.) by lions.

DIANA by stags.

JUNO by peacocks.

NEPTUNE by sea—horses.

PLUTO by black horses.

The SUN by seven horses (the seven days of the week).

VENUS by doves.

Charioteers

(in Rome) were classed under four factions, distinguished by their liveries:— white, red, sky—blue, and green. Domitian added two more, viz. the golden and the purple.

Charities

Masks.

“Our ladies laugh at bare—faced trulls when they have those mufflers on, which they call masks, and which were formerly much more properly called charity, because they cover a multitude of sins.”— Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 27.

Charity

Charity begins at home. “Let them learn first to show piety at home” (1 Tim. v. 4 and 8).

Cold as charity.

Than which what's colder to him who gives and him who takes?

Charivari

The clatter made with pots and pans, whistling, bawling, hissing, and so on. Our concert of “marrow—bones and cleavers”; the German Katzenmusik, got up to salute with ridicule unequal marriages. Punch is our national Charivari, and clatters weekly against political and social wrong—sidedness.

Charlatan

The following etymology is suitable to a book of Phrase and Fable. It is said that one Latan, a famous quack, used to go about Paris in a gorgeous car, in which he had a traveling dispensary. A man with a horn announced the approach of this magnate, and the delighted sightseers used to cry out, “Voilà! le char de Latan.” When I lived in Paris I often saw this gorgeous car; the horn—man had a drum also, and M. Latan, dressed in a long showy robe, wore sometimes a hat with feathers, sometimes a brass helmet, and sometimes a showy cap. He was a tooth—extracter as well as dispenser.

Probably “Latan” was an assumed name, for charlatan is undoubtedly the Italian ciarlatano, a babbler or quack.

Charlemagne

His nine wives were Hamiltrude, a poor Frankish woman, who bore him several children; Desiderata, who was divorced; Hildegarde, Fastrade (daughter of Count Rodólph the Saxon), and Luitgarde the German, all three of whom died before him, Maltegarde; Gersuinde the Saxon; Regina; and Adalinda.

Charlemagne's peers.

(See Paladins.) Charlemagne's sword. La Joyeuse. Faire Charlemagne. To carry off one's winnings without giving the adversaries “their revenge.”

“Faire Charlemagne cest se retirer du jeu avec tout son gain, ne point donner de revanche. Charlemagne garda jusqu' á la fin toutes ses conquetes et quitta le jeu de la vie sans avoir rien rendu du fruit de ses victoires. Le joueur qui se retire les mains pleins, fait conine Charlemagne.”— Genin Recreations. i. 186.

Charles

An ill—omened name for kings:

England:

Charles I. was beheaded by his subjects.

Charles II. lived long in exile.

Charles Edward, the Young Pretender, died in poverty and disgrace in France.

France:

Charles I., the Bald, marching to repel the invading Saracens, was forsaken by his followers, and died of poison at Brios.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Charles II., the Fat, reigned wretchedly, and died a beggarly dependent on the stinting bounty of the Archbishop of Metz.

Charles III., the Simple, died in the dungeon of Château Thierry.

Charles IV., the Fair, reigned six years, married thrice, but buried all his children except one daughter, who was forbidden by the Salic law to succeed to the crown.

Charles VI. lived and died an idiot or madman.

Charles VII. starved himself to death.

Charles VIII. smashed his head against the lintel of a doorway in the Château Amboise, and died in agony.

Charles IX. died at the age of twentyfour, harrowed in conscience for the part he had taken in the “Massacre of St. Bartholomew.”

Charles X. spent a quarter of a century in exile, and when he succeeded to the throne, fled for his life and died in exile.

Charles le Téméraire, of Burgundy, lost his life at Nancy, where he was utterly defeated by the Swiss.

Naples:

Charles I. saw the French massacred in the “Sicilian Vespers,” and experienced only disasters. Charles II., the Lame, was in captivity at his father's death.

Charles III., his grandson, was assassinated. (See Jane)

Charles I

When Bernini's bust of Charles I. was brought home, the King was sitting in the garden of Chelsea Palace. He ordered the bust to be uncovered, and at the moment a hawk with a bird in its beak flew by, and a drop of the blood fell on the throat of the bust. The bust was ultimately destroyed when the palace was burnt down.

Charles and the Oak

When Charles II. fled from the Parliamentary army, he took refuge in Boscobel House; but when he deemed it no longer safe to remain there, he concealed himself in an oak. Dr. Stukeley says that this tree “stood just by a horse—track passing through the wood, and the king, with Colonel Carlos, climbed into it by means of the hen—roost ladder. The family reached them victuals with a nuthook.” (Itinerarium Curiosum, iii. p. 57, 1724.)

Charles's Wain

The constellation called the Great Bear, which forms the outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon. “Charles” is a corruption of the word churles, the farmer's wagon. (Anglo—Saxon, ceorles wan.)

Sometimes still further corrupted into “King Charles's wain.”

Charleys

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Charlies. The old night watch, before the police force was organised in 1829. So called from Charles I., in whose reign the system was re—organised. (1640.)

Charlotte Elizabeth

Mrs. Tonna (1792—1846).

Charm

means a song. Incantation is singing on or against some one. Enchant is the same. (Latin, carmen.)

Charon's Toll

[care—un]. A coin, about equal to a penny, placed in the mouth or hand of the dead to pay Charon for ferrying the spirit across the river Styx to the Elysian fields.

Charter

(See People's Charter)

Chartism

The political system of the Chartists, who, in 1838, demanded the People's Charter, consisting of five principles: universal suffrage, annual parliaments, stipendiary members, vote by ballot, and electoral districts.

Charybdis [ch=k]. A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. Scylla and Charybdis are employed to signify two equal dangers. Thus Horace says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis, i.e. seeking to avoid one fault, falls into another. The tale is that Charybdis stole the oxen of Hercules, was killed by lightning, and changed into the gulf.

“Thus when I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother.”— Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii. 5.

Chase

(A). A small deer—forest held, for the most part, by a private individual, and protected only by common law. Forests are royal prerogatives, protected by the “Forest Laws.”

Chase

(A). An iron frame used by printers for holding sufficient type for one side of a sheet. The type is first set up letter by letter in the “composing stick,” and is then transferred to the “galley,” where it appears in columns. It is next divided into pages, and then transferred to the chase, where it is held tight by quoins, or small wedges of wood. The word is French, chasse (a frame), our case—ment. (See Stick) and Zadikim. After the Babylonish captivity the Jews were divided into two groups— those who accepted and those who rejected the Persian innovation. The former were called pietists (chasidim), and the latter uprights (zadikim).

Chasidim

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Chasseurs de Vincennes

(French). The Duke of Orleans' rifle corps; so called because they were garrisoned at Vincennes. (1835.)

Chat

Nid d'une souris dans Voreille d'un chat. A mare's nest. This French phrase is the translation of a line in Wynkyn de Worde's Amusing Questions, printed in English in 1511. “Demand: What is that that never was and never will be? Response: A mouse's nest in a cat's ear.” (See Mare's Nest)

Chat de Beaugency

(Le). Keeping the word of promise to the ear, but breaking it to the sense. The legend is this: An architect was employed to construct a bridge over the Loire, opposite Beaugency, but not being able to accomplish it, made a league with the devil to give his sable majesty the first living being which crossed the bridge. The devil supposed it would be the architect himself, but when the bridge was finished the man threw a cat forwards, and it ran over the bridge like a wild thing. The devil was furious, but a bargain's a bargain, and the “cat of Beaugency” became a proverb.

Chateaux en Espagne

[Castles in Spain.] A castle in the air; something that exists only in the imagination. In Spain there are no châteaux. (See Castle)

Château.

Many wines are named after the manor on which the grapes are grown: as Château Lafitte, Château La Tour, Château Margaux, Château Rose (and Bordeaux), Château Yquem (a white Bordeaux), etc.

Chattelin's

A fashionable coffee—house in the reign of Charles II.

“Met their servant coming to bring me to Chatelin's, the French house, in Covent Garden, and there with music and good company ... mighty merry till ten at night. The Duke of Monmouth and a great many blades were at Chatelin's, and I left them there.”— Pepys: Diary, April 22nd, 1668.

Chatterbox

A talkative person. The Germans have Plaudertasche (chatterbag). Shakespeare speaks of the clack—dish. “His use was to put a ducat in her clack—dish” (Measure for Measure, iii. 2)— i.e. the box or dish used by beggars for collecting alms, which the holder clatters to attract attention. We find also chatter—basket in old writers, referring to the child's rattle.

Chatterhouse

To go through the chatterhouse. Between the legs of one or more boys, set apart like an inverted A, who strike, with their hands or caps, the victim as he creeps through. Halliwell (Archaic Dict.) gives chat, a small twig, and chatter, to bruise; also chattocks, refuse wood left in making faggots. Probably, the boys used little twigs or sticks instead of caps or hands. And to go through chatterhouse means to get a trouncing or tunding. The pun between chatterhouse and charterhouse is obvious.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Chatterpie

Same as chatterbox. The pie means the magpie. (Mag, to chatter.) (See Halliwell.)

Chaucer of Painting

(The). Albert Dürer of Nurnberg (1471—1528). “The prince of artists.”

Chauvin

A blind idolator of Napoleon the Great. The name is taken from Les Aides de Camp, by Bayard and Dumanoir, but was popularised in Charet's Conscrit Chauvin.

Chauvinism.

A blind idolatry of Napoleon the Great. Now it means a blind and pugnacious patriotism: a warlike spirit.

“Chauvin, patriote ardent, jusqu'à l'exagération. Allusion au nom d'un type de caricature populaire, comme le prouve cet exemple: 1820, époque ou un liberalism plus large commença à se moquer de ces éloges donnés aux conscrit Chauvin, fit justice de ces niaiseries de l'opinion.”—Lorédan Larchey: Dictionnaire de l'Argot Parisien, 1872.

Chawbacon

(A). An uncouth rustic, supposed to eat no meat but bacon. I myself knew a most respectable day—labourer, who had saved up enough money to keep himself in old age, who told me he never saw or touched any meat in his cottage but bacon, except once a year, and that was on club—day (1879). He never ate rabbit, game, chicken, or duck.

Chawed up

Done for, utterly discomfited, demolished. (American.)

Che sara, sara

What shall be will be. The motto of the Russells (Bedford)

“What doctrine call ye this, Che sara, sara!” — Faust (Anster's translation), i. 1.

Cheap as a Sardinian

A Roman phrase referring to the great crowds of Sardinian prisoners brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus, and offered for sale at almost any price.

Cheap Jack

Jack, the chap—man. Not cheap, meaning low—priced, but cheap meaning merchant, as in “chapman,” “Cheap—side,” etc. Jack is a term applied to inferior persons, etc. (Saxon, cepa, a merchant; ceapian, to buy; ceapmann, a tradesman.) (See Jack)

Cheapside Bargain

(A). A very weak pun, meaning that the article was bought cheap or under its market value.

Cheater

(2 syl.) originally meant an Escheator or officer of the king's exchequer appointed to receive dues and taxes. The present use of the word shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. (See Catchpole).

Compare with escheator the New Testament word "Publicans," or collectors of the Roman tax in Judæa, etc.

Chech

Called also stone—chest, kistvaen (a sepulchral monument or cromlech).

"We find a rude chech or flat stone of an oval form, about three yards in length, five feet over where broadest, and ten or twelve inches thick."— Camden.

Checkmate

in the game of chess, means placing your adversary's king in such a position that he can neither cover nor move out of check. Figuratively, "to checkmate" means to foil or outwit another; checkmated, outmanoeuvred. "Mate" (Arabic, mat, dead; Spanish, matar, to kill). The German schach means both chess and check, and the Italian scacco means the squares of the chess—board; but schach—matt and scaccomatto = check—mate. The French échec is a "stoppage," whence donner or faire échec et mat, to make a stoppage (check) and dead; the Spanish, xaque de mate means the check of death (or final check).

If we go to Arabic for "mate," why not go there for "check" also? And "sheik mat" = the king dead, would be consistent and exact. (See Chess)

Cheek

None of your cheek. None of your insolence. "None of your jaw" means none of your nagging or word irritation.

We say a man is very cheeky, meaning that he is saucy and presumptuous.

To give cheek.

To be insolent. "Give me none of your cheek." To have the cheek. To have the face or assurance. "He hadn't the cheek to ask for more."

"On account of his having so much cheek"— Dickens: Bleak House.

Cheek

(To). To be saucy. "You must cheek him well," i.e. confront him with fearless impudence; face him out.

Cheek by Jowl

In intimate confabulation; tête-à-tête. Cheek is the Anglo—Saxon ceca, céac—bán, cheek—bone; and jowl is the Anglo—Saxon ceole (the jaw); Irish, gial.

“Ill go with thee, cheek by jowl.”— Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 2.

Cheese

Tusser says that a cheese, to be perfect, should not be like (1) Gehazi, i.e. dead white, like a leper; (2) not like Lot's wife, all salt; (3) not like Argus, full of eyes; (4) not like Tom Piper, “hoven and puffed,” like the cheeks of a piper; (5) not like Crispin, leathery; (6) not like Lazarus, poor; (7) not like Esau, hairy; (8) not like Mary Magdalene, full of whey or maudlin; (9) not like the Gentiles, full of maggots or gentils; and (10) not like a bishop, made of burnt milk. (Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.)

A cheese which has no resemblance to these ten defects is “quite the cheese.”

Bread and cheese.

Food generally, but of a frugal nature. “Come and take your bread and cheese with me this evening.”

A green cheese:

An unripe cheese. The moon made of green cheese. A slight resemblance, but not in the least likely. “You will persuade him to believe that the moon is made of green cheese.” (See above.)

‘Tis an old rat that won't eat cheese.

It must be a wondrously toothless man that is inaccessible to flattery; he must be very old indeed who can abandon his favourite indulgence; only a very cunning rat knows that cheese is a mere bait.

Cheese

Something choice (Anglo—Saxon, ceos—an, to choose; German, kiesen; French, choisir). Chaucer says, “To cheese whether she wold him marry or no.”

“Now thou might cheese

How thou couetist [covetest] to calme, now thou Knowist all mi names.”

P. Ploughman's Vision.

It is not the cheese.

Not the right thing; not what I should choose.

He is quite the cheese or just the cheese— i.e. quite the thing. By a double refinement we get the slang varieties, That's prime Stilton, or double Gloster — i.e. slap bang up.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cheeseparer (A). A skinflint: a man of small savings; economy carried to excess like one who pares or shaves off very thinly the rind of his cheese instead of cutting it off. The tale is well known of the man who chose his wife out of three sisters by the way they ate their cheese. One pared it— she (he said) was mean; one cut it off extravagantly thick— she was wasteful; the third sliced it off in a medium way, and there his choice fell.

Cheeseparer Economy

A useless economy. The French say, “Une économie de bouts de chandelles.” The allusion is to the well-known tale of a man who chose one of three sisters for wife by the way they pared their cheese. (See above.)

Cheese—Toaster

(A). A sword; also called a “toasting—fork.” “Come! out with your toaster.” In Latin veru means a dart, a spit used in roasting, or a toasting fork. Thus we have “pugnant mucrone veruque Sabello” (Æn. vii. 663), and in Æn. i. 210, etc., we read that the men prepared their supper, after slaying the beasts, “pars in frustra secant, verubusque trementia figunt.” In the former example veru is used for an instrument of war, and in the latter for a toasting—fork or spit.

Cheesewring

(Lynton, Devon). A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty—two feet; so called because it looks like a gigantic cheese—press. This is probably a natural work, the effect of some convulsion. The Kilmarth Rocks, and part of Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit, present somewhat similar piles of stone.

Chef d'OEuvre

A masterpiece. (French.) (Pronounce sha deuvr.)

Chemistry

[kemistry] is from the Arabic kimia, whence al—kimia (the occult art), from kamai (to conceal).

Inorganic chemistry is that branch of chemistry which is limited to metallic and non—metallic substances, which are not organised bodies.

Organic chemistry is devoted to organised bodies and their elements.

Chemos

or Chemosh [Keemosh]. War—god of the Moabites; god of lust.

“Next, Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons,

From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild

Of southmost Abarim.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

book i, 406—8.

Chennappa

The city of Chennappa. So Madras is called by the natives.

Chenu

(French). Hoary, grey—headed. This word is much used in Paris to signify good, delicate, exquisite in flavour, delicious, de bon goût. It was originally applied to wine which is improved by age. Thus we hear—commonly in Paris the expression, “Voilà du vin qui est bien chenu” (mellow with age). Sometimes gris (grey, with age) is substituted, as, “Nous en boirons tant de ce bon vin gris” (Le Tresor des Chansons Nouvelles, p. 78). The word, however, is by no means limited to wine, but is applied to well—nigh everything worthy of commendation. We even hear Chenu Reluit, good morning; and Chenu sorgue, good night.

“Reluit,” of course, means “sunshine,” and “sorgue” is an old French word for evening or brown. “Chenument” = à merveille.

Chequers A public—house sign. In England without doubt the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans, may have helped to popularise this sign, which indicated that the house was duly licensed; but the sign has been found on houses in exhumed Pompeii, and probably referred to some game, like our draughts, which might be indulged in on the premises. Possibly in some cases certain public—houses were at one time used for the payment of doles, etc., and a chequer—board was provided for the purpose. In such cases the sign indicated the house where the parish authorities met for that and other purposes.

Cheronean

[ch=k]. The Cheronean Sage. Plutarch, who was born at Chaerone'a, in Boeotia (46—120).

“This phrase, O Cheronean sage, is thine.”

Beattie: Minstrel.

Cherry

The whole tree or not a cherry on it. “Aut Caesar aut nullus.” All in all or none at all.

“This Hospitaller seems to be one of those pragmatistical knaves who must have the whole tree, or they'll not have a cherry on it.”

To make two bites of a cherry.

To divide something too small to be worth dividing.

Cherry Fairs

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Now called teagardens. Nothing to do with cherries; it is cheery fairs— i.e. gay or recreation fairs. A “cheering” is a merrymaking. Halliwell tells us that “Cherry (or rather chery) fairs are still held in Worcestershire.” Gower says of this world, “Alle is but a cherye—fayre,” a phrase frequently met with.

“This life, my son, is but a chery—fayre.”— MS. Bodl. 221 (quoted by Halliwell).

Cherry Trees and the Cuckoo

The cherry tree is strangely mixed up with the cuckoo in many cuckoo stories, because of the tradition that the cuckoo must eat three good meals of cherries before he is allowed to cease singing.

“Cuckoo, cuckoo, cherry—tree,

Good bird, prithee, tell to me

How many years I am to see.”

The answer is made by the cuckoo repeating its cry the prophetic number of times.

Cherubims

The 11th Hussars are so called, by a bad pun, because their trousers are of a cherry colour.

Chery and Fair—Star

Chery was the son of a king's brother and Brunetta; Fair—star was the daughter of the king and Blondina, the two fathers being brothers, and the two mothers sisters. They were cast on the sea adrift, but were found and brought up by a corsair and his wife. Ultimately they are told of their birth by a green bird, and marry each other. This tale is imitated from The Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister, in Arabian Nights.

N.B.— The name is from the French cher (dear), and is about equal to “deary” or “dear one.” It is quite wrong to spell it with a double r. (Comtesse d'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales.) is the Latin castra'—shire, called by the Romans Devana castra (the camp town of Deva, or Deemouth).

Cheshire

Chess

Called by the Hindus cheturanga (the four angas)— i.e. the four members of the army— viz. elephants, horses, chariots, and foot—soldiers; called by the ancient Persians chetrang. The Arabs, who have neither c nor g, called it shetranj, which modern Persians corrupted into sacchi, whence the Italian scacchi, German schach, French echec, our chess. (See page 242, Checkmate) lauded by Thomson in his Winter is the fourth earl, author of Chesterfield's Letters to His Son (1694—1773).

Chesterfield

Chesterfield House

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(London) was built by Isaac Ware for Philip, fourth earl of Chesterfield. (See above.)

Chestnut

A stale joke. In The Broken Sword, an old melodrama by William Dillon, Captain Xavier is for ever telling the same jokes with variations. He was telling about one of his exploits connected with a cork—tree, when Pablo corrects him, “A chestnut—tree you mean, captain.” “Bah! (replied the captain) I say a cork—tree.”

“A chestnut—tree,” insists Pablo. “I must know better than you (said the captain); it was a cork—tree, I say.”

“A chestnut (persisted Pablo). I have heard you tell the joke twenty—seven times, and I am sure it was a chestnut.”

“Is not this an illustration of the enduring vitality of the `chestnut'? [joke].”— Notes and Queries.

Chestnut Sunday

Rogation Sunday, or the Sunday before Ascension Day.

Cheval

(French, à cheval). Troops are arranged à cheval when they command two roads, as Wellington's army at Waterloo, which, being at the apex of two roads, commanded that between Charleroi and Brussels, as well as that to Mons.

“The Western Powers will assuredly never permit Russia to place herself again à cheval between the Ottoman empire and Persia.”— The Times.

Cheval de Bataille

(His). His strong argument. (See Notes and Queries, May 22nd, 1886, p. 410.)

Chevalier d'Industrie

A man who lives by his wits and calls himself a gentleman.

“Denicheur de fauvelles, chevalier de l'ordre de l'industrie, qui va chercher quelque bon nid, quelque femme qui lui fasse sa fortune.”— Gongam, ou l'Homme Prodigieux (1713).

Chevalier du Brouillard

(Le). The French Jack Sheppard. A drama.

Chevaux de Frise

(French). Horses of Friesland. A beam filled with spikes to keep off horses, so called from its use in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before, but was not called by the same name. In German it is “a Spanish horseman” (ein Spanischer Reiter).

Cheveril

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

He has a cheveril conscience. One that will easily stretch like cheveril or kid leather.

“Oh, here's a wit of cheveril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad!”— Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

“Your soft cheveril conscience would receive.

If you might please to stretch it.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 3.

Chevy Chase

There had long been a rivalry between the families of Percy and Douglas, which showed itself by incessant raids into each other's territory. Percy of Northumberland one day vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without condescending to ask leave of Earl Douglas. The Scotch warden said in his anger, “Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient.” The ballad called Chevy Chase mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Dr. Percy justly observes, was “a very different event.”

(Chaucer, chevachie, a military expedition on horseback.)

“To louder strains he raised his voice, to tell

What woful wars in `Chevy Chase' befell,

When Percy drove the deer with hound and horn, Wars to be wept by children yet unborn.”

Gay: Pastoral VI.

Chiabresco

(Italian). Poetry formed on the Greek model; so called from Gabriel Chiabrera, surnamed the “Pindar of Italy” (1552—1637).

Chiar—oscuro

[pronounce ke—ar—ros—ku'—ro . A style of painting now called “black and white.”

“Chiar—oscuro ... is the art of representing light in shadow and shadow in light, so that the parts represented in shadow shall still have the clearness and warmth of those in light; and those in light, the depth and softness of those in shadow.”— Chambers: Encyclopædia, iii. p. 171.

Chibiabos

The musician; the harmony of nature personified. He teaches the birds to sing and the brooks to warble as they flow. “All the many sounds of nature borrow sweetness from his singing.”

“Very dear to Hiawatha

Was the gentle Chibiabos.

For his gentleness he loved him,
And the magic of his singing.”

Longfellow: Hiawatha, vi.

Chibouque

(A). A smoking—pipe with a long tube, used in the East (Turkish).

Chic

Fashionable; comme il faut; the mode. This is an archaic French word in vogue in the seventeenth century. It really is the Spanish chico, little, also a little boy, and chica, a little girl or darling. Similarly, wee in Scotch is a loving term of admiration and pride. (Chic is an abbreviation of the German geschickt, apt, clever.)

“Juse de mots de l'art, je met en marge hic;

J'espere avec le tems que j'entendrai le chic.”

Les Satyres de Du Lorens, xii. p. 97.

Avoir le chic.

To have the knack of doing the thing smartly. Chicard and chicandard = elegant, de grand style, are very common expressions with artists.

Chichivache

(3 syl.). French for the “sorry cow,” a monster that lived only on good women— all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. The old English romancers invented another monster, which they called Bicorn, as fat as the other was lean; but, luckily, he had for food “good and enduring husbands,” of which there is no lack. (See Bicorn)

“O noble wyvës, full of heigh prudence,

Let noon humilitie your tongës nayle,

Ne lat no clerk have cause or diligence

To write of you a story of such mervayle

As of Griseldes, pacient and kynde,

Lest Chichi—vache you swolwe in hir entraile.”

Chaucer: L'Envoye de Chaucer, v. 9064.

The French chiche—face means “thin—face.” Lydgate wrote a poem entitled Bycorne and Chichevache.

Chick—a—bidy

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A child's name for a young chicken, and a mother's word of endearment to her young child. "Biddy" is merely the call of a child, bid—bid—bid—bid to a chicken.

"Do you, sweet Rob? Do you truly, chickabiddy?"—Dickens: Dombey and Son.

Chicken

(plural chickens). It is quite a mistake to suppose "chickens" to be a double plural. The Anglo—Saxon is cicen, plural cicen—u. We have a few plural forms in—en, as ox—en, brack—en, children, brethren, hosen, and eyen; but of these children and brethren are not the most ancient forms. "Chick" is a mere contraction of chicken.

The old plural forms of "child" are child—r—e, dialectic child—er; children is a later form. The old plural forms of "brother" are brothru, brothre, brethre; later forms are brethren and brothres (now brothers).

Children and chicken must always be pickin'.

Are always hungry and ready to eat food. To count your chickens ere they are hatched (Hudibras). To anticipate profits before they come. One of Æsop's fables describes a market woman saying she would get so much for her eggs, with the money she would buy a goose; the goose in time would bring her so much, with which she would buy a cow, and so on; but in her excitement she kicked over her basket, and all her eggs were broken. The Latins said, "Don't sing your song of triumph before you have won the victory" (ante victoriam canere triumphum). "Don't crow till you are out of the wood" has a similar meaning. (See page 36, col. 2, Alnaschar's Dream)

Curses like chickens come home to roost. (See under Curses) Mother Carey's chickens. (See Mother Carey)

She's no chicken.

Not young. The young child as well as the young fowl is called a chicken or chick. Chicken of St. Nicholas (The). So the Piedmontese call the ladybird, or little red beetle with spots of black, called by the Russians "God's little cow," and by the Germans, "God's little horse" sent as a messenger of love.

Chicken—hearted

Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid, and run to the wing of the hen upon the slightest cause of alarm.

Chien

Entre chien et loup. Dusk, between daylight and lamp—light; owligh.

"The best time to talk of difficult things is entre chien et loup, as the Guernsey folk say."—Mrs. Edwardes: A Girton Girl, chap. xlvi.

Chien de Jean de Nivelles

(Le), which never came when it was called. Jean de Nivelles was the eldest son of Jean II. de Montmorency, born about 1423. He espoused the cause of the Duke of Burgundy against the orders of Louis XI. and the wish of his father, who disinherited him. Bouillet says: Jean de Nivelles était devenu en France à cause du refus qu'il fit de répondre à l'appel de son roi un objet de haine et de mépris; et le peuple lui donna le surnom injurieux de chien, de là le proverbe.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“C'est le chien de Jean de Nivelles

Qui s'en fuit toujours quand on l'appelle.

The Italians call this Arlotto's dog.

Child

at one time, meant a female infant, and was the correlative of boy.

“Mercy on `s! A barne, a very pretty barne. A boy or a child, I wonder?”— Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iii. 3.

Child of God

(A), in the Anglican and Catholic Church, means one who has been baptised; others consider the phrase to mean one converted by special grace and adopted into the holy family of God's Church.

“In my baptism, wherein I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven.”— Church Catechism.

Child of the Cord

So the defendant was called by the judges of the vehmgericht in Westphalia, because everyone condemned by the tribunal was hanged to the branch of a tree.

Childe

as Childe Harold, Childe of Ellechilde Waters, Childe Roland, Childe Tristram, Childe Arthur, etc. In all these cases the word “Childe” is a title of honour, like the infante and infanta of Spain. In the times of chivalry, the noble youths who were candidates for knighthood were, during their time of probation, called infans, valets, damoyseles, and bacheliers. Childe or infant was the term given only to the most noble. (In Anglo—Saxon, the same word [cniht] means both a child and a knight.)

Childe Harold

A man sated of the world, who roams from place to place to flee from himself. The “childe” is, in fact, Lord Byron himself, who was only twenty—one when he began, and twenty—eight when he finished the poem. In canto i. (1809), he visited Portugal and Spain; in canto ii. (1810), Turkey in Europe; in canto iii. (1816), Belgium and Switzerland; and in canto iv. (1817), Venice, Rome, and Florence.

Children

The children in the wood. The master of Wayland Hall, Norfolk, on his deathbed left a little son, three years old, and a still younger daughter, named Jane, to the care of his wife's brother. The boy was to have 300 a year when he came of age, and the girl 500 as a wedding portion; but, if the children died previously, the uncle was to inherit. After twelve months had elapsed, the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the two babes. As they went along one of the ruffians relented, and killed his fellow; then, putting down the children in a wood, left them. The poor babes gathered blackberries to allay their hunger, but died during the night, and “Robin Redbreast” covered them over with strawberry leaves. All things went ill with the cruel uncle; his sons died, his barns were fired, his cattle died, and he himself perished in gaol. After the lapse of seven years, the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair. (Percy: Reliques, iii. ii. 18.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Then sad he sung `The Children in the Wood.' (Ah! barbarous uncle, stained with infant blood!) How blackberries they plucked in deserts wild,

And fearless at the glittering falchion smiled;

Their little corpse the robin—redbreast found,

And strewed with pious bill the leaves around.” Gay: Pastoral VI.

Children. Three hundred and sixty—five at a birth. It is said that the Countess of Henneberg accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty—two at the time.

as plural of “child.” (See under Chicken,) page 245, col. 2.)

Chilenos People of Chili.

Chilian

A native of Chili, pertaining to Chili, etc.

Chiliasts

[kiliasts]. Another word for Millenarians; those who believe that Christ will return to this earth and reign a thousand years in the midst of His saints. (Greek, chilias, a thousand.)

Chillingham Cattle

A breed of cattle (bos taurus) in the park of the Earl of Tankerville, supposed to be the last remnant of the wild oxen of Britain.

Chillon'

Prisoner of Chillon. Francois de Bonnavard, of Lunes. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered as martyrs. The father and two sons died on the battle—field; one was burnt at the stake; three were incarcerated in the dungeon of Chillon, near the lake of Geneva— of these, two died, and Francois was set at liberty by “the Bearnais.” Byron says that Bonnavard has left traces of his footsteps in the pavement of the dungeon. He was put in prison for “republican principles” by the Duke—Bishop of Savoy. (1496—1570.)

Chilminar'

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

and Balbec. Two cities built by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jan ben Jan, who governed the world long before the time of Adam. Chilminar, or the “Forty Pillars,” is Persepolis. These two cities were built as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chiltern Hundreds

(The). There are three, viz. Stoke, Desborough, and Bonenham (or Burnham). At one time the Chiltern Hills, between Bedford and Hertford, etc., were covered with beech trees which formed shelter for robbers; so a steward was appointed by the Crown to put down these marauders and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from depredations. The necessity of such watch and ward has long since ceased, but the office remains; and, since 1750, when a Member of Parliament wishes to vacate his seat, one way of doing so is by applying for the stewardship of the three Chiltern Hundreds. The application being granted, the Member is advanced to an office under the Crown, and his seat in the House is ex officio vacated. Immediately the Member has effected his object, he resigns his office again. The gift is in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was refused to a Member for Reading in 1842.

The Stewardships used for a similar purpose were Old Sarum (in Sussex), East Hendred (in Berks), the Manor of Poynings (in Sussex), Hempholwic (in Yorkshire), all of which have dropped out of use. The Stewardship of the Manor of Northstead (in Yorks) survives (1894), but the Escheatorships of Munster and Ulster were abolished in 1838.

The London Gazette of August 4, 1893, announced that the “Chancellor of the Exchequer has appointed William Henry Grenfell to be steward and bailiff of the Chiltern Hundreds in the room of John Morrogh, resigned.”

Chimaera

[kimera]. An illusory fancy, a wild, incongruous scheme, a castle in the air. Homer describes the chimæra as a monster with a goat's body, a lion's head, and a dragon's tail. It was born in Lycia, and was slain by Bellerophon. (Greek, chimaira, a shegoat.)

Chime in with

(To). To be in harmony with, to accord with, to fall in with. The allusion is to chiming bells.

“This chimed in with Mr. Dombey's own hope and belief.”— Dickens: Dombey and Son.

Chimney Money

or Hearth money. A Crown duty for every fireplace in a house (14 Car. ii. c. 2). Repealed by 1 Will. & Mary, i. c. 2.

Chimney-pot Hat

(A). The ordinary cylindrical black—silk hat, generally worn as more dressy than the soft felt hats or stiff billycocks. Called by the French cheminée.

Chinese Gordon

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

General Gordon (afterwards killed at Khartoum), who succeeded in putting down the Taëping rebellion, which broke out in 1851 and lasted fifteen years. The rebels had ravaged sixteen of the eighteen provinces, and had destroyed six hundred cities. In 1861 Ward raised an army called the “Ever Victorious,” which was placed under General Gordon, and in 1864 the rebellion was stamped out.

Chingachgook

The Indian chief in Fenimore Cooper's Last of the Mohicans, Pathfinder, Deerslayer, and Pioneer. Called in French Le Gros Serpent.

Chink

or Jink. Money; so called because it chinks or jingles in the purse. Thus, if a person is asked if he has money, he rattles that which he has in his purse or pocket.

“Have chinks in thy purse.” Tusser.

Chintz

means spotted. The cotton goods originally manufactured in the East. (Persian, chinz, spotted, stained; Hindu, chint, plur. chints; Sanscrit, chitra, variegated.)

Chios

(Kios). The man of Chios. Homer, who lived at Chios, near the Ægean Sea. Seven cities claim to be his place of birth—

“Smyrna, Rhodos, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athe'næ.”— Varro.

Chip

or Chips.

A carpenter is known by his chips.

A man is known to be a carpenter by the chips in his workshop, so the profession or taste of other men may be known by their manners or mode of speech. There is a broadcloth slang as well as a corduroy slang; a military, naval, school, and university slang.

Such carpenters, such chips.

As the workman, so his work will be.

Brother Chip.

Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to anyone of the same vocation as ourselves. (Es nostræ fasciæ; Petronius.)

The ship's carpenter is, at sea, commonly addressed as “chips.”

Saratoga chips.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Potatoes sliced thin while raw, and fried crisp. Sometimes called chipped potatoes.

Chip of the Old Block

(A). A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block. Burke applied the words to W. Pitt

Chiron

[Kiron]. The centaur who taught Achilles music, medicine, and hunting. Jupiter placed him in heaven among the stars, where he is called Sagittarius (the Archer).

Chiron,

according to Dantë, has watch over the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of hell.

Chirping Cup or Glass. A merry—making glass or cup of liquor. Wine that maketh glad the heart of man, or makes him sing for joy.

“A chirping cup is my matin song,

And my vesper bell is my bowl; Ding dong!”

A Friar of Orders Grey.

Chisel

I chiselled him means, I cheated him, or cut him out of something.

Chitty—faced

Baby—faced, lean. A chit is a child or sprout. Both chit and chitty—faced are terms of contempt. (Anglo—Saxon, cith, a twig, etc.)

Chivalry

The paladins of Charlemagne were all scattered by the battle of Roncesvallës. The champions of Diderick were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhilda, the bride of Ezzel, King of the Huns.

The Knights of the Round Table were all extirpated by the fatal battle of Camlan.

Chivalry.

The six following clauses may be considered almost as axioms of the Arthurian romances:— (1) There was no braver or more noble king than Arthur.

(2) No fairer or more faithless wife than Guiniver.

(3) No truer pair of lovers than Tristan and Iseult (or Tristram and Ysolde).

(4) No knight more faithful than Sir Kaye.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(5) None so brave and amorous as Sir Launcelot.

(6) None so virtuous as Sir Galahad.

The flower of Chivalry.

William Douglas, Lord of Liddesdale. (Fourteenth century.)

Chivy

A chase in the school game of "Prisoners' Base" or "Prison Bars." Probably a gipsy word. One boy sets a chivy, by leaving his bar, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home," the boy touched becomes a prisoner.

Chivy

or Chivvy. Slang for the face. Much slang is due to rhyme, and when the rhyme is a compound word the rhyming part is sometimes dropped and the other part remains. Thus Chivy [Chevy]—chase rhymes with "face," by dropping "chase" chivy remains, and becomes the accepted slang word. Similarly, daisies=boots, thus: daisy—roots will rhyme with "boots," and by dropping "roots," the rhyme, daisy remains. By the same process sky is the slang for pocket, the compound word which gave birth to it being "sky—rocket."

"Christmas" the slang for a railway guard, as "Ask the Christmas," is, of course, from the rhyme

"Christmas—card"; and "raspberry" the slang for heart, is from the rhyme "raspberry—tart."

"Then came a knock at the Rory o'More [door],

Which made my raspberry beat."

Other examples given under their proper heads.

Chlo'e

(Kloee). The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled Daphnis and Chloë. St. Pierre's tale of Paul and Virginia is founded on the exquisite romance of Longus.

Prior calls Mrs. Centlivre "Cloe."

Chloe

in Pope's Moral Essays (epist. ii.), Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II. "Content to dwell in decencies for ever."

Choereas

[Kereas]. The lover of Callirrhoë, in Chariton's Greek romance, called the Loves of Choereas and Callirrhoë. (Eighth century.)

Choice Spirit

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A) or “Choice Spirit of the Age,” a gallant of the day, being one who delights to exaggerate the whims of fashion.

Hobson's Choice.

(See Hobson.)

Choke

May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread, on which the mass had been said, given him to swallow. He put it in his mouth uttering the words given above, and if he could swallow it without being choked, he was pronounced innocent.

Tradition ascribes the death of the Earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread, after this solemn appeal.

(See Corsned .)

Choke—pear

An argument to which there is no answer. Robbers in Holland at one time made use of a piece of iron in the shape of a pear, which they forced into the mouth of their victim. On turning a key, a number of springs thrust forth points of iron in all directions, so that the instrument of torture could never be taken out except by means of the key.

Choker

(A). A neckcloth. A white choker is a white neckcloth or necktie, worn in full dress, and generally by waiters and clergymen. Of course, the verb to choke has supplied the word.

Chop

and Chops. Chop and change (To). To barter by the rule of thumb. Boys “chop” one article for another (Anglo—Saxon, cip—an, or ceáp—ian, to sell or barter).

A mutton chop is from the French coup—er, to cut off. A piece chopped off. The wind chops about. Shifts from point to point suddenly. This is cip—an, to barter or change hands. (See above To Chop And Change.)

“How the House of Lords and House of Commons chopped round.”— Thackeray: The Four Georges (George I.).

Chop—fallen

Crest—fallen; down in the mouth. (See next column, Chops .)

Chop—House

(A). An eating—house where chops and steaks are served.

“John Bull ... would set up a chop—house at the very gates of paradise.”— Washington Irving: vol. i. chap. vi. p. 61.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A Chinese custom—house is called a Chop—house (Hindu, chap, a stamp).

Chop Logic (To). To bandy words; to altercate. Lord Bacon says, “Let not the council chop with the judge.” (See Chop And Change .)

“How now, how now, chop logic! What is this? `Proud,' and `I thank you,' and `I thank you not,' And yet `not proud.’ “

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet,

iii. 5.

Chops

The face, is allied to the Latin caput, the head; Greek, kegaloz Anglo—Saxon ceafel, the snout; in the plural, the cheeks. We talk of a “pig's chap.”

The Latin cap—ut gives us the word chap, a fellow or man; and its alliance with chop gives us the term

“chapped” hands, etc. Everyone knows the answer given to the girl who complained of chapped lips: “My dear, you should not let the chaps come near your lips.”

Down in the chops— i.e.

down in the mouth in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down. (Anglo—Saxon, cealf, the snout or jaw; Icelandic, kiaptr.)

Chops of the Channel

The short broken motion of the waves, experienced in crossing the English Channel; also the place where such motion occurs.

Chopine

(2 syl.), or Chopin. A high—heeled shoe. The Venetian ladies used to wear “high—heeled shoes like stilts.” Hamlet says of the actress, “Your lady—ship is nearer to heaven, than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine” (act ii. s. 2). (Spanish, chapin, a high cork shoe.)

Choreu'tæ

[Korutee]. A sect of heretics, who, among other errors, persisted in keeping the Sunday a fast.

Choriambic Metre

Horace gives us a great variety, but the main feature in all is the prevalence of the choriambus. Specimen translations of two of these metres are subjoined:

(1) Horace, 1 Odes, viii.

Lydia, why on Stanley.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

By the great gods, tell me, I pray, ruinous love you centre? Once he was strong and manly,
Never seen now, patient of toil, Mars' sunny camp to enter.

E.C.B.

(2) The other specimen is 1 Odes, xii.

When you, with an approving smile,

Praise those delicate arms, Lydy, of Telephus, Ah me! how you stir up my bile!

Heart—sick, that for a boy you should forsake me thus.

E.C.B.

Chouans

(2 syl.). French insurgents of the Royalist party during the Revolution. Jean Cottereau was their leader, nicknamed chouan (owl), because he was accustomed to warn his companions of danger by imitating the screech of an owl. Cottereau was followed by George Cadoudal.

It is an error to suppose Chouan to be a proper name.

Choughs Protected

(See page 137, col. 1, Birds, etc.)

Chouse

(1 syl.). To cheat out of something. Gifford says the interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England is called chiaus, and in 1609 this chiaus contrived to defraud his government of 4,000, an enormous sum at that period. From the notoriety of the swindle the word chiaus or to chouse was adopted.

“He is no chiaus.”

Ben Jonson: Alchemist,

i. 1 (1610).

Chriem—hilda or Chriem—hild. A woman of unrivalled beauty, sister of Gunther, and beloved by Siegfried, the two chief heroes of the Nibelungenlied. Siegfried gives her a talisman taken from Gunther's lady—love, and Gunther, in a fit of jealousy, induces Hagen to murder his brother—in—law. Chriemhild in revenge marries Ezzel, King of the Huns; invites the Nibelungs to the wedding feast; and there they are all put to the sword, except Hagen and Gunther, who are taken prisoners, and put to death by the bride. (See Kriemhild.)

Chriss—cross Row

(row to rhyme with low). The alphabet in a horn—book, which had a cross at the beginning and end.

C

“Philosophy is all the go,
And science quite the fashion;
Our grandams learnt the Chriss—cross Row,
L—d, how their daughters dash on.”

Anon. in the Eaglet.

Chrisom

or Chrism signifies properly “the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrism”—i.e. a composition of oil and balm. In the Form of Private Baptism is this direction: “Then the minister shall put the white vesture, commonly called the chrisome, upon the child.” The child thus baptised is called a chrisom or chrisom child. If it dies within the month, it is shrouded in the vesture; and hence, in the bills of mortality, even to the year 1726, infants that died within the month were termed chrisoms. (The cloth is so called because it was anointed. Greek, chrisma, verb chrío, to anoint.)

“A' made a finer end and went away an it had been any chrisom child.”—Shakespeare: Henry

V., ii. 3.

Christabel

[Kristabel]. The heroine of Coleridge's fragmentary poem of that name.

Christabelle

[Kristabel]. Daughter of a “bonnie king” in Ireland. She fell in love with Sir Cauline (q.v.).

Christendom

[Kris'—en—dum] generally means all Christian countries; but Shakespeare uses it for baptism, or “Christian citizenship.” Thus, in King John, the young prince says:—

“By my christendom!

So I were out of prison and kept sheep,

I should be merry as the day is long.”

Act iv sc. 1.

Christian

[ch = k]. The hero of John Bunyan's allegory called The Pilgrim's Progress. He flees from the “City of Destruction,” and journeys to the “Celestial City.” He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross.

Christian.

A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi. 26). Most Christian Doctor. John Charlier de Gerson (1363—1429).

Most Christian King.

The style of the King of France. (1469.)

Pepin le Bref was so styled by Pope Stephen III. (714—768).

Charles le Chauve was so styled by the council of Savonnières (823, 840—877). Louis XI. was so styled by Pope Paul II. (1423, 1461—1483).

Since which time (1469) it was universally adopted in the French monarchy.

“And thou, O Gaul, with gaudy trophies plumed, `Most Christian king.' Alas! in vain assumed.”

Camoens: Lusiad, book vii.

Founder of Christian Eloquence.

Louis Bordaloue, the French preacher (1632—1704).

Christian Traditions

connected with natural objects. 1. Birds, Beasts, and Fishes.

The Ass: Cross on the back. (See Ass.)

Bunting.

(See Yellowhammer.)

The Crossbill has nothing to do with the Christian cross; the bird is so called, because its mandibles cross each other.

Haddock:

The finger—marks on the Haddock and John Dory. (See Haddock, etc.) Ichthus, a fish. (See Ichthus.)

Pike's

Head (q.v.).

Pigeons

or Doves: The Russians are averse to pigeons as a food, because the Holy Ghost assumed the form of a dove at the baptism of Jesus. (Sporting Magazine, January, 1825, p. 307.)

Robin Redbreast:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The red breast. (See Robin.) Stork: The cry of the Stork. (See Stork.) Swallow: The cry of the Swallow. (See Swallow.) Swine: The holes in the forefeet of Swine. (See Pigs.) 2. The Vegetable World.

The Arum, Aspen, Calvary—clover, Cedar (see also Cross), Dwarf—elder, Judas—tree, Passion—flower, Purple Orchis, Red Anemone, Rood Selken, Spotted Persicaria, Thistle.

(See these articles, and Flowers With Traditions Of Christ.)

3. The Number Thirteen. (See Thirteen.)

Christian'a [ch = k]

. The wife of Christian, who started with her children and Mercy from the "City of Destruction" long after her husband. She was placed under the guidance of Mr. Great—Heart, and went, therefore, in "silver slippers" along the thorny road (Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.).

Christmas

(Kristmas). "Christmas comes but once a year." (Thomas Tusser.)

Christmas

Slang for a railway—guard. Explained under Chivy (q.v.).

Christmas Box

A small gratuity given to servants, etc., on Boxing Day (the day after Christmas Day). In the early days of Christianity boxes were placed in churches for promiscuous charities, and opened on Christmas Day. The contents were distributed next day by the priests, and called the "dole of the Christmas box," or the "box money." It was customary for heads of houses to give small sums of money to their subordinates "to put into the box" before mass on Christmas Day. Somewhat later, apprentices carried a box round to their master's customers for small gratuities. The custom since 1836 has been gradually dying out.

"Gladly the boy, with Christmas—box in hand,

Throughout the town his devious route pursues, And of his master's customers implores

The yearly mite."

Christmas.

Christmas Carols

are in commemoration of the song of the angels to the shepherds at the nativity. Durand tells us that the bishops with the clergy used to sing carols and play games on Christmas Day. (Welsh, carol, a love—song; Italian, carola, etc.)

Christmas Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Transferred from the 6th of January to the 25th of December by Julius I. (337—352). Old Christmas Day. January 6th. When Gregory XIII. reformed the Calendar in 1582, he omitted ten days; but when the New Style was adopted in England in 1752, it was necessary to cut off eleven days, which drove back January 6th to December 25th of the previous year. So what we now call January 6th in the Old Style would be Christmas Day, or December 25th.

Christmas Decorations

The great feast of Saturn was held in December, when the people decorated the temples with such green things as they could find. The Christian custom is the same transferred to Him who was born in Bethlehem on Christmas Day. The holly or holy—tree is called Christ's—thorn in Germany and Scandinavia, from its use in church decorations and its putting forth its berries about Christmas time. The early Christians gave an emblematic turn to the custom, referring to the “righteous branch,” and justifying the custom from Isaiah lx. 13— “The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir—tree, the pine—tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary.”

Christmas Trees and Maypoles are remnants of the Scandinavian Ash, called Yggdrasil', the Tree of Time, whose roots penetrate to heaven, Niffheim and Ginnungagap (the gap of gaps). In Ginnungagap the frost giants dwell, in Niffheim is the great serpent Nidhögg; and under this root is Helheim, the home of the dead. We are told that the ancient Egyptians, at the Winter Solstice, used a palm branch containing twelve leaves or shoots to symbolise the “completion of the year.” The modern custom comes from Germany.

Christolytes

[Kris'—to—lites]. A sect of Christians that appeared in the sixth century. They maintained that when Christ descended into hell, He left His soul and body there, and rose only with His heavenly nature.

Christopher

(St.). The giant carried a child over a brook, and said, “Chylde, thou hast put me in grete peryll. I might bere no greater burden.” To which the child answered, “Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise.” This is an allegory: Christopher means Christ—bearer; the child was Christ, and the river was the river of death.

Chronicle Small Beer

(To). To note down events of no importance whatsoever.

“He was a wight, if ever such wight were ...

To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.”

Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1.

Chronicon ox Chronicis

is by Florence, a monk of Worcester, the earliest of our English chroniclers. It begins from Creation, and goes down to 1119, in which year the author died; but it was continued by another hand to 1141. Printed in 4to at London, 1592. Its chief value consists in its serving as a key to the Saxon chronicle.

Chronon—hoton—thologos

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[ch = k]. A burlesque pomposo in Henry Carey's farce, so called. Anyone who delivers an inflated address. See <http://www.chrononhotonthologos.com> “Aldiborontephoscophornio, where left you Chrononhotonthologos?”— H. Carey.

Chrysalis

[ch = k]. The form which caterpillars assume before they are converted into butterflies or moths. The chrysalis is also called an aurelia, from the Latin aurum, gold. The external covering of some species has a metallic, golden hue, but others are green, red, black, etc. (Greek, chrusos, gold.)

The plural is either chrysalises or chrysalides (4 syl.).

Chrysaor

[ch = k]. Sir Artegal's sword, “that all other swords excelled.” (Spenser: Faërie Queene.) (See Sword .)

Chrysippus

Nisi Chrysippus fuisset, Porticus non esset. Chrysippus of Soli was a disciple of Zeno the Stoic, and Cleanthes his successor. He did for the Stoics what St. Paul did for Christianity— that is, he explained the system, showed by plausible reasoning its truth, and how it was based on a solid foundation. Stoicism was founded by Zeno, it is true; but if Chrysippus had not advocated it, the system would never have taken root.

Chubb

(Thomas). A deistical writer who wrote upon miracles in the first half of the eighteenth century.

“He heard of Blount, of Mandeville, and Chubb.”

Crabbe: Borough.

Chuck Full

Probably a corruption of chock full or choke full — i.e. full enough to choke one.

“Ayr was holding some grand market; streets and inn had been chokefull during the sunny hours.”— Carlyle, in Froude's Jane W. Carlyle, vol. i. letter lxxxvii. p. 275.

Chukwa

The tortoise at the South Pole on which the earth is said to rest.

Chum

A crony, a familiar companion, properly a bedfellow; a corruption either of chamber—mate or comrade.

“To have a good chum is one of the pleasantest parts of a voyage.”— Nordhoff: Merchant Vessels, chap. xii. p. 164.

Chum in with

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(To). To be on friendly terms with. (See above.)

Church

The etymology of this word is generally assumed to be from the Greek, Kuriou oikos (house of God); but this is most improbable, as the word existed in all the Celtic dialects long before the introduction of Greek. No doubt the word means "a circle." The places of worship among the German and Celtic nations were always circular. (Welsh, cyrch, French, cirque; Scotch, kirk; Greek, kirk—os, etc.) Compare Anglo—Saxon circe, a church, with circol, a circle.

High, Low,

and Broad Church. Dr. South says, "The High Church are those who think highly of the Church and lowly of themselves; the Low Church, those who think lowly of the Church and highly of themselves"

(this may be epigrammatic, but the latter half is not true). Broad Church are those who think the Church is broad enough for all religious parties, and their own views of religion are chiefly of a moral nature, their doctrinal views being so rounded and elastic that they can come into collision with no one.

By the "High Church" now are meant those who follow the "Oxford Movement"; the "Low Church" party call themselves the "Evangelical" Church party.

The Church of Latter—day Saints.

The Mormons.

The Anglican Church.

That branch of the Protestant Church which, at the Reformation, was adopted in England. It disavowed the authority of the Pope, and rejected certain dogmas and rules of the Roman Church. Since 1532 generally called the "Established Church," because established by Act of Parliament.

The Catholic Church.

The Western Church called itself so when it separated from the Eastern Church. It is also called the Roman Catholic Church, to distinguish it from the Anglican Church or Anglican Catholic Church, a branch of the Western Church.

The Established Church.

The State Church, which, in England, is Episcopalian and in Scotland Presbyterian. Before the Reformation it was, in both countries, "Catholic;" before the introduction of Christianity it was Pagan, and before that Druidism. In Turkey it is Mohammedanism; in Russia the Greek Church; in China, India, etc., other systems of religion.

To go into the Church.

To take holy orders, or become an "ordained" clergyman.

Church—goer

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). One who regularly attends the parish church.

Church Invisible

(The). Those who are known to God alone as His sons and daughters by adoption and grace. (See Church Visible .)

“Oh, may I join the choir invisible.” G. Eliot.

Church Militant

The Church on earth means the whole body of believers, who are said to be “waging the war of faith” against “the world, the flesh, and the devil.” It is therefore militant, or in warfare. (See Church Triumphant .)

Church Porch

(The) was used in ancient times for settling money transactions, paying dowries, rents, and purchases of estates. Consequently, it was furnished with benches on both sides. Hence, Lord Stourton sent to invite the Hartgills to meet him in the porch of Kilmington church to receive the 2,000 awarded them by the Star Chamber. (Lord de Ros: Tower of London.)

Church Triumphant

(The). Those who are dead and gone to their rest. Having fought the fight and triumphed, they belong to the Church triumphant in heaven. (See Church Militant .)

Church Visible

(The). All ostensible Christians; all who profess to be Christians; all who have been baptised and admitted into Church Communion. (See Church Invisible .)

Churched

Baptized. To church a woman is to read the appointed service when a woman comes to church to return thanks to God for her “safe deliverance” and restored health.

Churchwarden

(A). A long clay pipe, such as churchwardens used to smoke some half a century ago when they met together in the parish tavern, after they had made up their accounts in the vestry, or been elected to office at the Easter meeting.

“Thirty years have enabled these [briar—root pipes] to destroy short clays, ruin meerschaums, and even do much mischief to the venerable church warden.”— Notes and Queries, April 25th, 1885 p. 323.

Churchyard Cough

(A). A consumptive cough indicating the near approach of death.

Chuzzlewit

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Martin). The hero of Dickens's novel so called. Jonas Chuzzlewit is a type of mean tyranny and sordid greed.

Chyndonax

A chief Druid, whose tomb, with a Greek inscription, was discovered near Dijon in 1598.

Ci—devant (French). Former, of times gone by. As Ci—devant governor — i.e. once a governor, but no longer so, Ci—devant philosophers means philosophers of former days.

“The appellation of mistress put her in mind of her ci—devant abigailship.”— Jane Porter: Thaddeus of Warsaw, chap. xxi.

Cicero

So called from the Latin, cicer (a wart or vetch). Plutarch says “a flat excrescence on the tip of his nose gave him this name.” His real name was (Tullius) Tully.

La Bouche de Ciceron.

Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428—1494.) The Cicero of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663—1742.)

The Cicero of Germany.

Johann III., elector of Brandenburg. (1455—1499.) The Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770—1827.)

The British Cicero.

William Pitt, Earl of Chatham (1708—1778.) The Christian Cicero. Lucius Coelius Lactantius, a Christian father, who died 330. The German Cicero. Johann Sturm, printer and scholar. (1507—1589.)

Cicerone

(4 syl.). A guide to point out objects of interest to strangers. So called in the same way as Paul was called by the men of Lystra “Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker” (Acts xiv. 12). Cicero was the speaker of speakers at Rome; and certainly, in a party of sight—seers, the guide is “the chief speaker.” It is no compliment to the great orator to call the glib patterer of a show—place a Cicero; but we must not throw stones at our Italian neighbours, as we have conferred similar honour on our great epic poet in changing “Grub Street” into “Milton Street.” Pronounce chick—e—reny.

“Every glib and loquacious hireling who shows strangers about their pleasure—galleries, palaces, and ruins is called [in Italy] a cicerone or a Cicero.”— Trench: On the Study of Words, lecture iii. p. 88.

In England, generally called “a guide.”

Cicisbe'o

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[che—chiz—bee'—o]. A dangler about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking—sticks, umbrellas, etc. Cicis—beism, the practice of dangling about women.

Ciclenius

or Cyllenius. Mercury. So called from mount Cyllene, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Cicuta

In Latin cicuta means the length of a reed up to the knot, such as the internodes made into a Pan—pipe. Hence Virgil (Ecl. ii. 36) describes a Pan—pipe as “septem compacta cicutis fistula.” It is called Cow—bane, because cows not unfrequently eat it, but are killed by it. It is one of the most poisonous of plants, and some think it made the fatal draught given to Socratus.

“Sicut cicuta homini venenum est, sic cicutæ vinum.”— Pliny, xiv. 7.

“Quæ poterunt unquam satis expurgare cicutæ.” Horace: 2 Epist. ii. 53.

Cid

Arabic for lord. Don Roderigo Laynez, Ruy Diaz (son of Diaz), Count of Bivar'. He was called “mio cid el campëador,” my lord the champion (1025—1099). Corruption of Saïd.

The Cid's horse.

Babieca. (3 or 4 syl.). (See Horse.) The Cid's sword. Colada. The sword taken by the Cid Roderigo from King Bucar was called Tizona. (See Sword.)

The Portuguese Cid.

Nunez Alvarez Pereira, general diplomatist. (1360—1431.)

Cid Hamet Benengeli The supposititious author of Don Quixote's Adventures.

Cigogne

(French). A stork. Conte de la cigogne. An old wife's tale; silly tittle—tattle. “On conte des choses merveilleuses de la cigogne” (wonderful stories are told of the stork). This, no doubt, refers to the numerous Swedish legends of the stork, one of which is that its very name is derived from a stork flying round the cross of Christ, crying, Styrka! Styrka! (strengthen, strengthen, or bear up), and as the stork has no voice at all, the legend certainly is a “Conte de la cigogne,” or old wife's fable.

“Japprehende qu'on ne croye que tout ce que j'ai rapporté jusqu'a present ne passe pour des contes de la cigogne, ou de ma mère Poie.”— Le Romam Bourgeois, 1713.

Cillaros

(See Horse.)

Cimmerian Bosphorus

C

The strait of Kaffa.

Cimmerian Darkness

Homer (possibly from some story as to the Arctic night) supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land “beyond the ocean—stream,” where the sun never shone. (Odys., xi. 14.)

“In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell.”

Milton: L'Allegro.

Cinchona

or Quinine. So named from the wife of the Contè del Chinchon, viceroy of Peru, whence the bark was first sent to Europe in 1640. Linnæus erroneously named it Cinchona for Chinchona. (See Peruvian Bark the Roman, was ploughing his field, when he was saluted as Dictator. After he had conquered the Volsci and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

.)

Cincinnatus

“And Cincinnatus, awful from the plough.”

Thomson: Winter,

512.

The Cincinnatus of the Americans.

George Washington (1732—1799).

Cinderella

[little cinder girl]. Heroine of a fairy tale. She is the drudge of the house, dirty with housework, while her elder sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper is a mistranslation of pantoufle en vair (a fur slipper), not en verre. (R. C. Perrault: Contes de Fées.)

Cinque Cento

An epithet applied to art between 1500—1600; called in France Renaissance, and in England Elizabethan. It was the revival of the classical or antique, but is generally understood as a derogatory term, implying debased or inferior art. The great schools of art closed with 1500. The “immortal five” great painters were all born in the previous century: viz. Leonardo da Vinci, born 1452; Michel Angelo, 1474; Titian, 1477; Raphael, 1480; and Correggio, 1494. Cinque Cento is the Italian for 500, omitting the thousand=mil cinque cento.

Cinque Ports

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). Originally the five seaports Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Romney, and Hythe. Subsequently Winchelsea and Rye were added.

Cinter

(A). The framing erected between piers to hold up the stones of an arch during the making thereof.

“Certain crude beliefs may be needful in the infancy of a nation, but when the arch is made, when the intelligence is fully developed, the cinter is thrown down and truth stands unsupported.”— E. D. Fawcett.

Cipher

Dr. Whewell's riddle is—

“A headless man had a letter (o) to write,

He who read it (naught) had lost his sight;

The dumb repeated it (naught) word for word,

And deaf was the man who listened and heard (naught).

Circe

(2 syl.). A sorceress. She lived in the island of Ææa. When Ulysses landed there, Circë turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphose by virtue of a herb called moly, given him by Mercury.

“Who knows not Circe,

The daughter of the Sun, whose charmèd cup

Whoever tasted lost his upright shape,

And downward fell into a grovelling swine?”

Milton: Comus, 50— 53.

Circle of Ulloa

A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather.

Circuit

The journey made through the counties of Great Britain by the judges twice a year. There are six circuits in England, two in Wales, and three in Scotland. Those in England are called the Home, Norfolk, Midland, Oxford, Western, and Northern; those of Wales, the North and South circuits; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circumbendibus

(A). He took a circumbendibus, i.e. he went round about and round about before coming to the point.

C

“Partaking of what scholars call the periphrastic and ambagitory, and the vulgar the circumbendibus.”— Sir W. Scott: Waverley, chap. xxiv.

Circumcellians

A sect of the African Donatists in the fourth century; so called because they rambled from town to town to redress grievances, forgive debts, manumit slaves, and set themselves up as the oracles of right and wrong. (Latin, circum—cello, to beat about.)

Circumcised Brethren

(in Hudibras). They were Prynne, Bertie or Burton, and Bastwick, who lost their ears and had their noses slit for lampooning Henrietta Maria and the bishops.

Circumlocution Office A term applied in ridicule to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to some one else; and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments, that every fly is crushed on a wheel. The term was invented by Charles Dickens, and appears in Little Dorrit.

Ciric—Sceat

or Church Scot. An ecclesiastical due, paid chiefly in corn, in the reign of Canute, etc., on St. Martin's Day.

Cist

(Greek kistê, Latin cista). A chest or box. Generally used as a coffer for the remains of the dead. The Greek and Roman cist was a deep cylindrical basket made of wickerwork, like a lady's work—basket. The basket into which voters cast their tablets was called a “cist;” but the mystic cist used in the rites of Ceres was latterly made of bronze.

Cist Urn

(A). An urn for the ashes of those buried in cists.

Cistercians

A religious order, so called from the monastery of Cistercium, near Dijon, in France. The abbey of Cistercium or Citeaux was founded by Robert, abbot of Molême, in Burgundy, at the close of the eleventh century.

Citadel

(A), in fortification, a small strong fort, constructed either within the place fortified, or on the most inaccessible spot of its general outline; to give refuge for the garrison, that it may prolong the defence after the place has fallen, or to hold out for the best terms of capitulation. Citadels generally command the interior of the place, and are useful, therefore, for overawing a population which might otherwise strive to shorten a siege. (French, citadelle; Italian, citadella, a little city.)

Cities

Cities of Refuge. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whither any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were

Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh. (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 1—8.)

The Cities of the Plain.

Sodom and Gomorrah.

“Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.”— Gen. xiii. 12.

The Seven Cities.

Egypt, Jerusalem, Babylon, Athens, Rome, Constantinople, and either London for commerce, or Paris for beauty. (See Pentapolis.)

Citizen King

(The). Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected king by the citizens of Paris. (Born 1773, reigned 1830—1848, died 1850.)

City

(A), strictly speaking is a large town with a corporation and cathedral; but any large town is so called in ordinary speech. In the Bible it means a town having walls and gates.

“The eldest son of the first man [Cain] builded a city (Gen. iv. 17)— not, of course, a Nineveh or a Babylon, but still a city.”— Rawbinson: Origin of Nations, part i. chap. i. p. 10.

City College

(The). Newgate. The wit is now a thing of the past.

City of Bells

(The). Strasburg.

“He was a Strasburgher, and in that city of bells had been a medical practitioner.”— Mayne Reid: The Scalp Hunters, chap. xxv.

City of David (The). Jerusalem. So called in compliment to King David. (2 Sam. v. 7, 9.)

City of Destruction

(The). This world, or rather, the world of the unconverted. Bunyan makes Christian flee from the “City of Destruction” and journey to the “Celestial City,” by which he allegorises the “walk of a Christian” from conversion to death.

City of God

(The). The church or whole body of believers; the kingdom of Jesus Christ, in contradistinction to the city of the World, called by John Bunyan the City of Destruction. The phrase is that of St. Augustine; one of his chief works bearing that title, or rather De Civitate Dei.

City of Lanterns

(The). A supposititious city in Lucian's Veræ Historiæ, situate somewhere beyond the zodiac. (See Lantern Land .)

City of Palaces

(The). Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, converted Rome from “a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces.” (Cf. Suetonius.) Calcutta is called the “City of Palaces.” Modern Paris well deserves the compliment of being so called.

City of Refuge

(The). Medina, in Arabia, where Mahomet took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca. He entered the city, not as a fugitive, but in triumph, A.D. 622. (See under Cities Of Refuge , page 255.)

City of St. Michael

(The). Dumfries, of which city St. Michael is the patron saint.

City of Saints

Montreal, in Canada, is so named because all the streets are named after saints.

“Mr. Geo. Martin ... said he came from [Montreal] a city of saints, where all the streets were named after saints.”— Secular Thought, September 10th, 1891.

City of the Great King

(The)— i.e. Jerusalem. (Psa. xlvi. 2; Matt. v. 35.)

City of the Seven Hills

(The). Rome, built on seven hills (Urbs septacollis). The hills are the Aventine, Cælian, Capitoline, Esquiline, Palatine, Quirinal, and Viminal.

The AVENTINE HILL was given to the people. It was deemed unlucky, because here Remus was slain. It was also called “Collis Dianæ,” from the Temple of Diana which stood there.

The CAELIAN HILL was given to Caelius Vibenna, the Tuscan, who came to the help of the Romans in the Sabine war.

The CAPITOLINE HILL or “Mons Tarpeius,” also called “Mons Saturni,” on which stood the great castle or capitol of Rome. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The ESQUILINE HILL was given by Augustus to Mecænas, who built thereon a magnificent mansion. The PALATINE HILL was the largest of the seven. Here Romulus held his court, whence the word “palace” (palatium).

The QUIRINAL HILL was where the Quirés or Curês settled. It was also called “Cabalinus,” from two marble statues of a horse, one of which was the work of Phidias, the other of Praxiteles.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The VIMINAL HILL was so called from the number of osiers (vimines) which grew there. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Viminalis.

City of the Sun

(The). A romance by Campanella, similar to the Republic of Plato, Utopia of Sir Thomas More, and Atlantis of Lord Bacon (1568—1639).

City of the Violet Crown

Athens is so called by Aristophanes iostefauoz (see Equites, 1323 and 1329; and Acharnians, 637). Macaulay refers to Athens as the “violet—crowned city.” Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes; and Greece, in Asia Minor, was called Ionia. Athens was the city of “Ion crowned its king” or “of the Violet crowned.” Similarly Paris is the “city of lilies”—i.e. fleurs—de—luce or Louis—flowers.

I do not think that Athens was called from “the purple hue which Hymettus assumed in the evening sky.”

Civic Crown

(See under Crown .)

Civil List

Now applied to expenses voted annually by Parliament to pay the personal expenses of the Sovereign, the household expenses, and the pensions awarded by Royal bounty; but before the reign of William III. it embraced all the heads of public expenditure, except those of the army and navy.

Civil Magistrate

(A). A civic or municipal magistrate, as distinguished from ecclesiastical authority.

Civil Service Estimates

(The), C.S.E. The annual Parliamentary grant to cover the expenses of the diplomatic services, the post—office and telegraphs, the grant for national education, the collection of the revenue, and other expenses neither pertaining to the Sovereign, the army, nor the navy.

Civil War

War between citizens (civilês). In English history the term is applied to the war between Charles I. and his Parliament; but the War of the Red and White Roses was a civil war. In America the War of Secession (1861—1865) was a civil war.

Civis Romanus Sum

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

This single plea sufficed to arrest arbitrary condemnation, bonds, and scourging. Hence, when the centurion commanded Paul “to be examined by scourging,” he virtually pleaded “Civis Romanus sum”; and asked, “Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen, and uncondemned?” (1) No Roman citizen could be condemned unheard; (2) by the Valerian Law he could not be bound; (3) by the Sempronian Law it was forbidden to scourge him, or to beat him with rods. (See also Acts xvi. 37, etc.)

Civitas Solis

A political and philosophical romance by Thomas Campanella (1568—1639), born at Stillo, or Stilo, in Italy. This romance is a kind of Utopia, formed on the model of Plato's Republic. His society is a sort of convent—life established on the principles of a theocratic communism.

Clabber Napper's Hole

Near Gravesend; said to be named after a free—booter; but more likely the Celtic Caerber l'arber (water—town lower camp).

Clack Dish

A dish or basin with a movable lid. Some two or three centuries ago beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish.

“Can you think I get my living by a bell and clack—dish?”

... “How's that? “Why, begging, sir.” Family of Love (1608).

Claft

An Egyptian head—dress with long lappets pendent on the shoulders, as in the statue of Amenophis III.

Clak—ho—haryah

At Fort Vancouver the medium of intercourse is a mixture of Canadian—French, English, Indian, and Chinese. An Englishman goes by the name of Kint—shosh, a corruption of King George; an American is called Boston; and the ordinary salutation is clak—ho—haryah. This is explained by the fact that the Indians, frequently hearing a trader named Clark addressed by his companions, “Clark, how are you?” imagined this to be the correct English form of salutation. (Taylor: Words and Places.)

Clam

(See Close As A Clam .)

Clan—na—Gael

(The). An Irish Fenian organisation founded in Philadelphia in 1870, and known in secret as the “United Brotherhood”; its avowed object being to secure “the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connection between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland.” (See Dynamite Saturday .)

In 1883 Alexander Sullivan was elected one of the three heads of this club, to which is due the dynamite outrages in London (January, 1885), and the design to murder the Queen's ministers.

Clap—trap

Something introduced to win applause: something really worthless, but sure to take with the groundlings. A trap to catch applause.

Clapper

A plank bridge over a stream; a ferry—gate. A roofing—board is called a clap—board.

“A little low and lonesome shed,

With a roof of clap—boards overhead.”

Alice Cary: Settlers' Christmas Eve.

Probably a corruption of clath—board, a covering board, from Anglo—Saxon, clath, a covering, whence our clothes.

Boards for making casks are also called “clap—boards.”

Clapperclaw

To jangle and claw each other about. (Dutch and German, klappen, to strike, clatter.)

“Now they are clapper—clawing one another I'll go look on.”— Shakespeare: Troilus, and Cressida, v. A.

A clapper—claw is a back—scratcher.

Clapper — dudgeons

Abram—men (q.v.). The clapper is the tongue of a bell, and in cant language the human “tongue.” Dudgeon is a slang word for a beggar.

Clapping the Prayer Books

OR stamping the feet, in the Roman Catholic Church, on Good Friday, is designed to signify the abandonment of our Saviour by His disciples. This is done when twelve of the thirteen burning candles are put out. The noise comes from within the choir.

Claque;

Claqueurs Applause by clapping the hands; persons paid for doing so. M. Sauton, in 1820, established in Paris an office to ensure the success of dramatic pieces. He was the first to organise the Parisian claque. The manager sends an order to his office for any number of claqueurs, sometimes for 500 or even more. The class is divided into commissaires, those who commit the pieces to memory and are noisy in pointing out its merits; rieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs chiefly women, who are to hold their pocket—handkerchiefs to their eyes at the moving parts; chatouilleurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bisseurs, who are to cry (bis) encore. The Romans had their Laudicoeni (q.v.).

Claras

(Stock Exchange term) The Chatham, London, and Dover Railway Ordinary Stock (C L.R.S.)

Clare

(St.) A religious order of women, the second that St. Francis instituted. It was founded in 1213, and took its name from its first abbess.

Clarenceux King—of—Arms

One of the two provincial heralds, with jurisdiction over the southern provinces. The name was taken in honour of the Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. The herald of the northern provinces is called Norroy King—of—Arms.

Garner—King—of—Arms, also “Principal King—of—Arms,” has to attend on Knights of the Garter, and arrange whatever is required in connection with these knights. There is a Bath King—of—Arms, not a member of the college, to attend on Knights of the Bath.

Clarendon

The Constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by a general council of nobles and prelates, held at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, in 1164, to check the power of the Church, and restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These famous ordinances, sixteen in number, define the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the Pope in these realms.

Clarendon Type

The black letters which head these articles are so called.

Claret

The wine so called does not receive its name from its colour, but the colour so called receives its name from the wine. The word means clarified wine (vinum claretum) What we call hippocras was called claretum, made of wine and honey clarified.

Claret

Blood. To broach one's claret. To give one a bloody nose; so called from the claret colour.

Claret Cup

A drink made of claret, brandy, lemon, borage, sugar, ice, and carbonated water

Claret Jug

(One's) One's nose. (See above, Claret)

To tap one's claret jug

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To give one a bloody nose. “Tap” is meant for a pun— to broach and to knock.

Classic Races

(The). The five chief horse—races in England, viz. the 2,000 and 1,000 guinea races for two—year—olds, run at Newmarket, the Derby for fillies and colts, the Oaks for fillies only, and the St. Leger.

Classics

The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into six classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus, all the rest were said to be infra clàssem. From this the best authors were termed classici aucto'rës (classic authors), i.e. authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin were held at the revival of letters obtained for these authors the name of classic, emphatically; and when other first—rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, etc., classics.

Claude Lorraine

(i.e. of Lorraine). This incorrect form is generally used in English for the name of Claude le Lorrain, or Claude Gelée, the French landscape painter, born at the Château—de—Chamagne, in Lorraine.

(1600—1682.)

The Scotch Claude.

Thomas of Duddingston (near Edinburgh)

Claus

(Santa). (See Santa Claus)

Clause

Letter—clause, a close letter sealed with the royal signet or privy—seal, in opposition to letters—patent, which are left open, the seal being attached simply as a legal form (“Clause,” Latin clausus, shut, closed.

“Patent,” Latin patens, open.)

Clause Rolls

(Rotuli clausi). Close Rolls. (See Close Rolls)

“Clause Rolls contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs. These Rolls are preserved in the Tower”—Jacob: Law Dictionary

Clavie

Burning of the Clavie on New—year's eve (old style) in the village of Burghead, on the southern shore of the Moray Frith. The clavie is a sort of bonfire made of casks split up. One of the casks is split into two parts of different sizes, and an important item of the ceremony is to join these parts together with a huge nail made for the purpose. Whence the name clavus (Latin), a nail. Chambers, who in his Book of Days (vol. ii. p. 789) minutely describes the ceremony, suggests that it is a relic of Druid worship, but it seems to me to be connected with the Roman ceremony observed on the 13th September, and called the clavus annalis. The two divisions of the cask, I think, symbolise the old and the new year, which are joined together by a nail. The two parts are unequal, because the part of the new year joined on to the old is very small in comparison.

Clavileno The wooden horse on which Don Quixote got astride, in order to disenchant the Infanta Antonomasia and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of Queen Maguncia, of Canday'a. It was the very horse on which Peter of Provence carried off the fair Magalona; it was constructed by Merlin, and was governed by a wooden pin in the forehead. (The word means Wooden Peg.) (Don Quixote, part ii. book 3, chaps. 4, 5.) (See Cambuscan) means the foot of an animal armed with claws; a hand. To claw is to lay one's hands upon things. It also means to tickle with the hand; hence to please or flatter, puff or praise. (Anglo—Saxon, clawu, a claw, with the verb clawian, to claw.)

Claw me and I will claw thee, means, “praise me, and I will praise you,” or, scratch my back, and I will do the same for you.

“Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour.”— Shakespeare: Much Ado, etc., i.

3.

Claw—backs

Flatterers. Bishop Jewel speaks of “the Pope's claw—back.” (See above, and Clapperclaws)

Claymore

or Glaymore (2 syl.) is the Celtic glaiif (a bent sword), Gaelic claidheamh (a sword), and mór (great). (See Morglay)

“I've told thee how the Southrons fell

Beneath the broad claymore.”

Aytoun: Execution of Montrose, stanza 2

Clean

Free from blame or fault.

“Ye are clean, but not all.”— John xiii. 10.

BILL. To show a clean bill of health. (See page 135, col. 1, Bill Of Health.) BREAST. To make a clean breast or Make a clean breast of it. To make a full and unreserved confession. HANDS. To have clean hands. To be quite clear of some stated evil. Hence “clean—handed.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To keep the hands clean.

Not to be involved in wrong—doing.

HEART. To have a clean heart. A righteous spirit.

“Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me.”— Psalm li. 10.

HEELS. To show a clean pair of heels. To make one's escape, to run away. Here “clean” means free from obstruction.

“The Maroons were runaway slaves who had ... shown their tyrants a clean pair of heels”— Sala.

LIFE. To live a clean life. Blameless and undefiled.

TONGUE. A clean tongue. Not abusive, not profane, not foul.

Clean

(To).

Clean away!

Scrub on, go on cleaning, etc. To clean down. To sweep down, to swill down. To clean out. To purify, to make tidy. Also, to win another's money till his pocket is quite empty. To clean up. To wash up, to put in order.

Clean, used adverbially, means entirely, wholly; as, “you have grown clean out of knowledge,” i.e. wholly beyond recognition.

Clean and Unclean Animals

Pythagoras taught the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, but that it never entered into those animals which it is lawful to eat. Hence those animals which were lawful food for man were those into which the human soul never entered; but those into which the human soul entered were unclean or not fit for human food. This notion existed long before the time of Pythagoras, who learnt it in Egypt.

In the Old Testament, those animals which chew the cud and part the hoof were clean, and might be eaten. Hares and rabbits could not be eaten because (although they chew the cud) they do not part the hoof. Pigs and camels were unclean, because (although they part the hoof) they do not chew the cud. Birds of prey were accounted unclean. Fish with fins and scales were accounted fit food for man. (Lev. xi.)

Cleaned Out

Impoverished of everything. De Quincey says that Richard Bentley, after his lawsuit with Dr. Colbatch, “must have been pretty well cleaned out.”

Clear

(verb).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Clear away.

Remove.

Clear off!

Away with you! Take away. Clear out. Empty out, make tidy. (See below, Clear Out For Guam.) Clear up. Become fine after rain or cloudiness; to make manifest; to elucidate what was obscure. To clear an examination paper. To floor it, or answer every question set.

To clear the air.

To remove the clouds, mists, and impurities. To clear the dishes. To empty them of their contents.

To clear the room.

To remove from it every thing or person not required. To clear the table To remove what has been placed on it.

Clear the Court

Remove all strangers, or persons not officially concerned in the suit.

Clear the Decks

Prepare for action by removing everything not required. Clear used adverbially means wholly, entirely, as, "He is gone clear away," "Clear out of sight."

Clear

(the adjective)

A clear head.

— A mind that can understand clearly anything which it grasps. A clear statement. A straightforward and intelligible statement.

A clear style

[of writing] A lucid method of expressing one's thoughts.

Clear as Crystal. Clear as Mud

(See Similes)

Clear—coat A mixture of size, alum, and whitening, for sizing walls. To cover over whatever might show through the coat of colour or paper to be put on it, also to make them stick or adhere more firmly.

Clear Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A) A bright day, an entire day, as, “The bonds must be left three clear days for examination,” to examine them before the interest is paid.

Clear Grit

(The) The real thing, as “champagne is ... if it be but the clear grit” (Anglo—Saxon, gryt, bolted flour).

A man of grit, or clear grit, is one of decision, from whom all doubt or vacillation has been bolted out, as husks from fine flour.

Clear Out For Guam

(To) The ship is bound for no specific place. In the height of the gold fever, ships were chartered to carry passengers to Australia without having return cargoes secured for them. They were, therefore, obliged to leave Melbourne in ballast, and to sail in search of homeward freights. The Custom House regulations required, however, that, on clearing outwards, some port should be named; and it became the habit of captains to name “Guam” (a small island of the Ladrone group) as the hypothetical destination. Hence, “to clear out for Guam” came to mean, clear out for just anywhere—we are bound for whatever coast we may choose to venture upon (See Notes and Queries, April 18th 1885, p. 314)

Clear Voice

(A) A voice of pure intonation, neither husky, mouthy, nor throaty

Cleared out

I am quite cleared out. I have spent all my money, I have not a farthing left. In French, Je suis Anglé (See French Leave .) Cleared out means, my purse or pocket is cleared out of money.

Clearing House

A building in Lombard Street, set apart, since 1775, for interchanging bankers' cheques and bills. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to their respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets. The origin of this establishment was a post at the corner of Birchin Lane and Lombard Street, where banking clerks met and exchanged memoranda.

Railway lines have also their “Clearing Houses” for settling the “tickets” of the different lines. A “clearing banker” is a banker who has the entrée of the clearing house.

“London has become the clearing—house of the whole world, the place where international debts are exchanged against each other. And something like 5,000 million pounds'—worth of checks and bills pass that clearing yearly.”—A C Perry Elements of Political Economy. p. 363.

Cleave

Either to stick to or to part from. A man “shall cleave to his wife” (Matt. xix. 5). As one that “cleaveth wood” (Psalm cxli. 7). The former is the Anglo—Saxon clif—an, to stick to, and the latter is cleof—an, to split.

Clelia

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a smattering of everything. In youth she coquetted, and, when youth was passed, tried sundry ways of earning a living, but always without success. It is a character in Crabbe's Borough.

Clelie

A character in Madam Scudéri's romance so called. This novel is a type of the buckram formality of Louis XIV. It is full of high—flown compliments, theatrical poses, and cut—and—dry sentiments.

Clement

(St.). Patron saint of tanners, being himself a tanner. His symbol is a pot, because November the 23rd, St. Clement's Day, is the day on which the early Danes used to go about begging for ale.

Clementina (The Lady). In love with Sir Charles Grandison, who marries Harriet Biron. (Richardson: Sir Charles Grandison.) and Clinch. To clench is to grasp firmly, as, "He clenched my arm firmly," "He clenched his nerves bravely to endure the pain." (Anglo—Saxon, be—clencan, to hold fast.)

Clench

To clinch is to make fast, to turn the point of a nail in order to make it fast. Hence, to clinch an argument. (Dutch, klinken, to rivet. Whence "clinker—built," said of a ship whose planks overlap each other, and are riveted together.)

I gave him a clencher

(should be "clincher"). I nailed him fast.

Cleombrotos

(4 syl.). A philosopher who so admired Plato's Phaedon that he jumped into the sea in order to exchange this life for a better. He was called Ambraciota (of Ambracia), from the place of his birth in Epirus.

"He who to enjoy

Plato's elysium, leaped into the sea,

Cleombrotus."

Milton: Paradise Lost,

iii. 471—3.

Cleon

The personification of glory in Spenser's Faërie Queene.

Cleopatra

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

was introduced to Julius Caesar by Apollodorus in a bale of rich Syrian rugs. When the bale was unbound, there was discovered the fairest and wittiest girl of all the earth, and Caesar became her captive slave.

Cleopatra and her Pearl

It is said that Cleopatra made a banquet for Antony, the costliness of which excited his astonishment; and, when Antony expressed his surprise, Cleopatra took a pearl ear—drop, which she dissolved in a strong acid, and drank to the health of the Roman triumvir, saying, “My draught to Antony shall far exceed it.” There are two difficulties in this anecdote— the first is, that vinegar would not dissolve a pearl; and the next is, that any stronger acid would be wholly unfit to drink. Probably the solution is this: the pearl was sold to some merchant, whose name was synonymous with a strong acid, and the money given to Antony as a present by the fond queen. The pearl melted, and Cleopatra drank to the health of Antony as she handed him the money. (See “Gresham” in Reader's Handbook.)

Clergy

The men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's first epistle (ch. v. 3) the Church is called “God's heritage” or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the “lot or heritage of the Lord.” (Greek, Latin, clerus and clericus, whence Norman clerex and clerkus; French, clergé.)

Benefit of clergy.

(See Benefit)

Clergymen

The dislike of sailors to clergymen on board ship arises from an association with the history of Jonah. Sailors call them a kittle cargo, or kittlish cargo, meaning dangerous. Probably the disastrous voyage of St. Paul confirmed the prejudice.

Clerical Titles

(1) CLERK. As in ancient times the clergyman was about the only person who could write and read, the word clerical, as used in “clerical error,” came to signify an orthographical error. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk, and the assistants in writing, etc., are so termed in business.

(Latin, clericus, a clergyman.)

(2) CURATE. One who has the cure of souls. As the cure of the parish used to be virtually entrusted to the clerical stipendiary, the word curate was appropriated to this assistant.

(3) RECTOR. One who has the parsonage and great tithes. The man who rules or guides the parish. (Latin, “a ruler.”)

(4) VICAR. One who does the “duty” of a parish for the person who receives the tithes. (Latin, vicarius, a deputy.)

(5) INCUMBENT and PERPETUAL CURATE are now termed Vicars. (See Parsons)

The French curé equals our vicar, and their vicaire our curate.

Clerical Vestments

(1) White. Emblem of purity, worn on all feasts, saints' days, and sacramental occasions. (2) Red. The colour of blood and of fire, worn on the days of martyrs, and on Whit—Sunday, when the Holy Ghost came down like tongues of fire.

(3) Green. Worn only on days which are neither feasts nor fasts.

(4) Purple. The colour of mourning, worn on Advent Sundays, in Lent, and on Ember days.

(5) Black. Worn on Good Friday, and when masses are said for the dead.

Clerimond

Niece of the Green Knight (q.v.), bride of Valentine the brave, and sister of Ferragus the giant. (Valentine and Orson.)

Clerk

A scholar. Hence, beau—clerc. (See above, Clerical Titles .)

“All the clerks,

I mean the learned ones, in Christian kingdoms, Have their free voices.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII.,

ii. 2.

St. Nicholas's Clerks.

Thieves. An equivoque on the word Nick.

“I think there came prancing down the hill a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks.”— Rowley: Match at Midnight, 1633.

Clerk—ale and Church—ale. Mr. Douce says the word “ale” is used in such composite words as bride—ale, clerk—ale, church—ale, lamb—ale, Midsummer—ale, Scot—ale, Whitsun—ale, etc., for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor given.

“The multitude call Church—ale Sunday their revelyng day, which day is spent in bulbeatings, bearbeating, ... dicing, ... and drunkenness.”— W. Kethe (1570).

Clerkenwell

(London) means the Clerks'—well, where the parish clerks of London used to assemble yearly to play some sacred piece.

Clerkly

Cleverly; like a scholar.

“I thank you, gentle servant: `tis very clerkly done.”

Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona,

iii. 1.

Client

In Roman history meant a plebeian under the patronage of a patron. The client performed certain services, and the patron protected the life and interests of the client. The word is now a legal one, meaning a person who employs the services of a legal adviser to protect his interests.

Clifford

(Paul). A highwayman, reformed by the power of love, in Sir L. Bulwer Lytton's novel so called.

Climacteric

It was once believed that 7 and 9, with their multiples, were critical points in life; and 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climacteric, which few persons succeeded in outliving.

“There are two years, the seventh and the ninth, that commonly bring great changes in a man's life, and great dangers; wherefore 63, that contains both these numbers multiplied together, comes not without heaps of dangers.”— Levinus Lemnius.

Climacteric Years

are seventh and ninth, with their multiples by the odd numbers 3, 5, 7, 9— viz. 7, 9, 21, 27, 35, 45, 49, 63, and 81, over which astrologers supposed Saturn, the malevolent planet, presided. Hippocrates recognises these periods. (See Nine) means a stair (Greek), applied to the last of a gradation of arguments, each of which is stronger than the preceding. The last of a gradation of words of a similar character is also called a climax. The point of highest development.

Climax

“In the very climax of his career ... he was stricken down.”— Chittenden: Recollections of Lincoln chap. xlv. p. 454.

Climb

On the climb. Under the hope of promotion. Thomas Becket, after he became Cardinal—archbishop of Canterbury, was at the top of the tree, and no further promotion was in the power of the king to bestow. Being no longer on the climb, he could set the king at defiance, and did do so.

Clinch

To bend the point of a nail after it is driven home. The word is sometimes written clench, from the French clenche, the lift of a latch. (German, klinke; Dutch, klinken, to rivet.) (See page 261, col. 1, Clench)

That was a clincher.

That argument was not to be gainsaid, that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it “as a nail in a sure place.”

A lie is called a clincher from the tale about two swaggerers, one of whom said, “I drove a nail right through the moon.” “Yes,” said the other, “I remember it well, for I went the other side and clinched it.” The French say, Je lui ai bien rivé son clou (I have clinched his nail for him).

Clinker

(Humphrey). Hero of Smollett's novel so called. The general scheme of Oliver Twist resembles it. Humphrey is a workhouse boy, put out apprentice; but being afterwards reduced to great want, he attracts the notice of Mr Bramble, who takes him into his service. He turns out to be Bramble's natural son, and falls in love with Winifred Jenkins, Miss Bramble's maid.

Clio

was one of the nine Muses, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry.

Clio.

Addison is so called because his papers in the Spectator are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters of Chelsea, London, Islington, Office. (See Notarica)

See

Professor Morley's “Introduction to the Spectator, ” on the subject.

Clipper

A fast—sailing ship.

“We shall have to catch the Aurora, and she has a name for being a clipper.”— A. C. Doyle: The Sign of Four, chap. x.

She's a clipper. Said of a stylish or beautiful woman. A first—class craft.

Clipping Pace

(A). Very fast. A clipper is a fast—sailing vessel.

“Leaving Bolus Head, we scudded on at a clipping pace, and the skiff yielded so much to the breeze that Bury said we must reef the mainsail.”— W. S. Trench: Realities of Irish Life, chap. x

Cliquot

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(of Punch celebrity). A nickname of Frederick William IV. of Prussia called from his fondness for champagne (1795, 1840—1861)

Cloacina

Goddess of sewers (Latin, cloaca, a sewer)

“Then Cloacina, goddess of the tide.

Whose sable streams beneath the city glide

Indulged the modish flame, the town she loved

A mortal scavenger she saw she loved.”

Gay Trivia

ii.

Cloak and Sword Plays

Modern comedy, played in the ordinary costume of modern life. The phrase was adopted by Canderon who lived in Spain while gentlemen were accustomed to wear cloaks and swords For tragedy the men actors wore either heraldic or dramatico—historic dresses. In England actors in tragedy and old comedy wore the costume of Charles II's period, till quite recently

Clock

So church bells were once called (German glocke, French, cloche Mediæval Latin, cloca)

“Wel sikerer [surer] was his crowyng in his logge

Than is a klok [bell] or abbay orologge”

Chaucer The Nonne Prestes Tale (1639—40)

Clock

The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's Memorials of Westminster, and refers to John Hatfield, who died 1770, aged 102. He was a soldier in the reign of William III, and was brought before a court—martial for falling asleep on duty upon Windsor Terrace. In proof of his innocence he asserted that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen, which statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

Clodhopper

A farmer, who hops or walks amongst the clods. The cavalry call the infantry clodhoppers, because they have to walk instead of riding horseback.

Clog Almanac

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A primitive almanac or calendar, originally made of a “clog,” or log of wood, with four faces or parallelograms, the sharp edge of each face or side was divided by notches into three months, every week being marked by a big notch. The face left of the notched edge contained the saints' days, the festivals, the phases of the moon, and so on in Runic characters, whence the “clog” was also called a Runic staff. These curiosities are not uncommon, and specimens may be seen in the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the Ashmolean Museum, St. John's (Cambridge), the Cheetham Library (Manchester), and other places both at home and abroad.

Cloister

He retired into a cloister, a monastery. Almost all monasteries have a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupied three sides of a quadrangle.

Cloridano

(in Oriando Furioso) A humble Moorish youth, who joins Medoro in seeking the body of King Dardinello to bury it. Medoro being wounded, Cloridano rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain.

Clorinda

(in Jerusalem Delivered) A female knight who came from Persia to oppose the Crusaders, and was appointed by Aladine leader of all the Pagan forces. Tancred fell in love with her, but not knowing her in a night attack slew her after a most dreadful combat. Before she died she received Christian baptism at the hands of Tancred, who mourned her death with great sorrow of heart. (Book xii.)

Senapus of Ethiopia (a Christian) was her father but her being born white alarmed her mother, who changed her babe for a black child. Arse'tës, the eunuch, was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest he saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and suckled, it after which Arsetes left Ethiopia with the child for Egypt.

Close as a Clam

A clam is a bivalve mollusca, which burrows in sand or mud. It is about the size of a florin, and may be eaten raw or fried like an oyster. Clams are gathered only when the tide is out. When the tide is in they are safe from molestation, hence the saying “Happy as a clam at high tide”. (Anglo—Saxon clam, mud verb claem—ian, to glue German, klamm, close) are mandates, letters, and writs of a private nature, addressed, in the Sovereign's name, to individuals and folded or closed and sealed on the outside with the Great Seal.

Close Rolls

Patent

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Closh

(Mynherr). A Dutch Jack—tar. Closh is corrupt form of Claus, a contraction of Nicholas, a name as common with the Dutch as Jack is with the English people.

Cloten

A vindictive lout who wore his dagger in his mouth. He fell in love with Imogen, but his love was not reciprocated (Shakespeare Cymbeline.)

Cloth

(The). The clergy, the clerical office, thus we say “having respect for the cloth” Formerly the clergy used to wear a distinguishing costume, made of grey or black cloth.

Clotharius

or Clothaire (in Jerusalem Delivered) At the death of Hugo he takes the lead of the Franks, but is shot by Clorinda (q.v.) with an arrow (book xi.). After his death, his troops sneak away and leave the Christian army (book xiii.).

Clotho

in Classic mythology One of the Three Fates. She presided over birth, and drew from her distaff the thread of life, Atropos presided over death and cut the thread of life, and Lachesis spun the fate of life between birth and death. (Greek, klótho, to draw thread from a distaff.)

“A France slashed asunder with Clotho—scissors and civil war”— Carlyle. (This is an erroneous allusion It was Atropos who cut the thread.)

Cloud, Clouds

He is in the clouds In dreamland, entertaining visionary notions; having no distinct idea about the matter in question.

He is under a cloud.

Under suspicion, in disrepute.

To blow a cloud is to smoke a cigar or pipe.

Cloud

A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. A white spot is called a star, and an elongated star is a blaze. (See Blaze)

“Agrippa He [Antony] has a cloud on his face.

Enobarbus.

He were the worse for that were he a horse” Shakespeare. Antony and Cleopatra, iii 2

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cloud

(St.). Patron saint of nailsmiths, by a play upon the French word clou, a nail.

Clouded Cane

(A.) A malacca cane clouded or mottled from age and use. These canes were very fashionable in the first quarter of the present century.

Cloven foot

To show the cloven foot, i.e. to show a knavish intention, a base motive. The allusion is to Satan, represented with the legs and feet of a goat; and, however he might disguise himself, he could never conceal his cloven feet. (See Bag O'Nails, Goat .)

“Real grief little influenced its composition and the cloven foot peeps out in some letters written by him at the period.”— St. James's Magazine

Clover

He's in clover. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle feeding in clover fields.

Clowns

The three most celebrated are Joseph Grimaldi (1779—1837), the French Carlin (1713—1783), and Richard Tarlton, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, who acted at the galleried inn called the Belle Sauvage.

“To sit with Tarlton on an alehouse signe.”

Bishop Hall: Satires.

Club

A society of persons who club together, or form themselves into a knot or lump. The word was originally applied to persons bound together by a vow. (German, gelübde) (See Cards 4 clubs.)

“[1190] was the era of chivalry, for bodies of men uniting themselves by a sacred vow, gelubde, which word and thing have passed over to us in a singularly dwindled condition, `club' we call it; and the vow does not rank very high”— Carlyle: Frederick the Great vol i. p 111

Club—bearer

(The). Periphe'tës, the robber of Argolis, is so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club—land

That part of the West End of London where the principal clubs are situated, the members of such clubs.

Club—law

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement. Do it or get a hiding.

Clue

I have not yet got the clue: to give a clue, i.e. a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (Ang—Saxon, cleowen) The only mode of finding the way out of the Cretan labyrinth was by a skein of thread, which, being laid along the proper route, indicated the right path.

Clumsy (Norwegian, klump, a lump, Swedish, klummsen, benumbed; Icelandic, klumsa). Piers Plowman has “thou klompsist for cold,” and Wiclif has “Our hondis ben aclumpsid”. Halliwell gives us clumpish = awkward, and clump = lazy.

Cluricaune

(3 syl.) An elf of evil disposition who usually appears as a wrinkled old man, and has knowledge of hid treasures. (Irish mythology.)

Clydesdale Horses

Scotch draught—horses, not equal to Shire—horses in size, but of great endurance. (See Shire Horses)

Clym of the Clough

with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesly, were noted outlaws, whose skill in archery rendered them as famous in the north of England as Robin Hood and Little John in the midland counties. Their place of resort was in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. N.B.— Englewood means firewood. Clym of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff.

Clytie

(3 syl.). A water—nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cneph

The name under which the Egyptians adore the Creator of the world.

Cnidian Venus

(The) The exquisite statue of Venus or Aphroditê by Praxitelês, placed in the temple of Venus, at Cnidus.

Co

A contraction of company, as Smith and Co.

Coach

(A) A private tutor The term is a pun on getting on fast. To get on fast you take a coach, you cannot get on fast without a private tutor— ergo, a private tutor is the coach you take in order that you may get on quickly. (University slang.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The books are expensive, and often a further expense is entailed by the necessity of securing `a coach.’”—Stedman Oxford, chap. x. p. 188.

To dine in the coach.

In the captain's private room. The coach or couch of a ship is a small apartment near the stern, the floor being formed of the aftmost part of the quarter—deck, and the roof by the poop.

A slow coach.

A dull, unprogressive person, somewhat fossilised.

“What a dull, old—fashioned chap thou be st but thou wert always a slow—coach.”—Mrs. Gaskell: Cibbie Marsh (Era 2).

Coach—and—four

(or Coach—and—six). It is said one may drive a coach—and—four through an Act of Parliament, i.e. lawyers can always find for their clients some loophole of escape.

“It is easy to drive a coach—and—four through wills, and settlements, and legal things.”—H. R. Haggard.

“[Rice] was often heard to say that he would drive a coach and six horses through the Act of Settlement.”—Welwood.

Coach—and—pair

(A). A coach drawn by a pair of horses. Coach—and—four, coach—and—six, etc.

Coach Away

Get on a little faster Your coach drags; drive on faster

Coached Up

Taught by a private tutor for examination. “Well coached up,” well crammed or taught.

Coal Hot as a coal. The expression has an obvious allusion

To post the coal or cole To pay or put down the cash. Coal=money has been in use in the sporting world for very many years. Buxton, in 1863, used the phrase “post the coal,” and since then it has been in frequent use. Probably rhyming slang “Coal,” an imperfect rhyme of gool =gold. (See page 248, Chivy and page 266, Coaling)

“It would not suit me to write, ... even if they offered, ..., to post the cole.”—Hood.

Coal Brandy

Burnt brandy The ancient way to set brandy on fire was to drop in it a live or red—hot coal.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Coals

To blow the coals To fan dissensions, to excite smouldering animosity into open hostility, as dull coals are blown into a blaze by a pair of bellows.

To carry coals

To be put upon. “Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals”— i.e. submit to be “put upon” (Romeo and Juliet, i. 1) So in Every Man out of his Humour, “Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog.” The allusion is to the dirty, laborious occupation of coal—carriers. Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says, “Of these (i.e. scullions, etc.), the most forlorn wretches were selected to carry coals to the kitchen, halls, etc.” (See page 141, col. 1, Blackguard)

To carry coals to Newcastle.

To do what is superfluous. As Newcastle is the great coal—field, it would be quite superfluous to carry coals thither. The French say, “Porter de l'eau à la rivière” (to carry water to the river). There are numerous Latin equivalents as, “To carry wood to the forests,” “Poma Alcinoo dare” (See Alcinoo); “Noctuas Athenas ferre” (See Noctuas), “Crocum in Ciliciam ferre” (See Crocum).

To haul over the coals.

To bring to task for shortcomings, to scold. At one time the Jews were “bled” whenever the kings or barons wanted money, and one very common torture, if they resisted, was to haul them over the coals of a slow fire, to give them a “roasting.” (See Ivanhoe, where Front—de—Boeuf threatens to haul Isaac over the coals.)

Coals of Fire

To heap coals of fire on the head of a foe. To melt down his animosity by deeds of kindness.

“If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat, and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink, for thou shalt beap coals of fire upon his head.” Prov xxv. 21, 22.

Coaling

in theatrical slang, means telling phrases and speeches, as, “My part is full of `coaling lines.’” Coal being money, means profit, whence coaling. (See p. 265, To Post The Goal ...)

Coalition Government

A Government formed by various parties by a mutual surrender of principles. The administration of Lord North and Charles Fox, 1783, was a coalition, but it fell to pieces in a few months. That of Lord Salisbury with the old Whig party headed by Lord Hartington was a coalition (1886—1892).

Coast Clear

Is the coast clear? The coast is clear. There is no likelihood of interference. None of the coast—guards are about.

Coast Men of Attica

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The merchant class who lived along the coast—lands (Parali).

Coasting Lead

(A). A sounding lead used in shallow water.

Coasting Trade

Trade between ports of the same country carried on by coasting vessels.

Coasting Waiter

An officer of Customs in the Port of London, whose duty it was to visit and make a return of coasting vessels trading from one part of the kingdom to another, and which (from the nature of their cargo) were not required to report or make entry at the Custom House. These vessels were liable to the payment of certain small dues, which it was the duty of the Coasting Waiter to exact. He was also expected to search the cargo, that no contraband goods were illicitly on board. Like Tide Waiters, these Coasting Waiters were abolished in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and their duties have since been performed by the Examining Officer. Their salary was about 40 a year.

Coat

Cut your coat according to your cloth. Curtail your expenses to the amount of your income; live within your means. Si non possis quod velis, velis id quod possis.

Near is my coat, but nearer is my skin. “Tunica pallio propior est.” “Ego proximus mihi.” To baste one's coat. To dust his jacket; to beat him.

To wear the king's coat.

To be a soldier. Turning one's coat for luck. It was an ancient superstition that this was a charm against evil spirits. (See Turncoat)

“William found

A means for our deliverance: `Turn your cloaks, Quoth hee, `for Pucke is busy in these oakes.' “

Bishop Corbett: Iter Boreale

Coat of Arms

A surcoat worn by knights over their armour, decorated with devices by which heralds described the wearer. Hence the heraldic device of a family. Coat—armour was invented in the Crusading expeditions, to distinguish the various noble warriors when wrapped in complete steel, and it was introduced into England by Richard Lion—heart.

Coat of many Colours

(Gen. xxxvii. 3). Harmer, in his Observations (vol. ii. p. 386), informs us that “many

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

colours” in this connection does not mean striped, flowered embroidered, or “printed” with several colours, but having “divers pieces of different colours sewed together” in patchwork. The Hebrew word is passeem. In 2 Sam. xiii. 18 we are told that king's daughters wore a garment of many colours or divers pieces. Dr. Adam Clarke says that similar garments “are worn by persons of distinction in Persia, India, and some parts of China to the present day.” The great offence was this: Jacob was a sheik, and by giving Joseph a “prince's robe” he virtually announced him his heir. (See Divers Colours)

Coats, Hosen, and Hats

(Dan. iii, 21). These were not articles of dress, but badges of office. It will be recollected that Shadrach and his two companions had recently been set over provinces of Babylon; and Nebuchadnezzar degraded them by insisting on their wearing their insignia of office. The word cap would be better than “hat,” their caps of office; and sandàls would be better than “hosen.” Coats or cloaks have always designated office. “Hosen” means what the Romans called calceus patricius, which were sandalled up to the calf of the leg. Every Latin scholar knows that calceos mutare means to “become a senator.”

Cob

(A). Between a pony and a horse in size, from thirteen to nearly fifteen hands high. The word means big, stout. The original meaning is a tuft or head, hence eminent, large, powerful. The “cob of the county” is the great boss thereof. A rich cob is a plutocrat Hence also a male, as a cob—swan.

Riding horses run between fifteen and sixteen hands in height, and carriage horses, between sixteen and seventeen hands.

Cobalt

From the German Kobold (a gnome). The demon of mines. This metal was so called by miners, because it was long thought to be useless and troublesome. It was consequently attributed to the ill offices of the mine demon.

Cobbler

A drink made of wine (sherry), sugar, lemon, and ice. It is sipped up through a straw. (See Cobbler's Punch)

“This wonderful invention, sir, ... is called cobbler,— Sherry cobbler, when you name it long; cobbler when you name it short.”— Dickens: Marten Chuzzlewit, xvii.

Cobbler

Let not the cobbler overstep his last (Ne sutor ultra crepidam). Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant. The tale goes that a cobbler detected a fault in the shoe—latchet of one of Apelles' paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticise the legs; but Apelles answered, “Keep to your trade”— you understand about shoes, but not about anatomy.

Cobbler Poet

(The). Hans Sachs of Nuremberg, prince of the mastersingers of Germany (1494—1574).

Cobbler's Punch

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Gin and water, with a little treacle and vinegar.

Cobbler's Toast

School—boys' bread and butter, toasted on the dry side and eaten hot.

Cobham

referred to by Thomson in his Autumn, was Sir Richard Temple, created Lord Cobham in 1714.

Cob—nut

A nut with a tuft. (Welsh, cob or cop, a tuft; German, kopf, the head.)

Coburgs

A corded or ribbed cotton cloth made in Coburg (Saxony), or in imitation thereof. Chiefly used for ladies' dresses.

Cobweb

Cob, Teutonic for "spider." Dutch, spinnckop; Saxon, attercop (poisonous spider); Chaldee, kopi (spider's web).

Cock

Mahomet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size that its crest touched the second heaven. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature from sleep except man. The Moslem doctors say that Allah lends a willing ear to him who reads the Koran, to him who prays for pardon, and to the cock whose chant is divine melody. When this cock ceases to crow, the day of judgment will be at hand.

Cock.

Dedicated to Apollo, the sun—god, because it gives notice of the rising of the sun. It was dedicated to Mercury, because it summons men to business by its crowing. And to Æsculapius, because "early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy."

A cock on church spires is to remind men not to deny their Lord as Peter did, but when the cock crew he "went out and wept bitterly." Peter Le Neve affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the Goths, and therefore used in Gothic churches for ornament.

Every cock crows on its own dunghill, or Ilka cock crows on his own midden. It is easy to brag of your deeds in your own castle when safe from danger and not likely to be put to the proof.

Latin:

Gallus in suo sterquilinio plurimum potest.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

French:

Chien sur son fumier est hardi.

Spanish: Cada Galla canta en su muladar.

Nourish a cock, but offer it not in sacrifice. This is the eighteenth Symbolic Saying in the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The cock was sacred to Minerva, and also to the Sun and Moon, and it would be impious to offer a sacrilegious offering to the gods. What is already consecrated to God cannot be employed in sacrifice.

That cock won't fight.

That dodge wouldn't answer; that tale won't wash. Of course, the allusion is to fighting cocks. A bet is made on a favourite cock, but when pitted he refuses to fight.

To cry cock.

To claim the victory; to assert oneself to be the superior. As a cock of the walk is the chief or ruler of the whole walk, so to cry cock is to claim this cockship.

Cock and Bottle

A public—house sign, meaning draught and bottled ale may be had on the premises. The “cock” here means the tap. It does not mean “The Cork and Bottle.”

Cock and Bull Story

A corruption of a concocted and bully story. The catch—pennies hawked about the streets are still called cocks—i.e. concocted things. Bully is the Danish bulle (exaggerated), our bull—rush (an exaggerated rush), bull—frog, etc.

Another etymology may be suggested. The idol Nergal was the most common idol of the ancient Phoenicians, Indians, and Persians, and Nergal means a dunghill cock. The Egyptian bull is equally notorious under the name of Osiris. A cock—and—bull story may therefore mean a myth, in reference to the mythological fables of Nergal and Osiris.

The French equivalents are faire un coq à l'âne and un conie de ma mère Voie (a mother goose tale).

Cock and Pie

(By). We meet with cock's bones, cock's wounds, cock's mother, cock's body, cock's passion, etc., where we can have no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for the sacred name which should never be taken in vain. The Pie is the table or rule in the old Roman offices, showing how to find out the service for each day, called by the Greeks pinax (an index). The latter part of the oath is equivalent to “the Mass book.”

“By cock and pie, sir, you shall not away to—night.”—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., act v. 1.

Cock and Pie

(as a public—house sign) is probably “The Cock and Magpie.”

Cock of Hay

(A) or a haycock. A small heap of hay thrown up temporarily. (German, Kocke, a heap of hay; Norwegian, kok, a heap.)

Cock of the North

The Duke of Gordon. So called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers, in Aberdeenshire. (Died 1836.)

Cock of the Walk

The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barn—door fowls are fed is called the walk, and if there is more than one cock they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Cock—a—hoop or Cock—a—houp. To sit cock—a—houp. Boastful, defiant, like a game cock with his houpe or crest erect; eagerly expectant. (French, coq à huppe.)

“And having routed a whole troop,

With victory was cock—a—hoop.”

Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Cock apace

Set off as fast as you can run. A cock is a tap through which liquor runs. “To cock” is to walk lightly or nimbly.

“If storms be nigh then cock apace,” says Tusser (1174).

Cockboat

or Cockle Boat. A small boat made of a wicker frame, and covered with leather or oil—cloth. The Welsh fishers used to carry them on their backs. (Welsh, cwch, a boat; French, coche, a passage boat; Irish, coca; Italian, cocca; Norwegian, kog, a cockboat.)

Cock—crow

The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: 1, The “beginning of the watches” or “even” (Lam. ii. 19); 2, “The middle watch” or “midnight” (Judg. vii. 19); 3, “The cock—crowing;” 4, “The morning watch” or “dawning” (Exod. xiv. 24).

“Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock—crowing, or in the morning.”— Mark xiii. 35.

The Romans divided the night into sixteen parts, each one hour and a—half, beginning at midnight. The third of these divisions (3 a.m.) they called gallicinium, the time when cocks begin to crow; the next was conticinium, when they ceased to crow; and fifth was diluculum, dawn.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Probably the Romans sounded the hour on a trumpet (bugle) three times, and if so it would explain the diversity of the Gospels: "Before the cock crow" (John xiii. 38, Luke xxii. 34, and Matt. xxvi. 34); but

"Before the cock crow twice" (Mark xiv. 30)— that is, before the "bugle" has finished sounding.

Apparitions vanish at cock crow.

This is a Christian superstition, the cock being the watch—bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

"The morning cock crew loud,

And at the sound it [the Ghost] shrunk in haste away, And vanished from our sight."

Shakespeare: Hamlet,

i. 2.

Cock—eye

A squint. Cock—eyed, having a squint; cross—eyed. (Irish and Gaelic, caog, a squint; "caogshuil," squint—eyed.)

Cock—fighting was introduced into Britain by the Romans. It was a favourite sport both with the Greeks and with the Romans.

That beats cock—fighting.

That is most improbable and extraordinary. The allusion is to the extravagant tales told of fighting—cocks.

"He can only relieve his feelings by the ... frequent repetition, 'Well, that beats cock—fighting!' "— Whyte—Melville.

To live like fighting—cocks. To live in luxury. Before game—cocks are pitted they are fed plentifully on the very best food.

Cock—horse

To ride—a—cock—horse. To sit astride a person's foot or knee while he dances or tosses it up and down.

Cock Lane Ghost A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of horrors. In Cock Lane, Stockwell (1762), certain knockings were heard, which Mr. Parsons, the owner, declared proceeded from the ghost of Fanny Kent, who died suddenly, and Parsons wished people to suppose that she had been murdered by her husband. All London was agog with this story; but it was found out that the knockings were produced by Parsons' daughter (a girl twelve years of age) rapping on a board which she took into her bed. Parsons was condemned to stand in the pillory. (See Stockwell Ghost)

Cock—pit

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The judicial committee of the privy council is so called, because the council—room is built on the old cock—pit of Whitehall palace.

“Great consultations at the cockpit about battles, duels, victories, and what not.”— Poor Robin's Almanack, 1730.

Cock Sure

is cocky sure — pertly confident. We call a self—confident, over—bearing prig a cocky fellow, from the barnyard despot; but Shakespeare employs the phrase in the sense of “sure as the cock of a firelock.”

“We steal as in a castle, cock—sure.”— Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 1.

The French phrase is à coup sûr, as “Nous réussirons à coup sûr, ” we are certain of success, “Cela est ainsi à coup sûr, ” etc., and the phrase “Sure as a gun,” seem to favour the latter derivation.

Cock the Ears

(To). To prick up the ears, or turn them as a horse does when he listens to a strange sound. Here “cock” means to turn, and seems to be connected with the Greek a circle, and the verb .

Cock the Nose

or Cock up the nose. To turn up the nose in contempt. (See Cock Your Eye)

Cock up your Head

[foot, etc.]. Lift up, turn up your head or foot. The allusion is to cocking hay, i.e. lifting it into small heaps or into the haycart. (See Cock Of Hay)

Cock your Eye

(To) is to shut one eye and look with the other; to glance at. A “cock—eye” is a squinting eye, and “cock—eyed” is having squinting eyes. In many phrases, cock means to turn. (See above.)

Cock your Hat

(To). To set your hat more on one side of the head than on the other; to look knowing and pert. Soldiers cock their caps over the left side to “look smart.” (See Cocked Hat)

Cockade

The men—servants of the military wear a small black cockade on their hat, the Hanoverian badge. The Stuart cockade was white. At the battle of Sherra—Muir, in the reign of George I., the English soldiers wore a black rosette in their hats. In the song of Sherra—Muir the English soldiers are called “the red—coat lads wi' black cockades.” (French, cocarde; German, kokarde.)

In the British Army and Navy the cockade, since the Hanoverian accession, has been black. AUSTRIAN cockade is black and yellow. All sentry boxes and boundary posts are so painted. Ein schwarz—gelber was the nickname of an Austrian Imperialist in 1848.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

BAVARIA, light blue and white are the royal colours.

BELGIUM, black, yellow, and red.

FRANCE (regal), the royal colour was white.

HANOVER, the cockade was black. Black enters into all the German cockades.

PRUSSIA, black and white are the royal colours.

RUSSIA, green and white are the royal colours.

To mount the cockade.

To become a soldier. From time immemorial the partisans of different leaders have adopted some emblem to show their party; in 1767 an authoritative regulation determined that every French soldier should wear a white cockade, and in 1782 the badge was restricted to the military. The phrase given above is common both to England and France.

Cockaigne

(Land of). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury. The subject of a burlesque, probably “the earliest specimen of English poetry which we possess.” London is generally so called, but Boileau applies the phrase to Paris. (See page 270, col. 2, Cockney)

Allied to the German, kuchen, a cake. Scotland is called the “land of cakes” there is the old French word coçaigne, abundance. Compare Latin coquo, to cook, coquinaria, coquina, etc.

Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets (i. 83—95), has printed at length an old French poem called

“The Land of Cockaign” (thirteenth century) where “the houses were made of barley sugar and cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods for nothing.”

Cockatrice

(3 syl.). A monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon and head of a cock. So called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death. In consequence of the crest with which the head is crowned, the creature is called a basilisk, from the Greek, basiliskos (a little king). Isaiah says, “The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den” (xi. 8), to signify that the most noxious animal should not hurt the most feeble of God's creatures. Figuratively, it means an insidious, treacherous person bent on mischief.

“They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices.”— Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Cocked Hat

(A). A hat with the brim turned, like that of a bishop, dean, etc. It is also applied to the chapeau bras, and the military full—dress hat, pointed before and behind, and rising to a point at the crown, the chapeau à cornu. “Cock” in this phrase means to turn; cocked, turned up.

Knocked into a cocked hat.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

In the game of nine—pins, three pins were set up in the form of a triangle, and when all the pins except these three were knocked down, the set was technically said to be “knocked into a cocked hat.” Hence, utterly out of all shape or plumb. A somewhat similar phrase is “Knocked into the middle of next week.”

Cocked—hat Club

(The). A club of the Society of Antiquaries. A cocked hat was always placed before the president when the club met.

There was another club so called in which the members, during club sittings, wore cocked hats.

Cocker

According to Cocker. All right, according to Cocker. According to established rules, according to what is correct. Edward Cocker (1631—1677) published an arithmetic which ran through sixty editions. The phrase, “According to Cocker,” was popularised by Murphy in his farce called The Apprentice.

Cockie

or Cocky. Bumptious, overbearing, conceited, and dogmatical; like a little bantam cock.

Cockle Hat

A pilgrim's hat. Warburton says, as the chief places of devotion were beyond sea, or on the coasts, pilgrims used to put cockle—shells upon their hats, to indicate that they were pilgrims. Cockles are symbols of St. James, patron saint of Spain. Cockle—scallop, as in heraldry.

“And how shall I your true love know

From many another one?

Oh, by his cockle hat and staff,

And by his sandal shoon.”

Beaumont and Fletcher: The Friar of Orders Grey.

Cockle Shells

Favourite tokens worn by pilgrims in their hats. The polished side of the shell was scratched with some rude drawing of the “blessed Virgin,” the Crucifixion, or some other subject connected with the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, they were considered amulets against spiritual foes, and might be used as drinking vessels.

Cockles

To cry cockles. To be hanged; from the gurgling noise made in strangulation.

Cockles of the Heart

“To warm the cockles of one's heart,” said of good wine. (Latin, cochleae cordis, the ventricles of the heart.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Fibræ quidem rectis hisce exterioribus in dextro ventriculo proxime subjectæ oblique dextrorsum ascendentes in basim cordis terminantur, et spirali suo ambitu helicem sive cochleam satis apte referunt.”—Lower: Tractatus de Corde, p. 25. (1669.)

Cockledemoy

(A). An amusing rogue, a sort of Tyll Eulenspiegel. A character in Marston's comedy of The Dutch Courtesan. He cheats Mrs. Mulligrub, a vintner's wife, of a goblet and salmon.

Cockney

One born within sound of Bow—bells, London; one possessing London peculiarities of speech, etc.; one wholly ignorant of country sports, country life, farm animals, plants, and so on.

Camden says the Thames was once called “the Cockney.”

The word has been spelt Cockeney, Cockaneys, Cocknell, etc. “Cocknell” would be a little cock. “Puer in deliciis matris nutritus,” Anglice, a kokenay, a pampered child. “Niais” means a nestling, as faucon niais, and if this is the last syllable of “Cockney,” it confirms the idea that the word means an enfant gâté.

Wedgwood suggests cocker (to fondle), and says a cockerney or cockney is one pampered by city indulgence, in contradistinction to rustics hardened by outdoor work. (Dutch, kokkeler, to pamper; French, coquelinier, to dangle.)

Chambers in his Journal derives the word from a French poem of the thirteenth century, called The Land of Cocagne, where the houses were made of barley—sugar and cakes, the streets paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment. The French, at a very early period, called the English cocagne men, i.e. bons vivants (beef and pudding men).

“Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney did to the cels, when she put them into the paste alive.”—Shakespeare: Lear, ii. 4.

The king of cockneys.

A master of the revels chosen by students of Lincoln's Inn on Childermas Day (Dec. 28th).

Cockney School

Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats; so called by Lockhart. (1817.)

“If I may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may be henceforth referred to by the designation of the ‘Cockney School.’”—Z. Blackwood's Magazine, Oct., 1817.

Cockpit of Europe

Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other country; for example, Oudenarde, Ramillies, Fontenoy, Fleurus, Jemmapes, Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo.

Cockshy

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A free fling or “shy” at something. The allusion is to the once popular Shrove—Tuesday sport of shying or casting stones or sticks at cocks. This sport is now superseded by pigeon—shooting, which is thought to be more aristocratic! but can hardly be deemed more humane.

Cockswain

or COXSWAIN [cox'n]. The swain or servant of the cock or boat, together with its crew. (Anglo—Saxon, swan or swein, a youth or servant, and cock, a boat.) (See Cockboat)

Cocktail

The New York World, 1891, tells us that this is an Aztec word, and that “the liquor was discovered by a Toltec noble, who sent it to the king by the hand of his daughter Xochitl. The king fell in love with the maiden, drank the liquor, and called them xoc—tl, a name perpetuated by the word cocktail.

Cocktail is an iced drink made of spirits mixed with bitters, sugar, and some aromatic flavouring. Champagne cocktail is champagne flavoured with Angostura bitters; soda cocktail is sodawater, sugar, and bitters.

“Did ye iver try a brandy cocktail, Cornel?”— Thackeray: The Newcomes, xiii.

Cocqcigrues

At the coming of the Cocqcigrues. That good time coming, when every mystery shall be cleared up.

“`That is one of the seven things,' said the fairy Bedonebyasyoudid, `I am forbidden to tell till the coming of the Cocqcigrues.'”— C. Kingsley: The Water Babies, chap. vi.

Cocytus

[Ko—kytus]. One of the five rivers of hell. The word means the “river of lamentation.” The unburied were doomed to wander about its banks for 100 years. (Greek, koku'o, to weep.)

“Cocytus, named of lamentation loud

Heard on the rueful stream.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 579.

Codds

Codgers. Thackeray says, “The Cistercian lads call the poor brethren of the Charterhouse codds, ” adding, “but I know not wherefore.” (Turkish, kodjah, an old man or woman.) We say “Well, old boy,” without referring to age.

“I say, do you know any of the old codds ...? Colonel Newcome is going to be a codd.”— Nineteenth Century, October, 1893, p. 589.

Codille

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(2 syl.). Triumph. A term in the game of Ombre. When one of the two opponents of Ombre has more tricks than Ombre, he is said to have won Codille, and takes all the stake that Ombre played for. Thus Belinda is said, in the Rape of the Lock, to have been “between the jaws of ruin and Codille.” She wins with the “king of hearts,” and she wins codille.

Codlin's your Friend, not Short

(Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop, chap. xix.). Codlin had a shrewd suspicion that little Nell and her grandfather had absconded, and that a reward would be offered for their discovery. So he tried to bespeak the goodwill of the little girl in the hope of making something of it.

“None of the speakers has much to say in actual hostility to Lord Salisbury's speech, but they all harp upon the theory that Codlin is the friend, not Short.”— Newspaper paragraph, Oct. 13th, 1885.

Coehorns

(2 syl.). Small howitzers of about 4 2/3 inches calibre; so called from Baron van Coehorn, of Holland.

Coenobites

or Cenobites (3 syl.). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to the hermits or anchorites. (Greek, koinosbios.)

Coeur de Lion

Richard I. of England; so called from the prodigies of personal valour performed by him in the Holy Land. (1157, 1189—1199.)

Louis VIII. of France, more frequently called Le Lion. (1187, 1223—1226.) Boleslas I. of Poland, also called “The Intrepid.” (960, 992—1025.)

Coffee

The Turkish word is Kauhi, Kauveh or Kauvey.

Coffee.

In Ardennes ten cups of coffee are taken after dinner, and each cup has its special name. (1) Café (2) Gloria, (3) Pousse Café (4) Goutte, (5) Regoutte, (6) Sur—goutte, (7) Rincette, (8) Re—rincette, (9)

Sur—rincette, and (10) Coup de l'érier. Gloria is coffee with a small glass of brandy in lieu of milk; all the following have more and more l'eau de vie; and the last is the “stirrup—cup.”

Coffin

A raised crust, like the lid of a basket. Hence Shakespeare speaks of a “custard coffin” (Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3). Mahomet's Coffin)

“Of the paste a coffin will I rear.’

Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus,

v. 2.

Coggeshall

A Coggeshall job. The saying is, that the Coggeshall folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and fixed hurdles in the bed of it for the purpose. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing it would go mad, chained it up in a shed. (See Gotham)

Cogito ergo sum

Descartes' axiom. This is a petitio principii. "I think" can only prove this: that "I think." And he might just as well infer from it the existence of thought as the existence of I. He is asked to prove the latter, and immediately assumes that it exists and does something, and then infers that it exists because it does something. Suppose I were asked to prove the existence of ice, and were to say, ice is cold, therefore there is such a thing as ice. Manifestly I first assume there is such a thing as ice, then ascribe to it an attribute, and then argue back that this attribute is the outcome of ice. This is not proof, but simply arguing in a circle.

Cohens (Stock Exchange term). The Turkish '69 loan, floated by the firm of that name.

Coif

(1 syl.). The coif of the old serjeant—at—law was a relic of his ecclesiastical character. The original serjeants—at—law were clerical lawyers, and the coif is the representation of the tonsure. Serjeants of the Coif. Serjeants—at—law (now abolished). (See above.)

Coiffe

Il est né coiffé. He is born with a silver spoon in his mouth; born to fortune. (See page 229, col. 2, Caul)

“Quelques enfans viennent au monde avec une pellicule ... que l'on appelle du nom de coëffe; et que l'on croit estre une marque de bonheur. Ce qui a donné lieu au proverbe françois. ... Il est né coëffé. “— Traite des Superstition, 1679.

Coiffer to Sainte Catherine

To remain an old maid. “St. Catherine est la patronne des filles à marier et des vieilles filles. Ce sont ces dernières qui restent ordinairement pour soigner les chapelles consacrées à la sainte, et qui sont chargées de sa toilette.” (Hetaire le Gai: Encyclopédie des Proverbes Français.)

“Il crois peut—etre que je le regrette, que, de désespoir je vais coiffer St. Catherine. Ah! ah! mais non! moi aussi je veux me marier.”— La Mascotte (an opera).

Coin

Paid in his own coin. Tit for tat. “Par pari referre.”

Coin Money

(To). To make money with rapidity and ease.

“For the last four years ... I literally coined money.”— F. Kemble: Residence in Georgia.

Coins

BRITISH Iron rings were used for money by the ancient Britons, and Segonax, a petty king under Cassivelân, is the first whose head was impressed on the coin. Gold, silver, and copper coins were struck by Cunobelin.

The ROMANS introduced their own coins into the island.

The oldest ANGLO—SAXON coin was the sceatta (pl. sceattae), sixth century. In the reign of Ethelbert, King of Kent, money accounts were kept in pounds, mancuses, shillings, and pence. One of the last being equal to about 3 pence of our money. 5 pence = one scilling, 30 scillings one manca or mancus, and 40 one pound. Mancuses were in gold and silver also.

The NORMANS introduced pence with a cross so deeply impressed that the coin could be broken either into two or four parts, hence the terms half—pence and fourthings.

The Angel, a gold coin (7s. 6d.), was introduced by Edward IV., and had a figure of Michael slaying the dragon.

The Bawbee first came into use in the reign of James VI. of Scotland. (French, bas—billon, base copper coin.)

The Carolus (20s.) was a gold coin of the reign of Charles I.

The Crown (5s.) was first issued in 1553. Crowns and half—crowns are still in common circulation. English Dollars (4s. 6d.) were introduced in 1798.

Florins,

a gold coin (6s.), were issued by Edward III.; but the silver florin (2s.) in 1849. The Guinea (a gold coin = 21s.) was first issued in 1717; but a gold coin so—called, of the value of 30s., was issued in 1673, reduced in 1696 to 22s.

Our Sovereign was first issued in 1816, but there were coins so called in the reigns of Henry I. (worth 22s.), Edward VI. (from 24s. to 30s.).

Shillings

of the present value date from 1503; pence made of bronze in 1862, but copper pence were coined in 1620, half—pence and farthings in 1665.

Coke To cry coke. To cry peccavi; to ask for mercy. Ruddiman says “coke” is the sound which cocks utter when they are beaten.

Coke upon Littleton

Tent and brandy.

“Another ... sipping Coke upon Littleton, i.e. tent and brandy.”— Nichols: Illustrations of Literature (1743).

Colbronde

or Colbrand. The Danish giant slain by Sir Guy of Warwick. By the death of this giant the land was delivered from Danish tribute.

“I am not Samson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand,

To mowem down before me.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 4.

Colcannon

Potatoes and cabbage pounded together and then fried in butter (Irish). “Col” is cole or cale, i.e. cabbage.

“About 1774 Isaac Sparks, the Irish comedian, founded in Long Acre a Colcannon Club.”— The Athenæum, January 20th, 1875.

Cold as Charity

(See Charity)

Cold—Bath Fields

So called from the cold baths established there by Mr. Bains, in 1697, for the cure of rheumatism, convulsions, and other nervous disorders.

Cold Blood

Done in cold blood. (French, sang froid.) Not in the heat of temper; deliberately, and with premeditation. The allusion is to the ancient notion that the blood grew hot and cold, and this difference of temperature ruled the temper.

Cold—blooded Animals

As a rule, all invertebrate animals, and all fishes and reptiles, are called cold—blooded, because the temperature of their blood is about equal to the medium in which they live.

Cold—blooded Persons

Those not easily excited; those whose passions are not easily roused; those whose circulation is sluggish.

Cold—chisel

(A). A chisel of tempered steel for cutting cold metal.

Cold Drawn Oil

Castor oil, obtained by pressure in the cold.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cold Pigeon (A). A message sent in place of a love—letter. The love—letter would have been a poulet (q.v.). A pigeon pie is called a dove—tart, and dove is symbolical of love. Pyramus says of Thisbe, “What dead, my dove?” A verbal message is “cold comfort” to a lover looking out for a letter.

Cold Pudding settles Love

by giving the pains of indigestion, colic, etc.

Cold Shoulder

To show or give one the cold shoulder is to assume a distant manner towards a person, to indicate that you wish to cut his acquaintance. The reference is to a cold shoulder of mutton served to a stranger at dinner; there is not much of it, and even what is left is but moderate fare.

Cold Steel

The persuasion of cold steel is persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold Water Ordeal

An ancient method of testing the guilt or innocence of the common sort of people. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank to the bottom, he was held to be guiltless, and drawn up by the cord; but if he floated, the water rejected him, because of his guilt.

Cold Without

An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Coldbrand

(See Colbronde)

Coldstream Guards

One of the three regiments of Foot Guards. It was originally under the command of Colonel Monk (1650—1660), and in January, 1660, marched under him from Coldstream in Berwickshire with the object of bringing back Charles II. to the throne.

Cole

= money. (See Coal)

Cole

(King). A legendary British king, described as “a merry old soul” fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his “fiddlers three.” (Kg. Coil, i.)

Colemira

(3 syl.). A poetical name for a cook; being, of course, compounded of coal and mire.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“ ‘Could I,’ he cried, ‘express how bright a grace

Adorns thy morning hands and well—washed face, Thou wouldst, Colemira, grant what I implore,

And yield me love, or wash thy face no more.’ “ Shenstone: Colemira, an Eclogue.

Colin Clout

A name which Spenser assumes in The Shepherd's Calendar, and in the pastoral entitled Colin Clout's Come Home Again, which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, “the Shepherd of the Ocean.”

Colin Tampon

The nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of a North American, and Monsieur Crapaud of a Frenchman.

Collapse

The scheme collapsed. Came to nothing. An inflated balloon is said to collapse when the gas has escaped and the sides fall together, or pucker into wrinkles. As a collapsed balloon will not mount, a collapsed scheme will not go off. (Latin, collapsus, collabor, to fall or sink together.)

Collar

Against the collar. Somewhat fatiguing. When a horse travels up—hill the collar distresses his neck, so foot—travellers often find the last mile or so “against the collar,” or distressing. Authors of long books often find the last few pages wearisome and against the grain.

In collar. In harness. The allusion is to a horse's collar, which is put on when about to go to work. Out of collar. Out of work, out of place. (See above.)

To slip the collar. To escape from restraint; to draw back from a task begun. To work up to the collar. To work tooth and nail; not to shirk the work in hand. A horse that lets his collar lie loose on his neck without bearing on it does not draw the vehicle at all, but leaves another to do the real work.

“As regarded himself, the path lay plain. He must work up to the collar, hot and hard, leaving himself no time to feel the parts that were galled and wrung.”— Mrs. Edwardes: A Girton Girl, chap. iv.

Collar

(verb). To collar one. To seize by the collar; to prig; to appropriate without leave.

To collar the cole

or coal. To prig the money. (See Coal)

Collar—day

(A). In royal levees, means that attendants are to wear all their insignia and decorations, such as medals, stars, ribbons, and orders. This is done on grand occasions by order of the Crown. The Queen's Collar—day is when she wears the Order of the Garter.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Collar of Arsinoe

(4 syl.) or Collar of Alpheisibea, given by her to her husband Alcmeon, was a fatal gift; so was the collar and veil of Eriphyle, wife of Amphiaraos. (See Fatal Gifts)

Collar of SS

A decoration restricted to the Lord Chief Justices of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings—of—Arms, the Heralds, the Sergeant—at—Arms, and the Sergeant Trumpeter. (Coussan's Heraldry.) (See SS.)

Collectivists

Collectivism is the opposite of Individualism. In the latter system, everyone is to be his own master, and everything is to be free and in common. In the former system, government is to be the sole employer, the sole landlord, and the sole paymaster. Private property is to be abolished, competition to be stamped out; everyone must work for his living, and the State must find the work. Bellamy's novel of Looking Backward will give a pretty fair notion of what is meant by Collectivism. (See Individualists)

College

(New). Newgate prison. “To take one's final degree at New College” is to be hanged. “King's College” is King's Bench Prison, now called Queen's College. Prisoners are “collegiates.” College is the Latin collegium, and has a very wide range, as, College of the Apostles, College of Physicians, College of Surgeons, Heralds College, College of Justice, etc.; and on the Continent we have College of Foreign Affairs, College of War, College of Cardinals, etc.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

College Port

The worst species of red wine that can be manufactured and palmed off upon young men at college. (See Widows' Port)

“We all know what college port is like.”— The Times.

Colliberts

A sort of gipsy race in Poitou, Maine, and Anjou, similar to the Cagots of Gascony and the Caqueux of Brittany. In feudal times a collibert was a serf partly free, but bound to certain services. (Latin, col—libertus, a fellow freedman.)

Colluthians

A religious sect which rose in the fourth century; so called from Colluthos of Alexandria, their founder.

Colly my Cow

A corruption of Calainos, the most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calainos the Moor asked a damsel to wife, who said the price of winning her should be the heads of the three paladins of Charlemagne, named Rinaldo, Roland, and Olivier. Calainos went to Paris and challenged the paladins. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest knight, accepted the challenge and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor and smote him.

Collyridians

A sect of Arabian Christians, chiefly women, which first appeared in 373. They worshipped the Virgin Mary, and made offerings to her in a twisted cake, called a collyris. (Greek, kollura, a little cake.)

Collywobbles

The grips, usually accompanied with sundry noises in the stomach. These noises are called the “borbarigmus.” (The wobbling caused by a slight colic.)

Cologne

The three kings of Cologne. The three magi, called Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar. They are called by other names, but those given are the most generally accepted.

Colon

One of the rabble leaders in Hudibras was Noel Perryan, or Ned Perry, an ostler, who loved bear—baiting, but was a very straight—laced Puritan of low morals.

Colophon

The end of a book. Colophon was a city of Ionia, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen that they would turn the scale of battle to the side on which they fought; hence, the Greek phrase, To add a colophonian, means “to put a finishing stroke to any matter.” (Strabo.) In the early times of printing, the statement containing the date, place, printer, and edition was given at the end of the book, and was called the colophon. Now called the “imprint.”

“The volume was uninjured ... from title—page to colophon.”— Scott: The Antiquary.

Coloquintida

or Colocynth. Bitterapple or colocynth. (Greek, kolokunthis.)

“The food that to him now is luscious as locusts, shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquintida.”— Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Coloquintida

(St.). Charles I. was so called. He was bitter as gall to the Levellers.

“The Levellers styled him [Charles I.] an Ahab, and a Coloquintida, a man of blood, and the everlasting obstacle to peace and liberty.”— Howitt: History of England (“Charles I.,” chap.

vi. p. 284).

Colorado

(U.S. America). A Spanish word meaning red, referring to the red hue of the water of the river.

Colossal

Gigantic. As a colossal scheme. (See below.)

Colossus

or Colossos (Latin, colossus). A giant. The Rhodian Colossos was a gigantic statue of brass, 126 feet high, executed by Chares. It is said that ships could pass full sail under the legs of this statue, but the notion of a striding statue rose in the sixteenth century, and is due to Blaise de Vigenère, who was the first to give the chef d'oeuvre of Chares this impossible position. The Comte de Caylus has demonstrated that the Apollo of Rhodes was never planted at the mouth of the Rhodian port, that it was not a striding statue, and that ships never passed under it. Neither Strabo nor Pliny makes mention of any of these things, though both describe the gigantic statute minutely. Philo (the architect of Byzantium, third century) has a treatise on the seven wonders of the world, and says that the Colossos stood on a block of white marble, and Lucius Ampellius, in a similar treatise, says it stood in a car. Tickell out—herods Herod in the following lines:

“So, near proud Rhodes, across the raging flood,

Stupendous form! the vast Colossus stood,

While at one foot the thronging galleys ride,

A whole hour's sail scarce reached the farther side; Betwixt his brazen thighs, in loose array,

Ten thousand streamers on the billows play.”

On the Prospect of Peace.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“He doth bestride the narrow world

Like a Colossus.” Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i. 2.

The twin Colossi of Amenophis III., on the banks of the Nile, near Thebes, are seated. The statue of Liberty, New York, is colossal.

Switzerland Red, with white cross.

Colours Nailed to the Mast

(With our), à outrance. If the colours are nailed to the mast, they cannot be lowered to express submission.

“If they catch you at disadvantage, the mines for your life is the word; and so we fight them with our colours nailed to the mast.”— Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xxi.

Colour—blindness

Incapacity of discerning one colour from another. The term was introduced by Sir David Brewster. It is of three sorts: (1) inability to discern any colours, so that everything is either black or white, shade or light; (2)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

inability to distinguish between primary colours, as red, blue, and yellow; or secondary colours, as green, purple, and orange; and (3) inability to distinguish between such composite colours as browns, greys, and neutral tints. Except in this one respect, the colour—blind may have excellent vision.

Colour Sergeant

A sergeant who carries or has charge of the regimental colours.

Colour

(verb). To colour up, to turn red in the face; to blush.

Coloured Frontispiece by Phiz

(A). A blush.

Colporteur

A hawker or pedlar; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck. The term is more especially applied to hawkers of religious books. (Latin, collum, the neck; porto, to carry.)

Colt (A). A piece of knotted rope eighteen inches long for the special benefit of ship boys; a cat—o'—nine—tails.

“Look alive there, lads, or as sure as my name is Sam Weston I'll give the colt to the last man off the deck.”—J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. vii.

Colt

(A). A barrister who attends a sergeant—at—law at his induction.

“I accompanied the newly—made Chief Baron as his colt.”—Pollock.

“Then Mr. Railey, his colt, delivered his ring to the Lord Chancellor.”—Wynne.

Colt

(To). To befool, to gull. (Italian, colto, cheated, befooled.)

Colt—pixy

(A). A pixy, puck, or fairy. To colt—pixy is to take what belongs to the pixies, and is specially applied to the gleaning of apples after the crop has been gathered in; these apples were the privilege of the pixies, and to colt—pixy is to deprive the pixies of their perquisites.

Colt's Revolver

A fire—arm which, by means of revolving barrels, can be fired several times without intermission. This instrument was patented by Colonel Samuel Colt, U.S., in 1835.

Colt's—tooth

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word "coltish" for skittish. Horses have at three years old the colt's—tooth. The allusion is to the colt's teeth of animals, a period of their life when their passions are strongest.

"Her merry dancing—days are done;

She has a colt's—tooth still, I warrant."

King: Orpheus and Eurydice

"Well said, Lord Sands;

Your colt's—tooth is not cast yet."

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., 1.3.

Columbine

(3 syl.). The sweetheart of Harlequin, and, like him, supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. Columbina in Italian is a pet—name for a lady—love, and means a little dove, a young coquette.

Columbus

His signature was—

S. i.e., Servidor

S. A. S. Sus Altezas Sacras

X. M. Y. Jesus Maria Isabel

Xto. FERENS Christo—pher

El Almirante El Almirante.

In English, "Servant— of their Sacred Highnesses— Jesus Mary and Isabella— Christopher— the Admiral." The second Columbus. Cyrus West Field was so called by John Bright when he completed the Atlantic Cable. Born at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1819.

Columbus of the Skies

(The). Sir F. William Herschel, discoverer of Georgium Sidus (Uranus), 1738—1822.

Column The Alexandrine Column. Made of granite; in memory of the Emperor Alexander.

The Column of Antoninus.

At Rome; made of marble, 176 feet high; in memory of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antonius. Like that of Trajan, this column is covered externally with spiral bas—reliefs representing the wars carried on by the emperor.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Sixtus V. caused the original statue of this column to be supplanted by a figure of St. Paul. (See Trajan's Column.)

The Column of Arcadius.

At Constantinople; made of marble.

Column at Boulogne

To commemorate the camp of Boulogne. This formidable army was intended for the invasion of England. England also girded herself for battle, and here the matter ended. The Column perpetuates the memory of this threat. The Duke of York's Column, in London, at the top of the steps leading into St. James's Park. Erected in 1830—1833 in memory of Frederick, Duke of York, second son of George III., who died in 1827. It is of the Tuscan order, was designed by R. Wyatt, and is made of Aberdeenshire granite. On the summit is a statue of the duke by Sir R. Westmacott.

The Column of July.

1832, Paris; made of bronze, and erected on the spot where the Bastille stood, to commemorate the revolution of July, 1830, when Charles X. abdicated. It is surmounted with a statue of Liberty standing on one foot.

London's Column.

(See Monument.)

Nelson's Column.

In Trafalgar Square, London, was erected in 1843. The four lions, by Landseer, were added in 1867. The order of the Column is Corinthian, and the material Devonshire granite. The reliefs are (north side) the battle of the Nile, where Nelson was wounded, (south side) Nelson's death at the battle of Trafalgar, (east side) the bombardment of Copenhagen; and (west side) the battle of St. Vincent. The column is surmounted by a statue of Nelson by E. H. Baily.

Column of the Place Vendôme.

Paris, 1806—1810; made of bronze, and erected in honour of Napoleon I. The spiral outside represents in bas-relief the battles of Napoleon I., ending with Austerlitz in 1805. It is a facsimile of Trajan's Column.

In 1871 the statue of Napoleon, which surmounted this column, was hurled to the ground by the Communists, but in 1874 a statue of Liberty was substituted for the original one.

Pompey's Column.

In Egypt, made of marble.

Trajan's Column.

At Rome, made of marble, A.D. 114, by Apollodorus. It is 132 feet in height, and has inside a spiral staircase of 185 steps, and 40 windows to let in light. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan, but Sixtus V. supplanted the original statue by that of St. Peter. The spiral outside represents in bas-reliefs the battles of the emperor.

Columns of Hercules

Two large pyramidal columns set up by the Phoenicians as lighthouses and landmarks, dedicated, one to Hercules (the sun), and the other to Astarte (the moon).

By the Greeks and Romans the two pyramidal mountains at the Straits of Gibraltar (Calpe and Abyla), the former in Europe and the latter in Africa, were termed the Pillars of Hercules.

Coma Berenices

(4 syl.). (See Berenice .)

Comazants

Called St. Elmo fires by the French, Castor and Pollux by the Romans. A celestial light seen occasionally to play round mast—heads, etc. (Latin, coma, hair.) Virgil makes good use of this phenomenon while Æneas is hesitating whether to leave burning Troy or not:

“Ecce levis summo de vertice visus Iuli

Fundere lumen apex, tractuque innoxia mo

Lambere flamma comas, et circum tempora pasci Nos, pavidi trepidare metu, crinemque flagrantem Excutere, et sanctos restinguere fontibus ignes.”

When old Anchises interferes, and a falling star is interpreted to mean that Jupiter will lead them forth securely. (Æneid, ii. 682, etc.)

Comb

A crabtree comb. A cudgel applied to the head. To smooth your hair with a crabtree comb, is to give the head a knock with a stick.

Reynard's wonderful comb.

This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Panthera's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry. (Reynard the Fox, chap. ii.)

To comb one's head.

To humiliate a person, or to give him a “set down.”

“I'll carry you with me to my country box, and keep you out of harm's way, till I find you a wife who will comb your head for you.”—Bulwer—Lytton: What will he do with it? iv. 16.

To comb your noddle with a three—legged stool

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Taming of the Shrew, i. 1) is to beat you about the head with a stool. Many stools, such as those used by milkmaids, are still made with three legs; and these handy weapons seem to have been used at one time pretty freely, especially by angry women.

To cut one's comb.

To take down a person's conceit. In allusion to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

To set up one's comb is to be cockish and vainglorious.

Comb the Cat

(To). To run your fingers through the lashes of a cat—o'—nine—tails to disentangle them.

Come and take Them

The reply of Leonidas, King of Sparta, to the messengers sent by Xerxes to Thermop'—ylae. Xerxes said, "Go, and tell those madmen to deliver up their arms." Leonidas replied, "Go, and tell Xerxes to come and take them."

Come Ather

(pron. ah—ther) means, when addressed to horses, "come hither"—i.e. to the left, the side on which the teamsman walks.

Come Down a Peg

Humiliated; lowered in dignity, tone, demands, etc.

"Well, he has come down a peg or two, and he don't like it."—Haggard.

A come down. Loss of prestige or position.

"`Now I'm your worship's washerwoman.' The dignitary coloured, and said that `this was rather a come down.'"—Reade.

Come Down upon One

(To). To reproach, to punish severely, to make a peremptory demand.

Come Home

Return to your house; to touch one's feelings or interest.

"No poetry was ever more human than Chaucer's; none ever came more generally ... home to its readers."—Green: Short History of the English People, chap. v.

Come it

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Has he come it? Has he lent the money? Has he hearkened to your request? Has he come over to your side? Also, "Out with it!"

Come it Strong

Lay it on thick; to exaggerate or overdo. (See Draw It Mild .)

Come Lightly

Lightly come, lightly go. There is a somewhat similar Latin proverb, male parata, male dilabuntur.

Come Of

What's to come of it? What's to come of him? A contracted form of become. To come of [a good stock] is to be descended from [a good family].

Come Off

(To). To occur, to take place. (Anglo—Saxon, of—cuman = Latin, pro—cedo, to proceed.) To come off with honours is to proceed to the end successfully.

Come On!

A challenge to fight with fists.

Come Out

Said of a young lady after she has been introduced at Court, or has entered into society as a "grown—up" person. She "comes out into society."

Come Over One

(To). To wheedle one to do or give something. (Anglo—Saxon, ofer—cuman, to overcome.) To come over one is in reality to conquer or get your own way.

Come Round

(See Coming , etc.).

Come Short

(To). Not to be sufficient. "To come short of" means to miss or fail of attaining.

Come That

as, Can you come that? I can't come that. Here, "come" means to arrive at, to accomplish.

Come the Religious Dodge

(To) means to ask or seek some favour under pretence of a religious motive. Here "come" means to come and introduce. (See Dodge)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Come to

Amount to, to obtain possession. "It will not come to much."

Come to Grief

(To). To fail, to prove a failure, as, "the undertaking (or company) came to grief," i.e. to a grievous end.

Come to Hand

(It has). Been received. "Come into my hand." In Latin, ad manus (alicujus) pervenire.

"Your letter came to hand yesterday."— A. Trollope.

Come to Pass

(To). To happen, to befall, to come about.

"What thou hast spoken is come to pass."— Jer. xxxii. 24.

"It came to pass in those days that there went out a decree."— Luke ii. 1.

Come to an End

To terminate. The allusion is to travelling, when the traveller has come to the end of his journey.

Come to the Hammer To be sold by auction.

Come to the Heath

To tip. A pun taken from the place called Tip—tree Heath, in Essex. Our forefathers, and the French too, delighted in these sort of puns. A great source of slang. (See Chivy .)

Come to the Point

Speak out plainly what you want, do not beat about the bush, but state at once what you wish to say. The point is the gist or grit of a thing. Circumlocution is wandering round the point with words; to come to the point is to omit all needless speech, and bring all the straggling rays to a focus or point.

Come to the Scratch

(See Scratch .)

Come to the Worst

If the worst come to the worst; even if the very worst occurs.

Come Under

(To). To fall under; to be classed under.

Come Up

Marry, come up! (See Marry .) “To come up to” means to equal, to obtain the same number of marks, to amount to the same quantity.

Come Upon the Parish

(To). To live in the workhouse; to be supported by the parish.

Come Yorkshire over One

(To). To bamboozle one, to overreach one. Yorkshire has always been proverbial for shrewdness and sharp practice. “I’s Yorkshire too” means, I am 'cute as you are, and am not to be taken in.

Comedy

means a village—song (Greek, Kome—ode), referring to the village merry—makings, in which comic songs still take a conspicuous place. The Greeks had certain festal processions of great licentiousness, held in honour of Dionysos, in the suburbs of their cities, and termed komoi or village—revels. On these occasions an ode was generally sung, and this ode was the foundation of Greek comedy. (See Tragedy .)

The Father of comedy.

Aristophanēs, the Athenian (B.C. 444—380).

Comes

(2 syl.). A Latin military title, now called count on the continent of Europe, but earl in England from the Saxon earldorman (alderman), Danish eorle. The wife of an earl is called countess.

Comet Wine

A term of praise to signify wine of superior quality. A notion prevails that the grapes in comet years are better in flavour than in other years, either because the weather is warmer and ripens them, better, or because the comets themselves exercise some chemical influence on them. Thus, wine of the years 1811, 1826, 1839, 1845, 1852, 1858, 1861, etc., have a repute.

“The old gentleman yet nurses some few bottles of the famous comet year (i.e. 1811), emphatically called comet wine.”— The Times.

Coming Round

He is coming round. Recovering from sickness; recovering from a fit of the sulks; returning to friendship. Death is the end of life, and therefore recovering from “sickness nigh unto death” is coming back to health, or coming round the corner.

Command Night

In theatrical parlance, a night on which a certain play is performed by command of some person of authority or influence.

Commandment

The eleventh commandment. Thou shalt not be found out.

“After all, that Eleventh Commandment is the only one that is vitally important to keep in these days.”— B. H. Buxton: Jennie of the Prince's, iii. 314.

The ten commandments. The ten fingers or nails. (Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., i. 3.)

Comme il Faut

(French, pronounce cum eel fo), as it should be; quite proper; quite according to etiquette or rule.

Commendam

A living in commendam is a living held by a bishop till an incumbent is appointed. When a clergyman accepts a bishopric he loses all his previous preferment; but in order that these livings may not be uncared for, they are commended by the Crown to the care of the new bishop till they can be properly transferred. Abolished in 1836.

Commendation Ninepence

A bent silver ninepence, supposed to be lucky, and commonly used in the seventeenth century as a love—token, the giver or sender using these words, “From my love, to my love.” Sometimes the coin was broken, and each kept a part.

“Like commendation ninepence, crooked,

With ‘To and from my love,’ it looked.”

Butler: Hudibras, i. 1.

“Filbert:

As this divides, thus are we torn in twain. Kitty: And as this meets, thus may we meet again.” Gay: What d'ye Call It?

Commis—voyageur

(A). A commercial traveller.

Committee

A committee of the whole house, in Parliamentary language, is when the Speaker leaves the chair and all the members form a committee, where anyone may speak once or more than once. In such cases the chair is occupied by the chairman of committees, elected with each new Parliament.

A standing committee, in Parliamentary language, is a committee which continues to the end of the current session. To this committee are referred all questions which fall within the scope of their appointment.

Committing Falsehood

Swindling.

The Earl of Rosebery pointed out that the expression “committing false—hood” in Scotch law was synonymous with what in England was called swindling (April 25th, 1885).

Commodity of Brown Paper

(A). Rubbish served as make—weight; worthless stock; goods palmed off on the inexperienced. In most auctions the buyer of a lot has a fair share of the commodity of brown paper. Rubbish given to supplement a loan.

“Here's young Master Rash! he's in for a commodity of brown paper and old ginger, nine—score and seventeen pounds [i.e. 197, a part of the advance being old ginger and brown paper].”—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

Commodore

A corruption of “commander” (French, commandeur; Spanish, comendador). A naval officer in temporary command of a squadron or division of a fleet. He has the pay of a rear—admiral.

Common Pleas

Civil actions at law brought by one subject against another— not by the Crown against a subject. The Court of Common Pleas is for the trial of civil [not capital] offences. In 1875 this court was abolished, and in 1880 it was represented by the Common Pleas Division and merged in the King's [or Queen's] Bench Division.

Common Prayer The Book of Common Prayer. The book used by the Established Church of England in “divine service.” Common, in this case, means united.

Common Sense

does not mean that good sense which is common, or commonly needed in the ordinary affairs of life, but the sense which is common to all the five, or the point where the five senses meet, supposed to be the seat of the soul, where it judges what is presented by the senses, and decides the mode of action. (See Seven Senses .)

Commoner

The Great Commoner. 1. Sir John Barnard, who, in 1737, proposed to reduce the interest of the national debt from 4 per cent. to 3 per cent., any creditor being at liberty to receive his principal in full if he preferred it. Mr. Goschen (1889—90) reduced the 3 per cents. to two and a half.

2. William Pitt, the statesman (1759—1806).

Commons

To put one on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast is called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To come into commons.

To enter a society in which the members have a common or general dinner table.

Commons in Gross

— that is, at large. These are commons granted to individuals and their heirs by deed, or claimed by prescription as by a parson or corporation.

Commonwealths

(Ideal). “Utopia” by Sir Thomas More, “The New Atlantis” by Lord Bacon, “The City of the Sun” by Campanella, etc.

Companion Ladder

The ladder leading from the poop to the main deck. The “companion way” is the staircase to the cabin. (Dana: Seaman's Manual.)

The staircase from the deck to the cabin.

Companions of Jehu

The Chouans were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self—imposed task and that appointed to Jehu, on being set over the kingdom of Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house, and all the priests of Baal. The Chouans were to cut off all who assassinated Louis XVI., and see that his brother (Jehu) was placed on the throne.

Comparisons are Odorous

So says Dogberry. (Much Ado About Nothing, iii. 5.)

“We own your verses are melodious,

But then comparisons are odious.”

Swift, Answer to Sheridan's “Simile.”

Complementary Colours

(See Colours)

Complexion

literally means “what embraces or contains,” and the idea implies that the colour of the skin corresponds to the habit of body, and the habit of body answers to the element which predominates. If fire predominates, the person is bilious or full of bile, if air, he is sanguine or full of blood, if earth, the body is melancholic or full of black bile, if water, it is phlegmatic or full of phlegm. The first is hot and dry, the second hot and moist, the third cold and dry, and the last moist and cold like water.

“’Tis ill, tho' different your complexions are [i.e. dispositions].” Dryden.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Cretans through mere complexion lie.”

Pitt: Hymn of Callimachus.

Compline

(2 syl.). The last service of the day in the Roman Catholic Church. First appointed by the abbot Benedict in the sixth century. The word is a corruption of completorium.

In ecclesiastical Latin vesperinus, from vesper, means evening service, and completinus is formed on the same model.

Compostella

A corruption of Giacomo—postolo (James the Apostle). So called after his relics were transferred thither from Iria Flavia (El Padron) on the borders of Galicia, in the ninth century. Leo III. transferred the See of Iria Flavia to Compostella. (Somewhere between 810 and 816.)

Compte rendu

The account already sent; the account of particulars delivered; a report of proceedings.

Comrade

(2 syl.). The name of Fortunio's fairy horse. It ate but once a week; knew the past, present, and future; and spake with the voice of a man. (Grimm's Goblins: Fortunio.) (See Horse)

Comrades

(2 syl.). Those who sleep in the same bed—chamber. It is a Spanish military term derived from the custom of dividing soldiers into chambers. The proper spelling is camerades, men of the same camera (chamber).

Comus

God of revelry. Milton represents him as a male Circe. (Greek, komos, carousal.)

“This nymph [Circe], that gazed upon his [Bacchus's] clustering locks, ... Had by him, ere he parted thence, a son,

Much like his father, but his mother more,

Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus named.”

Milton: Comus,

54—58.

Comus.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The elder brother in this domestic drama is meant for Lord Viscount Brackley, eldest son of John, Earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales. The younger brother is Mr. Thomas Egerton. The lady is Lady Alice Egerton. (Milton.)

Comus's Court

A social gathering formerly held at the Half—Moon Tavern in Cheapside, London.

Con Amore

(Italian). With heart and soul; as, “He did it con amore”—i.e. lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con Commodo

(Italian). At a convenient rate. A musical term.

Con Spirito

(Italian). With quickness and vivacity. A musical term.

Conan

The Thersites of “Fingal;” brave even to rashness.

Blow for blow

or claw for claw, as Conan said. Conan made a vow never to take a blow without returning it; when he descended into the infernal regions, the arch—fiend gave him a cuff, which Conan instantly returned, saying “Claw for claw.”

“ ‘Blow for blow,’ as Conan said to the devil.”— Scott Waverley, chap. xxii.

Concert Pitch

The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by a number of musicians acting in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. Generally, a particular note is selected for the standard, as A or C; this note is put into the proper pitch, and all other notes are regulated by it.

Concerto

(Italian). A composition intended to display the powers of some particular instrument, with orchestral accompaniments.

Concierge

(3 syl.). French. The door — porter of a public or private “hotel,” or house divided into flats, or of a prison.

Conciergerie

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(French.) The office or room of a concierge or porter's lodge; a state prison. During the Revolution it was the prison where the chief victims were confined prior to execution.

Conclave

(2 syl.). A set of rooms, all of which are entered by one common key (Latin, con clavis). The word is applied to the little deal cells erected in some large apartment for the cardinals who meet to choose a new Pope, because the long gallery of the Vatican between the cells and the windows of the palace is common ground to all the conclavists. The assembly itself is, by a figure of speech, also called a conclave.

Conclamatio

amongst the ancient Romans, was similar to the Irish howl over the dead; and, as in Ireland, women led the funeral cortège, weeping ostentatiously and gesticulating. "One not howled over" (corpus nondum conclamatum) meant one at the point of death; and "one howled for" was one given up for dead or really deceased. Virgil tells us that the ululation was a Phoenician custom; and therefore he makes the palace ring with howls when Dido burnt herself to death.

"Lamentis, gemituque, et foemineo ululato, Texta fremunt." Aeneid, iv. 667.

Conclamatum est

He is dead past all hope. The sense of hearing is generally the last to fail in the hour of death, hence the Romans were accustomed to call on the deceased three times by name, and if no indication of hearing was shown death was considered certain. Conclamatum est, he has been called and shows no sign.

Concord is Strength

The wise saw of Periander, "tyrant" of Corinth (B.C. 665—585).

Concordat

An agreement made between a ruler and the Pope relative to the collation of benefices. As the Concordat of 1801 between Napoleon Bonaparte and Pope Pius VII.; the Concordat of 1516 between Francois

I. and Pope Leo X. to abolish the "pragmatic sanction;" and the Germanic Concordat of 1448 between Frederick III. and Pope Nicholas V.

Condign'

Latin; condignus (well worthy); as condign punishment— i.e. punishment well deserved.

"In thy condign praise."

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost,

i. 2.

Condottieri

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Leaders of military adventurers in the fifteenth century. The most noted of these brigand leaders in Italy were Guarnieri, Lando, Francesco of Carmagnola, and Francesco Sforza. Giacomo Sforza, the son of Francesco, married the daughter of the Duke of Milan, and succeeded his father—in—law. The singular is Condottiere (5 syl.).

Confederate States

The eleven States which revolted from the Union in the late American Civil War (1861—1866)— viz. Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida and Texas.

Confederation of the Rhine Sixteen German provinces in 1806 dissolved their connection with Germany, and allied themselves with France. At the downfall of Napoleon in 1814 this confederation melted away of itself.

Confession

John of Nepomuc, canon of Prague, suffered death rather than violate the seal of confession. The Emperor Wenceslas ordered him to be thrown off a bridge into the Moldau, because he refused to reveal the confession of the empress. He was canonised as St. John Nepomucen.

Confiscate

(3 syl.). To forfeit to the public treasury. (Latin, con fiscus, with the tribute money.)

“If thou dost shed one drop of Christian blood,

Thy lands and goods are, by the laws of Venice, Confiscate to the State of Venice.”

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Confusion Worse Confounded

Disorder made worse than before.

“With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout,

Confusion worse confounded.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. line 996.

Conge

“To give a person his congé” is to dismiss him from your service. “To take one's congé” is to give notice to friends of your departure. This is done by leaving a card at the friend's house with the letters P.P.C. (pour prendre congé) inscribed on the left—hand corner. (French, donner congé and donner à son congé.)

Conge d'Elire

(Norman — French, leave to elect). A royal warrant given to the dean and chapter of a diocese to elect the person nominated by the Crown to their vacant see.

Congleton Bears

The men of Congleton. It is said that the Congleton parish clerk sold the church Bible to buy a bear.

Congregationalists

Those Protestant Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community, and has a right to make its own laws and choose its own minister. They rose in the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Congreve Rockets

(1808.) So called from Sir William Congreve, eldest son of Lieut.—Colonel Sir William Congreve (1772—1828).

Congreves

A predecessor of Lucifer matches. The splints were first dipped in sulphur, and then tipped with the chlorate of potash paste, in which gum was substituted for sugar, and there was added a small quantity of sulphide of antimony. The match was ignited by being drawn through a fold of sand—paper with pressure. These matches, being dangerous, were prohibited in France and Germany. (See Prometheans;Lucifers)

Conjugal

What pertains to conjuges (yoke—fellows). In ancient times a yoke (jugum) was put on a man and woman by way of marriage ceremony, and the two were said to be yoked together by marriage.

Conjuring Cap

I must put on my conjuring cap— i.e. your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect on it. Eric XIV., King of Sweden, was a great admirer of magic, and had an “enchanted cap” made, either to keep his head warm or for mystification. He pretended to have power over the elements; and when a storm arose, his subjects used to say “The king has got on his conjuring cap.”

Connecticut U.S. America, is the Indian Quin — neh — tuk — qut, meaning “land of the long tidal river.”

Connubialis de Mulcibre fecit Apellem

Love turned a blacksmith into a great artist. Said of Quentin Matsys, the blacksmith of Antwerp, who was in love with an artist's daughter. The father scorned the alliance, and said he should not be accepted unless he made himself a worthy artist. This did Matsys and won his bride. The sentence may be seen still on the monument of Quentin Matsys outside Antwerp cathedral.

Conqueror

The Conqueror.

Alexander the Great. The conqueror of the world. (B.C. 356, 336—323.) Alfonso of Portugal. (1094, 1137—1185.)

Aurungzebe the Great. Alemgir. The most powerful of the great Moguls. (1618, 1659—1707.) James I. of Aragon. (1206, 1213—1276.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Othman or Osman I. Founder of the Turkish power. (1259, 1299—1326.) Francisco Pizarro. Conquistador. So called because he conquered Peru. (1475—1541.) William, Duke of Normandy. So called because he obtained England by conquest. (1027, 1066—1087.)

Conqueror's Nose

(A). A prominent straight nose, rising at the bridge. Charlemagne had such a nose, so had Henry the Fowler (Heinrich I. of Germany), Rudolf I. of Germany; Friedrich I. of Hohenzollern, famous for reducing to order his unruly barons by blowing up their castles (1382—1440); our own “Iron Duke,” Bismarck, the iron Chancellor of Prussia, etc.

Conquest

(The). The accession of William I. to the crown of England. So called because his right depended on his conquest of Harold, the reigning king. (1066.)

Conrad

(Lord). Afterwards called Lara, the corsair. A proud, ascetic, but successful captain. Hearing that the Sultan Seyd was about to attack the pirates, Conrad assumed the disguise of a dervish and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the sultan's fleet. The trick being discovered, Conrad was taken prisoner, but was released by Gulnare, the sultan's favourite concubine, whom he had rescued from the flaming palace. Gulnare escaped with the corsair to the Pirates' Isle, and when Conrad found Medora dead, he left the island, and no one knew whither he went. The rest of his adventures are recorded under his new name of Lara. (Byron: The Corsair.)

Conscience

Have you the conscience to [demand such a price]. Can your conscience allow you to [demand such a price]. Conscience is the secret monitor within man which accuses or excuses him, as he does what he thinks to be wrong or right.

In all conscience.

As, “And enough too, in all conscience.” Meaning that the demand made is as much as conscience would tolerate without accusing the person of actual dishonesty; to the verge of that fine line which separates honesty from dishonesty.

My conscience!

An oath. I swear by my conscience.

Court of Conscience.

Established for the recovery of small debts in London and other trading places. These courts have been superseded by county courts.

“Why should not Conscience have vacation,

As well as other courts o' the nation?”

Butler: Hudibras, ii. 2.

Nonconformist Conscience.

(See Nonconformist)

Conscience Clause

(A). A clause in an Act of Parliament to relieve persons with conscientious scruples from certain requirements in it.

Conscience Money

Money paid anonymously to Government by persons who have defrauded the revenue. Their conscience being uneasy, they send the deficit to the Treasury, and the sum is advertised in the Gazette.

Conscious Water

The conscious water saw its God, and blushed (Nympha pudica Deum vidit, et erubuit). Crashaw's epigram on the miracle of Cana in Galilee. "The modest water" would be a closer rendering.

Conscript Fathers

In Latin, Patres Conscripti. The Roman senate. Romulus instituted a senate consisting of a hundred elders, called Patres (Fathers). After the Sabines joined the State, another hundred were added. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king, added a third hundred, called Patres Minorum Gentium. When Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was banished, several of the senate followed him, and the vacancies were filled up by Junius Brutus, the first consul. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial register, and called Conscripti; the entire body was then addressed as Patres [et] Conscripti or Patres, Conscripti.

Consentes Dii

The twelve chief Roman deities—Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Mercury, and Vulcan. Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, and Venus. Ennius puts them into two hexameter verses:

"Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi', Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo."

Called "consentes," says Varro,

"Quia in consilium Jovis adhibebantur."—De Lingua Latina, vii. 28.

Consenting Stars

Stars forming configurations for good or evil. In Judges v. 20 we read that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed unlucky or malignant configurations.

"... Scourge the bad revolting stars

That have consented unto Henry's death."

Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., i. 1.

Conservative

(4 syl.). A medium Tory— one who wishes to preserve the union of Church and State, and not radically to alter the constitution. The word was first used in this sense in 1830, in the January number of the Quarterly Review — “We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party” (p. 276).

Canning, ten years previously, had used the word in a speech delivered at Liverpool in March, 1820. In Lord Salisbury's Ministry those Whigs and Radicals who joined the Conservatives were called “Liberal Unionists” because they objected to give Ireland a separate parliament (1885).

Consistory

(A). An ecclesiastical court. In Rome it consists of the cardinals, presided over by the Pope. In England it is a diocesan court, presided over by the chancellor of the diocese.

Consolidated Fund

(The). In 1757 an Act was passed for consolidating the nine loans bearing different interests, into one common loan bearing an interest of three per cent. In 1890 this interest was reduced to two and three—quarter per cent.; and in 1903 will be still further reduced to two and a—half per cent. This fund is pledged for the payment of the interest of the national debt, the civil list, the salaries of the judges, ambassadors, and other high officials, etc.

Consols

A contraction of Consolidated Fund. (See above.)

Consort

is, properly, one whose lot is cast in with another. As the Queen does not lose by marriage her separate existence, like other women, her husband is called a consort, because he consorts with the Queen, but does not share her sovereignty.

“Wilt thou be our consort?”

Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona,

iv. 1.

Conspirators

Members of a commercial ring or corner. (See Corner, Trusts) These merchants “conspire” to fix the price of articles, and make the public bleed ad libitum. In criminal law it means persons who league together to do something unlawful.

Constable

(Latin, comes—stabuli) means “Master of the Horse.” The constable of England and France was at one time a military officer of state, next in rank to the crown.

To overrun or outrun the constable. To get into debt; spend more than one's income; to talk about what you do not understand. (See below.)

“Quoth Hudibras, Friend Ralph, thou hast

Outrun the constable at last;

For thou hast fallen on a new Dispute, as senseless as untrue.”

Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Who's to pay the constable?

Who is to pay the score?

The constable arrests debtors, and, of course, represents the creditor; wherefore, to overrun the constable is to overrun your credit account. To pay the constable is to give him the money due, to prevent an arrest.

Constable de Bourbon

Charles, Duc de Bourbon, a powerful enemy of Francois I. He was killed while heading the assault on Rome. (1527.)

Constantine Tolman

(Cornwall). A vast egg—like stone, thirty—three feet in length, eighteen in width, and fourteen in thickness, placed on the points of two natural rocks, so that a man may creep under it. The stone upheld weighs 750 tons.

Constantine's Cross

In Latin, vinces in hoc; in English, By this conquer. It is said that Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, in the shape and with the motto here given. In the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra a vision appeared to him in his sleep, commanding him to inscribe the cross and the motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice of the vision, and prevailed. The monogram is CRistoz (Christ). (See Gibbon: Decline and Fall, chap. xix. n.)

This may be called a standing miracle in legendary history; for, besides Andrew's cross, and the Dannebrog or red cross of Denmark (q.v.), we have the cross which appeared to Don Alonzo before the battle of Ourique in 1139, when the Moors were totally routed with incredible slaughter. As Alonzo was drawing up his men, the figure of a cross appeared in the eastern sky, and Christ, suspended on the cross, promised the Christian king a complete victory. This legend is commemorated by the device assumed by Alonzo, in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross, each escutcheon being charged with five bezants, in memory of the five wounds of Christ. (See Labarum)

Constituent Assembly

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The first of the national assemblies of the French Revolution; so called because it took an oath never to separate till it had given to France a constitution. (1788—1791.)

Constituents

Those who constitute or elect members of Parliament. (Latin, constituo, to place or elect, etc.)

Constitution

The fundamental laws of a state. It may be either despotic, aristocratic, democratic, or mixed.

To give a nation a constitution is to give it fixed laws even to the limitation of the sovereign's rights, so that the people are not under the arbitrary caprice of a ruler, but under a known code of laws. A despotism or autocracy is solely under the unrestricted will of the despot or autocrat.

Constitutions of Clarendon

(See Clarendon

Apostolic Constitutions.

A “Catholic” code of both doctrine and discipline collected by Clemens Romaus. The word “Apostolic,” as in the “Apostles' Creed,” does not mean made by the Apostles, but what the “Church” considered to be in accordance with apostolic teaching.

Construe

To translate. To translate into English means to set an English word in the place of a foreign word, and to put the whole sentence in good grammatical order. (Latin, construo, to construct.)

Consuelo

(4 syl.). The impersonation of moral purity in the midst of temptations. The heroine of George Sand's (Mad. Dudevant's) novel of the same name.

Contango

The sum paid by a speculator on a “bull account” (i.e. a speculation on the rise in the price of certain stock), to defer completing the bargain till the next settling day. (See Backwardation)

Contemplate

(3 syl.). To inspect or watch the temple. The augur among the Romans, having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, marked out with his wand the space in the heavens he intended to consult. This space he called the templum. Having divided his templum into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; the watching of the templum was called contemplating.

Contempt of Court

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Refusing to conform to the rules of the law courts. Consequential contempt is that which tends to obstruct the business or lower the dignity of the court by indirection. Direct contempt is an open insult or resistance to the judge or others officially employed in the court.

Contenement

A word used in Magna Charta, meaning the lands and chattels connected with a tenement; also whatever befits the social position of a person, as the arms of a gentleman, the merchandise of a trader, the ploughs and wagons of a peasant, etc.

“In every case the contenement (a word expressive of chattels necessary to each man's station) was exempted from seizure.”— Hallam: Middle Ages, part ii. chap. viii. p. 342.

Contentment is true Riches

The wise saw of Democritus, the laughing philosopher. (B.C. 509—400.)

“Content is wealth, the riches of the mind;

And happy he who can such riches find.”

Dryden: Wife of Bath's Tale.

Contests of Wartburg

(The), sometimes called The Battles of the Minstrels. An annual contest held in Wartburg, in Saxe Weimar, for a prize given by Hermann, Margrave of Thuringia, for the best poem. About 150 specimens of these poems are still extant, by far the best being those of Walter of Vogelweide, in Thuringia (1168—1230).

The poem called The Contest of Wartburg is by Wolfram, a minnesinger. It records the contest of the two great German schools of poetry in the thirteenth century— the Thuringian and the Suabian. Henry of Vogel—weide and Henry of Ofterdingen represent the two schools.

Continence of a Scipio

It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africanus, and he refused to see her, “lest he should be tempted to forget his principles.” The same is said of Cyrus (see Panthea), of Anson (see Theresa), and of Alexander.

Continental System

A name given to Napoleon's plan for shutting out Great Britain from all commerce with the continent of Europe. He forbade under pain of war any nation of Europe to receive British exports, or to send imports to any of the British dominions. It began Nov. 21st, 1806.

Contingent

(A). The quota of troops furnished by each of several contracting powers, according to agreement. The word properly means the number which falls to the lot of each; hence we call a fortuitous event a contingency.

Contra bonos Mores

(Latin). Not in accordance with good manners; not comme il faut (q.v.).

Contretemps

(French). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally, “out of time.”

Conventicle

means a “little convent,” and was originally applied to a cabal of monks against the election of a proposed abbot. It now means a religious meeting of dissenters. (Latin, conventus, an assembly, with a diminutive.) (See Chapel)

Conversation Sharp

Richard Sharp, F.R.S., the critic. (1759—1835.)

Convey

A polite term for steal. Thieves are, by a similar euphemism, called conveyers. (Latin, con—veho, to carry away.)

“Convey, the wise it call. Steal! foh! a fico for the phrase.”— Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 3.

Conveyers

Thieves. (See above.)

“Bolingbroke. `Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.’

Rich. II.

`O, good! “Convey.” Conveyers are ye all,

That rise thus nimbly by a true king's fall.’ “

Shakespeare: Richard II., iv. 4.

Conway Cabal

(The), 1777. A faction organised to place General Gates at the head of the American army. He conquered Burgoyne, October, 1777, at Saratoga, and hoped to supplant Washington. The Conway referred to is the town in New Brunswick, North America, where the cabal was formed.

General Gates was conquered in 1780 by Lord Cornwallis.

Conyger

or Conigry. A warren for conies, a cony—burrow.

Cooing and Billing

like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in the year 1555, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

“Still amorous, and fond, and billing,

Like Philip and Mary on a shilling.”

Hudibras, part iii. 1.

Cook your Goose

(See Goose)

Cooked

The books have been cooked. The ledger and other trade books have been tampered with, in order to show a balance in favour of the bankrupt. The term was first used in reference to George Hudson, the railway king, under whose chairmanship the Eastern Counties Railway accounts were falsified. The allusion is to preparing meat for table.

Cooking

Terms belonging to cuisine applied to man under different circumstances: Sometimes he is well basted; he boils with rage, is baked with heat, and burns with love or jealousy. Sometimes he is battered and well buttered; he is often cut up, devoured with a flame, and done brown. We dress his jacket for him; sometimes he is eaten up with care; sometimes he is fried. We cook his goose for him, and sometimes he makes a goose of himself. We make a hash of him, and at times he makes a hash of something else. He gets into hot water, and sometimes into a mess. Is made into mincemeat, makes mincemeat of his money, and is often in a pickle. We are often asked to toast him, sometimes he gets well roasted, is sometimes set on fire, put into a stew, or is in a stew no one knows why. A “soft” is half-baked, one severely handled is well peppered, to falsify accounts is to salt them, wit is Attic salt, and an exaggerated statement must be taken cum grano salis. A pert young person is a sauce box, a shy lover is a spoon, a rich father has to fork out, and is sometimes dished of his money.

ii. Connected with foods and drinks.

A conceited man does not think small beer (or small potatoes) of himself, and our mouth is called a potato—trap. A simpleton is a cake, a gudgeon, and a pigeon. Some are cool as a cucumber, others hot as a quail. A chubby child is a little dumpling. A man or woman may be a cheese or duck. A courtesan is called a mutton, and a large coarse hand is a mutton fist. A greedy person is a pig, a fat one is a sausage, and a shy one, if not a sheep, is certainly sheepish; while a Lubin casts sheep's eyes at his lady—love. A coward is chicken—hearted, a fat person is crummy, and a cross one is crusty, while an aristocrat belongs to the upper crust of society. A yeoman of the guards is a beef-eater, a soldier a red herring, a policeman a lobster, and a stingy, ill-tempered old man is a crab. A walking advertiser between two boards is a sandwich. An alderman in his chair is a turkey hung with sausages. Two persons resembling each other are like as two peas. A chit is a mere sprat, a delicate maiden a tit-bit, and a colourless countenance is called a whew—face. “How now? ... Where got ye that whew—face?”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cooks

Athenæus affirms that cooks were the first kings of the earth.

In the luxurious ages of ancient Greece Sicilian cooks were most esteemed, and received very high wages. Among them Trimalcio was very celebrated. It is said that he could cook the most common fish, and give it the flavour and look of the most highly esteemed.

In the palmy days of Rome a chief cook had 800 a year. Antony gave the cook who arranged his banquet for Cleopatra the present of a city.

Modern Cooks.

CAREME. Called the “Regenerator of Cookery” (1784—1833). FRANCATELLI (Charles Elmé), who succeeded Ude at Crockford's. Afterwards he was appointed to the Royal household, and lastly to the Reform Club (1805—1876).

SOYER (Alexis), who died 1858. His epitaph is Soyer tranquille.

UDE. The most learned of modern cooks, author of Science de Gueule. It was Ude who said, “A cook must be born a cook, he cannot be made.” Another of his sayings is this: “Music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanics possess professors under the age of twenty years, but pre—eminence in cookery can never be attained under thirty years of age.” Ude was chef to Louis XIV., then to Lord Sefton, then to the Duke of York, then to Crockford's Club. He left Lord Sefton's because on one occasion one of the guests added pepper to his soup.

VATEL. At a fête given by the great Condé to Louis XIV. at Cantilly the roti at the twenty—fifth table was wanting. Vatel being told of it exclaimed that he could not survive such a disgrace. Another messenger then announced that the lobsters for the turbot—sauce had not arrived, whereupon Vatel retired to his room and, leaning his sword against the wall, thrust himself through, and at the third attempt succeeded in killing himself (1671).

WELTJE. Cook to George while Prince Regent.

Cool Card

You are a cool card (or pretty cool card). A person who coolly asks for something preposterous or outrageous. Card = character, hence a queer card, a rum card, etc. And “cool” in this connection means coolly impudent.

Gifford says the phrase means a “cooling—card, or bolus”; but this is not likely, as a cool—card acts generally as an irritant. A person's card of address is given at the door, and represents the person himself, and this without doubt is the card referred to.

“You're a shaky old card; and you can't be in love with this Lizzie.”— Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, book iii. chap. i. p. 192.

Cool as a Cucumber

Perfectly composed; neither angry nor agitated in the least.

Cool Hundred

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A) or Cool Thousand (or any other sum) means entire, or the whole of 100. Cool, in this case, means not influenced by hot-headed enthusiasm or exaggeration.

“I lost a cool hundred myself.”— Mackenzie.

Cool Tankard

(A) or Cool Cup. A drink made of wine and water, with lemon, sugar, and borage; sometimes also slices of cucumber.

Coon

(A) means a racoon, a small American animal valued for its fur. It is about the size of a fox, and lodges in hollow trees.

A gone coon.

A person in a terrible fix; one on the verge of ruin. The coon being hunted for its fur is a “gone coon” when it has no escape from its pursuers. It is said that Colonel Crockett was one day out racoon—shooting in North America, when he levelled his gun at a tree where an “old coon” was concealed. Knowing the colonel’s prowess, it cried out, in the voice of a man, “Hallo, there! air you Colonel Crockett? for if you air, I’ll jist come down, or I know I am a gone ‘coon.”

Martin Scott, lieutenant-general of the United States, is said to have had a prior claim to this saying.

Cooper

Half stout and half porter. The term arises from the practice at breweries of allowing the coopers a daily portion of stout and porter. As they do not like to drink porter after stout, they mix the two together.

Cooper

A coop for wine bottles. The bottles lie in a slanting position in the coop, and may be transported in it from place to place. We find allusions to “six—bottle coopers” not unfrequently, i.e. coops or cases containing six bottles. Compare “hen—coops,” “cooped up,” etc. (Latin, cupa, a cask; our “cup.”)

“(Enter waiter with a cooper of wine.)

Waiter:

Six bottles of wine for Corporal Toddy.” O’Keeffe: Rogues All, iii. 4.

Cooper

Do you want a cooper? This question is asked of those who have an order to visit the wine cellars of the London Docks. The “cooper” bores the casks and gives the visitor different wines to taste.

Cooper’s Hill

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Near Runnymede and Egham. Both Denham and Pope have written in praise of this hill.

“If I can be to thee

A poet, thou Parnassus art to me.” Denham.

Coot

A silly old coot. Stupid as a coot. The coot is a small water—fowl.

Bald as a coot.

The coot has a strong, straight, and somewhat conical bill, the base of which tends to push up the forehead, and there dilates, so as to form a remarkable naked patch.

Cop

(A). A policeman.

Cop

(A). A copperhead (q.v.).

Cop To throw, as cop it here. The word properly means to beat or strike, as to cop a shuttlecock or ball with a bat. (Greek, copto, to beat); but in Norfolk it means to “hull” or throw.

Cop

(To). To catch [a fever, etc.]. To “get copped” is to get caught by the police. (Latin, capere, to take, etc.) A similar change of a into o is in cotched (caught).

“They thought I was sleepin', ye know,

And they sed as I'd copped it o' Jim;

Well, it come like a bit of a blow,

For I watched by the deathbed of him.”

Sims: Dagonet Ballads (The Last Letter).

“`I shall cut this to—morrow, ...” said the younger man. `You'll be copped, then,' replied the other.”— T. Terrell: Lady Delmar.

Copenhagen

The Duke of Wellington's horse, on which he rode in the Battle of Waterloo, “from four in the morning till twelve at night.” It was a rich chestnut, 15 hands high. It was afterwards a pensioner in the paddocks of Strathfieldsaye. It died quite blind, in 1835, at the age of twenty—seven, and was buried with military honours. (See Horse .)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Copernicanism

The doctrine that the earth moves round the sun, in opposition to the doctrine that the sun moves round the earth; so called after Nicolas Copernicus, the Prussian astronomer. (1473—1543.)

“Even Bellarmine does not by any means hold the consensus to be decisive against Copernicanism; for, in his letter to F. Foscarini, he says that though he does not believe that any proof of the earth's motion can be adduced, yet, should such proof occur, he is quite prepared to change his views as to the meaning of the Scripture text.”— Nineteenth Century, May, 1886 (The Case of Galileo).

“Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Holy Congregation that that false Pythagorean doctrine altogether opposed to Holy Scripture, on the mobility of the earth and the immobility of the sun, taught by Nicholas Copernicus. ... This congregation has decreed that the said book of Copernicus be suspended until it be corrected.”— Decree of the H. Congregation of the Index, A.D. 1616. (Quoted in the Nineteenth Century, as above.)

Copesmate

(2 syl.). A companion. “Copesmate of ugly night” (Rape of Lucrece), a mate who copes with you.

Cophetua

An imaginary king of Africa, of great wealth, who “disdained all womankind.” One day he saw a beggar—girl from his window, and fell in love with her. He asked her name; it was Penelophon, called by Shakespeare Xenelophon (Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 1).

They lived together long and happily, and at death were universally lamented. (Percy's Reliques, book ii. 6.)

“King Cophetua loved the beggar—maid.”

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.

ii. 1.

Copper

(A). A policeman. Said to be so called from the copper badge which Fernando Wood, of New York, appointed them to wear; but more likely a variant of “cop” (q.v.).

“There were cries of ‘Coppers, Coppers!’ in the yard, and then a violent struggle. ... Whoever it was that was wanted had been evidently secured and dragged off to gaol.”— T. Terrell: Lady Delmar, 1.

Copper was by the ancient alchemists called Venus; gold, symbol of Apollo (the sun); silver, of Diana (the moon); iron, of Mars; quicksilver, of Mercury; tin, of Jupiter; and lead, of Saturn.

Copper

Give us a copper, i.e. a piece of copper money. I have no coppers — no ha'pence.

Copper Captain

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A Brummagem captain; a “General von Poffenburgh.” Michael Perez is so called in Rule a Wife and have a Wife, by Beaumont and Fletcher.

“To this copper—captain was confided the command of the troops.”— W. Irving.

Copper Nose

Oliver Cromwell; also called “Ruby Nose,” “Nosey,” and “Nose Almighty,” no doubt from some scorbutic tendency which showed itself in a big red nose.

Copper—nosed Harry

Henry VIII. When Henry VIII. had spent all the money left him by his miserly father, he minted an inferior silver coin, in which the copper alloy soon showed itself on the more prominent parts, especially the nose of the face; and hence the people soon called the king “Old Copper—nose.”

Copperheads

Secret foes. Copperheads are poisonous serpents of America that give no warning, like rattlesnakes, of their attack. In the great Civil War of the United States the term was applied by the Federals to the peace party, supposed to be the covert friends of the Confederates.

Copple

The hen killed by Reynard, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Copronymus

So Constantine V. was surnamed (718, 741—775). “Kopros” is the Greek for dung, and Constantine V. was called Copronymus: “Parce qu'il salit les fonts baptismaux lorsqu'on le baptisait.”

Copts

The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have for eleven centuries been in possession of the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Thebaid. These Christians conduct their worship in a dead language called “Coptic” (language of the Copts).

“The Copts [of Egypt] circumcise, confess to their priests, and abstain from swine's flesh. They are Jacobites in their creed.”— S. Olin; Travels in Egypt (vol. i. chap viii. p. 102).

Copus

A drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together, and served in a “loving—cup.” Dog—Latin for cupellon Hippocratis (a cup of hippocras).

Copy

That's a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me.

Copy

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is a printer's term both for original MS. and printed matter that is to be set up in type.

Copyhold Estate

Land which a tenant holds [or rather, held] without any deed of transfer in his own possession. His only document is a copy of the roll made by the steward of the manor from the court—roll kept in the manor—house.

“The villein took an oath of fealty to his lord for the cottage and land which he enjoyed from his bounty. ... These tenements were suffered to descend to their children ... and thus the tenure of copyhold was established.”—Lingard: England (vol. ii. chap. i. p. 27, note).

Copyright

The law of copyright was made in 1814 (54 Geo. III. c. 156). It enacted that an author should possess a right in his work for life, or for twenty—eight years. If he died before the expiration of twenty—eight years, the residue of the right passed to the heirs.

By Talfourd's or Lord Mahon's Act (1842) the time was extended to forty—two years, and at least seven years after decease: for example, if the time unexpired exceeds seven years, the heirs enjoy the residue; if less, the heirs claim seven years.

In the first case eleven copies of the work had to be given for public use; by Lord Mahon's Act the number was reduced to five: i.e. one to each of the following institutions, viz. the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the University library (Cambridge), the Advocates' library (Edinburgh), and the library of Trinity College (Dublin).

The six omitted are Sion College, the Scotch Universities of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews, and King's Inn (Dublin).

Coq—a—l'âne

A cock—and—bull story; idle nonsense, as “Il fait toujours des coq—à—l'âne ”— he is always doing silly things, or talking rubbish.

Il m'a répondu par un coq—à—l'âne

— His reply was nothing to the purpose.

Corah

in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Dr. Titus Oates (Numbers xvi.). North describes him as a short man, extremely ugly: if his mouth is taken for the centre, his chin, forehead, and cheek—bones would fall in the circumference.

“Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud;

Sure signs he neither choleric was, nor proud;

His long chin proved his wit; his saint—like grace

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.

His memory, miraculously great,

Could plots, exceeding man's belief, repeat

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 646—51.

Coral Beads

The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the neck of infants, to “preserve and fasten their teeth,” and save them from “the falling sickness.” It was considered by soothsayers as a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck, and fire. Paracelsus says it should be worn round the neck of children as a preservative “against fits, sorcery, charms, and poison.” The coral bells are a Roman Catholic addition, the object being to frighten away evil spirits by their jingle.

“Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children ... to preserve them from the falling sickness. It has also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral ... will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover.”— Plat: Jewel—House of Art and Nature.

Coral Master

A juggler. So called by the Spaniards. In ancient times the juggler, when he threw off his mantle, appeared in a tight scarlet or coral dress.

Coram Judice

(Latin). Under consideration; still before the judge.

Coranach

or CORONACH. Lamentation for the dead, as anciently practised in Ireland and Celtic Scotland. (Gaelic, comh rànaich, crying together.) Pennant says it was called by the Irish hululoo.

Corbant

The rook, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Latin, corvus; French, corbeau.) Heinrich von Alkmar.

Corbeaux

Bearers, i.e. persons who carry the dead to the grave; mutes, etc. So called from the corbillards, or coches d'eau, which went from Paris to Corbeil with the dead bodies of those who died in the 16th century of a fatal epidemic.

“J'ai lu quelque part que ce coche [the Gorbillard] servit, sous Henri IV., a transporter des morts, victimes d'une epidémie de Paris à Corbeil. Le nom de Corbillard resta depuis aux voitures funebres.”— Alf. Bonnardot.

Corceca

[Blind—heart]. Superstition is so named in Spenser's Faërie Queene. Abessa tried to make her understand that danger was at hand, but, being blind, she was dull of comprehension. At length she was induced to shut her door, and when Una knocked would give no answer. Then the lion broke down the door, and both entered. The meaning is that England, the lion, broke down the door of Superstition at the Reformation. Corceca means Romanism in England. (Book i. 3.)

Corcyrean Sedition

(The), B.C. 479. Corcyra was a colony of Corinth, but in the year of the famous Battle of Plataea revolted from the mother country and formed an alliance with the Athenians. The Corinthians made war on the colony and took 1,000 prisoners; of these 250 were men of position, who promised as the price of liberty to bring back the Corcyreans to the mother country. This was the cause of the sedition. The 250 returned captives represented the oligarchical party; their opponents represented the democratic element. The latter prevailed, but it would be difficult to parallel the treachery and brutality of the whole affair.

(Thucydides, book iv. 46, 48.)

Cordelia

The youngest of Lear's three daughters, and the only one that loved him. (Shakespeare: King Lear.)

Cordelia's Gift

A "voice ever soft, gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman." (Shakespeare: King Lear,

v. 3.)

"It is her voice that he hears prevailing over the those [sic] of the rest of the company, ... for she has not Cordelia's gift."—Miss Broughton: Dr. Cupid.

Cordeliers

i.e. "cord—wearers," 1215. A religious order of the Minor Brothers of St. Francis Assisi. They wore a large grey cloth vestment, girt about the loins with a rope or cord. It was one of the mendicant orders, not allowed to possess any property at all; even their daily food was a gift of charity. The Cordeliers distinguished themselves in philosophy and theology. Duns Scotus was one of their most distinguished members.

The tale is that in the reign of St. Louis these Minorites repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordelies (corded people) were. From this they received their appellation.

Cordeliers

(The), 1790. A French political club in the Great Revolution. It held its meetings in the "Convert des Cordeliers," which was in the "Place de l'École de Médecine." The Cordeliers were the rivals of the Jacobins, and numbered among its members Paré (the president), Danton, Marat, Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, Chaumette, Dufournoy de Villiers, Fabre d'Eglantine (a journalist), and others. The Club of the Cordeliers was far in advance of the Jacobins, being the first to demand the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a commonwealth instead. Its leaders were put to death between March 24th and April 5th, 1794.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

This club was nicknamed “The Pandemonium,” and Danton was called the “Archfiend.” When Bailly, the mayor, locked them out of their hall in 1791, they met in the Tennis Court (Paris), and changed their name into the “Society of the Rights of Man”; but they are best known by their original appellation.

Cordon

(The), in fortification, is the flat stone covering of the revetment (q.v.), to protect the masonry from the rain.

Cordon

(Un grand). A member of the Legion d'Honneur. The cross is attached to a grand (broad) ribbon.

Cordon Bleu

(Un) (French). A knight of the ancient order of the St. Esprit (Holy Ghost); so called because the decoration is suspended on a blue ribbon. It was at one time the highest order in the kingdom.

Un repas de cordon bleu.

A well—cooked and well—appointed dinner. The commandeur de Souvé Comte d'Olonne, and some others, who were cordons bleus (i.e. knights of St. Esprit), met together as a sort of club, and were noted for their excellent dinners. Hence, when anyone had dined well he said, “Bien, c'est un vrai repas de cordon bleu.”

Une Cordon Bleu.

A facetious compliment to a good female cook. The play is between cordons bleus, and the blue ribbons or strings of some favourite cook.

Cordon Noir

(Un). A knight of the Order of St. Michael, distinguished by a black ribbon.

Cordon Rouge

(Un) (French). A chevalier of the Order of St. Louis, the decoration being suspended on a red ribbon.

Corduoy

A corded fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase. (French, cord du roy.)

Corduoy Road.

A term applied to roads in the backwoods and swampy districts of the United States of America, formed of the halves of trees sawn in two longitudinally, and laid transversely across the track. A road thus made presents a ribbed appearance, like the cloth called corduroy.

“Look well to your seat, 'tis like taking an airing

On a corduroy road, and that out of repairing.”

Lowell: Fable for Critics, stanza 2.

Cordwainer

Not a twister of cord, but a worker in leather. Our word is the French cordouannier (a maker or worker of cordouan); the former a corruption of Cordovanier (a worker in Cordovan leather).

Corea

(The). The dancing mania, which in 1800 appeared in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. The usual manifestations were laughing, shouting, dancing, and convulsions. (Latin chorea, a dance where many dance simultaneously.)

Corflambo

The impersonation of sensual passion in Spenser's Faërie Queene. (Book iv. 8.)

Corineus

(3 syl.). A mythical hero in the suite of Brute, who conquered the giant Goëm'agot, for which achievement the whole western horn of England was allotted him. He called it Corinea, and the people Corineans, from his own name.

“In meed of these great conquests by them got,

Corineus had that province utmost west

To him assynëd for his worthy lot,

Which of his name and memorable gest,

He callëd Cornwall.”

Spenser: Faërie Queene,

ii. 10.

Corinnus

A Greek poet before the time of Homer. He wrote in heroic verse the Siege of Troy, and it is said that Homer is considerably indebted to him. (Suidas.)

Corinth

Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum (It falls not to every man's lot to go to Corinth). Gellius, in his Noctes Atticæ, i. 8, says that Horace refers to Laïs, a courtesan of Corinth, who sold her favours at so high a price that not everyone could afford to purchase them; but this most certainly is not the meaning that Horace intended. He says, “To please princes is no little praise, for it falls not to every man's lot to go to Corinth.” That is, it is as hard to please princes as it is to enter Corinth, situated between two seas, and hence called Bimaris Corinthus. (1 Odes, vii. line 2.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Still, without doubt, the proverb was applied as Aulus Gellius says: “The courtesans of Corinth are not every man's money.” Demosthenes tells us that Laïs sold her favours for 10,000 [Attic] drachmae (about 300), and adds tanti non emo poenitere. (Horace: 1 Epistles, xvii. line 36.)

Corinth

There is but one road that leads to Corinth. There is only one right way of doing anything. The Bible tells us that the way of evil is broad, because of its many tracks; but the way of life is narrow, because it has only one single footpath.

“All other ways are wrong, all other guides are false. Hence my difficulty:— the number and variety of the ways. For you know, ‘There is but one road that leads to Corinth.’” — Pater: Marius the Epicurean, chap. 24.

Corinth's Pedagogue

Dionysios the younger, on being banished a second time from Syracuse, went to Corinth and became schoolmaster. He is called Dionysios the tyrant. Hence Lord Byron says of Napoleon—

“Corinth's pedagogue hath now

Transferred his by—word to thy brow.”

Ode to Napoleon, stanza xiv.

Corinthian

(A). A licentious libertine. The immorality of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and Rome. To Corinthianise is to indulge in licentious conduct. A gentleman sportsman who rides his own horses on the turf, or sails his own yacht.

A Corinthian.

A member of the pugilistic club, Bond Street, London.

Corinthian Brass

A mixed metal made by a variety of metals melted at the conflagration of Corinth in B.C. 146, when the city was burnt to the ground by the consul Mummius. Vases and other ornaments were made by the Romans of this metal, of greater value than if they had been made of silver or gold.

The Hông—hee vases (1426) of China were made of a similar mixed metal when the Imperial palace was burnt to the ground. These vessels are of priceless value.

“I think it may be of Corinthian brass,

Which was a mixture of all metals, but

The brazen uppermost.”

Byron: Don Juan,

vi. 56.

Corinthian Order

The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted, and the capital adorned with acanthus leaves. (See Acanthus .)

Corinthian Tom

The sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London. A "Corinthian" was the "fast man" of Shakespeare's period.

"I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy."— Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Corinthian War (The), B.C. 395—387. A suicidal contention between the Corinthians and the Lacedemonians. The allies of Corinth were Athens, Thebes, and Argos. The only battle of note was that of Coronea won by the Lacedemonians. Both the contending parties, utterly exhausted, agreed to the arbitration of Artaxerxes, and signed what is called The Peace of Antalkidas.

Not long after this destructive contest Epaminondas and Pelopidas (Theban generals) won the battle of Leuctra (B.C. 371), from which defeat the Lacedemonians never recovered.

Corked

This wine is corked— i.e. tastes of the cork.

Corker

or Calker. The nail in a horse's shoe to prevent slipping in frosty weather. (Latin, calx.)

Corking—pins

Pins at one time used by ladies to keep curls on the forehead fixed and in trim.

Cormoran'

The Cornish giant who fell into a pit twenty feet deep, dug by Jack the Giant—killer, and filled over with grass and gravel. The name means cormorant or great eater. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from King Arthur, with this inscription—

"This is the valiant Cornish man

That slew the giant Cormoran."

Jack the Giant—killer.

Corn ... Horn

Up corn, down horn. When corn is high or dear, beef is down or cheap, because persons have less money to spend on meat.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Corn in Egypt

(There's). There is abundance; there is a plentiful supply. Of course, the reference is to the Bible story of Joseph in Egypt.

Corn — Law Rhymer

Ebenezer Elliot, who wrote philippics against the corn laws (1781—1849).

“Is not the corn—law rhymer already a king?”— Carlyle.

Cornstalks

In Australia and the United States, youths of colonial birth are so called from being generally both taller and more slender than their parents.

Corns

To tread on one's corns. To irritate one's prejudices; to annoy another by disregard to his pet opinions or habits.

Cor`nage

(2 syl.), horn—service. A kind of tenure in grand serjeanty. The service required was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived. “Cornagium” was money paid instead of the old service.

Corneille du Boulevard

Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773—1844).

Corneille d'Esopé

(La). Motley work. “C'est la corneille d'Esopé. “

The allusion is to the fable of the Jackdaw which decked itself with the plumage of the peacocks. The jackdaw not only lost its borrowed plumes, but got picked well—nigh to death by the angry peacocks.

Corner

(A). The condition of the market with respect to a commodity which has been largely bought up, in order to create a virtual monopoly and enhance its market price; as a salt—corner, a corner in pork, etc. The idea is that the goods are piled and hidden in a corner out of sight.

“The price of bread rose like a rocket, and speculators wished to corner what little wheat there was.”— New York Weekly Times (June 13, 1894).

Corner

Driven into a corner. Placed where there is no escape; driven from all subterfuges and excuses.

Corner

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). Tattersall's horse—stores and betting—rooms, Knightsbridge Green. They were once at the corner of Hyde Park.

To make a corner.

To combine in order to control the price of a given article, and thus secure enormous profits. (See Corner.)

What have I done to deserve a corner?

To deserve punishment. The allusion is to setting naughty children in a corner by way of punishment.

“There's nothing I have done yet, o' my conscience, Deserves a corner.”

Shakespeare: Henry VIII.,

iii. 1.

Corner—stone

(The). The chief corner—stone. A large stone laid at the base of a building to strengthen the two walls forming a right angle. These stones in some ancient buildings were as much as twenty feet long and eight feet thick. Christ is called (in Eph. ii. 20) the chief corner—stone because He united the Jews and Gentiles into one family. Daughters are called corner—stones (Psalm cliv. 12) because, as wives and mothers, they unite together two families. In argument, the minor premise is the chief corner—stone.

Cornet

The terrible cornet of horse. William Pitt, first Earl of Chatham (1708—1778). His son William was “the pilot that weathered the storm” (meaning the French Revolution and Napoleon).

Cornette

Porter la cornette. To be domineered over by the woman of the house; to be a Jerry Sneak. The cornette is the mob—cap anciently worn by the women of France. Porter les culottes (to wear the breeches) is the same idea; only it shows who has the mastery, and not who is mastered. In the latter case it means the woman wears the dress of the man, and assumes his position in the house. Probably our expression about “wearing the horns” may be referred to the “cornette” rather than to the stag or deer.

Corngrate

(2 syl.). A term given in Wiltshire to the soil in the north—western border, consisting of an irregular mass of loose gravel, sand, and limestone.

Cornish Hug

A hug to overthrow you. The Cornish men were famous wrestlers, and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular grip or embrace called the Cornish hug.

Cornish Language

was virtually extinct 150 years ago. Doll Pentreath, the last person who could speak it, died, at the age of ninety—one, in 1777. (Notes and Queries.)

Cornish Names

“By Tre, Pol, and Pen,

You shall know the Cornishmen.”

Thus, Tre [a town] gives Trefry, Tregengon, Tregony, Tregothnan, Trelawy, Tremayne, Trevannion, Treveddoe, Trewithen, etc.

Pol

[a head] gives Polkerris Point, Polperro, Polwheel, etc. Pen [a top] gives Penkevil, Penrice, Penrose, Pentire, etc.

Cornish Wonder

(The). John Opie, of Cornwall, the painter. (1761—1807.)

Cornubian Shore (The). Cornwall, famous for its tin mines.

“... from the bleak Cornubian shore

Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old

Sidonian pilots sought.”

Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cornu—copia

(See Amaltheas Horn .)

Cornwall

(See Barry, Corineus .)

Coronach

(See Coranach .)

Coronation Chair

consists of a stone so enclosed as to form a chair.

It was probably the stone on which the kings of Ireland were inaugurated on the hill of Tara. It was removed by Fergus, son of Eric, to Argyleshire, and thence by King Kenneth (in the ninth century) to Scone, where it was enclosed in a wooden chair. Edward I. transferred it to Westminster.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The monkish legend says that it was the very stone which formed “Jacob's pillow.” The tradition is, “Wherever this stone is found, there will reign some of the Scotch race of kings.” (See Scone.)

Coroner

means properly the crown—officer. In Saxon times it was his duty to collect the Crown revenues; next, to take charge of Crown pleas; but at present to uphold the paternal solicitude of the Crown by searching into all cases of sudden or suspicious death. (Vulgo, crowner; Latin, corona, the crown.)

“But is this law?

Ay, marry, is't: crowner's quest law.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Coronet

A crown inferior to the royal crown. A duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquis with strawberry leaves alternating with pearls; that of an earl has pearls elevated on stalks, alternating with leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pearls above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only six pearls.

Coronis

Daughter of a King of Phocis, changed by Athena into a crow. There was another Coronis, loved by Apollo, and killed by him for infidelity.

Corporal Violet

(See Violet .)

Corporation

A large paunch.

A municipal corporation is a body of men elected for the local government of a city or town.

Corps de Garde

(French). The company of men appointed to watch in a guard—room; the guard—room.

Corps Diplomatique

(French). A diplomatic body [of men].

Corps Legislatif

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(French). The lower house of the French legislature. The first assembly so called was when Napoleon I. substituted a corps legislatif and a tribunal for the two councils of the Directory, Dec. 24, 1799. The next was the corps legislatif and conseil d'état of 1807. The third was the corps legislatif of 750 deputies of 1849. The legislative power under Napoleon III. was vested in the Emperor, the senate, and the corps legislatif. (1852.)

Corpse Candle

The ignis fatuus is so called by the Welsh because it was supposed to forbode death, and to show the road that the corpse would take. Also a large candle used at lich wakes— i.e. watching a corpse before interment. (German leiche, a corpse.)

Corpus Christi

[body of Christ]. A festival of the Church, kept on the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday, in honour of the eucharist. There are colleges both at Cambridge and Oxford so named.

Corpus Delicti (Latin). The fundamental fact that a crime has really been committed; thus finding a murdered body is “corpus delicti” that a murder has been committed by someone.

Corpuscular Philosophy promulgated by Robert Boyle. It accounts for all natural phenomena by the position and motion of corpuscles. (See Atomic Philosophy .)

Corrector

(See Alexander The Corrector .)

Correggio

The Correggio of sculptors. Jean Goujon, who was slain in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. (1510—1572.)

Corroboree

An Australian wardance.

“He roared, stamped, and danced corroboree, like any black fellow.”— Kingsley: Water—Babies, chap. viii. p. 300.

Corrouge

The sword of Sir Otuel in mediaeval romance. (See Sword .)

Corrugated Iron

Sheet iron coated with zinc. It is called corrugated or wrinkled because the sheet is made wavy by the rollers between which it is made to pass.

Corrupticolae

A sect of heretics of the sixth century, who maintained that Jesus Christ was corruptible.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Corruption of Blood

Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man's blood is attainted and his issue suffers.

Corsair'

means properly “one who gives chase.” Applied to the pirates of the northern coast of Africa. (Italian corso, a chase; French corsaire; Latin cursus.)

Corsned

means the “cursed mouthful.” It was a piece of bread “consecrated for exorcism,” and given to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt. The words of “consecration” were, “May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent.” (Saxon, corse, curse; snaed, mouthful.) (See Choke .)

Cortes

(2 syl.). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means “court officers.”

Cortina

The skin of the serpent Pytho, which covered the tripod of the Pythoness when she delivered her oracles. “Tripodas cortina tegit” (Prudentius: Apophthegmata, 506); also the tripod itself, or the place where the oracle was delivered. (Virgil: Aeneid, vi. 345.) “Neque te Phoebi cortina fefellit.”

Corvinus

[a raven]. Janos Hunyady, Governor of Hungary, is so called from the raven on his shield. There were two Romans so called— viz. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messala, and Valerius Messala Corvinus.

Marcus Valerius was so called because, in a single combat with a gigantic Gaul during the Gallic war, a raven flew into the Gaul's face and so harassed him that he could neither defend himself nor attack his adversary.

Corybantic Religion

An expression applied by Prof. Huxley to the Salvation Army and its methods. The rowdy processions of the Salvation Army (especially at Eastbourne, 1891), resembling the wild ravings of the ancient Corybantes, or devotees of Bacchus, more than sober, religious functions, have given colour to the new word.

Corycian Cave (The), on Mount Parnassus; so called from the nymph Corycia. The Muses are sometimes called Corycides (4 syl.).

“The immortal Muse

To your calm habitations, to the cave

Corycian ... will guide his footsteps.”

Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Corycian Nymphs

(The). The Muses. (See above.)

Corydon

A swain; a brainless, love—sick spooney. It is one of the shepherds in Virgil's eclogues.

Coryphaeus

(The) or “Corypheus.” The leader and speaker of the chorus in Greek dramas. In modern English it is used to designate the chief speaker and most active member of a board, company, or expedition.

Coryphaeus of German Literature

(The). Goethe, “prince of German poets” (1749—1812).

“The Polish poet called upon ... the great Coryphæus of German literature.”— See Notes and Queries, 27th April, 1878.

Coryphaeus of Grammarians

Aristarchos of Samothrace. A coryphaeus was the leader of the Greek chorus; hence the chief of a department in any of the sciences or fine arts. Aristarchos, in the second century B.C., was the chief or prince of grammarians. (Greek, koruphaios, leader.)

Coryphee

A ballet—dancer. (See preceding column.)

Cosa

(plu. Cosas). A theoretic speculation; a literary fancy; a whim of the brain (Indian).

Cosmiel

(3 syl.). The genius of the world. He gave Theodidactus a boat of asbestos, in which he sailed to the sun and planets. (Kircher: Ecstatic Journey to Heaven.)

Cosmopolite

(4 syl.). A citizen of the world. One who has no partiality to any one country as his abiding—place; one who looks on the whole world with “an equal eye.” (Greek, cosmopolites.)

Cosset

A house pet. Applied to a pet lamb brought up in the house; any pet. (Anglo—Saxon, cot—seat, cottage—dweller; German, kossat.)

Costard

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A clown in Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare), who apes the court wit of Queen Elizabeth's time, but misapplies and miscalls like Mrs. Malaprop or Master Dogberry.

Costard

A large apple, and, metaphorically, a man's head. (See Costermonger .)

“Take him over the costard with the hilts of thy sword.”— Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 4.

Costermonger

A seller of eatables about the streets, properly an appleseller (from costard, a sort of apple, and monger, “a trader;” Saxon, mangian, “to trade”), a word still retained in iron—monger, cheese—monger, fish—monger, news—monger, fell—monger, etc.

“Her father was an Irish costarmonger.”

B. Jonson: The Alchemist, iv. 1.

Cote—hardi A tight—fitting tunic buttoned down the front.

“He was clothed in a cote—hardi upon the gyse of Almayne [Germany].”— Geoffroi de la Tour: Landry.

Cotereaux

(French). Cut—throats. The King of England, irritated at the rising in Brittany in the twelfth century, sent the Brabancons (q.v.) to ravage the lands of Raoul de Fourgères. These cut—throats carried knives (couteaux) with them, whence their name.

Coterie'

(3 syl.). A French word, originally tantamount to our “guild,” a society where each paid his quota—

i.e.

his quote—part or gild (share). The French word has departed from its original meaning, and is now applied to an exclusive set, more especially of ladies.

“All coteries ... it seems to me, have a tendency to change truth into affectation.”— E. C. Gaskell; Charlotte Brontë (vol. ii. chap. xi. p 47).

Cotillon

(co—til'—yon) means properly the “under—petticoat.” The word was applied to a brisk dance by eight persons, in which the ladies held up their gowns and showed their under—petticoats. The dance of the present day is an elaborate one, with many added figures.

Cotset

The lowest of bondsmen. So called from cot—seat (a cottage—dweller). These slaves were bound to work for their feudal lord. The word occurs frequently in Domesday Book.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cotswold Barley

You are as long a—coming as Cotswold barley. Cotswold, in Gloucestershire, is a very cold, bleak place on the wolds, exposed to the winds, and very backward in vegetation, but yet it yields a good late supply of barley.

Cotswold Lion

A sheep for which Cotswold hills are famous. Fierce as a Cotswold lion (ironical).

Cotta

in Pope's Moral Essays (Epistle 2). John Holles, fourth Earl of Clare, who married Margaret, daughter of Henry Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and was created Duke of Newcastle in 1694 and died 1711.

Cottage Countess

(The). Sarah Higgins, of Shropshire, daughter of a small farmer, in 1790 married Henry Cecil, Marquis of Exeter and Lord of Burleigh. The bridegroom was at the time living under the name of John Jones, separated from his wife, whose maiden name was Emma Vernon. She eloped with a clergyman, and subsequently to the second marriage "John Jones," the lord of Burleigh, obtained a divorce and an Act of Parliament to legitimatise the children of his second wife. Sarah Higgins was seventeen at the time of her marriage, and "John Jones" was thirty. They were married by licence in the parish church of Bolas. Tennyson has a poem on the subject called The Lord of Burleigh, but historically it is not to be trusted.

Cottage Orne

(A) (French). A cottage residence belonging to persons in good circumstances.

Cottys

One of the three Hundred—handed giants, son of Heaven and Earth. His two brothers were Briareus [Bri—a—ruce] and Gyges or Gyes. (See Hundred—Handed, Giants .)

Cotton

To cotton to a person. To cling to one or take a fancy to a person. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

Cotton Lord

A great cotton lord. A rich Manchester cotton manufacturer, a real lord in wealth, style of living, equipage, and tenantry.

Cottonian Library

In the British Museum. Collected by Sir R. Cotton, and added to by his son and grandson, after which it was invested in trustees for the use of the public.

Cottonopolis

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Manchester, the great centre of cotton manufactures.

“His friends thought he would have preferred the busy life of Cottonopolis to the out—of—way county of Cornwall.”— Newspaper paragraph, January, 1886.

Cotyto

The Thracian goddess of immodesty, worshipped at Athens with nocturnal rites.

“Hail! goddess of nocturnal sport,

Dark—veiled Cotyto.”

Milton: Comus,

129, 130.

Coucy

Enguerrand III., Sire de Coucy, has won fame by his arrogant motto:

“Roi je ne suis,

Ni Prince, ni comte, aussi,

Je suis Le Sire de Coucy.”

Couleur de Rose

(French). Highly coloured; too favourably considered; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through glass tinted with rose pink.

Coulin

A British giant, pursued by Debon (one of the companions of Brute) till he came to a chasm 132 feet across, which he leaped; but slipping on the opposite side, he fell back into the chasm and was killed.

(Spenser: Faërie Queene.) (See Giants .)

Councils

Ecumenical Councils. There are twenty—one recognised, nine Eastern and twelve Western. THE NINE EASTERN: (1) Jerusalem; (2 and 8) Nice, 325, 787; (3, 6, 7, 9) Constantinople, 381, 553, 680, 869; (4) Ephesus, 431; (5) Chalcedon, 451.

THE TWELVE WESTERN: (10, 11, 12, 13, 19) Lateran, 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, 1517; (14, 15) Synod of Lyon, 1245, 1274; (16) Synod of Vienne, in Dauphiné, 1311; (17) Constance, 1414; (18) Basil, 1431—1443;

(20) Trent, 1545—1563; (21) Vatican, 1869.

Of these, the Church of England recognises only the first six, viz.: 325 of Nice, against the Arians.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

381 of Constantinople, against “heretics.”

431 of Ephesus, against the Nestorians and Pelagians.

451 of Chalcedon, when Athanasius was restored.

553 of Constantinople, against Origen.

680 of Constantinople, against the Monothelites (4 syl.).

Counsel

Keep your own counsel. Don't talk about what you intend to do. Keep your plans to yourself.

“Now, mind what I tell you, and keep your own counsel.”— Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. vi.

Count Kin with One

(To), is a Scotch expression meaning to compare one's pedigree with that of another.

Count not your Chickens

... (See Chicken .)

Count out the House

(To). To declare the House of Commons adjourned because there are not forty members present. The Speaker has his attention called to the fact, and must himself count the number present. If he finds there are not forty members present, he declares the sitting over.

Count Upon

(To). To rely with confidence on some one or some thing, to reckon on.

Countenance (To). To sanction, to support. Approval or disapproval is shown by the countenance. The Scripture speaks of “the light of God's countenance,” i.e. the smile of approbation, and to “hide His face” (or countenance) is to manifest displeasure.

“General Grant, neither at this time nor at any other, gave the least countenance to the efforts

...— Nicolay and Hay: Abraham Lincoln (vol. ix chap. ii. p. 51).

To keep in countenance.

To encourage, or prevent one losing his countenance or feeling dismayed. To keep one's countenance. To refrain from smiling or expressing one's thoughts by the face.

Out of countenance.

Ashamed, confounded. With the countenance fallen or cast down. To put one out of countenance is to make one ashamed or disconcerted. To “discountenance” is to set your face against something done or propounded.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Counter—caster

One who keeps accounts, or casts up accounts by counters. Thus, in The Winter's Tale, the Clown says, "Fifteen hundred shorn; what comes the wool to? I cannot do't without counters." (Act iv. s. 3.)

"And what was he?

Forsooth, a great arithmetician,

And I ... must be belee'd and calmed

By debtor and creditor, this counter—caster"

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 1.

Countercheck Quarrelsome

(The). Sir, how dare you utter such a falsehood? Sir, you know that it is not true. This is the third remove from the lie direct; or rather, the lie direct in the third degree.

The Reproof Valiant, the Countercheck Quarrelsome, the Lie Circumstantial, and the Lie Direct, are not clearly defined by Touchstone. That is not true, how dare you utter such a falsehood, if you say so, you are a liar, you lie, or are a liar, seem to fit the four degrees.

Counterforts

in permanent fortification. The sides of ditches strengthened interiorly by buttresses some fifteen or eighteen feet apart. (See Revetments .)

Counter—jumper

A draper's assistant, who jumps over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Counterpane

A corruption of counterpoint, from the Latin culcita (a wadded wrapper, a quilt). When the stitches were arranged in patterns it was called culcita puncta, which in French became courte—pointe, corrupted into contre—pointe, counter—point, where point is pronounced "poyn," corrupted into "pane."

Counterscarp

in fortification, the side of a ditch next to the open country. The side next to the place fortified is the escarp.

Countess di Civillari

(The). A bog, sewer, cesspool, into which falls the filth of a city. Two wags promised Simon da Villa an introduction to the Countess di Civillari, and tossed him, in his scarlet gown, into a ditch where farmers "emptied the Countess of Civillari for manuring their lands." Here the doctor floundered about half the night, and, having spoiled his robes, made the best of his way home, to be rated soundly by his wife.

(Boccaccio: Decameron, Eighth day, ix.)

Country

To appeal to the country. To dissolve Parliament in order to ascertain the wish of the country by a new election of representatives.

Father of his country.

(See Father.)

Country—dance

A corruption of the French contre danse (a dance where the partners face each other).

Coup [coo]. He made a good coup. A good hit or haul. (French.)

Coup d'Etat

(French) means a state stroke, and the term is applied to one of those bold measures taken by Government to prevent a supposed or actual danger, as when a large body of men are arrested suddenly for fear they should overturn the Government.

The famous coup d'état, by which Louis Napoleon became possessed of absolute power, took place on December 2nd, 1851.

Coup de Grace

The finishing stroke. When criminals were tortured by the wheel or otherwise, the executioner gave him a coup de grâce, or blow on the head or breast, to put him out of his misery.

“The Turks dealt the coup de grâce to the Eastern empire.”—Times.

The following is taken from a note (chap. xxx.) of Sir W. Scott's novel The Betrothed.

“This punishment [being broken on the wheel] consists in the executioner, with a bar of iron, breaking the shoulder—bones, arms, thigh—bones, and legs—taking alternate sides. The punishment is concluded by a blow across the breast, called the coup de grâce, or blow of mercy because it removes the sufferer from his agony. Mandrin, the celebrated smuggler, while in the act of being thus tortured, tells us that the sensibility of pain never continues after the nervous system has been shattered by the first blow.”

Coup de Main

(French). A sudden stroke; a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly. Sometimes called a coup only, as “The coup [the scheme] did not answer.”

“London is not to be taken by a coup de main.”—Public Opinion.

Coup d'OEil

(French). A view; glance; prospect; effect of things in the mass. These principles are presented at a single coup d'oeil.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The coup d'oeil was grand in the extreme.

Coup de Pied de l'Ane

(kick from the ass's foot). A blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or avenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass. (French.)

Coup de Soleil

(French). A sun—stroke, any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Coup de Theatre

An unforeseen or unexpected turn in a drama to produce a sensational effect. In ordinary life, something planned for effect. Burke and his dagger was meant for a coup de théâtre, but it was turned into farce by a little ready wit. (See Dagger—Scene .)

Coup Manque

(A). A false stroke.

“Shoot dead, or don't aim at all; but never make a coup manque.”— Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap. xx.

Coupon A certificate of interest which is to be cut off [French, couper] from a bond and presented for payment. It bears on its face the date and amount of interest to be paid. If the coupons are exhausted before the principal is paid off, new ones are gratuitously supplied to the holder of the bond.

Most foreign state—bonds expire in a stated term of years, generally a portion being paid off annually at par. Suppose there are 1,000 bonds, and 10 are paid off annually, then in 100 years all are paid off and the obligation is cancelled.

Courage of One's Opinion

To have the courage of one's opinion means to utter, maintain, and act according to one's opinion, be the consequences what they may. The French use the same locution. Martyrs may be said to have had the courage of their opinions.

Courland Weather

Very boisterous, uncongenial weather, with high winds, driving snow and rain, like the weather of Courland, in Russia.

Course

Another course would have done it. A little more would have effected our purpose. It is said that the peasants of a Yorkshire village tried to wall in a cuckoo in order to enjoy an eternal spring. They built a wall round the bird, and the cuckoo just skimmed over it. “Ah!” said one of the peasants, “another carse would a' done it.”

“There is a school of moralists who, connecting sundry short—comings ... with changes in manners, endeavour to persuade us that only `another carse' is wanted to wall in the cuckoo.”— Nineteenth Century,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

December, 1892, p. 920.

Course

To keep on the course. To go straight; to do one's duty in that course [path] of life in which we are placed. The allusion is to racing horses.

“We are not the only horses that can't be kept on the courses— with a good turn of speed, too.”—
Boldrewood: Robbery under Arms, chap. xv.

Court

originally meant a coop or sheepfold. It was on the Latium hills that the ancient Latins raised their cors or cohors, small enclosures with hurdles for sheep, etc. Subsequently, as many men as could be cooped or folded together were called a corps or cohort. The “cors” or cattle—yard being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a lot of farm cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court.

A short cut, alley, or paved way between two main streets. (French, court, “short,” as prendre un chemin court, “to take a short cut.”)

Out of court.

Not worth consideration; wholly to be discarded, as such and such an hypothesis is wholly out of court, and has been proved to be untenable. “No true bill.”

Court Circular

Brief paragraphs supplied to certain daily papers by an officer (the Court Newsmen) specially appointed for the purpose. He announces the movements of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and the court generally; gives reports of the levees, drawing—rooms, state balls, royal concerts, meetings of the Cabinet ministers, deputation to ministers, and so on. George III., in 1803, introduced the custom to prevent misstatements on these subjects.

Court—cupboard

The buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beakers. There are two in Stationers' Hall.

“Away with the joint—stools, remove the court—cupboard, look to the plate.” — Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i.5.

Court Fools

(See Fools .)

Court Holy Water Fair speeches, which look like promises of favour, but end in nothing.

Court Plaster

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The plaster of which the court ladies made their patches. These patches, worn on the face, were cut into the shape of crescents, stars, circles, diamonds, hearts, crosses; and some even went so far as to patch their face with a coach—and—four, a ship in full sail, a château, etc. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I.; and in the reign of Anne was employed as the badge of political partisanship. (See Patches.)

“Your black patches you wear variously,

Some cut like stars, some in half—moons, some lozenges.” Beaumont and Fletcher: Elder Brother, iii.2.

Court of Love

A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the palmy days of the Troubadours. The following is a case submitted to their judgment: A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the hand of another, and touched with her toe the foot of a third. Query, Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Court of Pie—powder

(See Pie Poudre.)

Court of the Gentiles

(The). They are but in the Court of the Gentiles. They are not wholly God's people; they are not the elect, but have only a smattering of the truth. The “Court of the Israelites” in the Jewish temple was for Jewish men; the “Court of the Women” was for Jewish women; the “Court of the Gentiles” was for those who were not Jews.

“Oh, Cuddie, they are but in the Court of the Gentiles, and will ne'er win farther ben, I doubt,” — Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. viii.

Courtesy

Civility, politeness. It was at the courts of princes and great feudatories that minstrels and pages practised the refinements of the age in which they lived. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Courtesy Titles

Titles assumed or granted by social custom, but not of any legal value. The courtesy title of the eldest son of a duke is marquis; of a marquis is earl; of the eldest son of an earl is viscount. Younger sons of peers are by courtesy called lord or honourable, and the daughters are lady or honourable. These titles do not give the holders official rank to sit in the House of Lords. Even the Marquis of Lorne, the Queen's son—in—law, is only a commoner (1894).

Cousin

Blackstone says that Henry IV., being related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connection in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, though the reason has long ago failed. (Commentaries, i. 398.)

Cousin

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

All peers above the rank of baron are officially addressed by the Crown as cousin. A viscount or earl is “Our right trusty and well—beloved cousin.”

A marquis is “Our right trusty and entirely—beloved cousin.”

A duke is “Our right trusty and right—entirely—beloved cousin.”

Cousin Betsy

A half—witted person, a “Bess of Bedlam” (q.v.).

“[None] can say Foster's wronged him of a penny, or gave short measure to a child or a cousin Betsy.” — Mrs. Gaskell.

Cousin—german The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk. (Latin, germánus, a brother, one of the same stock.)

“There is three cozen—germans that has cozened all the hosts of Reading, of Maidenhead, of Colebrook, of horses and money.” — Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv.5.

Cousin Jack

So Cornishmen are called in the western counties.

Cousin Michael

(or Michel). The Germans are so called. Michel, in Old German, means “gross,” cousin Michel is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, simple, unrefined, coarse—feeding people.

Coute que Coute

(French). Cost what it may, at any price, be the consequences what they may.

“His object is to serve his party coûte que coûte.” — Standard.

Couvade

(2 syl.). A man who takes the place of his wife when she is in child—bed. (See Reader's Handbook,

p. 217, col. 2.)

Cove

(1 syl.). An individual, as a flash cove (a swell), a rum cove (a man whose position and character is not quite palpable), a gentry cove (a gentleman), a downy cove (a very knowing individual), etc. (Gipsy, cova, a thing; cova, that man; covi, that woman.)

Covenanters

A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scotch Presbyterians, who united by “solemn league and covenant” to resist the encroachments of Charles I. on religious liberty.

Covent Garden

A corruption of Convent Garden; the garden and burial ground attached to the convent of Westminster, and turned into a fruit and flower market in the reign of Charles II. It now belongs to the Duke of Bedford.

Coventry

To send one to Coventry. To take no notice of him; to let him live and move and have his being with you, but pay no more heed to him than to the idle winds which you regard not. According to Messrs. Chambers (Cyclopædia), the citizens of Coventry had at one time so great a dislike to soldiers that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed. No intercourse was ever allowed between the garrison and the town; hence, when a soldier was sent to Coventry, he was cut off from all social intercourse.

Hutton, in his History of Birmingham, gives a different version. He says that Coventry was a stronghold of the parliamentary party in the civil wars, and that all troublesome and refractory royalists were sent there for safe custody

The former explanation meets the general scope of the phrase the better. (See Boycott.)

Coventry Mysteries

Miracle plays acted at Coventry till 1591. They were published in 1841 for the Shakespeare Society.

Parliaments held at Coventry.

Two parliaments have been held in this city, one in 1404, styled Parliamentum Indocorum; and the other in 1459, called Parliamentum Diabolicum.

Cover

To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth—holes of a fox being covered up the night before a hunt, the creature makes some gorse—bush or other cover its temporary resting—place, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Covers were laid for ... Dinner was provided for. ... A cover (couvert) in French means knife, fork, spoon, and napkin. Hence, mettre le couvert, to lay the cloth; and lever (or ôter) le couvert, to clear it away.

Covered Way

in fortification. (See Glacis .)

Covering the Face No malefactor was allowed, in ancient Persia, to look upon a king. So, in Esther vii. 5, when Haman fell into disgrace, being seen on the queen's divan, "they instantly cover Haman's face," that he might not look on the face of Ahasuerus.

In India a low caste man covers his mouth when speaking to one of high caste.

Coverley

Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an hypothetical club in the Spectator, “who lived in Soho Square when he was in town.” Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of Queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the Spectator.

“Who can be insensible to his unpretending virtues and amiable weaknesses; his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and eccentric whims; the respect for his neighbours, and the affection of his domestics?” — Hazlitt.

Covetous Man

A Tantalus (q.v.).

“In the full flood stands Tantalus, his skin

Washed o'er in vain, for ever dry within.

He catches at the stream with greedy lips —

From his parched mouth the wanton torrent slips ...

Change but the name, this fable is thy story:

Thou in a flood of useless wealth dost glory,

Which thou canst only touch, but never taste.”

Cowley: Horace, satire i.

Cow

The cow that nourished Ymir with four streams of milk was called Audhumla. (Scandinavian mythology.)
(See Audhumla.)

Curst cows. (See under Curst.) The whiter the cow, the surer is it to go to the altar. The richer the prey, the more likely is it to be seized.

“The system of impropriations grew so rapidly that, in the course of three centuries, more than a third part of all the benefices in England became such, and those the richest, for the whiter the cow, the surer was it to go to the altar.” — Blant: Reformation in England, p. 63.

Cow's Tail

“Always behind, like a cow's tail.” “Tanquam coda vituli.” (Petronius.)

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her tail brushed off.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“What we have we prize not to the worth

Whiles we enjoy it; but being lack'd and lost,

Why, then we rack the value.”

Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, iv.1.

Cow—lick

A tuft of hair on the human forehead, sometimes called a feather; it cannot be made to lie in the same direction as the rest of the hair by brushing, or even by pomatum. When cows lick their hides they make the hair stand on end.

“This term must have been adopted from a comparison with that part of a ... cow's hide where the hairs, having different directions, meet and form a projecting ridge, supposed to be occasioned by the animals licking themselves.” — Brockett: Glossary of North—Country Words.

Coward (anciently written culvard) is either from the French, couard, originally written culvert, from culver (a pigeon), pigeon—livered being still a common expression for a coward; or else from the Latin, culum vertere, to turn tail (Spanish, cobarde; Portuguese, covarde; Italian, codardo, “a coward,” Latin, cauda, “a tail”). A beast cowarded, in heraldry, is one drawn with its coue or tail between its legs. The allusion is to the practice of beasts, who sneak off in this manner when they are cowed.

Cowper

Called “Author of The Task,” from his principal poem. (1731—1800.)

Cowper Law

a corruption of Cupar, etc., is trying a man after execution. Similar expressions are Jedwood, Jeddart, and Jedburgh justice. Cowper justice had its rise from a baron—baile in Coupar—Angus, before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. (See Lydford Law.)

“Cowper Law, as we say in Scotland — hang a man first, and then judge him.” — Lord de Ros: Tower of London.

Coxcomb

An empty—headed, vain person. The ancient licensed jesters were so called because they wore a cock's comb in their caps.

“Coxcombs, an ever empty race,

Are trumpets of their own disgrace.”

Gay: Fables, xix.

“Let me hire him too; here's my coxcomb.”

Shakespeare: King Lear,

i. 4.

The Prince of Coxcombs.

Charles Joseph, Prince de Ligne. (1535—1614.) Richard II. of England is sometimes called the Coxcomb. (1366, 1377—1400.) Henri III. of France was called le Mignon, which means pretty well the same thing. (1551, 1574—1589.)

Coxeyites

(3 syl.). Followers of Mr. ["General"] Coxey, of the United States, who induced 50,000 labourers from sundry states "to march" to Washington to overawe the Government into giving employment to the unemployed. The word is now employed to express labour processions and masses organised to force concessions to workmen.

Coxswain

Kog is Norwegian for a cockboat; Welsh, cwch; Italian, cocca, etc.; and swain, Anglo—Saxon for a servant, superintendent, or bailiff. (See Cockboat.)

Coyne and Livery

Food and entertainment for soldiers, and forage for their horses, exacted by an army from the people whose lands they passed through, or from towns where they rested on their march.

Coystril

Coystrel, or Kestrel. A degenerate hawk; hence, a paltry fellow. Holinshed says, "costerels or bearers of the arms of barons or knights" (vol. i. p. 162); and again, "women, lackeys, and costerels are considered as the unwarlike attendants on an army" (vol. iii. 272). Each of the life—guards of Henry VIII. had an attendant, called a coystrel or coystril. Some think the word is a corruption of costerel, which they derive from the Latin coterellus (a peasant); but if not a corruption of kestrel, I should derive it from costrel (a small wooden bottle used by labourers in harvest time). "Vasa quædam quæ costrelli vocantur." (Matthew Paris.)

"He's a coward and a coystril that will not drink to my niece." — Shakespeare: Twelfth Night,

i.3.

Cozen

To cheat. (Armoric, Couzyein; Russian, kosnodei; Arabic, gausa; Ethiopic, chasawa; our chouse.)

"I think it no sin To cozen him that would unjustly win." Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well, iv.2.

Crab

(A). An ill—tempered fellow; sour as a crab—apple.

To catch a crab,

in rowing. (See Catch A Crab.)

Crab—cart

The carapace of a crab. So called because it is used very commonly by children for a toy—cart.

Crack

as a crack man, a first—rate fellow; a crack hand at cards, a first—rate player; a crack article, an excellent one, i.e. an article cracked up or boasted about. This is the Latin crepo, to crack or boast about. Hence Lucretius ii. 1168, "crepas antiquum genus."

"Indeed, la! `tis a noble child; a crack, madam." Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i.3.

A gude crack.

A good talker.

"To be a gude crack ... was essential to the trade of a `puir body' of the more esteemed class." — Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (Introduction).

In a crack.

Instantly. In a snap of the fingers, crepitu digitorum (in a crack of the fingers). (French, craquer.)

"Une allusion au bruit de l'ongle contre la dent que les Orientaux du moyen âge touchaient du doigt quand ils voulaient affirmer solennellement une chose." Hence —

Sire, bien vous croi seur les Dieux;

Mais asses vous querroie mieux

Se vous l'ongle hurties an dent."

Theatre Francois de Moyen Age, p. 167.

Crack—brained

Eccentric; slightly mad. Another form is "A crack—skull."

Crack a Bottle

— i.e. drink one. The allusion is to the mischievous pranks of the drunken frolics of times gone by, when the bottles and glasses were broken during the bout. Miss Oldbuck says, in reference to the same custom, "We never were glass—breakers in this house, Mr. Lovel" (Antiquary); meaning they were not bottle—crackers, or given to drunken orgies. (See Crush.)

"Dear Tom, this brown jug that now foams with mild ale,

From which I now drink to sweet Nan of the Vale,

Was once Toby Filpot's, a thirsty old soul

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

As e'er cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl."

O'Keefe: Poor Soldier.

Crack a Crib

(To). To break into a house as a thief. (See Crib .)

Crack Up a Person

(To). To praise him highly. (See Crack .)

Cracked

Made a bankrupt. A play on "rupt," which is from the Latin rumpo, to break.

Cracked Pipkins

Cracked pipkins are discovered by their sound. Ignorance is betrayed by speech.

"They bid you talk — my honest song

Bids you for ever hold your tongue;

Silence with some is wisdom most profound —

Cracked pipkins are discovered by the sound."

Peter Pindar: Lord B. and his Motions.

Cracker

So called from the noise it makes when it goes off.

Cracknells

(from the French craquelin). A hard, brittle cake.

Cradle—land

The same as "borough English," under which lands descend to the youngest son. By Gavelkind, land passes to all sons in equal proportions.

If the father has no son, then (in cradle—land tenures) the youngest daughter is sole heiress. If neither wife, son, nor daughter, the youngest brother inherits; if no brother, the youngest sister is heir; if neither brother nor yet sister, then the youngest next of kin.

Craft

(A). A trade (Anglo—Saxon, cræft). A craftsman is a mechanic. A handicraft is manual skill, i.e. mechanical skill. And leechcraft is skill in medicine. (Anglo—Saxon læce—cræft; læce, a doctor.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Craft (A). A general term for a vessel employed in loading and unloading ships.

Small craft.

Such vessels as schooners, sloops, cutters, and so on. A ship—builder was at one time the prince of craftsmen, and his vessels were work of craft emphatically.

Craft

Cunning, or skill in a bad sense. Hence Witchcraft, the art or cunning of a witch.

Craigmillar Castle

So called from Henry de Craigmillar, who built the castle in the twelfth century.

Crakys of War

Cannons were so called in the reign of Edward III.

Cram

To tell what is not true. A crammer, an untruth. The allusion is to stuffing a person with useless rubbish.

Crambe bis Cocta

["cabbage boiled twice"]. A subject hacked out. Juvenal says, "Occidit miseros crambe repetita magistros" (vii. 155), alluding to the Greek proverb "Dis krambe thanatos."

"There was a disadvantage in treading this Border district, for it had been already ransacked by the author himself, as well as by others; and, unless presented under a new light, was likely to afford ground to the objection of Crambe bis cocta." — Sir W. Scott: The Monastery

(Introduction).

Crambo

Repetition. So called from a game which consists in some one setting a line which another is to rhyme to, but no one word of the first line must occur in the second.

Dumb crambo.

Pantomime of a word in rhyme to a given word. Thus if "cat" is the given word, the pantomimists would act Bat, Fat, Hat, Mat, Pat, Rat, Sat, etc., till the word acted is guessed.

Crampart

(King). The king who made a wooden horse which would travel 100 miles an hour. (Alkmaar: Reynard the Fox, 1498.)

Swifter than Crampart's horse.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Quick as lightning; quick as thought. (See above.)

Cramp—ring

To scour the crampring. To be put into fetters; to be imprisoned. The allusion is obvious.

“There's no muckle hazard o' scouring the cramp—ring.” — Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxiii.

Crane

means long—shanks. (Welsh, gar, “the shanks,” whence our gaiter and garter.) Garan is the long—shanked bird, contracted into g'ran, crane; heron is another form of the same word.

Crank

An Abram man (q.v.). So called from the German krank (sickly), whence cranky, “idiotic, foolish, full of whims,” and cranks (simulated sickness). These beggars were called cranks because they pretended madness and sickness to excite compassion.

Crannock

An Irish measure which, in the days of Edward II., contained either eight or sixteen pecks.

“Crannocus continebit xvj pecks. Crannoco continente octo pecks.” — Exchequer of Ireland (Rec.).

Crapaud

or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman; so called from the device of the ancient kings of France, “three toads erect, saltant.” (Guillim's Display of Heraldrie, 1611.) Nostradamus, in the sixteenth century, called the French “crapauds.”

Les anciens crapauds prenderont Sara

(Nostradamus). Sara is the word Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV. took Aras from the Spaniards, this verse was quoted as a prophecy.

Crape ... Lawn

A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn. (Pope: Ep. to Cobham, 136.) Crape (a sort of bombazine, or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns used to be made, and here means one of the lower clergy; “lawn” refers to the lawn sleeves of a bishop, and here means a prelate. A good curate is all very well, but the same goodness in a bishop is exalted as something noteworthy.

Cravat'

A corruption of Crabat or Croät. It was introduced into France by some French officers on their return from Germany in 1636. The Croäts, who guarded the Turkish frontiers of Austria, and acted as scouts on the flanks of the army, wore linen round their necks, tied in front, and the officers wore muslin or silk. When France organised a regiment on the model of the Croäts, these linen neckcloths were imitated, and the regiment was called “The Royal Cravat.”

The Bonny Cravat.

A public—house sign at Woodchurch, Kent; a corruption of La bonne corvette. Woodchurch was noted for its smuggling proclivities, and the “Bonnie Cravat” was a smuggler’s hostelry.

To wear a hempen cravat.

To be hanged.

Craven

means “your mercy is craved.” It was usual in former times to decide controversies by an appeal to battle. The combatants fought with bâtons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown, he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out “Craven!” and was held infamous, while the defendant was advanced to honour. (Blackstone.)

Crawley

Crooked as Crawley (or) Crawley brook, a river in Bedfordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a progress direct of eighteen. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Crayon

(Geoffrey). The nom de plume under which Washington Irving published The Sketch—Book. (1820.)

Creaking Doors hang the Longest

“Un pot fêlé dure plus qu’un neuf.” “Tout se qui branle ne chet pas” (tumbles not). Delicate persons often outlive the more robust. Those who have some personal affliction, like the gout, often live longer than those who have no such vent.

Create. Make

God created the heavens and the earth (Gen. i.1.) (Hebrew, carah: Greek.) God made the firmament ... (Gen. i.7.) (Greek). God made the sun and moon ... (Gen. i.16.) God created the great fishes ... (Gen. i.21.) God made the terrestrial animals ... (Gen. i.25.) God created man and made him “God— like” ... (Gen. i.27.) God said “Let us make man in our own image” (verse 26), and so God created man in His image (verse 27).

Chap. ii. 3. He rested from all the works which He had created and made. Chap. ii. 4. He made the earth and the heavens; He also created them.

Chap. ii. 22. He made woman, but created man.

Most certainly create does not of necessity mean to make out of nothing, as fishes were “created” from water, and man was created from “earth.”

Creature

(The). Whisky or other spirits. A contracted form of “Creature—comfort.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“When he chanced to have taken an overdose of the creature.” — Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xlv.

A drop of the creature.

A little whisky. The Irish call it “a drop of the crater.”

Creature—comforts

Food and other things necessary for the comfort of the body. Man being supposed to consist of body and soul, the body is the creature, but the soul is the “vital spark of heavenly flame.”

“Mr. Squeers had been seeking in creature comforts [brandy and water] temporary forgetfulness of his unpleasant situation.” — Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.

Credat Judæus

or Credat Judæus Apella. Tell that to the Marines. That may do for Apella, but I don't believe a word of it. Who this Apella was, nobody knows. (Horace: 1 Satires, v. line 100.)

Cicero mentions a person of this name in Ad Atticum (12, ep. 19); but see Ducange.

Credence Table

The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are deposited before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence—table to be tasted previously to its being set before the guests. This was done to assure the guests that the meat was not poisoned. The Italian credenzare means to taste meats placed on the credenza. (Italian, la credenza, a shelf or buffet; Greek, kreas, food.)

Credit Foncier

(French). A company licensed to borrow money for city and other improvements connected with estates. A board of guardians may form such a company, and their security would be the parish rates. The money borrowed is repaid by instalments with interest. The word foncier means “landed,” as impôt foncier

(land—tax), bien foncier (landed property), and so on.

Credit Mobilier

(French). A company licensed to take in hand all sorts of trading enterprises, such as railways, and to carry on the business of stock—jobbers. The word mobilier means personal property, general stock, as bien mobilier (personal chattels), mobilier vif et mort (live and dead stock).

Crekenpit

A fictitious river near Husterloe, according to the invention of Master Reynard, who calls on the Hare to attest the fact. (Reynard the Fox.)

Cremona

An organ stop, a corruption of the Italian cormorne, which is the German krumhorn, an organ stop of eight feet pitch; so called from a wind—instrument made of wood, and bent outwards in a circular arc (krumhorn, crooked horn).

Cremonas

Violins of the greatest excellence; so called from Cremona, where for many years lived some makers of them who have gained a world—wide notoriety, such as Andrea Amati and Antonio his son, Antonius Stradivarius his pupil, and Giuseppe Guarnerius the pupil of Stradivarius. Cremona has long since lost its reputation for this manufacture.

“In silvis viva silui; canora jam mortua cano.”

A motto on a Cremona.

Speechless, alive, I heard the feathered throng;

Now, being dead, I emulate their song. E. C. B.

Creole

(2 syl.). A descendant of white people born in Mexico, South America, and the West Indies. (Spanish criado, a servant; diminutive criadillo, contracted into creollo, creole.) (See Mulatto.)

Creole dialects.

The various jargons spoken by the West India slaves.

Crepidam

Supra crepidam. Talking about subjects above one's metier, meddling and muddling matters of which you know little or nothing. (See Cobbler.)

Crescent Tradition says that “Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to undermine the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to Diana, and the crescent became the symbol of the state.”

Another legend is that Othman, the Sultan, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, “Donec repleat orbem.”

Crescent City

(The). New Orleans, in Louisiana, U.S.

Crescit

Crescit sub pondere Virtus (Virtue thrives best in adversity). The allusion is to the palm—tree, which grows better when pressed by an incumbent weight.

Many plants grow the better for being pressed, as grass, which is wonderfully improved by being rolled frequently with a heavy roller, and by being trodden down by sheep.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cressell'e

(2 syl.). A wooden rattle used formerly in the Romish Church during Passion week, instead of bells, to give notice of Divine worship. Supposed to represent the rattling in the throat of Christ while hanging on the cross.

Cresset

A beacon—light; properly “a little cross.” So called because originally it was surmounted by a little cross. (French, croisette.)

Cressida

daughter of Calchas the Grecian priest, was beloved by Troilus, one of the sons of Priam. They vowed eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarce had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent, and soon gave all her affections to Diomed — nay, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of his love.

“As false

As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth,

As fox to lamb, as wolf to heifer's calf,

Pard to the hind, or step—dame to her son; `Yea,' let them say, to stick the heart of false—hood, `As false as Cressid.'”

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida,

iii. 2.

Cresswell

(Madame). A woman of infamous character who bequeathed 10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. The Duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows: “All I shall say of her is this — she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Shad—well, married to Cress—well, lived at Clerken—well, and died in Bride—well.”

Cressy

(Battle of). Won by Edward III. and the Black Prince over Philippe VI. of France, August 26, 1346.

“Cressy was lost by kickshaws and soup meagre.” Fenton: Prol. to Southern's Spartan Dame.

Crestfallen

Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat and rises rigid and of a deep red colour in victory.

“Shall I seem crest—fallen in my father's sight?” Shakespeare: Richard II., i.1.

Crete Hound of Crete. A blood—hound.

“Coupe le gorge, that's the word. I thee defy again, O hound of Crete.”

Shakespeare: Henry V.,

ii. 1.

The Infamy of Crete.

The Minotaur.

“There lay stretched

The infamy of Crete, detested brood

Of the feigned heifer.”

Dante: Hell,

xii. (Cary's translation).

Creticus

Metellus, the Roman general, was so called because he conquered Crete (Candia).

Cretinism

Mental imbecility accompanied by goître. So called from the Crétins of the Alps. The word is a corruption of Christian (Chrétien), because, being baptised, and only idiots, they were “washed from original sin,” and incapable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents. (French crétin, crétinisme.)

Crex

White bullace. (Dutch, kriecke, cherry; Latin, cerasum.)

Crib

(A). Slang for a house or dwelling, as a “Stocking Crib” (i.e. a hosiery), a “Thimble Crib” (i.e. a silversmith's). Crib is an ox — stall. (Anglo—Saxon, crib, a stall, a bed, etc.)

“Where no oxen are, the crib is clean.” — Prov. xiv. 4.

A child's crib

is a child's bed. (See preceding column.)

Crib

(A). A petty theft; a literal translation of some foreign work, stealthily employed to save trouble.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“We are glad to turn from the choruses of Æschylus, or the odes of Horace, confected in English verse by some petty scholar, to the original text, and the homely help of a school boy's crib.” — Balzac's Shorter Stories: Prefatory Notice, p.16.

Crib

To steal small articles. (Saxon, crybb; Irish, grib; our grab, grapple, grip, gripe, etc.)

Cricket

The diminutive of the Anglo—Saxon cric, a staff or crutch. In the Bodleian library is a MS. (1344) picture of a monk bowling a ball to another monk, who is about to strike it with a cric. In the field are other monks. There are no wickets, but the batsman stands before a hole, and the art of the game was either to get the ball into the hole, or to catch it.

Perhaps the earliest mention of the word “crickett” is 1593. John Derrick, gent., tells us when he attended the “free school of Guldeforde, he and his fellows did runne and play there at crickett and other plaies.” It was a Wykehamist game in the days of Elizabeth.

A single stump was placed in the seventeenth century at each hole to point out the place to bowlers and fielders. In 1700 two stumps were used 24 inches apart and 12 inches high, with long bails atop.

A middle stump was added by the Hambledon Club in 1775, and the height of the stumps was raised to 22 inches.

In 1814 they were made 26 inches, and in 1817 they were reduced to 22 inches the present height. The length of run is 22 yards.

The first cricket club was Hambledon, which practically broke up in 1791, but existed in name till 1825.

Crikey A profane oath; a perverted form of the word Christ.

Crillon

Where wert thou, Crillon? Crillon, surnamed the Brace, in his old age went to church, and listened intently to the story of the Crucifixion. In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, “Ou étais — tu, Crillon?” (What were you about, Crillon, to allow of such things as these?).

N.B. Louis de Berton des Balbes de Crillon was one of the greatest captains of the sixteenth century. Born in Provence 1541, died 1615.

Henri IV., after the battle of Argives (1589), wrote to Crillon the following letter: “Prend—toi, brave Crillon, nous avons vaincu á Arques, et tu n'y etais pas.” The first and last part of this letter have become proverbial.

Crimen læsæ Majestatis

(Latin). High treason.

Crimp

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A decoy; a man or woman that is on the look—out to decoy the unwary. It is more properly applied to an agent for supplying ships with sailors, but these agents are generally in league with public—houses and private lodging—houses of low character, into which they decoy the sailors and relieve them of their money under one pretence or another. (Welsh, crimpiaw, to squeeze or pinch; Norwegian, krympe, a sponge.)

Crimp of Death

(A). A thief—catcher. A crimp is a decoy, especially of soldiers and sailors. (See above.)

“Here lie three crimps of death, knocked down by Fate,

Of justice the staunch blood—hounds, too, so keen.” Peter Pindar: Epitaph on Townsend, Macmanus, and Jealous.

Cringle

(Tom). An excellent sailor character in the naval story by Michael Scott, called Tom Cringle's Log, first published in Blackwood's Magazine.

Cripple

A battered or bent sixpence; so called because it is hard to make it go.

Cripplegate

St. Giles is the patron saint of cripples and beggars, and was himself a cripple. Churches dedicated to this saint are, therefore, in the suburbs of large towns, as St. Giles of London, Norwich, Cambridge, Salisbury, etc. Cripplegate, London, was so called before the Conquest from the number of cripples who resorted thither to beg. (Stowe.)

Criss—cross Row

(Christ—cross row). The A B C horn—book, containing the alphabet and nine digits. The most ancient of these infant—school books had the letters arranged in the form of a Latin cross, with A at the top and Z at the bottom; but afterwards the letters were arranged in lines, and a + was placed at the beginning to remind the learner that “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.”

“Mortals ne'er shall know

Crishna

An incarnate deity of perfect beauty. King Canza, being informed that a child of the family of Devaci would overturn his throne, gave orders to destroy all the male infants that were born. When Crishna was born, his brother conveyed him secretly to the house of a shepherd king; but Canza discovered his retreat, and sent the monster Kâkshas to poison him. The tale says the infant child sucked the monster to death, and so escaped. As he grew up, his beauty was so divine that all the princesses of Hindustan fell in love with him, and even to the present hour he is the Apollo of India and the “idol of women.” His images are always painted a deep azure colour. (Sir W. Jones.) (See Rama.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Crisis properly means the “ability to judge.” Hippocrates said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tidal days he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or a bad turn. The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character. (Greek, krino, to judge or determine.)

Crispin

A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soissons, in France (A.D. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepis is Greek for a shoe, Latin crepid—a, and St. Crepis or Crepid became Crepin and Crespin.

St. Crispin's Day.

October 25th, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V. says to his soldiers —

“And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by ...

But we in it shall be remembered.”

Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 3.

St. Crispin's holiday.

Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday; a no—work day with shoemakers. (See Crispin.)

St. Crispin's lance.

A shoemaker's awl. In French, “Lance de St. Crépin.” Crispin is the patron saint of shoemakers.

The French argot for a leather purse is une crépine.

Criterion

A standard to judge by. (Greek, krino, to judge.)

Critic

A judge; an arbiter. (Greek, krino, to judge.)

Critic.

A captious, malignant critic is called a Zoilus (q. v.)

“`And what of this new book the whole world makes such a rout about?' `Oh, it is out of all plumb, my lord; quite an irregular thing! not one of the angles at the four corners is a right angle. I had my rule and compasses in my pocket.' `Excellent critic!'

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“`And for the epic poem your lordship bade me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's [Bossut's], 'tis out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions.' `Admirable connoisseur!' ” — Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii. chap. xii.

The abbé Charles Bossut (1730—1814) was a noted mathematician and geometer.

Prince of critics.

Aristarchos, of Byzantium, who compiled the rhapsodies of Homer. (Second century B.C.) Stop—watch critics.

“`And how did Garrick speak the soliloquy last night?' `Oh, against all rule, my lord, most ungrammatically. Betwixt the substantive and the adjective, which should agree together in number, case, and gender, he made a breach, thus — stopping as if the point wanted settling; and betwixt the nominative case, which, your lordship knows, should govern the verb, he suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three—fifths by a stop—watch, my lord, each time.' `Admirable grammarian!' `But in suspending his voice was the sense suspended likewise? Did no expression of attitude or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look?' `I looked only at the stop—watch, my lord.'

“`Excellent observer!’” — Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii. chap. xii.

Croaker (2 syl.). A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a desponding view of things. Goldsmith, in his Good—natured Man, has a character so named.

Croakumshire

Northumberland is so called from the peculiar croaking of the natives in speaking. This is especially observable in Newcastle and Morpeth, where the people are said to be born with a burr in their throats, which prevents their giving effect to the letter r.

Croc mitaine

(A). A fire—eater; one always ready to quarrel and fight. (See Croquemitaine.)

Crocodile

(3 syl.). A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because it is the only aquatic animal, says Plutarch, which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen; so God sees all, Himself not being seen. To this he subsequently adds another reason, saying, “The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech.” (De Iside et Osiride, vol. ii. p. 381.)

Achilles Tattius says, “The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year.” Another tradition is, that during the seven days held sacred to Apis, the crocodile will harm no one.

Crocodile

(King). A king who devours his people, or at least their substance. Browne, in his Travels, tells us that there is a king crocodile, as there is a queen bee. The king crocodile has no tail.

Crocodile's Eye

Hieroglyphic for the morning.

Crocodile's Tears

Hypocritical tears. The tale is, that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it.

“As the mournful crocodile

With sorrow snares relenting passengers.”

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iii. 1.

Crocum in Ciliciam ferre

To carry coals to Newcastle. As Cilicia abounds with saffron, to send it there would be needless and extravagant excess. For similar phrases, see Alcinoos Poma Dare, Noctuas Athenas, Coals.

Croesus

Rich as Croesus. Croesus, King of Lydia, was so rich and powerful that all the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, and his name became proverbial for wealth. (B.C. 560—546.) (See Gyges.)

Cromeruach'

Chief idol of the Irish before the preaching of St. Patrick. It was a gold or silver image surrounded by twelve little brazen ones.

Cromlech

A large stone resting on two or more others, like a table. (Welsh, crom, bent; llech, a flat stone.) Weyland Smith's cave (Berkshire), Trevethy stone (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent). Irby and Mangles saw twenty—seven structures just like these on the banks of the Jordan; at Plas Newydd (Anglesey) are two cromlechs: in Cornwall they are numerous; so are they in Wales; some few are found in Ireland, as the “killing—stone” in Louth. In Brittany, Denmark, Germany, and some other parts of Europe, cromlechs are to be found.

Cromwell

in the part of “Tactus.” (See Tactus .)

Crone

properly speaking, means a ewe whose teeth are worn out; but metaphorically it means any toothless old beldam. (Irish, criona, old; allied to the Greek geron, an old man.)

“Take up the bastard; take `t up, I say; give `t to thy crone.” — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii.

3.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cronian Sea

The north polar sea. Pliny says, “A Thule unius diei navigatione mare concretum, a nonnullis cronium appellatur.” (Natural History, iv. 16.)

“As when two polar winds blowing adverse

Upon the Cronian sea.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

x. 290.

Crony

A familiar friend. An old crony is an intimate of times gone by. Probably crone with the diminutive ie for endearment, and equivalent to “dear old fellow,” “dear old boy.” (See Crone.)

Crook in the Lot

There is a crook in the lot of everyone. There is vexation bound up in every person's lot of life, a skeleton in the cupboard of every house. A crook in a stick is a bend, a part where the stick does not run straight, hence a “shepherd's crook.” When lots were drawn by bits of stick, it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but it is very hard to find one without a crook, knot, or some other defect. Boston has a book entitled The Crook in the Lot.

Crooked as Crawley

(See Crawley .)

Crooked Sixpence

(A). Said to bring luck. (See Money .)

Crooked Stick

(A). A self-willed fellow who will neither lead nor drive, neither be led nor driven. (See Crook.)

Crop Up

(or) Out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface. A mining term. Strata which rise to the surface are said to crop out. We also say, such and such a subject croops up from time to time — i.e. rises to the surface; such and such a thing croops out of what you were saying — i.e. is apropos thereof.

Cropper

He came a cropper. He fell head over heels. To get a cropper. To get a bad fall. “Neck and crop” means altogether, and to “come a cropper” is to come to the ground neck and crop.

Croquemitaine

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[croak—mit—tain], the bogie raised by fear. The romance so called, in three parts. The first relates the bloody tournament at Fransac, between the champions of the Moorish King Marsillus and the paladins of Charlemagne. The second is the Siege of Saragossa by Charlemagne. The third is the allegory of Fear—Fortress. The epilogue is the disaster at Roncesvallès. The author is M. l'Epine. There is an English version by Tom Hood, illustrated by Gustave Doré (1867). (See Fear—Fortress, Mitaine, etc.)

Croquet

A game played with a sort of bandy stick. The crook was superseded by a kind of mallet. Du Cange gives "Croque, croquebois, croquet, bâton armé d'un croc, ou qui est recourbé" (vol. vii. p. 115). The art of the game is to strike your balls through very small hoops arranged in a given order.

Cröre (A), in the East Indies, means a hundred lacs of rupees, equal nominally, in round numbers, to a million sterling. (Pronounce cror, Hindustanee karor.)

Cross

The cross is said to have been made of four sorts of wood (palm, cedar, olive, and cypress), to signify the four quarters of the globe.

"Ligna crucis palma, cedrus, cupressus,oliva."

We are accustomed to consider the sign of the cross as wholly a Christian symbol, originating with the crucifixion of our Redeemer. This is quite erroneous. In ancient Carthage it was used for ornamental purposes. Runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes. Cicero tells us (De Divinatione, ii. 27, and 80, 81) that the augur's staff with which they marked out the heaven was a cross. The ancient Egyptians employed the same as a sacred symbol, and we see on Greek sculptures, etc., a cake with a cross; two such buns were discovered at Herculaneum.

It was a sacred symbol among the Aztecs long before the landing of Cortes. (Malinche. In Cozumel it was an object of worship; in Tabasco it symbolised the god of rain; in Palinque (the Palmyra of America) it is sculptured on the walls with a child held up adoring it.

"The cross is not only a Christian symbol, it was also a Mexican symbol. It was one of the emblems of Quetzalcoatl, as lord of the four cardinal points, and the four winds that blow therefrom." — Fiske: Discovery of America, vol. ii. chap. viii. p. 250.)

Cross

(in heraldry). There are twelve crosses in heraldry, called (1) the ordinary cross; (2) the cross humetté, or coupé; (3) the cross urdé, or pointed; (4) the cross potent; (5) the cross crosslet; (6) the cross botonné, or treflé; (7) the cross moline; (8) the cross potence; (9) the cross fleury; (10) the cross patê; (11) the Maltese cross (or eight—pointed cross); (12) the cross cleché and fitché. Some heraldic writers enumerate 285 different kinds of crosses.

Cross

(a mystic emblem) may be reduced to these four:

The Greek cross

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

, found on Assyrian tablets, Egyptian and Persian monuments, and on Etruscan pottery. The crux decussata, generally called St. Andrew's cross. Quite common in ancient sculpture.

The Latin cross

, or “crux immissa.” This symbol is also found on coins, monuments, and medals, long before the Christian era.

The tau cross

, or “crux commissa.” Very ancient indeed, and supposed to be a phallic emblem. The tau cross with a handle is common to several Egyptian deities, as Isis, Osiris, etc.; and is the emblem of immortality and life generally.

Everyone must bear his own cross.

His own burden or troubles. The allusion is to the law that the person condemned to be crucified was to carry his cross to the place of execution.

Get on the cross.

Get into bad ways; not go straight.

“It's hard lines to think a fellow must grow up and get on the cross in spite of himself, and come to the gallow's foot at last, whether he likes it or not.” — Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. viii.

The judgment of the cross.

An ordeal instituted in the reign of Charlemagne. The plaintiff and defendant were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

On the cross.

Not “on the square,” not straightforward. To get anything “on the cross” is to get it unfairly or surreptitiously.

See

Rosicrucians.

Cross (To).

Cross it off or out.

Cancel it by running your pen across it. To cancel (q.v.) means to mark it with lattice lines.

Cross

ill—tempered, is the Anglo—Saxon crous.

“Azeyn [against] hem was he kene and crous.”

Cursor Mundi.

Cross Buns

(See Buns .)

Cross—grained

Patchy, ill—tempered, self—willed. Wood must be worked with the grain; when the grain crosses we get a knot or curling, which is hard to work uniform.

Cross—legged Knights indicate that the person so represented died in the Christian faith. As crusaders were supposed so to do, they were generally represented on their tombs with crossed legs.

“Sometimes the figure on the tomb of a knight has his legs crossed at the ankles, this meant that the knight went one crusade. If the legs are crossed at the knees, he went twice; if at the thighs he went three times.” — Ditchfield: Our Villages, 1889.

Cross Man

(A). Not straightforward; ungain; not honest.

“The storekeepers know who are their best customers, the square people or the cross ones.” — Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xvii.

Cross—patch

A disagreeable, ill—tempered person, male or female. Patch means a fool or gossip; so called from his parti—coloured or patched dress. A cross—patch is an ill—tempered fool or gossip. Patch, meaning “fellow,” is common enough; half a dozen examples occur in Shakespeare, as a “scurvy patch,” a “soldier's patch,” “What patch is made our porter?” “a crew of patches,” etc.

“Cross—patch, draw the latch,

Sit by the fire and spin;

Take a cup, and drink it up,

Then call your neighbours in.

Old Nursery Rhyme.

Cross—roads

All (except suicides) who were excluded from holy rites were piously buried at the foot of the cross erected on the public road, as the place next in sanctity to consecrated ground. Suicides were ignominiously buried on the highway, with a stake driven through their body.

Cross and Ball

so universally marked on Egyptian figures, is a circle and the letter T. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the T is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Mercury, meaning wisdom. The coronation orb is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. In this case the cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile

Money; pitch and toss. Hilaire le Gai tells us that some of the ancient French coins had a cross, and others a column, on the reverse; the column was called a pile, from which comes our word “pillar,” and the phrase “pile—driving.” Scaliger says that some of the old French coins had a ship on the reverse, the arms of Paris, and that pile means “a ship,” whence our word “pilot.”

“A man may now justifiably throw up cross and pile for his opinions.” — Locke: Human Understanding.

Cross or pile. Heads or tails. The French say pile ou face. The “face” or cross was the obverse of the coin, the “pile” was the reverse; but at a later period the cross was transferred to the reverse, as in our florins, and the obverse bore a “head” or “poll.”

“Marriage is worse than cross I win, pile you lose.” Shadwell: Epsom Wells.

Cross nor pile. I have neither cross nor pile. Not a penny in the world. The French phrase is, “N'avoir ni croix ni pile” (to have neither one sort of coin nor another).

“Whacum had neither cross nor pile.” Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Cross as a Bear

or Cross as a bear with a sore head.

Cross as the Tongs

The reference is to tongs which open like a pair of scissors.

Cross as Two Sticks

The reference is to the cross .

Crossing the Hand

Fortune—tellers of the gipsy race always bid their dupe to “cross their hand with a bit of silver.” This, they say, is for luck. Of course, the sign of the cross warded off witches and all other evil spirits, and, as fortune—telling belongs to the black arts, the palm is signed with a cross to keep off the wiles of the devil. “You need fear no evil, though I am a fortune—teller, if by the sign of the cross you exorcise the evil spirit.”

Crossing the Line

— i.e. the equator.

Crotalum

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A sort of castanet, rattled in dancing. Aristophanes calls a great talker krotalon (a clack).

Crotchet

A whim; a fancy; a twist of the mind, like the crotch or crome of a stick. (See Crook.)

“The duke hath crotchets in him.”

Shakespeare: Measure for Measure,

iii. 2.

Crotona's Sage

Pythagoras. So called because at Crotona he established his first and chief school of philosophy. Such success followed his teaching that the whole aspect of the town became more moral and decorous in a marvellously short time. About B. C. 540.

Crouchback

(See Red Rose .)

Crouchmas

from the Invention of the Cross to St. Helen's Day (May 3rd to August 18th). Not Christ—mas, but Cross—mas. Rogation Sunday is called Crouchmas Sunday, and Rogation week is called Crouchmas.

“From bull—cow fast,

Till Crouchmas be past” [i.e. August 18th].

Tusser: May Remembrances.

Crow

As the crow flies. The shortest route between two given places. The crow flies straight to its point of destination. Called the bee—line in America.

Crow.

(See Raven.)

I must pluck a crow with you; I have a crow to pick with you.

I am displeas'd with you, and must call you to account. I have a small complaint to make against you. In Howell's proverbs (1659) we find the following, “I have a goose to pluck with you,” used in the same sense; and Chaucer has the phrase “Pull a finch,” but means thereby to cheat or filch. Children of distinction among the Greeks and Romans had birds for their amusement, and in their boyish quarrels used to pluck or pull the feathers out of each other's pets. Tyndarus, in his Captives, alludes to this, but instances it with a lapwing. In hieroglyphics a crow symbolises contention, discord, strife.

“If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow together.” — Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iii. 1.

“If not, resolve before we go,

That you and I must pull a crow.”

Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 2.

Crow over One

(To), is to exult over a vanquished or abased person. The allusion is to cocks, who always crow when they have vanquished an adversary.

Crowbar

An iron with a crook, used for leverage. (Anglo—Saxon, cruc.)

“Science is as far removed from brute force as this sword from a crowbar.” — Bulwer—Lytton: Leila, book ii. chap. i. p.33.

Crowd

or Crowth. A species of fiddle with six or more strings. The last noted player on this instrument was John Morgan, who died 1720. (Welsh, crwth.)

“O sweet consent, between a crowd and a Jew's harp!” Lyly.

Crowdero

One of the rabble leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear—baiting. The original of this character was one Jackson or Jephson, a milliner, who lived in the New Exchange, Strand. He lost a leg in the service of the Roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of fiddling from alehouse to alehouse for his daily bread. The word means fiddler. (See above, Crowd.)

Crown

In heraldry nine crowns are recognised: The oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the diadem, the obsidional crown, the civic, the crown vallery, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

The blockade crown

(corona obsidionalis), presented by the Romans to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

A camp crown was given by the Romans to him who first forced his way into the enemy's camp. It was made of gold, and decorated with palisades.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A civic crown was presented to him who preserved the life of a civis or Roman citizen in battle. This crown was made of oak leaves, and bore the inscription, H.O.C.S. — i.e. hostem occidit, civem servavit (a foe he slew, a citizen saved).

A mural crown was given by the Romans to that man who first scaled the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold and decorated with battlements.

A naval crown was by the Romans given to him who won a naval victory. It was made of gold, and decorated with the beaks of ships.

An olive crown was by the Romans given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially mentioned in other clauses.

An ovation crown (corona ovalis) was by the Romans given to the general who vanquished pirates or any despised enemy. It was made of myrtle.

A triumphal crown was by the Romans given to the general who obtained a triumph. It was made of laurel or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown was given to a victorious general. (See Laurel.)

The iron crown of Lombardy is the crown of the ancient Longobardic kings. It is now at Monza, in Italy.

Henry of Luxembourg and succeeding kings were crowned with it. Napoleon I. put it on his head with his own hands. It is a thin fillet of iron, said to be hammered from a nail of the true cross, covered with a gold circle, enamelled with jewels, etc.

Crown Glass

is window glass blown into a crown or hollow globe. It is flattened before it is fit for use.

Crown Office

(The). A department belonging to the Court of Queen's Bench. There are three Crown officers appointed by the Lord Chief Justice — viz. (1) Queen's Coroner and Attorney; (2) the Master; and (3) the Assistant Master. The offices are held during good behaviour.

Crown of the East

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

— i.e. Antioch, capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart, that “enrouned them like a coronet.” It was also surnamed “the beautiful.”

Crowns

(worn by heathen deities):

APOLLO wore a crown of laurels. BACCHUS, of grapes or ivy. CERES, of blades of wheat. COMUS, of roses. CYBELÊ, of pine leaves. FLORA, of flowers. FORTUNE, of fir—slips. THE GRACES, of olive—leaves.

HERCULES, of poplar—leaves. HYMEN, of roses. JUNO, of quince—leaves. JUPITER, of oak—leaves. THE LARÊS, of rosemary. MERCURY, of ivy, olive—leaves, or mulberries. MINERVA, of olive—leaves. THE MUSES, of flowers. PAN, of pine—leaves. PLUTO, of cypress. POMONA, of fruits. SATURN, of vine—leaves. VENUS, of myrtle or roses.

Crowner

Coroner — i.e. an officer of the Crown.

“The crowner hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial.” — Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Crow's—Nest

(The), in a Greenlander's galley, is a small room constructed of staves, something like an empty cask. It is fitted up with seats and other conveniences, and here the person on watch continues for two hours looking out for whales. The whale generally announces his approach by a “blowing,” which may in favourable circumstances be heard several miles off.

Crowquill

(Alfred). Alfred Henry Forrester (1805—1872).

Croysado

The Great Croysado. General Lord Fairfax. (Hudibras.)

Crozier

or Crosier. An archbishop's staff terminates in a floriated cross, while a bishop's crook has a curved, brackenlike head. A bishop turns his crook outwards, to denote his wider authority; an abbot (whose crook is the same as a bishop's) carries it turned inwards, to show that his jurisdiction is limited to his own inmates. When walking with a bishop an abbot covers his crook with a veil hanging from the knob, to show that his authority is veiled in the presence of his superior.

Crucial

A crucial test. A very severe and undeniable one. The allusion is to a fancy of Lord Bacon's, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel for a time, but would ultimately cross each other: thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, the plague would assume its specific character. Hence the phrase instantia crucis (a crucial or unmistakable symptom), a crucial experiment, a crucial example, a crucial question, etc.

Crude Forms

in grammar. The roots or essential letters of words. The words are crude or unfinished. Thus am — is the crude form of the verb amo; bon — of the adjective bonus; and domin — of the noun dominus.

Cruel

(The). Pedro, King of Castile (1334, 1350—1369).

Pedro I. of Portugal; also called le Justicier (1320, 1357—1367).

Cruel

(now Crewel) Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn.

“Ha ! ha ! look, he wears cruel garters.”

Shakespeare: King Lear,

ii. 4.

“Wearing of silk, why art thou so cruel?”

Woman's a Weathercock

(1612).

Crummy

That's crummy, that's jolly good. She's a crummy woman, a fine handsome woman. Crummy means fat or fleshy. The crummy part of bread is the fleshy or main part. The opposite of “crusty” = ill—tempered.

Crump

“Don't you wish you may get it, Mrs. Crump?” Grose says Mrs. Crump, a farmer's wife, was invited to dine with Lady Coventry, who was very deaf. Mrs. Crump wanted some beer, but, awed by the purple and plush, said, in a half—whisper, “I wish I had some beer, now.” Mr. Flunkey, conscious that his mistress could not hear, replied in the same aside, “Don't you wish you may get it?” At this the farmer's wife rose from table and helped herself. Lady Coventry, of course, demanded the reason, and the anecdote soon became a standing joke.

Crusades

(2 syl.). Holy wars in which the warriors wore a cross, and fought, nominally at least, for the honour of the cross. Each nation had its special colour, which, says Matthew Paris (i. 446), was red for France; white for England; green for Flanders; for Italy it was blue or azure; for Spain, gules; for Scotland, a St. Andrew's cross; for the Knights Templars, red on white.

The seven Crusades.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

- (1) 1096—1100. Preached up by Peter the Hermit. Led by Godfrey of Bouillon, who took Jerusalem. As a result of this crusade, Geoffrey of Bouillon became the virtual king of Jerusalem.
- (2) 1147—1149. At the instigation of St. Bernard. Led by Louis VII. and the Emperor Conrad. To secure the union of Europe.
- (3) 1189—1193. Led by Richard Lionheart. For knightly distinction. This was against Saladin or Salah—Eddin.
- (4) 1202—1204. Led by Baldwin of Flanders and the doge. To glorify the Venetians.
- (5) 1217. Led by John of Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem. To suit his own purpose.
- (6) 1228—1229. Led by Frederick II. As a result, Palestine was ceded to Frederick (Kaiser of Germany), who was crowned king of Jerusalem.
- (7) 1248—1254 and (8) 1268—1270. To satisfy the religious scruples of Louis IX.

Crush

To crush a bottle — i.e. drink one. Cf. Milton's crush the sweet poison. The idea is that of crushing the grapes. Shakespeare has also burst a bottle in the same sense (Induction of Taming the Shrew). (See Crack.)

“Come and crush a cup of wine.”

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet,

i. 2.

To crush a fly on a wheel.

To crack a nut with a steam—hammer; to employ power far too valuable for the purpose to be accomplished. The wheel referred to is the rack. (See Break A Butterfly.)

Crush—room

(The) of an opera or theatre. A room provided for ladies where they can wait till their carriages are called. Called crush because the room is not only crowded, but all crush towards the door, hoping each call will be that of their own carriage. “Mrs. X.'s carriage stops the way,” “Lord X.'s carriage,” etc.

Crusoe

(A). A solitary man; the only inhabitant of a place. The tale of Defoe is well known, which describes Robinson Crusoe as cast on a desert island, where he employs the most admirable ingenuity in providing for his daily wants.

“Whence creeping forth, to Duty's call he yields,

And strolls the Crusoe of the lonely fields.”

Bloomfield: Farmer's Boy.

Crust

The upper crust (of society). The aristocracy; the upper ten—thousand.

Crusted Port

When port is first bottled its fermentation is not complete; in time it precipitates argol on the sides of the bottle, where it forms a crust. Crusted port, therefore, is port which has completed its fermentation.

The “crust” is composed of argol, tartrate of lime, and colouring matter, thus making the wine more ethereal in quality and lighter in colour.

Crusty

Ill—tempered, apt to take offence. This is formed from the old word crous, cross, peevish.

“Azeyn [against] hem was he kene ane crous,

And said, `Goth out my Fader hous.' “

Cursor Mundi.

Crutched Friars

is the Latin cruciati (crossed) — i.e. having a cross embroidered on their dress. They were of the Trinitarian order.

Crux

(A). A knotty point, a difficulty. Instantia crucis means a crucial test, or the point where two similar diseases crossed and showed a special feature. It does not refer to the cross, an instrument of punishment; but to the crossing of two lines, called also a node or knot; hence a trouble or difficulty. Qua te mala crux agitat? (Plautus); What evil cross distresses you? — i.e. what difficulty, what trouble are you under?

Crux Ansata

The tau cross with a loop or handle at the top. (See Cross.)

Crux Decussata

A St. Andrew's cross

“Crux decussata est in qua duo ligna directa et æquabilia inter se obliquantur, cujus formam refert litera X quæ, ut ait Isidorus (Orig, 1, iii.) `in figura crucem et in numero decem demonstrat.' Hæc vulgo Andreana vocatur, quod vetus traditio sit in hac S. Antream fuisse necatum.” — Gretser: De Cruce, book i. p. 2.

Crux Pectoralis

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The cross which bishops of the Church of Rome suspend over their breast.

“Crucem cum pretioso ligno vel cum reliquis Sanctorum ante pectus portare suspensum ad collum, hoc est quod vocant encolpium [or crux Pectoralis].” — See Ducange, vol.iii. p. 302, col. 2, article ENCOLPIUM.

Cry

Great cry and little wool. This is derived from the ancient mystery of David and Abigail, in which Nabal is represented as shearing his sheep, and the Devil, who is made to attend the churl, imitates the act by “shearing a hog.” Originally, the proverb ran thus, “Great cry and little wool, as the Devil said when he sheared the hogs.” N.B. — Butler alters the proverb into “All cry and no wool.”

Cry of Animals

(The). (See Animals .)

Cry

(To).

To cry over spilt milk.

To fret about some loss which can never be repaired.

Cry Cave

(To). To ask mercy; to throw up the sponge; to confess oneself beaten. (Latin, caveo.) (See Cave In)

Cry Havock!

No quarter. In a tract entitled The Office of the Constable and Mareschall in the Tyme of Werre (contained in the Black Book of the Admiralty), one of the chapters is, “The peyne of hym that crieth havock, and of them that followeth him” — “Item si quis inventus fuerit qui clamorem inceperit qui vocatur havok. “

“Cry Havock, and let slip the dogs of war.”

Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar,

iii. 1

Cry Quits

(See Quit .)

Cry Vinegar

(To). In French, Crier Vinaigre. The shout of sportsmen when a hare is caught. He cries “Vinegar !” he has caught the hare; metaphorically it means, he has won success. “C'étoit, dit le Duchat, la coutume en Languedoc, entre les chasseurs, de s'écrier l'un à l'autre 'Vinaigre,' dès qu'ils avaient tiré un lièvre, parceque la vraie sauce de cet animal est le vinaigre. “ has quite another meaning. It is the reproof to a landlord who serves his customers with bad wine. In a figurative sense it means Crier au Voleur.

Crier au Vinaigre

Cry Wolf

(See Wolf .)

Crystal Hills

On the coast of the Caspian, near Badku, is a mountain which sparkles like diamonds, from the sea—glass and crystals with which it abounds.

Crystalline

(3 syl.). The Crystalline sphere. According to Ptolemy, between the “primum mobile” and the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars comes the crystalline sphere, which oscillates or has a shimmering motion that interferes with the regular motion of the stars.

“They pass the planets seven, and pass the `fixed’

And that crystalline sphere, whose balance weighs The trepidation talked (of).”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

iii.

Cub An ill—mannered lout. The cub of a bear is said to have no shape until its dam has licked it into form.

“A bear's a savage beast, of all

Most ugly and unnatural;

Whelped without form until the dam

Has licked it into shape and frame.”

Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Cuba

The Roman deity who kept guard over infants in their cribs and sent them to sleep. Verb cubo, to lie down in bed.

Cube

A faultless cube. A truly good man; a regular brick. (See Brick.)

O g wz alhqwz agaqoz kai teragwuoaz aueu yogou — Aristotle: Nicomachean Ethics, i. 11, sec. 11.

Cucking—stool

(The) or Choking—stool, for ducking scolds, is not connected with choke (to stifle), but the French choquer; hence the archaic verb cuck (to throw), and one still in use, chuck (chuck—farthing). The cucking—stool is the stool which is chucked or thrown into the water.

“Now, if one cucking—stool was for each scold,

Some towns, I fear, would not their numbers hold.” Poor Robin (1746).

Cuckold

(See Actæon .)

Cuckold King

(The). Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Yseult intrigued with Sir Tristram, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Cuckold's Point

A spot on the riverside near Deptford. So called from a tradition that King John made there successful love to a labourer's wife.

Cuckoo

A cuckold. The cuckoo occupies the nest and eats the eggs of other birds; and Dr. Johnson says “it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out ‘Cuckoo,’ which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned.” Green calls the cuckoo “the cuckold's quirister” (Quip for an Upstart Courtier, 1620). This is an instance of how words get in time perverted from their original meaning. The Romans used to call an adulterer a “cuckoo,” as “Te cuculum uxor ex lustris rapit” (Plautus: Asinaria, v. 3), and the allusion was simple and correct; but Dr. Johnson's explanation will hardly satisfy anyone for the modern perversion of the word.

“The cuckoo, then, on every tree,

Mocks married men; for thus sings he,

Cuckoo!

Cuckoo! cuckoo! O word of fear,

Unpleasing to a married ear!”

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Cuckoo

(A). A watch or clock. The French have the same slang word coucou for a watch or clock. Of course, the word is derived from the German cuckoo—clocks, which, instead of striking the hour, cry cuckoo.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cuckoo Oats and Woodcock Hay

Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay make a farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that oats cannot be sown till the cuckoo is heard (i.e. April), or if the autumn is so wet that the aftermath of hay cannot be got in till woodcock shooting (middle of November), the farmer must be a great sufferer.

Cuckoo—Spit

“Frog—Spit,” or “Froth—Spit.” The spume which forms the uidus of an insect called the Cicada Spumaria, or, more strictly speaking, the Cercopis Spumaria (one of the three divisions of the Cicadariæ). This spume is found on lavender—bushes, rosemary, fly—catch, and some other plants. Like the cochineal, the cicada spumaria exudes a foam for its own warmth, and for protection during its transition state. The word “cuckoo” in this case means spring or cuckoo—time.

Cucumber Time The dull season in the tailoring trade. The Germans call it Die saure Gurken Zeit (pickled gherkin time). Hence the expression Tailors are vegetarians, because they live on “cucumber” when without work, and on “cabbage” when in full employ. (Notes and Queries.)

Cuddy

An ass; a dolt. A gipsy term, from the Persian gudda and the Hindustanee ghudda (an ass).

“Hast got thy breakfast, brother cuddy?”

D. Wingate.

Cudgel One's Brains

(To). To make a painful effort to remember or understand something. The idea is from taking a stick to beat a dull boy under the notion that dulness is the result of temper or inattention.

“Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for our dull ass will not mend his place with beating.” — Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Cudgels

To take up the cudgels. To maintain an argument or position. To fight, as with a cudgel, for one's own way.

“For some reason he did not feel as hot to take up the cudgels for Almira with his mother.” —

M. E. Wilkins: A Modern Dragon.

Cue

(1 syl.). The tail of a sentence (French, queue), the catch—word which indicates when another actor is to speak; a hint; the state of a person's temper, as “So—and—so is in a good cue (or) bad cue.”

“When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.” — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 1.

To give the cue.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To give the hint. (See above.)

Cuffy

A negro; both a generic word and proper name.

“Sambo and Cuffey expand under every sky.” — Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Cui bono?

Who is benefited thereby? To whom is it a gain? The more usual meaning attached to the words is, What good will it do? For what good purpose? It was the question of Judge Cassius. (See Cicero: Pro Milone, 12, sec. 32.)

“Cato, that great and grave philosopher, did commonly demand, when any new project was propounded unto him, cui bono, what good will ensue in case the same is effected?” — Fuller: Worthies (The Design, i.).

Cuirass

Sir Arthur's cuirass was “carved of one emerald, centred in a sun of silver rays, that lightened as he breathed.” (Tennyson: Elaine.) or Cuisses (2 syl.). Armour for the thighs. (French, cuisse, the thigh.)

Cuishes

“Soon o'er his thighs he placed the cuishes bright.” Jerusalem Delivered, book xi.

“His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly armed.” Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., iv. 1.

Cul de Sac (French). A blind alley, or alley blocked up at one end like a sack. Figuratively, an argument, etc., that leads to nothing.

Culdees

A religious order of Ireland and Scotland, said to have been founded in the sixth century by St. Columba. So called from the Gaelic cylle—dee (a house of cells) or ceilede (servants of God, ceile, a servant). Giraldus Cambrensis, going to the Latin for its etymology, according to a custom unhappily not yet extinct, derives it from colo—deus (to worship God).

Cullis

A very fine and strong broth, well strained, and much used for invalids. (French, coulis, from couler, to strain.)

Cully

A fop, a fool, a dupe. A contracted form of cullion, a despicable creature (Italian, coglione). Shakespeare uses the word two or three times, as “Away, base cullions!” (2 Henry VI., i. 3), and again in Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2 — “And makes a god of such a cullion.” (Compare GULL.)

“You base cullion, you.”

Ben Jonson: Every Man in his Humour,

iii. 2.

Culminate

(3 syl.). Come to a crisis. The passage of a celestial body over the meridian at the upper transit is called its culmination. (Latin, culmen, the top.)

Culross Girdles

The thin plate of iron used in Scotland for the manufacture of oaten cakes is called a “girdle,” for which Culross was long celebrated.

“Locks and bars, plough—graith and barrow—teeth! and why not grates and fireprongs, and Culross girdles?”
— Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, chap. ii.

Culver

Pigeon. (Old English, colver; Latin, columba; hence culver—house, a dove—cote.)

“On liquid wing,

The sounding culver shoots.”

Thomson: Spring 452.

Culverin

properly means a serpent (Latin, colubrinus, the coluber), but is applied to a long, slender piece of artillery employed in the sixteenth century to carry balls to a great distance. Queen Elizabeth's “Pocket Pistol” in Dover Castle is a culverin.

Culverkeys

The keys or flowers of the culver or columba, i.e. columbine. (Anglo—Saxon culfre, a dove.)

Cum Grano Salis

With its grain of salt; there is a grain of wheat in the bushel of chaff, and we must make the proper abatement.

Cum Hoc, Propter Hoc

Because two or more events occur consecutively or simultaneously, one is not necessarily the outcome of the other. Sequence of events is not always the result of cause and effect. The swallows come to England in the spring, but do not bring the spring.

“[Free trade and revival of trade] says Lord Penzance, came simultaneously, but, he adds, `There is no more dangerous form of reasoning than the cum hoc, propter hoc. ’” — Nineteenth Century, April, 1886.,

Cumberland Poet

(The). William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth. (1770—1850.)

Cummer A gammer, gudewife, old woman. A variety of gammer which is grande—mère (our grandmother), as gaffer is grand—père or grandfather. It occurs scores of times in Scott's novels.

Cunctator

[the delayer]. Quintus Fabius Maximus, the Roman general who baffled Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wearing him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. This was the policy by which Duguesclin forced the English to abandon their possessions in France in the reign of Charles V. (le Sage). (See Fabian.)

Cuneiform Letters

Letters like wedges (Latin, cuneus, a wedge). These sort of letters occur in old Persian and Babylonian inscriptions. They are sometimes called Arrow—headed characters, and those found at Babylon are called nail—headed. This species of writing is the most ancient of which we have any knowledge; and was first really deciphered by Grotefend in 1802.

Cunning Man or Woman. A fortune—teller, one who professes to discover stolen goods. (Anglo—Saxon, cunnan, to know.)

Cuno

The ranger, father of Agatha, in Weber's opera of Der Freischtütz.

Cunobelin's Gold Mines

Caverns in the chalk beds of Little Thurrock, Essex; so called from the tradition that King Cunobelin hid in them his gold. They are sometimes called Dane—holes, because they were used as lurking—places by the Norsemen.

Cunstance

A model of Resignation, daughter of the Emperor of Rome. The Sultan of Syria, in order to have her for his wife, renounced his religion and turned Christian; but the Sultan's mother murdered him, and turned Cunstance adrift on a raft. After a time the raft stranded on a rock near Northumberland, and the constable rescued Cunstance, and took her home, where she converted his wife, Hermegild. A young lord fell in love with her; but, his suit being rejected, he murdered Hermegild, and laid the charge of murder against Cunstance. King Ella adjudged the cause, and Cunstance being proved innocent, he married her. While Ella was in Scotland, Cunstance was confined with a boy, named Maurice; and Ella's mother, angry with Cunstance for the introduction of the Christian religion, put her on a raft adrift with her baby boy. They were accidentally found by a senator, and taken to Rome. Ella, having discovered that his mother had turned his wife and child adrift, put her to death, and went to Rome in pilgrimage to atone for his crime. Here he fell in with his wife and son. Maurice succeeded his grandfather as Emperor of Rome, and at the death of Ella, Cunstance returned to her native land. (Chaucer: The Man of Lawes Tale.)

Cuntur

A bird worshipped by the ancient Peruvians. It is generally called the “condor,” and by the Arabians the “roc.”

Cup

A deadly cup. Referring to the ancient practice of putting persons to death by poison, as Socrates was put to death by the Athenians.

“In the hand of the Lord there is a cup [a deadly cup], the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out and drink them.” — Psalm lxxv. 8.

Let this cup pass from me.

Let this trouble or affliction be taken away, that I may not be compelled to undergo it. The allusion is to the Jewish practice of assigning to guests a certain portion of wine — as, indeed, was the custom in England at the close of the eighteenth century and the first quarter of the nineteenth. This cup is “full of the wine of God's fury,” let me not be compelled to drink it.

Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip.

(See Ancaeus.) My [or his] cup runs over. My blessings overflow. Here cup signifies portion or blessing.

“My cup runneth over ... goodness and mercy follow me all the days of my life.” — Psalm xxiii. 5, 6.

We must drink the cup.

We must bear the burden awarded to us, the sorrow which falls to our lot. The allusion is to the words of our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 39; also xx. 22). One way of putting criminals to death in ancient times was by poison; Socrates had hemlock to drink. In allusion to this it is said that Jesus Christ tasted death for every man (Heb. ii. 9).

Cup in the university of Cambridge, means a mixture of strong ale with spice and a lemon, served up hot in a silver cup. Sometimes a roasted orange takes the place of a lemon. If wine is added, the cup is called bishop; if brandy is added, the beverage is called cardinal. (See BISHOP.)

Cup Tosser

A juggler (French, joueur de gobelet). The old symbol for a juggler was a goblet. The phrase and symbol are derived from the practice of jugglers who toss in the air, twist on a stick, and play all sorts of tricks with goblets or cups.

Cup of Vows

(The). It used to be customary at feasts to drink from cups of mead, and vow to perform some great deed worthy of the song of a skald. There were four cups: one to Odin, for victory; one to Frey, for a good year; one to Niörd, for peace; and one to Bragi, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

Cups

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

He was in his cups. Intoxicated. (Latin, inter pocula, inter vina.) (Horace: 3 Odes, vi. 20.)

Cupar

He that will to Cupar maun to Cupar. He that will have his own way, must have it even to his injury. The reference is to the Cistercian monastery, founded here by Malcolm IV.

Cupar Justice

Same as "Jedburgh Justice," hang first and try afterwards. Abingdon Law is another phrase. It is said that Major—General Brown, of Abingdon, in the Commonwealth, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them.

Cupboard Love

Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

"Cupboard love is seldom true." — Poor Robin.

Cupid

The god of love, and son of Venus. According to fable he wets with blood the grindstone on which he sharpens his arrows.

"Ferus et Cupido

Semper ardentis acuens sagittas.'

Horace: 2 Odes, viii. 14, 15.

The best statues of this little god are "Cupid Sleeping," in Albano (Rome); "Cupid playing with a Swan," in the Capitol; "Cupid mounted on a Tiger," (Negroni); and "Cupid stringing his Bow," in the Louvre (Paris). Raphael's painting of Cupid is in the Farnesina (Rome).

Cupid and Psyche

An exquisite episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius. It is an allegory representing the progress of the soul to perfection. Mrs. Tighe has a poem on the same subject; and Molière a drama entitled Psyche. (See Morris, Earthly Paradise [May].)

Cupid's Golden Arrow

Virtuous love. "Cupid's leaden arrow," sensual passion.

"Deque sagittifera promisit duo tela pharetra

Diversorum operum; fugat hoc, facit illud amorem. Quod facit auratum est, et cuspidis fulget acuta—, Quod fugat obtusum est, et habet sub arundine plumbum.' Ovid: Tale of Apollo and Daphnë.

"I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow;

By his best arrow with the golden head

By that which knitteth souls and prospers love.”

Shakespeare Midsummer Night's Dream.

Cupidon

(Le jeune). Count d'Orsay was so called by Lord Byron (1798—1852). The Count's father was styled Le beau d'Orsay.

Cur

A fawning, mean—spirited fellow, a crop—tailed dog (Latin, curtus, crop—tailed. French, court; our curt). According to forest laws, a man who had no right to the privilege of the chase was obliged to cut off the tail of his dog. Hence, a degenerate dog or man is called a cur.

“What would you have, you curs,

That like nor peace nor war?”

Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 1.

Curate

(See Clerical Titles .)

Cure de Meudon

— i.e. Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebend of St. Maur, and lastly curé of Meudon. (1483—1653.)

Curetes

(3 syl). A mythical people of Crete, to whom the infant Zeus or Jupiter was entrusted by his mother Rhea. By clashing their shields they drowned the cries of the infant, to prevent its father (Cronos) from finding the place where the babe was hid.

Curfew Bell

The bell rung in the reigns of William I. and II. at sunset, to give notice to their subjects that they were to put out their fires and candles (French, couvre feu, cover—fire). The Klokans in Abo, even to the present day, traverse the towns crying the “go—to—bed time.” Those abroad are told to “make haste home,” and those at home to “put out their fires.” Abolished, as a police regulation, by Henry I.

“The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.”

Gray: Elegy.

Curmudgeon

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.). A grasping, miserly churl. Dr. Johnson gives the derivation of this word thus, "coeur mechant, unknown correspondent." Dr. Ash, in his dictionary, says, "coeur, unknown; merchant, correspondent," a blunder only paralleled by the schoolboy translation of the Greek, me genoito, by mh (God) geuoito (forbid) (Luke xx. 6).

Currant

A corruption of Corinth, hence called by Juvenal Corinthiaca uvae.

Current

The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is that point of the compass towards which the waters of the current run.

Currente Calamo

(Latin). Offhand; without premeditation; written off at once, without making a rough copy first.

Currer Bell

The nom de plume of Charlotte Brontë.

Curry Favour

The French courir, to hunt after, to seek, as courir une charge, courir un bénéfice, to sue for a living; courir les tables, to go a spunging. Similarly, courir les faveurs, to sue for, court, or seek, favours.

Curse

or Cuss. Not worth a curse. I don't care a curse (or cuss). Here "curse" is a corruption of cerse or kerse. Similarly, the Latin nihil [nihilum] is ne hilum, not [worth] the black eye of a bean. Other phrases are "not a straw," "not a pin," "not a rap," "not a dam," "not a bit," "not a jot," "not a pin's point," "not a button." (Anglo—Saxon, cerse, cress; German, Kirsche, a cherry.)

"Wisdom and witt nowe is not worthe a kerse."

Robert Langland: Piers Ploughman.

Curse of Scotland

The nine of diamonds. The two most plausible suggestions are these: (1) The nine of diamonds in the game of Pope Joan is called the Pope, the Antichrist of the Scotch reformers. (2) In the game of comette, introduced by Queen Mary, it is the great winning card, and the game was the curse of Scotland because it was the ruin of so many families.

Other suggestions are these. (3) The word "curse" is a corruption of cross, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form a St. Andrew's Cross; but as the nine of hearts would do as well, this explanation must be abandoned. (4) Some say it was the card on which the “Butcher Duke” wrote his cruel order after the Battle of Culloden; but the term must have been in vogue at the period, as the ladies nicknamed Justice—Clerk Ormiston “The Nine of Diamonds” (1715). (5). Similarly, we must reject the suggestion that it refers to the arms of Dalrymple, Earl of Stair — viz. or, on a saltire azure, nine lozenges of the first. The earl was justly held in abhorrence for the massacre of Glencoe; so also was Colonel Packer, who attended Charles I. on the scaffold, and had for his arms “gules a cross lozengy or.”

Grose says of the nine of diamonds: “Diamonds ... imply royalty ... and every ninth King of Scotland has been observed for many ages to be a tyrant and a curse to the country.” — Tour Thro' Scotland, 1789.

It is a pity that Grose does not give the names of these kings. Malcolm III. was assassinated in 1046 by Macbeth, William was taken prisoner by Henry II. (died 1214), James I. was assassinated in 1437.

Curses

Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. Curses fall on the head of the curser, as chickens which stray during the day return to their roost at night.

Cursing by Bell, Book, and Candle is reading the anathema in the church, then closing the Bible, tolling the bell, and extinguishing all the candles, saying “Fiat, fiat! Do—to (close) the Book, quench the candles, ring the bell. Amen, amen.”

Cursitor

(Latin, clericus de cursu). Formerly a clerk of the course; a chancery clerk, who made out original writs for the beat, course, or part of the county allotted him. A Newgate solicitor was called a cursitor in depreciation of his office.

Curst

Curst cows have curt horns. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curst means “angry” or “fierce,” and curt is “short,” as curtmantle, curt—hose. The Latin proverb is, “Dat Deus immiti cornua curta bovi.”

“You are called plain Kate,

And bonny Kate, and sometimes Kate the curst.” Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, ii. 1.

Curtail

To cut short. (French, court tailler, to short cut, whence the old French courtault.)

Curtain

(The). In fortification, the line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two “bastions” (q.v.).

Curtain

To ring down the curtain. To bring a matter to an end. A theatrical term. When the act or play is over, the bell rings and the green curtain comes down.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“A few more matters of routine will be accomplished, and then the curtain will be rung down on the Session of 1891.” — Newspaper Paragraph, July 27th, 1891.

Curtain Lecture

The nagging of a wife after her husband is in bed. The lectures of Mrs. Caudle in Punch are first—rate caricatures of these “small cattle.”

“Besides what endless brawls by wives are bred,

The curtain lecture makes a mournful bed.”

Dryden.

Curtal Friar

A friar who served as an attendant at the gate of a monastery court. As a curtal dog was not privileged to hunt or course, so a curtal friar virtually meant a worldly—minded one.

“Some do call me the curtal Friar of Fountain Dale; others again call me in jest the Abbot of Fountain Abbey; others still again call me simply Friar Tuck.” — Howard Pyle: The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood, ii. p. 141.

Curtana

The sword of Edward the Confessor, which, having no point, was the emblem of mercy. The royal sword of England was so called to the reign of Henry III.

“But when Curtana will not do the deed,

You lay the pointless clergy—weapon by,

And to the laws, your sword of justice, fly.”

Dryden: Hind and Panther, part ii. 419—21.

Curthose

(2 syl.). Robert II., Duc de Normandie (1087—1134).

Curtis'e

(2 syl.). The little hound in the tale of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkman (1498). (High German, kurz; French, courte, short or small.)

Curtmantle

The surname of Henry II. He introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors. (1133, 1154—1189.) (See Caracalla.)

Curule Chair

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Properly a chariot chair, an ornamental camp—stool made of ivory placed by the Romans in a chariot for the chief magistrate when he went to attend the council. As dictators, consuls, praetors, censors, and the chief ediles occupied such a chair, they were termed curule magistrates or curules. Horace calls the chair curule ebur (1 Epist., vi. 53).

Curzon Street

(London). Named after the ground landlord, George August Curzon, third Viscount Howe.

Cussedness

Ungainliness; perversity, an evil temper; malice prepense. Halliwell gives cuss = surly.

“The turkey—cock is just as likely as not to trample on the young turkeys and smash them, or to split their skulls by a savage dig of his powerful beak. Whether this is ‘cussedness’ pure and simple ... has not been satisfactorily determined” — Daily News, December 22nd, 1885.

Custard

A slap on the hand with a ferula. The word should be custid, unless a play is meant. (Latin, custis, a club or stick.)

Custard Coffin

(See Coffin .)

Customer

A man or acquaintance. A rum customer is one better left alone, as he is likely to show fight if interfered with. A shop term. (See Card.)

“Here be many of her old customers.”

Shakespeare: Measure for Measure,

iv. 3.

Custos Rotulorum

(keeper of the rolls). The chief civil officer of a county, to whose custody are committed the records or rolls of the sessions.

Cut

To renounce acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut — (1) The cut direct is to stare an acquaintance in the face and pretend not to know him. (2) The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.

(3) The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the person cut has passed by. (4) The cut infernal, to stoop and adjust your boots till the party has gone past. There is a very remarkable Scripture illustration of the word cut, meaning to renounce: “Jehovah took a staff and cut it asunder, in token that He would break His covenant with His people; and He cut another staff asunder, in token that He would break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel" (Zech. xi, 7—14).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cut

Cut and come again. Take a cut from the joint, and come for another if you like. To cut the ground from under one (or from under his feet). To leave an adversary no ground to stand on, by disproving all his arguments.

He has cut his eye—teeth.

He is wide awake, he is a knowing one. The eye—teeth are the canine teeth, just under the eyes, and the phrase means he can bite as well as bark. Of course, the play is on the word "eye," and those who have cut their eye—teeth are wide awake.

Cut your wisdom teeth.

Wisdom teeth are those at the extreme end of the jaws, which do not make their appearance till persons have come to years of discretion. When persons say or do silly things, the remark is made to them that "they have not yet cut their wisdom teeth," or reached the years of discretion.

Cut the knot.

Break through an obstacle. The reference is to the Gordian knot (q.v.) shown to Alexander, with the assurance that whoever loosed it would be made ruler of all Asia, whereupon the Macedonian cut it in two with his sword, and claimed to have fulfilled the prophecy.

I must cut my stick — i.e.

leave. The Irish usually cut a shillelah before they start on an expedition. Punch gives the following witty derivation: — "Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm—stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, 'Where is brother Benedict?' 'Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!' — i.e. he is on his way home."

I'll cut your comb for you.

Take your conceit down. The allusion is to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

He'll cut up well.

He is rich, and his property will cut into good slices.

Cut Blocks with a Razor

(To). To do something astounding by insignificant means; to do something more eccentric than inexpedient. According to Dean Swift, to "make pincushions of sunbeams." The tale is that Accius, or Attus Navius, a Roman augur, opposed the king Tarquin the Elder, who wished to double the number of senators. Tarquin, to throw ridicule on the augur, sneered at his pretensions of augury, and asked him if he could do what was then in his thoughts. "Undoubtedly," replied Navius; and Tarquin with a laugh, said, "Why, I was thinking whether I could cut through this whetstone with a razor." "Cut boldly," cried Navius, and the whetstone was cleft in two. This story forms the subject of one of Bon Gaultier's ballads, and Goldsmith refers to it in his Retaliation:

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“In short, ’twas his [Burke’s] fate, unemployed or in place, sir,

To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor”

Cut neither Nails nor Hair at Sea

Petronius says, “Non licere cuiquam mortalium in nave neque ungues neque capillos deponere, nisi cum pelago ventus irascitur.” The cuttings of the nails and hair were votive offerings to Proserpine, and it would excite the jealousy of Neptune to make offerings to another in his own special kingdom.

Cut Off with a Shilling

Disinherited. Blackstone tells us that the Romans set aside those testaments which passed by the natural heirs unnoticed; but if any legacy was left, no matter how small, it proved the testator’s intention. English law has no such provision, but the notion at one time prevailed that the name of the heir should appear in the will; and if he was bequeathed “a shilling,” that the testator had not forgotten him, but disinherited him intentionally.

Cut out

Left in the lurch; superseded. In cards, when there are too many for a game (say whist), it is customary for the players to cut out after a [rubber], in order that another player may have a turn. This is done by the players cutting the cards on the table, and the lowest turn—up gives place to the new hand, who “supersedes” him, or takes his place.

It does not refer to cutting out a ship from an enemy’s port.

He is cut out for a sailor.

His natural propensities are suited for the vocation. The allusion is to cutting out cloth, etc., for specific purposes.

Cut your Coat according to your Cloth

Stretch your arm no farther than your sleeve will reach.

“Little barks must keep near shore,

Larger ones may venture more.”

French:

“Selon ta bourse nourris ta bouche.” “Selon le pain il faut le couteau.” “Fou est, qui plus dépense que sa rente ne vaut.”

Italian:

“Noi facciamo la spese secondo l’entrata.” Latin: “Ex quovis ligno non fit Mercurius.” “Parvum parva decent” (Horace). “Messe tenus propria vive” (Persius). “Cui multum est piperis, etiam oleribus immiscet.” “Sumptus census ne superat” (Plautus). “Si non possis quod velis, velis id quod possis.” “Ne te quæiveris extra” (Horace).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cut a Dash

Make a show. Cut is the French couper, better seen in the noun coup, as a grand coup, a coup de maltre (a masterly stroke), so “to cut” means to make a masterly coup, to do something to be looked at and talked about. Dashing means striking — i.e. showy, as a “dashing fellow,” a “dashing equipage.” To cut a dash is to get one's self looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance.

Cut and Dry

Already prepared. “He had a speech all cut and dry.” The allusion is to timber cut, dry, and fit for use.

“Sets of phrases, cut and dry,

Evermore thy tongue supply.” Swift.

Cut and Run

Be off as quickly as possible. A sea phrase, meaning cut your cable and run before the wind.

Cut Away

Be off at once. This is a French phrase, couper (cut away) — i.e. to break through the enemy's ranks by cutting them down with your swords.

Cut Capers

(To). To act in an unusual manner.

“The quietest fellows are forced to fight for their status quo, and sometimes to cut capers like the rest.” — LeFanu: The House in the Churchyard, p. 143.

To cut capers

(in dancing) is to spring upwards, and rapidly interlace one foot with the other. Cut your capers! Be off with you!

I'll make him cut his capers, i.e.

rue his conduct.

Cut it Short

(See Audley .)

Cut of his Jib

The contour or expression of his face. This is a sailor's phrase. The cut of a jib or foresail of a ship indicates her character. Thus, a sailor says of a suspicious vessel, he “does not like the cut of her jib.”

Cut Short

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is to shorten. "Cut short all intermission" (Macbeth, iv. 3). To cut it short means to bring to an end what you are doing or saying.

His life was cut short.

He died prematurely. The allusion is to Atropos, one of the three Parcae cutting the thread of life span by her sister Clotho.

Cut up Rough

(To). To be disagreeable or quarrelsome about anything.

Cuthbert

St. Cuthbert's beads. Joints of the articulated stems of encrinites, used for rosaries. St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be termed the St. Patrick of Great Britain. He is said to sit at night on a rock in Holy Island, and to use the opposite rock as his anvil while he forges the entrochites

(entrokites). (See Bead.)

"On a rock of Lindisfarn

St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame

The sea—born beads that bear his name."

Scott: Marmion.

St. Cuthbert's Stone. A granite rock in Cumberland. St. Cuthbert's Well. A spring of water close by St. Cuthbert's Stone.

Cuthbert Bede

A nom de plume of the Rev Edward Bradley, author of Verdant Green. (1827—1889.)

Cutler's Poetry

Mere jingles or rhymes. Knives had, at one time, a distich inscribed on the blade by means of aqua fortis.

"Whose posy was

For all the world like cutler's poetry

Upon a kuife."

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice,

v 1.

Cutpurse

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Now called “pickpocket.” The two words are of historical value. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the string by which the purse was attached; but when pockets were adopted, and purses were no longer hung on the girdle, the thief was no longer a cutpurse, but became a pickpocket.

“To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse.” — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv 3.

Cutter's Law

Not to see a fellow want while we have cash in our purse. Cutter's law means the law of purse—cutters, robbers, brigands, and highwaymen.

“I must put you in cash with some of your old uncle's broad—pieces. This is cutter's law; we must not see a pretty fellow want, if we have cash ourselves.” — Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap ix

Cuttle

Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind—hearted sailor, simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalised by the motto selected by Notes and Queries, “When found make a note of.” (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

“Unfortunately, I neglected Captain Cuttle's advice, and am now unable to find it.” — W H Husk: Notes and Queries.

Cutty

Scotch for short, as a cutty pipe, cutty sark. (A diminutive of curt.)

Cutty Pipe

A short clay pipe. Scotch, cutty (short), as cutty spoons, cutty sark, a cutty (little girl), etc., a cutty gun (a pop—gun).

Cutty Stool

A small stool on which offenders were placed in the Scotch church when they were about to receive a public rebuke.

Cwt

is C wt. — i.e. C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundred—weight. (See Dwt.)

Cyanean Rocks

(The). The Symplegades at the entrance of the Euxine Sea. Said to close together when a vessel attempted to sail between them, and thus crush it to pieces. Cyanean means dark, and Symplegades means dashers together.

“Here are those hard rocks of trap, of a greenish—blue, coloured with copper, and hence called the Cyanean.” — Olivier

Cycle

A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlastingly in precisely the same order.

Cycle of the moon, called "Meton's Cycle," from Meton, who discovered it, is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which time the phases of the moon repeat themselves on the same days as they did nineteen years previously. (See Callipic Period.)

Cycle of the sun.

A period of twenty—eight years, at the expiration of which time the Sunday letters recur and proceed in the same order as they did twenty—eight years previously. In other words, the days of the month fall again on the same days of the week.

The Platonic cycle

or great year is that space of time which elapses before all the stars and constellations return to any given state. Tycho Brahët calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cyclic Poets

Inferior epic poets. On the death of Homer a host of minstrels caught the contagion of his poems, and wrote continuations, illustrations, or additions thereto. These poets were called cyclic because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war. The chief were Agias, Arctinos, Eugamon, Lesches, and Strasinus.

"Besides the Homeric poems, the Greeks of this age possessed those of the poets named Cyclic as they sang a traditional cycle of events" — Keightley: Greece, part i chap.xiv. p. 150.

Cyclopædia

The living cyclopædia. Longinus, so called for his extensive information. (213—273.)

Cyclopean

Huge, massive, like the Cyclops of classic mythology.

Cyclopean Masonry

The old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Tiryns, the Gate of Lyons, the Treasury of Athens, and the Tombs of Phoroneus (3 syl.) and Danaos. They are said to have been the work of the Cyclops. They are huge blocks fitted together without mortar, with marvellous nicety.

Cyclops

One of a group of giants with only one eye, and that in the centre of their forehead, whose business it was to forge iron for Vulcan. They were probably Pelasgians, who worked in quarries, and attached a lantern to their forehead to give them light underground. The lantern was their one eye as big as the full moon.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Greek, “circular—eye.”) (See Arimaspians)

“Roused with the sound, the mighty family

Of one—eyed brothers hasten to the shore,

And gather round the bellowing Polypheme.”

Addison: Milton Imitated.

Cyllaros

according to Virgil, was the celebrated horse of Pollux (Geor., iii. 90), but, according to Ovid, it was Castor's steed (Met., xii. 408).

“He, O Castor, was a courser worthy thee ...

Coal—black his colour, but like jet it shone:

His legs and flowing tail were white alone.”

Dryden: Ovid's Metamorphose, xii.

Cymbeline

(See Imogen, Zineura .)

Cymochles

A man of prodigious might, brother of Pyrochles, son of Malice (Acrates) and Despair, and husband of Acrasia, the enchantress. He sets out to encounter Sir Guyen, but is ferried over the idle lake by Wantonness (Phæ'dria), and forgets himself; he is slain by King Arthur (canto viii.). The word means, “one who seeks glory in troubles.” (Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 5.)

Cymodoce

(4 syl.). A sea nymph and companion of Venus. (Virgil: Georgic, iv. 338; and again, Æneid, v. 826.) The word means “wave—receiving.”

The Garden of Cymodoce.

Sark, one of the Channel islands. It is the title of a poem by Swinburne, 1880.

Cynægiros

It is said that when the Persians were pushing off from shore after the battle of Marathon, Cynægiros, the brother of Æschylus, the poet, seized one of their ships with his right hand, which was instantly lopped off; he then grasped it with his left, which was cut off also; lastly, he seized hold of it with his teeth and lost his head. (See Benbow)

Cynic

C

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A snarling, churlish person, like a cynic. The cynics were so called because Antisthenes held his school in the gymnasium called Cynosarges, set apart for those who were not of pure Athenian blood. Cynosarges means white dog, and was so called because a white dog once carried away part of a victim which Diomeos was offering to Hercules. The sect was often called the Dog—sect; and the effigy over Diogenes' pillar was a dog, with this inscription:

“Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?”

“A dog.” — “His name?” — “Diogenes.” — “From far?”

“Sinope” — “What! who made a tub his home?”

“The same; now dead, amongst the stars a star.”

E.C.B.

Cynic Tub

(The). The tub from which Diogenes lectured. Similarly we speak of the “Porch,” that is, the Porch Poecile, meaning Stoic philosophy; the “Garden,” meaning Epicurean philosophy; the “Academy,” meaning Platonic philosophy; the “Colonnade,” meaning Aristotelian philosophy.

“[They] fetch their doctrines from the Cynic tub.”

Milton: Comus,

line 708.

Cynics

The chief were Antisthenes of Athens (the founder), Diogenes, Onesicritos, Monimos, Crates and his wife Hipparchia, Metrocles, Menippos, and Menedemos the madman.

Cynosure

(3 syl.). The polar star; the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called Ursa Minor. As seamen guide their ships by the north star, and observe it well, the word “cynosure” is used for whatever attracts attention, as “The cynosure of neighbouring eyes” (Milton), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter, as —

“Richmond was the cynosure on which all Northern eyes were fixed [in the American war].”

— The Times.

Cynthia

The moon; a surname of Artemis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who represented the moon, was called Cynthia from Mount Cynthus, where she was born.

“And from embattled clouds emerging slow,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Cynthia came riding on her silver car.”

Beattie: Minstrel.

Cynthia. Pope, speaking of the inconstant character of woman, “matter too soft a lasting mark to bear,” says

“Come, then, the colours and the ground prepare!

Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air;

Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it

Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of the minute.” Epistle ii. 17—20.

Cypress

(The) is a funeral tree, and was dedicated by the Romans to Pluto, because when once cut it never grows again.

“Cypresse garlands are of great account at funeralls amongst the gentiler sort, but rosemary and bayes are used by the commons both at funeralls and weddings. They are plants which fade not a good while after they are gathered ... and intimate that the remembrance of the present solemnity might not dye presently.” — Coles: Introduction to the Knowledge of Plants.

The magic cypress branch. In the opera of Roberto il Diavolo, after the “dance of love,” in which Helena seduces the duke, he removes the cypress branch, which has the power of imparting to him whatever he wishes. With this he enters the palace of Isabella, princess of Sicily, and transfixes the princess and her attendants in a magic sleep, but afterwards relenting, he breaks the branch, and is dragged away by the guards.

Cyprian Brass

or “æs Cyprium,” copper. Pliny (book xxxiv. c. ii.) says, “in Cypro enim prima æris inventio fuit.”

Cypriote

A native of Cyprus; the dialect spoken on the island; pertaining or special to Cyprus.

D

D This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Hebrew daleth (a door). In Egyptian hieroglyphics it is a man's hand.

D

or d, Indicating a penny or pence, is the initial letter of the Latin denarius a silver coin equal to 8 ¾d. during the commonwealth of Rome, but in the Middle Ages about equivalent to our penny. The word was used by the Romans for money in general.

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

stands for 500, which is half ¥, a form of m or M, which stands for mille.

D

stands for 5,000.

D.O.M.

Deo Optimo Maximo. Datur omnibus mori (It is allotted to all to die).

D.T.

A contraction of delirium tremens.

“They get a look, after a touch of D.T., which nothing else that I know of can give them” — Indian Tale.

Da Capo

or D.C. From the beginning — that is, finish with a repetition of the first strain. A term in music. (Italian.)

Dab

Clever, skilled, as “a dab—hand at it”; a corrupt contraction of the Latin adeptus (an adept). “Dabster” is another form. Apt is a related word.

“An Eton stripling, training for the law.

A dunce at learning, but a dab at taw (marbles).” Anon: Logic; or, The Biter Bit “ etc.

Dab, Din

“Hab Dab and David Din

Ding the deil o'er Dabson's Linn.”

“Hab Dab” means Halbert Dobson; “David Din” means David Dun; and “Dabson's Linn,” or Dob's Linn, is a waterfall near the head of Moffat Water.

Dobson and Dun were two Cameronians who lived for security in a cave in the ravine. Here, as they said, they saw the devil in the form of a pack of dried hides, and after fighting the “foul fiend” for some time, they dinged him into the waterfall.

Dabaira

An idol of the savages of Panama', to whose honour slaves are burnt to death. (American mythology.)

Dabbat [the Beast]. The Beast of the Apocalypse, which the Mahometans say will appear with Antichrist, called by them daggial. (Rev. xix. 19; xx. 10.)

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dabble

To dabble in the funds; to dabble in politics — i.e. to do something in them in a small way. (Dutch, dabbelen, our dip and tap.)

Dabchick

The lesser grebe. Dab is a corruption of dap, the old participle of dip, and chick (any young or small fowl), literally the dipping or diving chick.

Dactyl

(Will). The “smallest of pedants.” (Steele: The Tatler.)

Dactyls

(The). Mythic beings to whom is ascribed the discovery of iron. Their number was originally three — the Smelter, the Hammer, and the Anvil; but was afterwards increased to five males and five females, whence their name Dactyls or Fingers.

Dad

or Daddy. Father. The person who acts as father at a wedding, a stage—manager. The superintendent of a casual ward is termed by the inmates “Old Daddy.” (A Night in a Work—house, by an Amateur Casual [J. Greenwood].)

In the Fortunes of Nigel, by Sir W. Scott, Steenie, Duke of Buckingham, calls King James “My dear dad and gossip.” (Welsh, tad; Irish, daid, father; Sanskrit, tada; Hindu, dada.)

Daddy Long—legs

A crane—fly; sometimes applied to the long—legged spiders called “harvestmen.”

Daedalos

A Greek who formed the Cretan labyrinth, and made for himself wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the Archipelago. He is said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, etc.

Daffodil

(The), or “Lent Lily,” was once white; but Persephone, daughter of Demeter (Ceres), delighted to wander about the flowery meadows of Sicily. One spring—tide she tripped over the meadows, wreathed her head with wild lilies, and, throwing herself on the grass, fell asleep. The god of the Infernal Regions, called by the Romans Pluto, fell in love with the beautiful maid, and carried her off for his bride. His touch turned the white flowers to a golden yellow, and some of them fell in Acheron, where they grew luxuriantly; and ever since the flower has been planted on graves. Theophilus and Pliny tell us that the ghosts delight in the flower, called by them the Asphodel. It was once called the Affodil. (French, asphodéle; Latin, asphodilus; Greek, asphodilos.)

“Flour of daffodil is a cure for madness.” —

Med. MS. Lincoln Cathedral,

f.282.

Dag

(day). Son of Natt or night. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dagger

or Long Cross (†), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), is a Roman Catholic character, originally employed in church books, prayers of exorcism, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. This sign is sometimes called an obelisk — that is, “a spit.” (Greek, obelos, a spit.) Dagger, in the City arms of London, commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognisance of the City was the sword of St. Paul.

“Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew

Rebellious Tyler in his alarmes;

The king, therefore, did give him in lieu

The dagger to the city armes.”

Fourth year of Richard II.

(1381), Fishmongers' Hall.

Dagger Ale

is the ale of the Dagger, a celebrated ordinary in Holborn.

“My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night

In Holborn, at the Dagger. ’

Ben Jonson: The Alchemist,

i. 1.

Dagger—scene in the House of Commons

Edmund Burke, during the French Revolution, tried a bit of bunkum by throwing down a dagger on the floor of the House, exclaiming as he did so, “There's French fraternity for you! Such is the weapon which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our beloved king.” Sheridan spoilt the dramatic effect, and set the House in a roar by his remark, “The gentleman, I see, has brought his knife with him, but where is his fork?” (See Coup De Theatre)

Daggers

To speak daggers, To look daggers. To speak or look so as to wound the sensibilities.

“I will speak daggers to her; but will use none.” — Shakespeare: Hamlet, iii. 2.

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Daggers Drawn

(At). At great enmity, as if with daggers drawn and ready to rush on each other.

Daggle—tail or Draggle—tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (Saxon) means loose ends, mire or dirt; whence dag—locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag—wool, refuse wool. (Compare TAG.)

Dagobert

King Dagobert and St. Eloi. There is a French song very popular with this title. St. Eloi tells the king his coat has a hole in it, and the king replies, "C'est vrai, le tien est bon; prête—le moi." Next the saint complains of the king's stockings, and Dagobert makes the same answer. Then of his wig and cloak, to which the same answer is returned. After seventeen complaints St. Eloi said, "My king, death is at hand, and it is time to confess," when the king replied, "Why can't you confess, and die instead of me?"

Dagon

(Hebrew, dag On, the fish On). The idol of the Philistines; half woman and half fish. (See Atergata.)

"Dagon his name; sea—monster, upward man

And downward fish; yet had his temple high

Rear'd in Azotus dreaded through the coast

Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,

And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds."

Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 402.

Dagonet

(Sir). In the romance La Mort d' Arthure he is called the fool of King Arthur, and was knighted by the king himself.

"I remember at Mile—End Green, when I lay at Clement's Inn, I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show." — Henry IV., iii. 2. (Justice Shallow).

"Dagonet" is the pen—name of Mr. G. R. Sims.

Daguerreotype

(4 syl.). A photographic process. So named from M. Daguerre, who greatly improved it in 1839. (See Talbotype.)

Dagun

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A god worshipped in Pegu. When Kiakiak destroyed the world, Dagon reconstructed it. (Indian mythology.)

Dahak

The Satan of Persia. According to Persian mythology, the ages of the world are divided into periods of 1,000 years. When the cycle of “chiliasms” (1,000—year periods) is complete, the reign of Ormuzd will begin, and men will be all good and all happy; but this event will be preceded by the loosing of Dahak, who will break his chain and fall upon the world, and bring on man the most dreadful calamities. Two prophets will appear to cheer the oppressed, and announce the advent of Ormuzd.

Dahlia

A flower. So called from Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist.

Dahomey

is not derived from Daho, the founder of the palace so called, but is a corruption of Danh—homen, “Danh's Belly.” The story is as follows: Ardrah divided his kingdom at death between his three sons, and Daho, one of the sons, received the northern portion. Being an enterprising and ambitious man, he coveted the country of his neighbour Danh, King of Gedavin, and first applied to him for a plot of land to build a house on. This being granted, Daho made other requests in quick succession, and Danh's patience being exhausted, he exclaimed, “Must I open my belly for you to build on?” On hearing this, Daho declared himself insulted, made war on Danh, and slew him. He then built his palace where Danh fell, and called it Danh—homen.

(Nineteenth Century, October, 1890, pp. 605—6.)

Daiboth

(3 syl.). A Japanese idol of colossal size. Each of her hands is full of hands. (Japanese mythology.)

Daikoku

(4 syl.). The god invoked specially by the artisans of Japan. He sits on a ball of rice, holding a hammer in his hand, with which he beats a sack; and every time he does so the sack becomes full of silver, rice, cloth, and other useful articles. (Japanese mythology.)

Dairi (3 syl.). The royal residence in Japan; the court of the mikado, used by metonymy for the sovereign or chief pontiff himself.

Dairy

A corrupt form of “dey—ery,” Middle English deierie and deyyerye, from deye, a dairymaid.

“The dey or farm—woman entered with her pitchers, to deliver the milk for the family.” — Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, chap. xxxii.

Dais

The raised floor at the head of a dining—room, designed for guests of distinction (French, dais, a canopy). So called because it used to be decorated with a canopy. The proverb “Sous le dais” means “in the midst of grandeur.”

Daisies

Slang for boots. Explained under CHIVY.

Daisy

Ophelia gives the queen a daisy to signify “that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband.” So the daisy is explained by Greene to mean a Quip for an upstart courtier. (Anglo—Saxon dages eage, day's eye.)

The word is Day's eye, and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning it expands its petals to the light. (See Violet.)

“That well by reason men calle it maie.

The daisie, or else the eie of the daie.”

Chaucer

Daisy

(Solomon). Parish clerk of Chigwell. He had little, round, black, shiny eyes like beads; wore rusty black breeches, a rusty black coat, and a long—flapped waistcoat with queer little buttons. Solomon Daisy, with Phil Parkes, the ranger of Epping Forest, Tom Cobb, the chandler and post—office keeper, and John Willet, mine host, formed a quadrilateral or village club, which used to meet night after night at the Maypole, on the borders of the forest. Daisy's famous tale was the murder of Mr. Reuben Haredale, and the conviction that the murderer would be found out on the 19th of March, the anniversary of the murder. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, chap. i., etc.)

Daisy—cutter

(A). In cricket, a ball that is bowled all along the ground.

Daisy—roots

like dwarf—elder berries, are said to stunt the growth; hence the fairy Milkah fed her royal foster—child on this food, that his standard might not exceed that of a pigmy. This superstition arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. (See Fern Seed.)

“She robbed dwarf—elders of their fragrant fruit,

And fed him early with the daisy root,

Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran, And formed the beauteous miniature of man.”

Tickell: Kensington Gardens.

Dalai—Lama

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[grand lama]. Chief of the two Tartar priests — a sort of incarnate deity. The other lama is called the “Tesho—lama.”

Daldah

Mahomet's favourite white mule.

Dalgarno

(Lord). A heartless profligate in Scott's Fortunes of Nigel.

Dalgetty (Dugald). Jeffrey calls him “a compound of Captain Fluellen and Bobadil,” but this is scarcely just. Without doubt, he has all the pedantry and conceit of the former, and all the vulgar assurance of the latter; but, unlike Bobadil, he is a man of real courage, and wholly trustworthy to those who pay him for the service of his sword, which, like a thrifty mercenary, he lets out to the highest bidder. (Scott: Legend of Montrose.)

“Neither Schiller, Strads, Thuanus, Monroe, nor Dugald Dalgetty makes any mention of it.” — Carlyle.

Dalkey

(King of). A kind of “Mayor of Garrat” (q.v.) at Kingstown, in Ireland. A full description is given of this mock mayor, etc., in a book entitled Ireland Ninety Years Ago.

Dalle

(French), écu de six francs (5s.). Money generally.

“Quiconque parleroit de paix ... payeroit à la bourse de l'Union certaine quantité de dales, pour l'entretien des docteurs.” — Satyre Menippe, 1824, p.163.

Dalmatica

or Dalmatic. A robe, open in front, reaching to the knees; worn at one time by deacons over the alb or stole, when the Eucharist was administered. It is in imitation of the regal vest of Dalmatia, and was imported into Rome by the Emperor Commodus. A similar robe was worn by kings, in the Middle Ages, at coronations and other great solemnities, to remind them of their duty of bountifulness to the poor. The right sleeve was plain and full, but the left was fringed and tasselled. Deacons had broader sleeves than sub—deacons, to indicate their duty to larger generosity; for a similar reason the sleeves of a bishop are larger than those of a priest. The two stripes before and behind were to show that the wearer should exercise his charity to all.

Dam

An Indian copper coin, the fortieth part of a rupee. Hence the expression “Not worth a dam”; similarly “not worth a farthing,” “not worth a rap” (q.v.); “not worth a sou,” “not worth a stiver,” etc.

Damage

What's the damage? What have I to pay? how much is the bill? The allusion is to the law assessing damages in remuneration to the plaintiff.

D

Damask Linen

So called from Damascus, where it was originally manufactured.

Damaskeening

Producing upon steel a blue tinge and ornamental figures, sometimes inlaid with gold and silver, as in Damascus blades; so called from Damascus, which was celebrated in the Middle Ages for this class of ornamental art.

Dambe'a

or Dembe'a. A lake in Gojam, Abyssinia, the source of the Blue Nile. Captain Speke traced the White Nile to Lake Victoria N'yanza, which, no doubt, is fed by the Mountains of the Moon.

“He [the Nile] thro' the Incid lake

Of fair Dambea rolls his infant stream.”

Thomson: Summer, 807—8.

Dame du Lac

A fay, named Vivienne, who plunged with the infant Lancelot into a lake. This lake was a kind of mirage, concealing the demesnes of the lady “en la marche de la petite Bretagne.” (See Vivienne.)

“En ce lieu ... avoit la dame moult de belles maisons et moult riches; et au plain dessoubs elle avoit une gente petite rivièrè.”

Damiens' Bed of Steel

R. F. Damiens, in 1757, attempted the life of Louis XV. He was taken to the Conciergerie; an iron bed, which likewise served as a chair, was prepared for him, and to this he was fastened with chains. He was then tortured, and ultimately torn to pieces by wild horses. (Smollet: History of England,

v. 12, p. 39.)

“The uplifted axe, the agonising wheel,

Luke's iron crown, and Damiens' bed of steel.”

Goldsmith: The Traveller (1768).

Damn with Faint Praise

To praise with such a voice and in such measured terms as to show plainly secret disapproval.

“Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,

And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer.”

Pope: Epistle to Arbuthnot.

Damocles' Sword

Evil foreboded or dreaded. Damocles, the sycophant of Dionysius the elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accordingly he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damocles was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalising torment to him. (Cicero.)

“These fears hang like Damocles' sword over every feast, and make enjoyment impossible.” — Chambers's Cyclopædia.

Damon and Musidora

Two lovers in Thomson's Summer. One day Damon caught Musidora bathing, and his delicacy so won upon her that she promised to be his bride.

Damon and Pythias

Inseparable friends. They were two Syracusan youths. Damon, being condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs if Pythias became his security. Damon being delayed, Pythias was led to execution, but his friend arrived in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship that he pardoned both of them.

Damper

(A). A snap before dinner, which damps or takes off the edge, of appetite. “That's a damper” also means a wet—blanket influence, a rebuff which damps or cools one's courage.

Also a large thin cake of flour and water baked in hot ashes. The mute of a stringed instrument to deaden the sound is also called a “damper.”

Damsel

(See Domisellus.)

Damson

A corruption of Damascéne, a fruit from Damascus.

Damyan

(3 syl.). A “silke squyer,” whose illicit love was accepted by May, the youthful bride of January, a Lombard knight, sixty years old. (Chaucer: The Marchaundes Tale.)

Dan

A title of honour, common with the old poets, as Dan Phoebus, Dan Cupid, Dan Neptune, Dan Chaucer, etc. (Spanish, don.)

“Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

On Fame's eternal beadroll worthy to be filed." Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iv. canto ii. 32.

From Dan to Beersheba.

From one end of the kingdom to the other; all over the world; everywhere. The phrase is Scriptural, Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern city of the Holy Land. We have a similar expression, "From John o' Groats to the Land's End."

Dan Tucker

Out o' de way, old Dan Tucker. The first Governor of Bermuda was Mr. Moore, who was succeeded by Captain Daniel Tucker. These islands were colonised from Virginia.

Danace

(3 syl.). A coin placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay their passage across the ferry of the Lower World.

Danae

An Argive princess whom Zeus (Jupiter) seduced under the form of a shower of gold, while she was confined in an inaccessible tower. She thus became the mother of Perseus (2 syl.).

Danaides

(4 syl.). Daughters of Danaos (King of Argos). They were fifty in number, and married the fifty sons of Ægyptos. They all but one murdered their husbands on their wedding—night, and were punished in the infernal regions by having to draw water everlastingly in sieves from a deep well.

This is an allegory. The followers of Danaos taught the Argives to dig wells, and irrigate their fields in the Egyptian manner. As the soil of Argos was very dry and porous, it was like a sieve.

The names of the fifty Danaïdes and their respective husbands are as follows:

Danaos

According to the Roman de Rose, Denmark means the country of Danaos, who settled here with a colony after the siege of Troy, as Brutus is said by the same sort of name—legend to have settled in Britain.

Saxo—Germanicus, with equal absurdity, makes Dan, the son of Humble, the first king, to account for the name of the country.

Danaw

The Danube (German).

“To pass

Rhone or the Danaw.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 353.

Dance The Spanish danza was a grave and stately court dance. Those of the seventeenth century were called the Turdion, Pabana, Madama Orleans, Piedelgiba'o, El Rey Don Alonzo, and El Caballero. Most of the names are taken from the ballad—music to which they were danced.

The light dances were called Baylë (q.v.).

Dance of Death

A series of woodcuts, said to be by Hans Holbein (1538), representing Death dancing after all sorts of persons, beginning with Adam and Eve. He is beside the judge on his bench, the priest in the pulpit, the nun in her cell, the doctor in his study, the bride and the beggar, the king and the infant; but is “swallowed up at last.”

This is often called the Dance Macabre, from a German who wrote verses on the subject. On the north side of Old St. Paul's was a cloister, on the walls of which was painted, at the cost of John Carpenter, town clerk of London (15th century), a “Dance of Death,” or “Death leading all the estate, with speeches of Death, and answers, by John Lydgate” (Stow). The Death—Dance in the Dominican Convent of Basle was retouched by Holbein.

PHRASES.

I'll lead you a pretty dance, i.e.

I'll bother or put you to trouble. The French say, Donner le bal à quelqu'un. The reference is to the complicated dances of former times, when all followed the leader.

To dance attendance.

To wait obsequiously, to be at the beck and call of another. The allusion is to the ancient custom of weddings, where the bride on the wedding—night had to dance with every guest, and play the amiable, though greatly annoyed.

“Then must the poore bryde kepe foote with a dauncer, and refuse none, how scabbed, foule, droncken, rude, and shameless soever he be.” — Christen: State of Matrimony, 1543.

“I had thought

They had parted so much honestly among them (At least, good manners) as not thus to suffer A man of his place, and so near our favour,

To dance attendance on their lordships' pleasures.” Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 2.

To dance upon nothing.

To be hanged.

Dances

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(National Dances): Bohemian: the redowa. English: the hornpipe and lancers. French: the contredanse (country dance), cotillon, and quadrille. German: the gallopade and waltz. Irish: the jig. Neapolitan: the tarantella. Polish: the mazurka and krakovieck, Russian: the cossac. Scotch: the reel. Spanish: the bolero and fandango. When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniard, the arietta to the Italian, and the hornpipe and the morris—dance to the English.

Dances

(Religious Dances):

Astronomical dances, invented by the Egyptians, designed (like our orreries) to represent the movements of the heavenly bodies.

The Bacchic' dances were of three sorts: grave (like our minuet), gay (like our gavotte), and mixed (like our minuet and gavotte combined).

The dance Champêtre, invented by Pan, quick and lively. The dancers (in the open air) wore wreaths of oak and garlands of flowers.

Children's dances, in Lacedemonia, in honour of Diana. The children were nude; and their movements were grave, modest, and graceful.

Corybantic dances,

in honour of Bacchus, accompanied with timbrels, fifes, flutes, and a tumultuous noise produced by the clashing of swords and spears against brazen bucklers.

Funereal dances,

in Athens, slow, solemn dances in which the priests took part. The performers wore long white robes, and carried cypress slips in their hands.

Hymeneal dances were lively and joyous. The dancers being crowned with flowers. Of the Lapithæ, invented by Pirithöus. These were exhibited after some famous victory, and were designed to imitate the combats of the Centaurs and Lapithæ. These dances were both difficult and dangerous.

May—day dances

at Rome. At daybreak lads and lasses went out to gather “May” and other flowers for themselves and their elders; and the day was spent in dances and festivities.

Military dances.

The oldest of all dances, executed with swords, javelins, and bucklers. Said to be invented by Minerva to celebrate the victory of the gods over the Titans.

Nuptial dances.

A Roman pantomimic performance resembling the dances of our harlequin and columbine. Sacred dances (among the Jews). David danced in certain religious processions (2 Sam. vi. 14). The people sang and danced before the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 19). And in the book of Psalms (cl. 4) we read, "Let [the people] praise [the Lord] with timbrel and dance. Miriam, the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, was followed by all the women with timbrels and dances (Exod. xv. 20).

Salic dances, instituted by Numa Pompilius in honour of Mars. They were executed by twelve priests selected from the highest of the nobility, and the dances were performed in the temple while sacrifices were being made and hymns sung to the god.

The Dancing Dervishes celebrate their religious rites with dances, which consist chiefly of spinning round and round a little allotted space, not in couples, but each one alone.

In ancient times the Gauls, the Germans, the Spaniards, and the English too had their sacred dances. In fact, in all religious ceremonies the dance was an essential part of divine worship. In India dancing is a part of religious worship in which the priests join.

Dancing—water

(The), which beautifies ladies, makes them young again, and enriches them. It fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chery fetched a bottle of this water for his beloved Fair—star, but was aided by a dove. (Fairy Tales, by the Comtesse d'Aulnoy.)

Dandelion

A flower. The word is a corruption of the French dent de lion (lion's tooth), Also called Leontodon (lion—tooth, Greek), from a supposed resemblance between its leaves and the teeth of lions.

Dander

Is your dander up or riz? Is your angry passion up? This is generally considered to be an Americanism; but Halliwell gives, in his Archaic Dictionary, both dander (anger) and dandy (distracted), the former common to several counties, and the latter peculiar to Somersetshire.

Dandie Dinmont A jovial, true—hearted store—farmer, in Sir Walter Scott's Guy Mannering. Also a hardy hairy short—legged terrier.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“From this dog descended Davidson of Hyndlee's breed, the original Dandie—Dinmont.” T. Brown: Our Dogs, p.104.

Dandin

(French). A ninny, a snob. From Molière's comedy of George Dandin.

Dandin

(George). A French cit, who marries a sprig of nobility, and lives with his wife's parents. Madame appeals on all occasions to her father and mother, who, of course, take her part against her husband. Poor George is in a sad plight, and is for ever lamenting his fate with the expression, Vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin ('Tis your own fault, George Dandin). George Dandin stands for anyone who marries above his sphere, and is pecked by his wife and mother—in—law. The word means “a ninny.” (Molière's comedy so called.)

Perrin Dandin.

A sort of Lynch judge in Rabelais, who seated himself on the trunk of the first tree he came to, and there decided the causes submitted to him.

Dandiprat

or Dandëprat, according to Camden, is a small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII. Applied to a little fellow, it is about equal to our modern expression, a little “twopenny—ha'penny” fellow.

Dando

(A). One who frequents hotels, eating—houses, and other such places, satisfies his appetite, and decamps without payment.

Dandy

A coxcomb; a fop. The feminine of “dandy” is either dandilly or dandizett. Egan says the word was first used in 1813, but examples of the word occur at least one hundred years before that date. (French, dandin, a ninny, a vain, conceited fellow.)

Dandyism

The manners, etc., of a dandy; like a dandy.

Dane's Skin

(A). A freckled skin. Red hair and a freckled skin are the traditional characteristics of Danish blood.

Dangle

A theatrical amateur in Sheridan's Critic. It was designed for Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

Daniel Lambert

weighed 739 lbs. In 1841 eleven young men stood within his waistcoat buttoned. (1770—1809.)

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Danism

Lending money on usury. (Greek, daneisma, a loan.)

Dannebrog

or Danebrog. The old flag of Denmark. The tradition is that Waldemar II. of Denmark saw in the heavens a fiery cross which betokened his victory over the Esthonians (1219). This story is very similar to that of Constantine (q.v.), and of St. Andrew's Cross. (See Andrew, St.)

The order of Danebrog.

The second of the Danish orders. Brog means "cloth" or banner.

Dannocks

Hedging — gloves. A corruption of Tournay, where they were originally manufactured.

Danse

La danse commence la—bas, fighting has broken out yondër.

"Mon Caporal, there is great news: La danse commence la—bas." — Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap. xxv.

A la danse. On the march.

"The regiment was ordered out a la danse There was fresh war in the interior." — Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap.xxv. (See Dance.)

Dansker

A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danskë. Hence Polonius says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris." (Hamlet, ii. 1.)

Dante and Beatrice

— i.e. Beatrice Portinari, who was only eight years old when the poet first saw her. His abiding love for her was chaste as snow and pure as it was tender. Beatrice married a nobleman named Simone de Bardi, and died young, in 1290. Dante married Gemma, of the powerful house of Donati. In the Divina Commedia the poet is conducted first by Virgil (who represents human reason) through hell and purgatory; then by the spirit of Beatrice (who represents the wisdom of faith); and finally by St. Bernard (who represents the wisdom from on high).

Dantesque

(2 syl.). Dante—like — that is, a minute life—like representation of the infernal horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visible form, as in Doré's illustrations of the Inferno.

Daphnaida

An elegy on Douglas Howard, daughter and heiress of Lord Howard. (Spenser, 1591.)

D

Daphne

Daughter of a river—god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favourite tree of the sun—god.

“Nay, lady, sit. If I but wave this wand,

Your nerves are all chain'd up in alabaster, And you a statue, or, as Daphnë was,

Root—bound, that fled Apollo.”

Milton:Comus,

678—681.

Daphnis

A Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry.

Daphnis.

The lover of Chloe in the exquisite Greek pastoral romance of Longos, in the fourth century. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd, and the tale is the basis of St. Pierre's Paul and Virginia.

Dapper

A little, nimble, spruce young clerk in Ben Jonson's Alchemist.

Dapple

The name of Sancho Panza's donkey in Cervantes' romance of Don Quixote. Bailey derives dapple from the Teutonic dapper (streaked or spotted like a pippin). A dapple—grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple—bay is a light bay spotted with bay of a deeper colour. (Icelandic, depill, a spot.)

Darbies

(2 syl.). Handcuffs. This is derived from “Darby and Joan,” because originally two prisoners were linked together as Darby and Joan.

“Hark ye! Jem Clink will fetch you the darbies.” — Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak.

Johnny Darbies, policemen, is a perversion' of the French gensdarmes, in conjunction with the above.

Darby and Joan

A loving, old—fashioned, virtuous couple. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, and the characters are those of John Darby, of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730, and his wife, “As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You might sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom.” Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby.

“Perhaps some day or other we may be Darby and Joan.” — Lord Lytton.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The French equivalent is C'est St. Roch et son chien.

Darbyites

(3 syl.). The Plymouth Brethren are so called on the Continent from Mr. Darby, a barrister, who abandoned himself to the work, and was for years the “organ” of the sect.

Darics

(or) Stateres Darici. Celebrated Persian coins. So called from Darius. They bear on one side the head of the king, and on the other a chariot drawn by mules. Their value is about twenty—five shillings.

Dariolet, Dariolette

(French). An intrigant, a confidant, a go—between, a pander. Originally a dariole meant a little sweetmeat or cake rayed with little bands of paste.

“Dariolette, employé comme un des nombreux synonymes de soubrette, a eu d'abord la mission particulière de designer les suivantes de roman.”— Roland de Villarceaux.

“Mdlle. Vitry, confidente de Mdlle, de Guise, était la dariolette.” — Tallemant, vol. i. p. 125.

Darius

A classic way of spelling Darawesh (king), a Persian title of royalty. Gushtasp or Kishtasp assumed the title of darawesh on ascending the throne, and is the person generally called Darius the Great.

Darius.

Seven princes of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; as the horse of Darius was the first to neigh, Darius was proclaimed king.

Darius,

conquered by Alexander, was Dara, surnamed kuchek (the younger). When Alexander succeeded to the throne, Dara sent to him for the tribute of golden eggs, but the Macedonian returned for answer, “The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Dara must seek them.” The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master's hand. Lastly, Dara sent him a bitter melon, as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the Shah eat his own fruit.

Dark

To keep dark. To lie perdu; to lurk in concealment. (Ang. Sax. deorc.)

“We'd get away to some of the far—out stations ... where we could keep in the dark.” — Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, xvi.

Keep it in the dark.

Keep it a dead secret; don't enlighten anyone about the matter.

D

Dark Ages

The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty.

Dark Continent

(The). Africa, the land of the dark race or darkies.

Dark Horse

(A). A racing term for a horse of good pretensions, but of which nothing is positively known by the general public. Its merits are kept dark from betters and book—makers.

“At last a Liberal candidate has entered the field at Croydon. The Conservatives have kept their candidate back, as a dark horse.” — Newspaper paragraph, January, 1886.

Darkest Hour is that before the Dawn

(The). When Fortune's wheel is lowest, it must turn up again. When things have come to their worst, they must mend. In Latin, Post nubila, Phoebus.

Darky

A negro.

Darley Arabians A breed of English racers, from an Arab stallion introduced by Mr. Darley. This stallion was the sire of the Flying Childers, and great—grandsire of Eclipse.

Daron, Daronne

(French). The sobriquet given, at the present day, by workmen to shopkeepers and cobblers.

“Il étoit maitre de tout, jusqu'à manier l'argent de la daronne.” — Histoire de Guillaume, cocher.

Daronne

The confidant of Elisenne, mother of Amadis, and wife of Perion des Gaules. (Amadis de Gaule.)

Dart

(See Abaris.)

Darwinian Theory

Charles Darwin, grandson of the poet, published in 1859 a work entitled Origin of Species, to prove that the numerous species now existing on the earth sprang originally from one or at most a few primal forms; and that the present diversity is due to special development and natural selection. Those plants and creatures which are best suited to the conditions of their existence survive and become fruitful; certain organs called into play by peculiar conditions of life grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength, till they become so much a part and parcel of their frames as to be transmitted to their offspring. The conditions of life being very diverse, cause a great diversity of organic development, and, of course, every such diversity which has become radical is the parent of a new species. (See Evolution.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dash

in printer's copy. One dash under a word in MS. means that the part so dashed must be printed in italics; two dashes means small capitals; three dashes, large capitals.

Cut a dash.

(See Cut.)

Dash my Wig. Dash my Buttons

Dash is a euphemism for a common oath; and wig, buttons, etc., are relics of a common fashion at one time adopted in comedies and by “mashers” of swearing without using profane language.

Date

Not quite up to date. Said of books somewhat in arrears of the most recent information.

Daughter

Greek, thugater, contracted into thugter; Dutch, dogter; German, tochter; Persian, dochtar; Sanskrit, duhiter; Saxon, dohter; etc.

Daughter of Peneus

(The). The bay—tree is so called because it grows in greatest perfection on the banks of the river Peneus (3 syl.).

Daughter of the Horseleech

One very exigent; one for ever sponging on another. (Prov. xxx. 15.)

“Such and many such like were the morning attendants of the Duke of Buckingham — all genuine descendants of the daughter of the horse—leech, whose cry is ‘Give, give.’” — Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxviii.

Dauphin

The heir of the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. Guy VIII., Count of Vienne, was the first so styled, because he wore a dolphin as his cognisance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Humbert II., de la tour de Pisa, sold his seigneurie, called the Dauphiné, to King Philippe VI. (de Valois), on condition that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the Duc d'Angoulême, son of Charles IX., who renounced the title in 1830.

Grand Dauphin.

Louis, Duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV., for whose use was published the Latin classics entitled Ad Usum Delphini. (1661—1711.)

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Second or Little Dauphin. Louis, son of the Grand Dauphin. (1682—1712.)

Davenport

A kind of small writing—desk with drawers each side, named after the maker.

Davenport

(The Brothers), from America. Two impostors, who professed that spirits would untie them when bound with cords, and even that spirits played all sorts of instruments in a dark cabinet. The imposition was exposed in 1865.

David

in Dryden's satire called Absalom and Achitophel, represents Charles II.; Absalom, his beautiful but rebellious son, represents the Duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the traitorous counsellor, is the Earl of Shaftesbury; Barzillai, the faithful old man who provided the kind sustenance, was the Duke of Ormond; Hushai, who defeated the counsel of Achitophel, was Hyde, Duke of Rochester; Zadok the priest was Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Shimei, who cursed the king in his flight, was Bethel, the lord mayor; etc. etc. (2 Sam. xvii.—xix.)

“Once more the godlike David was restored,

And willing nations knew their lawful lord.” Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, part i.

David (St.)

or Dewid, was son of Xantus, Prince of Cereticu, now called Cardiganshire; he was brought up a priest, became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight, preached to the Britons, confuted Pelagius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon, since called St. David's. He died 544. (See Taffy.)

St. David's

(Wales) was originally called Menevia (i.e. main aw, narrow water or frith). Here St. David received his early education, and when Dyvrig, Archbishop of Caerleon, resigned to him his see, St. David removed the archiepiscopal residence to Menevia, which was henceforth called by his name.

David and Jonathan

Inseparable friends. Similar examples of friendship were Pylades and Orestes (q.v.); Damon and Pythias (q.v.); etc.

“I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan. Very pleasant hast thou been to me. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.” — 2 Sam. i. 26.

Davideis

An epic poem in four books, describing the troubles of King David. (Abraham Cowley [1618—1667].)

There is another sacred poem so called, by Thomas Elwood (1712).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Davus

Davus sum, non Œdipus (I am a plain, simple fellow, and no solver of riddles, like Œdipus). The words are from Terence's Andria, i. 2, 23.

Non te credas Davum ludere.

Don't imagine you are deluding Davus. "Do you see any white in my eye?" I am not such a fool as you think me to be.

Davy

I'll take my davy of it. I'll take my "affidavit" it is true.

Davy (Snuffly). David Wilson. (See Sir Walter Scott, The Antiquary, chap. iii. and note.)

Davy Jones's Locker

He's gone to Davy Jones's locker, i.e. he is dead. Jones is a corruption of Jonah, the prophet, who was thrown into the sea. Locker, in seaman's phrase, means any receptacle for private stores; and duffy is a ghost or spirit among the West Indian negroes. So the whole phrase is, "He is gone to the place of safe keeping, where duffy Jonah was sent to."

"This same Davy Jones, according to the mythology of sailors, is the fiend that presides over all the evil spirits of the deep, and is seen in various shapes ... warning the devoted wretch of death and woe." — Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, xiii.

Davy's Sow

Drunk as Davy's sow. Grose says: One David Lloyd, a Welshman, who kept an ale—house at Hereford, had a sow with six legs, which was an object of great curiosity. One day David's wife, having indulged too freely, lay down in the sty to sleep, and a company coming to see the sow, David led them to the sty, saying, as usual, "There is a sow for you! Did you ever see the like?" One of the visitors replied, "Well, it is the drunkenest sow I ever beheld." Whence the woman was ever after called "Davy's sow." (Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue.)

Dawson

(Bully). A noted London sharper, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars, in the reign of Charles II. (See Jemmy Dawson.)

"Bully Dawson kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson." — Charles Lamb.

Day

When it begins. (1) With sun—set: The Jews in their "sacred year," and the Church — hence the eve of feast—days; the ancient Britons "non dierum numerum, ut nos, sed noctium computant," says Tacitus — hence "se'n—night" and "fortnight;" the Athenians, Chinese, Mahometans, etc., Italians, Austrians, and Bohemians.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(2) With sun—rise: The Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks. (3) With noon: The ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers. (4) With midnight: The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spanish, Portuguese, Americans, etc.

A day after the fair.

Too late; the fair you came to see is over. Day in, day out. All day long.

“Sewing as she did, day in, day out.” — W. R. Wilkins: The Honest Soul.

Every dog has its day. (See under DOG.) I have had my day. My prime of life is over; I have been a man of light and leading, but am now “out of the swim.”

“Old Joe, sir ... was a bit of a favourite ... once; but he has had his day.” — Dickens.

I have lost a day (Perdidi diem) was the exclamation of Titus, the Roman emperor, when on one occasion he could call to mind nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects.

To—day a man, to—morrow a mouse.

In French, “Aujourd'hui roi, demain rien.” Fortune is so fickle that one day we may be at the top of the wheel, and the next day at the bottom.

Day of the Barricades

(See Barricades.)

Day of the Dupes

in French history, was November 11th, 1630, when Marie de Medicis and Gaston Duc d'Orléans extorted from Louis XIII. a promise that he would dismiss his Minister, the Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went in all speed to Versailles, the king repented, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever.

Marie de Medicis and Gaston were the dupes who had to pay dearly for their short triumph.

Day—dream

A dream of the imagination when the eyes are awake.

Daylight

in drinking bumpers, means that the wine—glass is not full to the brim; between the wine and the rim of the wine—glass light may be seen. Toast—masters used to cry out, “Gentlemen, no daylights nor heeltaps” — the heeltap being a little wine left at the bottom of the glass. The glass must be filled to the brim, and every drop of it must be drunk.

Daylights

The eyes, which let daylight into the sensorium.

To darken one's daylights.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To give one such a blow on the eyes with the fist as to prevent seeing. (Pugilistic slang.)

Days set apart as Sabbaths

Sunday by Christians; Monday by the Greeks; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Turks; Saturday by the Jews.

Christians worship God on Sunday.

Grecian zealots hallow Monday,

Tuesday Persians spend in prayer,

Assyrians Wednesday revere,

Egyptians Thursday, Friday Turks,

On Saturday no Hebrew works. E. C. B.

Daysman

An umpire, judge, or intercessor. The word is dais—man (a man who sits on the daïs); a sort of lit de justice. Hence Piers Ploughman —

“And at the day of doom

At the height Deys sit.”

Dayspring

The dawn: the commencement of the Messiah's reign.

“The dayspring from on high hath visited us.” — Luke i.78.

Daystar

(The). The morning star. Hence the emblem of hope or better prospects.

“Again o'er the vine—covered regions of France,

See the day—star of Liberty rise.”

Wilson: Noctes

(Jan., 1831, vol. iv. p. 231).

De Bonne Grace

(French). Willingly; with good grace.

De Die in Diem

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

From day to day continuously, till the business is completed.

“The Ministry have elected to go on de die in diem.” — Newspaper paragraph, December, 1885.

De Facto

Actually, in reality; in opposition to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was so de jure.

De Haut en Bas

Superciliously.

“She used to treat him a little de haut en bas.” — C.Reade.

But Du haut en bas. From top to bottom.

De Jure

(Latin). By right, rightfully, lawfully, according to the law of the land. Thus a legal axiom says: “De jure Judices, de facto Juratores, respondent” (Judges look to the law, juries to the facts).

De Lunatico Inquirendo

(Latin). A writ issued to inquire into the state of a person's mind, whether it is sound or not. If not of sound mind, the person is called non compos, and is committed to proper guardians.

De Mortuis Nil Nisi Bonum

Of the dead speak kindly or not at all.

De Nihilo Nihil Fit

(Latin). You cannot make anything out of nothing.

De Novo

(Latin). Afresh; over again from the beginning.

De Profundis

[Out of the depths]. The 130th Psalm is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It is sung by Roman Catholics when the dead are committed to the grave.

De Rigueur

Strictly speaking, quite comme il faut, in the height of fashion.

De Trop

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(French). Supererogatory, more than enough. Rien de trop, let nothing be in excess. Preserve in all things the golden mean. Also “one too many,” in the way; when a person's presence is not wished for, that person is de trop.

Dead

Dead as a door—nail. The door—nail is the plate or knob on which the knocker or hammer strikes. As this nail is knocked on the head several times a day, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it.

“Come thou and thy five men, and if I do not leave you all as dead as a door—nail, I pray God I may never eat grass more.” —Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iv. 10. (Jack Cade.)

“Falstaff. What! is the old king dead?”

Pistol.

As nail in door.” Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 3.

Dead as a herring.

(See Herring.)

Dead

He is dead. “Gone to the world of light.” “Joined the majority.”

The wind is dead against us.

Directly opposed to our direction. Instead of making the ship more lively, its tendency is quite the contrary. It makes a “dead set” at our progress.

Dead

Let the dead bury the dead. Let bygones be bygones. Don't rake up old and dead grievances.

“Let me entreat you to let the dead bury the dead, to cast behind you every recollection of bygone evils, and to cherish, to love, to sustain one another through all the vicissitudes of human affairs in the times that are to come.” — Gladstone: Home Rule Bill (February 13th, 1893).

Dead Drunk

So intoxicated as to be wholly powerless.

“Pythagoras has finely observed that a man is not to be considered dead drunk till he lies on the floor and stretches out his arms and legs to prevent his going lower.” — S. Warren.

Dead—eye

in nautical phrase, is a block of wood with three holes through it, for the lanyards of rigging to reeve through, without sheaves, and with a groove round it for an iron strap. (Dana: Seaman's Manual, p. 92.) The holes are eyes, but they are dead eyes.

Dead—flat

Dead Freight That part of a cargo which does not belong to the freight. Dead freight is not counted in the freight, and when the cargo is delivered is not to be reckoned.

Dead Hand

(A). A first—rate. One that would dead—beat. (See Mortmain.)

“First—rate work it was too; he was always a dead hand at splitting.” — Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, xv.

Dead—heads

in theatrical language, means those admitted by orders without payment. They count for nothing. In the United States, persons who receive something of value for which the taxpayer has to pay. In nautical language, a log floating so low in the water that only a small part of it is visible.

Dead Heat

A race to be run again between two horses that have “tied.” A heat is that part of a race run without stopping. One, two, or more heats make a race. A dead heat is a heat which goes for nothing.

Dead Horse

Flogging a dead horse. Attempting to revive a question already settled. John Bright used the phrase in the House of Commons.

Working for a dead horse.

Working for wages already paid.

Dead Languages

Languages no longer spoken.

Dead Letter

A written document of no value; a law no longer acted upon. Also a letter which lies buried in the post—office because the address is incorrect, or the person addressed cannot be found.

Dead—letter Office

(The). A department in the post—office where unclaimed letters are kept. (See above.)

Dead Lift

I am at a dead lift. In a strait or difficulty where I greatly need help; a hopeless exigency. A dead lift is the lifting of a dead or inactive body, which must be done by sheer force.

Dead Lights

Strong wooden shutters to close the cabin windows of a ship; they deaden or kill the daylight.

To ship the dead lights.

To draw the shutter over the cabin window; to keep out the sea when a gale is expected.

Dead Lock

A lock which has no spring catch. Metaphorically, a state of things so entangled that there seems to be no practical solution.

“Things are at a dead—lock.” — The Times.

Dead Men

Empty bottles. Down among the dead men let me lie. Let me get so intoxicated as to slip from my chair, and lie under the table with the empty bottles. The expression is a witticism on the word spirit. Spirit means life, and also alcohol (the spirit of full bottles); when the spirit is out the man is dead, and when the bottle is empty its spirit is departed. Also, a loaf of bread smuggled into the basket for the private use of the person who carries the bread out is called a “dead man.”

Dead Men's Shoes

Waiting for dead men's shoes. Looking out for legacies; looking to stand in the place of some moneyed man when he is dead and buried.

Dead Pan

(The). A poem founded on the tradition that at the crucifixion a cry swept across the ocean in the hearing of many, “Great Pan is Dead,” and that at the same time the responses of the oracles ceased for ever. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has a poem so called (1844).

Dead Reckoning A calculation of the ship's place without any observation of the heavenly bodies. A guess made by consulting the log, the time, the direction, the wind, and so on. Such a calculation may suffice for many practical purposes, but must not be fully relied on.

Dead Ropes

Those which are fixed or do not run on blocks; so called because they have no activity or life in them.

Dead Sea

So the Romans called the “Salt Sea.” Josephus says that the vale of Siddim was changed into the Dead Sea at the destruction of Sodom (Antiq. i. 8, 3, etc.). The water is of a dull green colour. Few fish are found therein, but it is not true that birds which venture near its vapours fall down dead. The shores are almost barren, but hyenas and other wild beasts lurk there. Called the “Salt Sea” because of its saltiness. The percentage of salt in the ocean generally is about three or four, but of the Salt Sea it is twenty—six or more.

Dead—Sea Fruit

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Fair to the eye, but nauseous to the taste; full of promise, but without reality. (See Apples Of Sodom.)

Dead Set

He made a dead set at her. A pointed or decided determination to bring matters to a crisis. The allusion is to a setter dog that has discovered game, and makes a dead set at it.

To be at a dead set is to be set fast, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery. To make a dead set upon someone is to attack him resolutely, to set upon him; the allusion being to dogs, bulls, etc., set on each other to fight.

Dead Shares

In theatrical sharing companies three or more supernumerary shares are so called. The manager has one or more of these shares for his expenses; a star will have another; and sometimes a share, or part of a share, is given to an actor who has brought down the house, or made a hit.

Dead Water

The eddy—water closing in with the ship's stern, as she passes through the water. It shifts its place, but is like taking money from one pocket and putting it into another.

Dead Weight

The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. (See Dead Lift.)

Dead Wind

(A). A wind directly opposed to a ship's course; a wind dead ahead.

Dead Wood

in shipbuilding. Blocks of timber laid on the ship's keel. This is no part of the ship, but it serves to make the keel more rigid.

Dead Works

in theology. Such works as do not earn salvation, or even assist in obtaining it. For such a purpose their value is nil. (Heb. ix. 14.)

Deaf

Deaf as an adder. (See below, Deaf adder.)

Deaf as a post.

Quite deaf; or so inattentive as not to hear what is said. One might as well speak to a gate—post or log of wood.

Deaf as a white cat.

It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid. None so deaf as those who won't hear. The French have the same locution: "Il n'y a de pire sourd que celui qui ne veut pas entendre."

Deaf Adder

"The deaf adder stoppeth her ears, and will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely" (Psalm lviii. 4, 5). Captain Bruce says, "If a viper enters the house, the charmer is sent for, who entices the serpent, and puts it into a bag. I have seen poisonous vipers twist round the bodies of these psylli in all directions, without having their fangs extracted." According to tradition, the asp stops its ears when the charmer utters his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other. In the United States the copperhead is so called.

Deal

A portion. "A tenth deal of flour." (Exodus xxix. 40.) (German, theil; Anglo—Saxon, dael verb, daelan, to share; Irish, dail; English, dole.)

To deal the cards

is to give each his dole or portion.

Deal—fish

So called because of some fancied resemblance to a deal—board, from its length and thinness.

Dean

(the Latin Decanus). The chief over ten prebends or canons.

The Dean (Il Piovano)

. Arlotto, the Italian humorist. (1395—1483.) Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick. (1667—1745.)

Deans

(Effie), in Scott's Heart of Midlothian, is Helen Walker. She is abandoned by her lover, Geordie Robertson [Staunton], and condemned for child—murder.

Jeanie Deans.

Half—sister of Effie Deans, who walks all the way to London to plead for her sister. She is a model of good sense, strong affection, and disinterested heroism. (See Walker.)

"We follow Pilgrim through his progress with an interest not inferior to that, with which we follow Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow, and Jeanie Deans from Edinburgh to London." — Lord Macaulay.

Dear

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Oh, dear me! Regarded, but without evidence, as a corruption of the Italian O Dio mio!

Dear Bought and Far Brought or Dear bought and far felt. A gentle reproof for some extravagant purchase of luxury.

Dearest

Most hateful, as dearest foe. The word dear, meaning “beloved,” is the Saxon deor (dear, rare); but dear, “hateful,” is the Anglo—Saxon derian (to hurt), Scotch dere (to annoy).

“Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,

Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i.2.

Death

according to Milton, is twin—keeper with Sin, of Hell—gate.

“The other shape (if shape it might be called that shape had none Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb;

Or substance might be called that shadow seemed;) ...

The likeness of a kingly crown had on.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

ii. 666 — 673.

Death.

(See Black Death.)

Death stands, like Mercuries, in every way.

(See Mercury.)

Till death us do part. (See Depart.) Angel of Death. (See Abou—Jahia, Azrael.) At death's door. On the point of death; very dangerously ill. In at the death. Present when the fox was caught and killed.

Death and Doctor Hornbook

Doctor Hornbook was John Wilson the apothecary, whom the poet met at the Torbolton Masonic Lodge. (Burns.)

Death from Strange Causes

Æschylus was killed by the fall of a tortoise on his bald head from the claws of an eagle in the air. (Valerius Maximus, ix. 12, and Pliny: History, vii. 7.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Agathocles

(4 syl.), tyrant of Sicily, was killed by a toothpick at the age of ninety—five. Anacreon was choked by a grapestone. (Pliny: History, vii. 7.)

Bassus (Quintus Lucanus)

died from the prick of a needle in his left thumb. Chalchas, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of having outlived the predicted hour of his death. Charles VIII., of France, conducting his queen into a tennis—court, struck his head against the lintel, and it caused his death.

Fabius,

the Roman praetor, was choked by a single goat—hair in the milk which he was drinking. (Pliny: History, vii. 7.)

Frederick Lewis,

Prince of Wales, died from the blow of a cricket—ball. Gallus (Cornelius), the praetor, and Titus Haterius, a knight, each died while kissing the hand of his wife. Gabrielle (La belle), the mistress of Henri IV., died from eating an orange.

Itadach

died of thirst in the harvest—field because (in observance of the rule of St. Patrick) he refused to drink a drop of anything.

Lepidus (Quintus Æm'ilius), going out of his house, struck his great toe against the threshold and expired. Louis VI. met with his death from a pig running under his horse and causing it to stumble.

Margutte

died of laughter on seeing a monkey trying to pull on a pair of boots. Otway, the poet, in a starving condition, had a guinea given him, on which he bought a loaf of bread, and died while swallowing the first mouthful.

Pamphilius (Cneius Babius),

a man of praetorian rank, died while asking a boy what o'clock it was. Philomenes (4 syl.) died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert. (Valerius Maximus.)

Placut (Phillipot)

dropped down dead while in the act of paying a bill. (Bacaberry the Elder.) Quenelault, a Norman physician, of Montpellier, died from a slight wound made in his hand in extracting a splinter.

Saufeius (Appius)

was choked to death supping up the white of an under—boiled egg. (Pliny: History, vii.)

33.)

Torquatus (Aulus Manlius),

a gentleman of consular rank, died in the act of taking a cheesecake at dinner. Valla (Lucius Tuscus), the physician, died in the act of taking a draught of medicine.

William III.

died from his horse stumbling over a mole—hill.

Zeuxis,

the great painter, died of laughter at sight of a hag which he had just depicted. It will be observed that four of the list died of laughter. No doubt the reader will be able to add other examples.

Death in the Pot

During a dearth in Gilgal, there was made for the sons of the prophets a pottage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When the sons of the prophets tasted the pottage, they cried out, "There is death in the pot." Then Elisha put into it some meal, and its poisonous qualities were counteracted. (2 Kings

iv. 40.)

Death under Shield

Death in battle.

"Her imagination had been familiarised with wild and bloody events ... and had been trained up to consider an honourable `death under shield' (as that in a field of battle was termed) a desirable termination to the life of a warrior." — Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 6.

Death—bell

A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scotch peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

"O lady, `tis dark, an' I heard the death—bell,

An' I darena gae yonder for gowd nor fee." James Hogg: Mountain Bard.

Death—meal

(A). A funeral banquet.

"Death—meals, as they were termed, were spread in honour of the deceased." — Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 7.

Death—watch

Any species of Anobium, a genus of wood—boring beetles that make a clicking sound, once supposed to presage death.

Death's Head

Bawds and procuresses used to wear a ring bearing the impression of a death's head in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Allusions not uncommon in plays of the period.

“Sell some of my cloaths to buy thee a death's—head, and put [it] upon thy middle finger. Your least considering bawds do so much.” — Messenger: Old Laws, iv. 1.

Death's Head on a Mopstick

A thin, sickly person, a mere anatomy, is so called. When practical jokes were more common it was by no means unusual to mount on a mopstick a turnip with holes for eyes, and a candle inside, to scare travellers at night time.

Deaths—man

An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

“Great Hector's deaths—man.”

Heywood: Iron Age.

Debateable Land

A tract of land between the Esk and Sark, claimed by both England and Scotland, and for a long time the subject of dispute. This tract of land was the hotbed of thieves and vagabonds.

Debon

One of the heroes who accompanied Brute to Britain. According to British fable, Devonshire is the county or share of Debon. (See Devonshire.)

Debonair'

[Le Débonnaire]. Louis I. of France, sometimes called in English The Meek, son and successor of Charlemagne; a man of courteous manners, cheerful temper, but effeminate and deficient in moral energy.

(778, 814—840.)

Debris

The débris of an army. The remnants of a routed army. Débris means the fragments of a worn—down rock. It is a geological term (débriser, to break down).

Debt of Nature

To pay the debt of Nature. To die. Life is a loan, not a gift, and the debt is paid off by death.

“The slender debt to Nature's quickly paid.”

Quarles: Emblems.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Decameron A volume of tales related in ten days (Greek, deka, hemera), as the Decameron of Boccaccio, which contains one hundred tales related in ten days.

Decamp

He decamped in the middle of the night. Left without paying his debts. A military term from the Latin de—campus (from the field); French, décamper, to march away.

Decaniller

To be off, to decamp, to escape. A curious instance of argot. Canille is old French for chenille, a pupa, imago, or chrysalis. These afterwards become winged insects and take their flight. So a visitor says in France, "Il faut me sauver," or "Il faut decaniller." I must be off.

December

(Latin, the tenth month.) So it was when the year began in March with the vernal equinox; but since January and February have been inserted before it, the term is quite incorrect.

Deception

"Doubtless the pleasure is as great

Of being cheated as to cheat:

As lookers—on feel most delight

That least perceive a juggler's sleight,

And still the less they understand,

The more they admire his sleight of hand." Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Decide

(2 syl.) means "to knock out." Several things being set before a person, he eliminates all but one, which he selects as his choice. A decided man is one who quickly eliminates every idea but the one he intends to adhere to.

Decimo

A man in decimo — i.e. a hobby—de—hoy. Jonson uses the phrase in decimo—sexto.

Deck

A pack of cards, or that part of the pack which is left after the hands have been dealt.

"But whilst he thought to steal the single`ten,'

The `king' was slyly fingered from the deck." Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., v. 1.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To sweep the deck.

To clear off all the stakes. (See above.) To deck is to decorate or adorn. (Anglo—Saxon, decan; Dutch, dekken, to cover.)

“I thought thy bride—bed to have decked, sweet maid,

And not have strewed thy grave.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet,

v. 1.

Clear the decks — i.e.

get out of the way; your room is better than your company; I am going to be busy. A sea term. Decks are cleared before action.

Decking Churches

Isaiah (lx. 13) says: “The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir—tree, the pine—tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary.” The “glory of Lebanon” is the cedar—tree. These are not the evergreens mainly used in church decorations. At Christmas the holly is chiefly used, though those mentioned by Isaiah abound.

Decollete

[da—coal—ta]. Nothing even décolleté should be uttered before ladies — i.e. bearing the least semblance to a double entendre. Décolleté is the French for a “dress cut low about the bosom.”

Decoration Day May 30th; set apart in the United States for decorating the graves of those who fell in the “War of the Union” (1861—5).

Decoy Duck

A bait or lure; a duck taught to allure others into a net, and employed for this purpose.

Decrepit

Unable to make a noise. It refers rather to the mute voice and silent footstep of old age than to its broken strength. (Latin, de—crepo.)

Decuman Gate

The gate where the 10th cohorts of the legions were posted. It was opposite the Praetorian gate, and farthest from the enemy. (Latin, decem, ten.)

Dedalian

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Intricate; variegated. So called from Dædalos who made the Cretan labyrinth.

Dedlock

(Sir Leicester). An honourable and truthful gentleman, but of such fossilised ideas that no “tongue of man” could shake his prejudices. (Charles Dickens: Bleak House.)

Dee

— i.e. D for a detective. Look sharp! the dees are about.

Dee

(Dr. John). A man of vast knowledge, whose library, museum, and mathematical instruments were valued at pound £2,000. On one occasion the populace broke into his house and destroyed the greater part of his valuable collection, under the notion that Dee held intercourse with the devil. He ultimately died a pauper, at the advanced age of eighty—one, and was buried at Mortlake. He professed to be able to raise the dead, and had a magic mirror, afterwards in Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill (1527—1608).

Dee's speculum or mirror, in which persons were told they could see their friends in distant lands and how they were occupied. It is a piece of solid pink—tinted glass about the size of an orange. It is now in the British Museum.

Dee Mills

If you had the rent of Dee Mills, you would spend it all. Dee Mills, in Cheshire, used to yield a very large annual rent. (Cheshire proverb.)

“There was a jolly miller

Lived on the river Dee;

He worked and sung from morn to night;— No lark so blithe as he;

And this the burden of his song

For ever used to be —

I care for nobody, no, not I

If nobody cares for me.’ “

Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Deer

Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears, but an oily secretion from the so—called tear—pits.

“A poor sequestered stag ...

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Did come to languish ... and the big round tears Coursed one another down his innocent nose In piteous chase.”

Shakespeare: As You Like It,

ii. 2.

Small deer.

Any small animal; and used metaphorically for any collection of trifles or trifling matters.

“But mice and rats, and such small deer,

Have been Tom's food for seven long year.” Shakespeare: Lear, iii.4.

Deerslayer

The hero of a novel so called, by F. Cooper. He is the beau—ideal of a man without cultivation — honourable in sentiment, truthful, and brave as a lion; pure of heart, and without reproach in conduct. The character appears, under different names, in five novels — The Deerslayer, The Pathfinder, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. (See Natty Bumppo.)

Dees

(The). (See above Dee .)

Deev—Binder

Tamnuras, King of Persia, who defeated the Deev king and the fierce Demrush, but was slain by Houndkonz, another powerful Deev.

Default

Judgment by default is when the defendant does not appear in court on the day appointed. The judge gives sentence in favour of the plaintiff, not because the plaintiff is right, but from the default of the defendant.

Defeat

“What though the field be lost? all is not lost.” (Milton: Paradise Lost, i, line 105—6.) “All is lost but honour” (Tout est perdu, madame, fors l'honneur) is what François I. is said to have written to his mother, after the Battle of Pavia in 1525.

Defeat

There is a somewhat strange connection between de—feat and de—feature. Defeat is the French de—fait, un—made or un—done, Latin, de—factus (defectus, our “defect”); and feature is the Norman faiture, Latin factura, the make—up, frame, or form. Hence old writers have used the word “defeat” to mean disfigure or spoil the form.

“Defeat thy favour [face] with an usurped beard.” —Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Defender of the Faith

A title given by Pope Leo X. to Henry VIII. of England, in 1521, for a Latin treatise On the Seven Sacraments. Many previous kings, and even subjects, had been termed “defenders of the Catholic faith,” “defenders of the Church,” and so on, but no one had borne it as a title. The sovereign of Spain is entitled Catholic, and of France Most Christian.

“God bless the king! I mean the `faith's defender! ’

God bless — no harm in blessing the Pretender. But who Pretender is, or who is king—

God bless us all! that's quite another thing.”

John Byron: Shorthand Writer.

Richard II., in a writ to the sheriffs, uses these words: “Ecclesia cujus nos defensor sumus,” and Henry VII., in the Black Book, is called “Defender of the Faith;” but the pope gave the title to Henry VIII., and from that time to this it has been perpetuated. (See Graceless Florin.)

Deficit

(Madame). Marie Antoinette. So called because she was always demanding money of her ministers, and never had any. According to the Revolutionary song:

“La Boulangère a des ecus

Qui ne lui content guère.”

(See Baker.)

Degenerate (4 syl.) is to be worse than the parent stock. (Latin, de genus.)

Dei Gratia

By God's grace. Introduced into English charters in 1106; as much as to say, “dei non hominum gratia,” by divine right and not man's appointment. The archbishops of Canterbury from 676 to 1170 assumed the same style.

From the time of Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 780), we find occasionally the same or some similar assumption as, Dei dono, Christo donante, etc. The Archbishop of Canterbury is now divina providentia.

Dei Gratia omitted on a florin. (See Graceless Florin.)

Dei Judicium

(Latin). The judgment of God; so the judgment by ordeals was called, because it was supposed that God would deal rightly with the appellants.

Deianira

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Wife of Hercules, and the inadvertent cause of his death. Nessos told her that anyone to whom she gave a shirt steeped in his blood, would love her with undying love; she gave it to her husband, and it caused him such agony that he burnt himself to death on a funeral pile. Deianira killed herself for grief.

Deiphobus

(4 syl.). One of the sons of Priam, and, next to Hector, the bravest and boldest of all the Trojans. On the death of his brother Paris, he married Helen; but Helen betrayed him to her first husband, Menelaos, who slew him. (Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Æneid.)

Deities

Air: Ariel, Elves (singular, Elf). Caves or Caverns: Hill—people (Hög—folk, hög = height). Corn: Ceres (2 syl.) (Greek, Demeter).

Domestic Life:

Vesta.

Eloquence:

Mercury (Greek, Hermes). Evening: Vesper.

Fates (The):

Three in number (Greek, Parcæ, Moiræ, 2 syl., Keres). Fire: Vulcan (Greek, Hephaistos, 3 syl.), Vesta, Mulciber. Fairies: (q.v.).

Furies:

Three in number (Greek, Eumenides, 4 syl., Erinnyes) Gardens: Priapus, Vertumnus with his wife Pomona. Graces (The): Three in number (Greek, Charites).

Hills:

Trolls. There are also Wood Trolls and Water Trolls. (See below Mountains.) Home Spirits (q.v.): Penates (3 syl.), Lares (2 syl.).

Hunting:

Diana (Greek, Artemis). Infernal Regions: Pluto, with his wife Proserpine, 3 syl. (Greek, Aides and Persephone). Justice: Themis, Astræa, Nemesis.

Love:

Cupid (Greek, Eros). Marriage: Hymen. Medicine: Æsculapius. Mines: Trolls.

Morning:

Aurora (Greek, Eos). Mountains: Oreads or Oreades (4 syl.), from the Greek, oros a mountain; Trolls. Ocean (The): Oceanides.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Poetry

and Music: Apollo, the nine Muses. Rainbow (The): Iris.

Riches:

Plutus. Shakespeare speaks of "Plutus' mine," (Julius Caesar, iv. 3). Rivers and Streams: Fluviales, 4 syl. (Greek, Potameides, 5 syl.).

Sea (The):

Neptune (Greek, Poseidon, 3 syl.), his son Triton, Necks, Mermaids, Nereids (3 syl.). (See Sea.) Shepherds and their Flocks: Pan, the Satyrs.

Springs, Lakes, Brooks, etc.: Nereides or Naiads (2 syl.). Time: Saturn (Greek, Chronos).

War:

Mars (Greek, Ares), Bellona, Thor. Water—nymphs: Naiads (2 syl.), Undine (2 syl.). Winds (The): Æolus.

Wine:

Bacchus (Greek, Dionysos).

Wisdom:

Minerva (Greek, Pallas, Athene or Pallas—Athene). Woods: Dryads (A Hama—Dryad presides over some particular tree), Wood—Trolls. Youth: Hebe

Of course this is not meant for a complete list of heathen and pagan deities. Such a list would require a volume.

Dejeuner a la Fourchette

(French). Breakfast with forks; a cold collation; a breakfast in the middle of the day, with meat and wine; a lunch.

Delaware

U.S. America, was granted by charter in 1701 to Lord De la Ware, who first explored the bay into which the river empties itself.

Delectable Mountains

(The), in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, are a range of mountains from which the "Celestial City" may be seen. They are in Immanuel's land, and are covered with sheep, for which Immanuel had died.

Delf

or more correctly Delft. A common sort of pottery made at Delft in Holland, about 1310.

Delia

of Pope's line, "Slander or poison dread from Delia's rage," was Lady Deloraine, who married W. Windam of Carsham, and died 1744. The person said to have been poisoned was Miss Mackenzie. (Satires and Epistles, i. 81.)

Delia is not better known to our yard—dog — i.e.

the person is so intimate and well known that the yard—dog will not bark at his approach. It is from Virgil, who makes his shepherd Menalcas boast "That his sweetheart is as well known to his dog as Delia the shepherdess." (Eclogues, iii. 67.)

Delias

The sacred vessel made by Theseus (2 syl.) and sent annually from Athens to Delos. This annual festival lasted 30 days, during which no Athenian could be put to death, and as Socrates was condemned during this period his death was deferred till the return of the sacred vessel. The ship had been so often repaired that not a stick of the original vessel remained at the time, yet was it the identical ship. So the body changes from infancy to old age, and though no single particle remains constant, yet the man 6 feet high is identical with his infant body a span long. (Sometimes called Theoris.)

Delight

is "to make light." Hence Shakespeare speaks of the disembodied soul as "the delighted spirit ... blown with restless violence round about the pendant world" (Measure for Measure, iii. 1). So again he says of gifts, "the more delayed; delighted" (Cymbeline, v. 5), meaning the longer they are delayed the "lighter" or less valuable they are esteemed. Delighted, in the sense of "pleased," means light—hearted, with buoyant spirits.

The delight of mankind.

So Titus, the Roman emperor, was entitled (40, 79—81).

Delirium

From the Latin lira (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de—lirare, to make an irregular ridge or balk in ploughing. Delirus is one whose mind is not properly tilled or cultivated, a person of irregular intellect; and delirium is the state of a person whose mental faculties are like a field full of balks or irregularities. (See Prevarication.)

Della Cruscans or Della Cruscan School. So called from Crusca, the Florentine academy. The name is applied to a school of poetry started by some young Englishmen at Florence in the latter part of the eighteenth century. These silly, sentimental affectations, which appeared in the World and the Oracle, created for a time quite a furor. The whole affair was mercilessly gibbeted in the Baviad and Mæviad of Gifford. (Academia della Crusca literally means, the Academy of Chaff, and its object was to sift the chaff from the Italian language, or to purify it.)

Delmonico

The great American cuisinier, of New York.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The table service is of heavy silver, French cut glasses, and handsome china; and the meals are worthy of Delmonico.” — The Oracle, August 2nd 1884, p. 495.

Delos

A floating island ultimately made fast to the bottom of the sea by Poseidon (Neptune). Apollo having become possessor of it by exchange, made it his favourite retreat. It is one of the Cyclades.

Delphi

or Delphos. A town of Phocis, famous for a temple of Apollo and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. So called from its twin peaks, which the Greeks called brothers (adelphoi).

Delphin Classics

A set of Latin classics edited in France by thirty—nine scholars, under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use of the son of Louis XIV., called the Grand Dauphin. Their chief value consists in their verbal indexes or concordances.

Delta

The island formed at the mouth of a river, which usually assumes a triangular form, like the Greek letter (Δ) called delta; as the delta of the Nile, the delta of the Danube, Rhine, Ganges, Indus, Niger, Mississippi, Po, and so on.

Deluge

After me the Deluge [”Après moi le Déluge “]. When I am dead the deluge may come for aught I care. Generally ascribed to Prince Metternich, but the Prince borrowed it from Mme. Pompadour, who laughed off all the remonstrances of ministers at her extravagance by saying, “Après nous le déluge” (Ruin, if you like, when we are dead and gone).

Deluges

(3 syl.). The chief, besides that recorded in the Bible, are the following: — The deluge of Fohi, the Chinese; the Satyavrata, of the Indians; the Xisuthrus, of the Assyrians; the Mexican deluge; and the Greek deluges of Deucalion and Ogyges.

The most celebrated painting of Noah's Flood is by Poussin, in Paris; and that by Raphael is in the Vatican (Rome).

Demerit

has reversed its original meaning (Latin, demereo, to merit, to deserve). Hence Plautus, Demertas dare laudas (to accord due praise); Ovid, Numina culta demeruisse; Livy, demereri beneficio civitatem. The de — is intensive, as in “de—mand,” “de—scribe,” “de—claim,” etc.; not the privative deorsum, as in the word

“de—fame.”

“My demerits [deserts]

May speak unbonneted.”

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 2.

Demijohn

(A). A glass vessel with a large body and small neck, enclosed in wickerwork like a Florence flask, and containing more than a bottle. (French, dame—jeanne, “Madam Jane,” a corruption of Damaghan, a town in Persia famous for its glass works.)

Demi—monde Lorettes, courtezans. Le beau monde means “fashionable society,” and demi—monde the society only half acknowledged.

“Demi—monde implies not only recognition and a status, but a certain social standing.” — Saturday Review.

Demi—rep

A woman whose character has been blown upon. Contraction of demi—reputation.

Demiurge

(3 syl.), in the language of Platonists, means that mysterious agent which made the world and all that it contains. The Logos or Word spoken of by St. John, in the first chapter of his gospel, is the Demiurgus of Platonising Christians. In the Gnostic systems, Jehovah (as an eon or emanation of the Supreme Being) is the Demiurge.

“The power is not that of an absolute cause, but only a world—maker, a demiurge; and this does not answer to the human idea of deity.” — Winchell: Science and Religion, chap. x.

p.295.

Demobilisation

of troops. The disorganisation of them, the disarming of them. This is a French military term. To “mobilise” troops is to render them liable to be moved on service out of their quarters; to “demobilise” them is to send them home, so that they cannot be moved from their quarters against anyone. To change from a war to a peace footing.

Democracy

A Republican form of government, a commonwealth. (Greek, demos—kratia, the rule of the people.)

Democritus

The laughing philosopher of Abdera. He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people's folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes that he might think more deeply.

“Democritus, dear droll, revisit earth,

And with our follies glut thy heightened mirth.” Prior.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Democritus Junior. Robert Burton, author of The Anatomy of Melancholy (1576—1640).

Demodocos

A minstrel who, according to Homer, sang the amours of Mars and Venus in the court of Alcin'oös while Ulysses was a guest there.

Demogorgon

A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. Hence Milton speaks of “the dreaded name of Demogorgon” (Paradise Lost, ii. 965). This tyrant king of the elves and fays lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. Spenser (book iv. 2) says, “He dwells in the deep abyss where the three fatal sisters dwell.” (Greek daimon, demon; gorgos, terrible.)

“Must I call your master to my aid,

At whose dread name the trembling furies quake, Hell stands abashed, and earth's foundations shake?” Rowe: Lucan's Pharsalia, vi.

“When the morn arises none are found,

For cruel Demogorgon walks his round,

And if he finds a fairy lag in light,

He drives the wretch before, and lashes into night.” Dryden: The Flower and the Leaf, 492—5.

Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness

Asmodeus, who slew the seven husbands of Sara. (Tobit.) (See Asmodaëus.)

Prince of Demons.

Asmodeus. (Talmud.)

Demos

(King). The electorate; the proletariat. Not the mob, but those who choose and elect our senators, and are therefore the virtual rulers of the nation.

Demosthenes' Lantern

A choragic monument erected by Lysicrates in Athens, originally surmounted by the tripod won by Lysicrates. A “tripod” was awarded to everyone in Athens who produced the best drama or choral piece of his tribe. The street in which Demosthenes' Lantern stood was full of these tripods.

Demurrage

An allowance made to the master or owners of a ship by the freighters for detaining her in port longer than the time agreed upon. (Latin, demorari, to delay.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The extra days beyond the lay days ... are called days of demurrage.” — Kent: Commentaries, vol. iii. part v. lecture xlvii. p. 159.

Demy'

A size of paper between royal and crown. Its size is 22 1/2 in. x 17 1/2 in. It is from the French word demi (half), and means demi—royal (a small royal), royal being 25 in. x 20 in. The old watermark is a fleur—de—lis.

A Demy'

of Magdalene College, Oxford, is a “superior” sort of scholar, half a Fellow.

Den Evening. God ye good den! — i.e. God (give) ye good evening. This is the final d of good joined to the “en,” a contraction of evening.

Denarius

A Roman silver coin, equal in value to ten ases (deni—ases). The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins, whether silver or copper, and for ready money generally. Now d (denarius) stands for money less than a shilling, as £ s. d.

“The denarius ... shown to our Lord ... was the tribute—money payable by the Jews to the Roman emperor, and must not be confounded with the tribute paid to the Temple.” — F. H. Madden: Jewish Coinage, chap. xi. p. 247.

Denarius Dei

[God's penny]. An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the church or poor. Denarii St. Petri [Peter's pence]. One penny from each family, given to the Pope.

Denarius tertius comitatus.

One—third of the pence of the county, which was paid to the earl. The other two—thirds belonged to the Crown. (See D.)

Denizen

A made citizen — i.e. an alien who has been naturalised by letters patent. (Old French deinzein; Latin de—intus, from within.)

“A denizen is a kind of middle state, between an alien and a natural—born subject, and partakes of both.” — Blackstone: Commentaries, book i. chap. x. p. 374.

Dennis

(John), called the “best abused man in England.” Swift and Pope both satirised him. He is called Zoilus.

Denouement

(3 syl.). The untying of a plot; the winding—up of a novel or play. (French dénouer, to untie.)

D

Denys

(St.), according to tradition, carried his head, after martyrdom, for six miles, and then deliberately laid it down on the spot where stands the present cathedral bearing his name. This absurd tale took its rise from an ancient painting, in which the artist, to represent the martyrdom of the bishop, drew a headless body; but, in order that the trunk might be recognised, placed the head in front, between the martyr's hands.

Sir Denys Brand,

in Crabbe's Borough, is a country magnate who apes humility. He rides on a sorry brown pony "not worth £5," but mounts his lackey on a racehorse, "twice victor for a plate." Sir Denys Brand is the type of a character by no means uncommon.

Deo Gratias

(Latin). Thanks to God.

Deo Juvante

(Latin). With God's help.

Deo, non Fortuna

(Latin). From God, not from mere luck; [I attribute it] to God and not to blind chance.

Deo Volente

contracted into D. V. (Latin). God being willing; by God's will.

Deodand

means something "given to God" (deo—dandum). This was the case when a man met with his death through injuries inflicted by some chattel, as by the fall of a ladder, the toss of a bull, or the kick of a horse. In such cases the cause of death was sold, and the proceeds given to the Church. The custom was based on the doctrine of purgatory. As the person was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money thus raised served to pay for masses for his repose. Deodands were abolished September 1st, 1846.

Depart

To part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the ancient prayer—books had "till death us depart," or "till alimony or death us departs," a sentence which has been corrupted into "till death us do part."

"Before they settle hands and hearts,

Till alimony or death departs."

Butler: Hudibras, iii. 3.

Department

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

France is divided into departments, as Great Britain and Ireland are divided into counties or shires. From 1768 it was divided into governments, of which thirty—two were grand and eight petit. In 1790, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, it was mapped out de novo into eighty—three departments. In 1804 the number of departments was increased to 107, and in 1812 to 130. In 1815 the territory was reduced to eighty—six departments, and continued so till 1860, when Savoy and Nice were added. The present number is eighty—seven.

Dependence

An existing quarrel. (A term used among swordsmen.)

“Let us pause ... until I give you my opinion on this dependence ... for if we coolly examine the state of our dependence, we may the better apprehend whether the sisters three have doomed one of us to expiate the same with our blood.” — Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap.

xxi.

Depinges

(2 syl.) or Deepings. A breadth of netting to be sewed on a hoddy (net) to make it sufficiently large. Sometimes the breadth is called a depth, and the act of sewing one depth on another is called deepening the net. In 1574 the Dutch settlers at Yarmouth were required “to provide themselves with twine and depinges in foreign places.”

Deputations

The year of deputations. The eighth of the Hedjrah, after Mahomet's victory over the Arabs near Taïf, when deputations from all parts flocked to do him homage.

Depute

(2 syl.). To depute means to prune or cut off a part; deputation is the part cut off. A deputation is a slip cut off to represent the whole. (Latin, deputo.)

Derbend

“Beyond the Caspian's iron gates.”

Moore: Fire Worshippers.

Derby Stakes

Started by Edward Smith Stanley, the twelfth Earl of Derby, in 1780, the year after his establishment of the Oaks stakes (q.v.).

The Derby Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

is the day when the Derby stakes are run for; it is the second Wednesday of the great Epsom Spring Meeting, in May.

The Derby Day.

The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger are called “The Classic Races.” The Oaks is the classic race for fillies only, three years' old (£1,000); the Derby (Darby) for colts and fillies three years' old; the St. Leger for colts and fillies, those which have run in the Oaks or Derby being eligible.

Derive

(2 syl.) means “back to its channel or source” (Latin, de rivo). The Latin rivus (a river) does not mean the stream or current, but the source whence it flows, or the channel through which it runs. As Ulpian says,

“Fons sive locus per longitudinem depressus, quo aqua decurrat.”

Dernier Ressort

(French). A last resource.

Derrick A hangman; a temporary crane to remove goods from the hold of a vessel. So called from Derrick, the Tyburn hangman early in the seventeenth century, who for more than a hundred years gave his name to gibbets. (See Hangman.)

“He rides circuit with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyborne the inn at which he will light.” — Bellman of London, 1616.

Derwentwater

Lord Derwentwater's lights. The Aurora borealis; so called from James, Earl of Derwentwater, beheaded for rebellion February 24th, 1716. It is said that the northern lights were unusually brilliant on that night.

Desdemona

(in Shakespeare's Othello). Daughter of Brabantio. She fell in love with Othello, and eloped with him. Iago, acting on the jealous temper of the Moor, made him believe that his wife had an intrigue with Cassio, and in confirmation of this statement told the Moor that she had given Cassio a pocket—handkerchief, the fact being that Iago's wife, to gratify her husband, had purloined it. Othello asked his bride for it, but she was unable to find it; whereupon the Moor murdered her and then stabbed himself.

“She ... was ready to listen and weep, like Desdemona, at the stories of his dangers and campaigns.” — Thackeray.

Despair

The Giant Despair, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, lived in “Doubting Castle.”

Dessert

means simply the cloth removed (French, desservir, to clear the cloth); and dessert is that which comes after the cloth is removed.

Destruction

Prince of Destruction. Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar (1335, 1360—1405.)

Destructives

(The), as a political term, arose in 1832.

“The Times newspaper, hitherto the most effective advocate of the [Reform] bill, has been obliged to designate those whom it formerly glorified as Radicals, by the more appropriate and emphatic title of the Destructives.” — Quarterly Review (Dec., 1832, p. 545.)

Desultory

Those who rode two or more horses in the circus of Rome, and used to leap from one to the other, were called desultores; hence desultor came in Latin to mean one inconstant, or who went from one thing to another; and desultory means after the manner of a desultor.

Detest

is simply to witness against. (Latin, de—testor.)

Deucalion

after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother (i.e. the stones of mother earth). Those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women. For the interchange between laoz (people), and laaz (a stone), see Pindar: Olympic Games, ix. 66.

Deucalion's flood.

According to Greek mythology, Deucalion was a king of Thessaly, in whose reign the whole world was covered with a deluge in consequence of the great impiety of man. (See Deluges.)

Deuce

The Kelts called wood—demons dus. (Compare the Latin deus.)

“In the popular mythology both of the Kelts and Teutons there were certain hairy wood—demons, called by the former dus, and by the latter scrat (? scratz). Our common names of ‘Deuce’ and ‘Old Scratch’ are plainly derived from these.” — Lowell: Among my (Witchcraft), p. 109.

Books

It played the deuce with me.

It made me very ill; it disagreed with me; it almost ruined me. The deuce is in you. You are a very demon.

Deuce take you.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Get away! you annoy me. What the deuce is the matter? What in the world is amiss?

Deuce—ace

A throw of two dice, one showing one spot and the other showing two spots.

Deuce of Cards

(The). The two (French, deux). The three is called “Tray” (French, trois; Latin, tres).

“A gentleman being punched by a butcher's tray, exclaimed, ‘Deuce take the tray.’ ‘Well,’ said the boy, ‘I don't know how the deuce is to take the tray.’” — Jest Book.

Deus

(2 syl.). Deus ex machina. The intervention of a god, or some unlikely event, in order to extricate from difficulties in which a clumsy author has involved himself; any forced incident, such as the arrival of a rich uncle from the Indies to help a young couple in their pecuniary embarrassments. Literally, it means “a god (let down upon the stage or flying in the air) by machinery.”

Deva's Vale

The valley of the river Dee or Deva, in Cheshire, celebrated for its pastures and dairy produce.

“He chose a farm in Deva's vale,

Where his long alleys peeped upon the main.” Thomson: Castle of Indolence, canto ii.

Development

(See Evolution .)

Devil

Represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers he is called seirissim (a goat). As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

Devil among the Tailors

(The). On Downton's benefit at the Haymarket, some 7,000 journeymen tailors congregated in and around the theatre to prevent a burlesque called The Tailors: a Tragedy for Warm Weather, which they considered insulting to the trade. Fairburn's edition of this play is headed The Devil among the Tailors, and contains an account of this fracas. (See also Biographia Dramatica, article TAILORS.) There is a Scotch reel so called.

Devil and Bag o'Nails

(The). The public—house by Buckingham Gate was so called, but the sign was The Blackamoor's Head and the Woolpack. (Remarkable Trials, ii. p. 14; 1765.)

Devil and Dr. Faustus

(The). Faust was the first printer of Bibles, and issued a large number in imitation of those sold as manuscripts. These he passed off in Paris as genuine, and sold for sixty crowns apiece, the usual price being five hundred crowns. The uniformity of the books, their rapid supply, and their unusual cheapness excited astonishment. Information was laid against him for magic, and, in searching his lodgings, the brilliant red ink with which his copies were adorned was declared to be his blood. He was charged with dealings with the Devil, and condemned to be burnt alive. To save himself, he revealed his secret to the Paris Parlement, and his invention became the admiration of the world. N.B. — This tradition is not to be accepted as history.

Devil and his Dam

(The). Either the Devil and his mother, or the Devil and his wife. Numerous quotations may be adduced in support of either of these interpretations. Shakespeare uses the phrase six times, and in King John (ii. 1) dam evidently means mother; thus Constance says that her son Arthur is as like his father as the Devil is like his dam (mother); and in Titus Andronicus Tamora is called the “dam” of a black child. We also read of the Devil's daughter and the Devil's son.

In many mythologies the Devil is supposed to be an animal: Thus in Cazotte's Diable Amoureux he is a camel; the Irish and others call him a black cat; the Jews speak of him as a dragon (which idea is carried out in our George and the Dragon); the Santons of Japan call him a species of fox; others say he is a goat; and Dante associates him with dragons, swine, and dogs. In all which cases dam for mother is not inappropriate. On the other hand, dam for leman or wife has good support. We are told that Lilith was the wife of Adam, but was such a vixen that Adam could not live with her, and she became the Devil's dam. We also read that Belphegor “came to earth to seek him out a dam.”

As women when they go wrong are for the most part worse than the other sex, the phrase at the head of this article means the Devil and something worse.

Devil and the Deep Sea

(Between the). Between Scylla and Charybdis; between two evils, each equally hazardous. The allusion seems to be to the herd of swine and the devils called Legion.

“In the matter of passing from one part of the vessel to another when she was rolling, we were indeed between the devil and the deep sea.” — Nineteenth Century, April, 1891, p.664.

Devil and Tom Walker

(The). An American proverb, used as a caution to usurers. Tom Walker was a poor, miserly man, born at Massachusetts in 1727, and it is said that he sold himself to the Devil for wealth. Be this as it may, Tom suddenly became very rich, and opened a counting—house at Boston during the money panic which prevailed in the time of Governor Belcher. By usury he grew richer and richer; but one day, as he was foreclosing a mortgage with a poor land—jobber, a black man on a black horse knocked at the office door. Tom went to open it, and was never seen again. Of course the good people of Boston searched his office, but all his coffers were found empty; and during the night his house caught fire and was burnt to the ground.

(Washington Irving: Tales of a Traveller.)

Devil catch the Hindmost

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). In Scotland (? Salamanca) it is said when a class of students have made a certain progress in their mystic studies, they are obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man is seized by the devil, and becomes his imp.

Devil in Dublin City

(The). The Scandinavian form of Dublin was Divel—in[a], and the Latin Dublinia. (See Notes and Queries, April 9th, 1881, p. 296, for another explanation.)

“Is just as true's the deil's in hell

Or Dublin city.”

Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.

Devil looking Over Lincoln

(The). Sir W. Scott in his Kenilworth has, “Like the Devil looking over Lincoln.” A correspondent of Notes and Queries, September 10th, 1892, says —

“The famous devil that used to overlook Lincoln College, in Oxford, was taken down (Wednesday, September 15th, 1731), having about two years since [previously] lost his head in a storm.” — Gentleman's Magazine, 1831, p. 402.

We have other similar phrases, as “The devil looking over Durham.”

Devil loves Holy Water

(As the). That is, not at all. The Roman Catholics teach that holy water drives away the Devil. The Latin proverb is, “Sicut sus amaricinum amat” (as swine love marjoram). Lucretius, vi. 974, says “amaricinum fugitat sus.”

Devil—may—care

(A). A reckless fellow.

Devil must be Striking

(The) (German). Said when it thunders. The old Norse Donar means Thor, equal to Jupiter, the god of thunder, and donner is the German for thunder or Devil, as may be seen in the expression, “The runaway goose is gone to the Devil” (donner).

Devil on the Neck

(A). An instrument of torture used by persecuting papists. It was an iron winch which forced a man's neck and legs together.

Devil rides on a Fiddlestick

(The). Much ado about nothing. Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, use the phrase. “Fiddlesticks!” as an exclamation, means rubbish! nonsense! When the prince and his merry companions are at the Boar's Head, first Bardolph rushes in to warn them that the sheriff's officers are at hand, and anon enters the hostess to put her guests on their guard. But the prince says, "Here's a devil of a row to make about a trifle" (or "The devil rides on a fiddlestick") (1 Henry IV., ii. 2), and hiding some of his companions, he stoutly faces the sheriff's officers and browbeats them.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Devil Sick would be a Monk

(The). "Dæmon languēbat, monachus bonus esse volebat; Sed cum convaluit, manet ut ante fuit."

"When the Devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;

When the Devil got well, the devil a monk was he."

Said of those persons who in times of sickness or danger make pious resolutions, but forget them when danger is past and health recovered.

Devil to Pay and no Pitch Hot

(The). The "devil" is a seam between the garboard—strake and the keel, and to "pay" is to cover with pitch. In former times, when vessels were often careened for repairs, it was difficult to calk and pay this seam before the tide turned. Hence the locution, the ship is careened, the devil is exposed, but there is no pitch hot ready, and the tide will turn before the work can be done. (French, payer, from paix, poix, pitch.)

The Devil to Pay

is the name of a farce by Jobson and Nelly. Here's the very devil to pay. Is used in quite another sense, meaning: Here's a pretty kettle of fish. I'm in a pretty mess; this is confusion worse confounded.

PROVERBIAL PHRASES.

Cheating the devil.

Mincing an oath; doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the Church, etc. It is by no means unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the "Devil's Bridge" is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that his Satanic Majesty had knocked down several bridges, but promised the abbot, Giraldus of Einsiedel, to let this one stand, provided the abbot would consign to him the first living thing that crossed it. When the bridge was finished, the abbot threw across it a loaf of bread, which a hungry dog ran after, and "the rocks re—echoed with peals of laughter to see the Devil thus defeated." (Longfellow: Golden Legend, v.)

The bridge referred to by Longfellow is that over the Fall of the Reuss, in the canton of the Uri, Switzerland.

Rabelais says that a farmer once bargained with the Devil for each to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The canny farmer sowed carrots and turnips when it was his turn to have the under—soil share, and wheat and barley the year following. (Pantagruel, book iv. chap. xlvi.)

Give the devil his due.

Give even a bad man or one hated like the devil the credit he deserves. Gone to the devil. To ruin. The Devil and St. Dunstan was the sign of a public house, No. 2, Fleet Street, at one time much frequented by lawyers.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Into the Devil Tavern three booted troopers strode.”

Pull devil, pull baker.

Lie, cheat, and wrangle away, for one is as bad as the other. (In this proverb baker is not a proper name, but the trade.)

“Like Punch and the Deevil rugging about the Baker at the fair.” — Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap.xxxviii.

Talk of the devil and he's sure to come.

Said of a person who has been the subject of conversation, and who unexpectedly makes his appearance. An older proverb still is, “Talk of the Dule and he'll put out his horns;” but the modern euphemism is, “Talk of an angel and you'll see its wings.” If “from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh,” their hearts must be full of the evil one who talk about him, and if the heart is full of the devil he cannot be far off.

“Forthwith the devil did appear,

For name him, and he's always near.”

Prior: Hans Carvel.

To hold a candle to the devil is to abet an evildoer out of fawning fear. The allusion is to the story of an old woman who set one wax taper before the image of St. Michael, and another before the Devil whom he was trampling under foot. Being reprov'd for paying such honour to Satan, she naïvely replied: “Ye see, your honour, it is quite uncertain which place I shall go to at last, and sure you will not blame a poor woman for securing a friend in each.”

To kindle a fire for the devil is to offer sacrifice, to do what is really sinful, under the delusion that you are doing God service.

To play the very devil with [the matter].

To so muddle and mar it as to spoil it utterly. When the devil is blind. Never. Referring to the utter absence of all disloyalty and evil.

“Ay, Tib, that will be [i.e. all will be true and loyal] when the deil is blind; and his e'en's no sair yet.” — Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (Dandie Dinmont to Tib Mumps), chap.xxii.

Devil

(A), in legal parlance, is a leader's fag who gets up the facts of a brief, with the laws bearing on it, and arranges everything for the pleader in methodical order.

These juniors have surplus briefs handed to them by their seniors. A good fag is a good devil and is sure to get on.

The Attorney—General's devils are the Counsel of the Treasury, who not unfrequently get promoted to the bench.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A printer's devil.

Formerly, the boy who took the printed sheets from the tympan of the press. Old Moxon says: "They do commonly so black and bedaub themselves that the workmen do jocosely call them devils." The errand—boy is now so called. The black slave employed by Aldo Manuzio, Venetian printer, was thought to be an imp. Hence the following proclamation:

"I, Aldo Manuzio, printer to the Doge, have this day made public exposure of the printer's devil. All who think he is not flesh and blood may come and pinch him." — Proclamation of Aldo Manuzio, 1490.

Robert the Devil,

of Normandy. (See Robert Le Diable.)

The French Devil.

Jean Bart, an intrepid French sailor, born at Dunkirk. (1650—1702.) Son of the Devil. Ezzelino, chief of the Gibelins, and Governor of Vicenza, was so called for his infamous cruelties. (1215—1259).

"Fierce Ezelin, that most inhuman lord,

Who shall be deemed by men the child of hell." Rose: Orlando Furioso, iii. 32.

The White Devil of Wallachia.

George Castriota was so called by the Turks. (1404—1467.)

Devil's Advocate

(The). In the Catholic Church when a name is suggested for canonisation, some person is appointed to oppose the proposition, and is expected to give reasons why it should not take place. This person is technically called Advocatus Diaboli. Having said his say, the conclave decides the question.

Devil's Apple

The mandrake.

Devil's Arrows

(Yorkshire). Three remarkable "Druid" stones near Boroughbridge, like Harold's Stones, and probably marking some boundary.

Devil's Bird

(The). The yellow bunting; is so called from its note, deil.

Devil's Bones

Dice, which are made of bones and lead to ruin.

Devil's Books

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Playing cards. A Presbyterian phrase, used in reproof of the term King's Books, applied to a pack of cards, from the French livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings). Also called the Devil's Bible.

Devil's Cabinet

(The). Belphego, the Devil's ambassador in France; Hutgin, in Italy; Belial, in Turkey; Tharung, in Spain; and Martinet, in Switzerland. His grand almoner is Dagon; chief of the eunuchs is Succor Benoth; banker is Asmodeus; theatrical manager is Kobal; master of ceremonies, Verdelet; court fool is Nybbas. (Victor Hugo: Toilers of the Sea.)

Devil's Candle

So the Arabs call the mandrake, from its shining appearance at night. (Richardson.)

“Those hellish fires that light

The mandrake's charnel leaves at night.”

T. Moore: Fire Worshippers.

Devil's Current

(The). Part of the current of the Bosphorus is so called, from its great rapidity.

Devil's Daughter's Portion (The). The saying is —

“Deal, Dover, and Harwich,

The devil gave with his daughter in marriage,”xs because of the scandalous impositions practised in these seaports on sailors and occasional visitors. (Grose: Classical Dictionary, etc.)

Devil's Den

A cromlech in a valley, near Marlborough. It now consists of two large uprights and an impost. The third upright has fallen. Some of the farm labourers, a few years ago, fastened a team of horses to the impost, and tried, but without effect, to drag it down.

Devil's Dust

Old rags torn up by a machine called the “devil,” and made into shoddy by gum and pressure. Mr. Ferrand brought the subject before Parliament, March 4th, 1842. It is so called from the dishonesty and falsehood which it covers. (Latimer's Sermons.)

Devil's Dyke

(The). A ravine in the South Downs, Brighton. The legend is, that St. Cuthman, walking on the downs, plumed himself on having Christianised the surrounding country, and having built a nunnery where the dyke—house now stands. Presently the Devil appears and tells him all his labour is vain, for he would swamp the whole country before morning. St. Cuthman went to the nunnery and told the abbess to keep the sisters in prayer till after mid—night, and then illuminate the windows. The Devil came at sunset with mattock and spade, and began cutting a dyke into the sea, but was seized with rheumatic pains all over the body. He flung down his mattock and spade, and the cocks, mistaking the illuminated windows for sunrise, began to crow; whereupon the Devil fled in alarm, leaving his work not half done.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Devil's Four—Poster

(The). A hand at whist with four clubs. It is said that such a hand is never a winning one.

Devil's Frying—pan

(The). A Cornish tin—mine worked by the Romans.

Devil's Livery

(The). Black and yellow. Black for death, yellow for quarantine.

Devil's Luck

(The). Astounding good luck. Persons always lucky were thought at one time to have compounded with the Devil.

“You won't have to pay his annuity very long; you have the Devil's luck in bargains, always.” —

Dickens.

Devil's Mass

(The). Swearing at everybody and everything.

“Whin a bad egg is shut av the army, he says the devil's mass ... an' manes svearin' at ivrything from the commandher—in—chief down to the room—corp'ril.” — Soldiers Three, p. 95

Devil's Nostrils

(The). Two vast caverns separated by a huge pillar of natural rock in the mainland of the Zetland Islands. (See The Pirate, chap. xxii.)

Devil's Own (CONNAUGHT BOYS.) The 88th Foot. So called by General Picton from their bravery in the Peninsular War, 1809—1814.

Applied also to the Inns of Court Volunteers, the members of which are lawyers.

Devil's Paternoster

(To say the). To grumble; to rail at providence.

Devil's Snuff—box

(The). A puff—ball; a fungus full of dust; one of the genus Lycoperdon.

Devil's Tattoo

(The). Tapping on the table with one's finger a wearisome number of times; tapping on the floor with one's foot in a similar manner; repeating any sound with wearisome pertinacity, giving those who hear the "blue devils" or the "fidgets."

Devil's Throat

(The). Cromer Bay. So called from its danger to navigation.

Devils

(The scandalmonger.) Graffigane. (The doggish.) Libicocco. (The ill—tempered.) Rubicante. (The red with rage.) Scarmiglione. (The baneful.)

The blue Devils.

The fidgets or megrims.

Devonshire

according to English mythology, is a corruption of Debon's—share. This Debon was one of the heroes who came with Brute from Troy. One of the giants that he slew in the south coasts of England was Coulin, whom he chased to a vast pit eight leagues across. The monster trying to leap this pit, fell backwards, and lost his life in the chasm. When Brutus allotted out the island, this portion became Debon's—share.

“And eke that ample pit, yet far renowned

For the large leap which Debon did compell Coulin to make, being eight lugs of grownd, Into the which returning back he fell ...

In mede of these great conquests by them got Corineus had that province utmost west ... And Debon's share was that is Devonshire Spenser: Faërie Queene, book ii. canto x. 11, 12.

Devonshire Poet

O. Jones, a journeyman wool—comber, who lived at the close of the 18th century. Edward Capern, called “The rural Postman of Bideford” (born 1819), and John Gay, author of the Beggar's Opera, etc. (1688—1732), of Barnstaple (Devonshire).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dew—beaters

The feet; shoes to resist the wet.

“Hold out your dew—beaters till I take off the darbies [iron shoes or fetters].” — Peveiril of the Peak

Dew—bit (A). A snack before breakfast.

Dew—drink

A draught before breakfast. In harvest the men are allowed, in some counties, a drink of beer before they begin work.

Dexterity

means right-handed skill (Latin, dexter, the right hand). “Awkward” (q.v.) means left-handed; gauche is the French, and sinister the Latin for the left hand. Certainly the German left-handed marriages are sinister ones.

Dgellabæ'an

The Persian era. Dgella Eddin, son of Togrul Beg, appointed eight astronomers to reform the calendar. The era began A.D. 1075, and is followed to this day.

Dhuldul

(See Horse .)

Diable

(Le). Olivier Ledain, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king's barber. So called because he was as much feared as his Satanic Majesty, and even more disliked. (Hanged 1484.)

Robert le Diable.

Meyerbeer's grand opera. (See Robert.)

Diadem

meant, originally, a fillet wound round the head. The diadem of Bacchus was a broad band, which might be unfolded so as to make a veil. Hieronymus, king of Syracuse (B.C. 216—215), wore a diadem. Constantine the Great (306—337) was the first of the Roman emperors who wore a diadem. After his time it was set with rows of pearls and precious stones. (Greek dia—deo, to bind entirely.)

Dialectics

Metaphysics; the art of disputation; that strictly logical discussion which leads to reliable results. The product or result is ideas, which, being classified, produce knowledge; but all knowledge being of the divine types, must conduce more or less to practical results and good morals. (Greek, dia—lego, to speak thoroughly.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Kant used the word to signify the theory of fallacies, and Hegel for that concept which of necessity develops its opposite.

The following questions from John of Salisbury are fair specimens of the Middle—age subjects of discussion :—

- (1) When a person buys a whole cloak, does the cowl belong to his purchase?
- (2) When a hog is driven to market with a rope round its neck, does the man or the rope take him?

Diamond

A corruption of adamant. So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can be cut or polished with no substance but itself. (Greek, a damao, what cannot be subdued. Latin, adamas, gen. adamant—is; French, diamant.)

Diamond

(3 syl.). Son of Agapè, a fairy. He was very strong, and fought either on foot or horse with a battle—axe. He was slain in single combat by Cambalo. (See TRIAMOND.) (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iv.)

A diamond of the first water.

A man of the highest merit. The colour or lustre of a pearl or diamond is called its “water.” One of the “first water” is one of the best colour and most brilliant lustre. We say also, “A man of the first water.”

A rough diamond.

An uncultivated genius; a person of excellent parts, but without society manners.

“As for Warrington, that rough diamond had not had the polish of a dancing—master, and he did not know how to waltz.” —Thackeray.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning out—witting cunning; a hard bargain over—reached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust, or by rubbing one against another.

Diamond (Newton's favourite little dog). One winter's morning, while attending early service in Trinity College, Newton inadvertently left Diamond shut up in his room. On returning from chapel he found that the little fellow had upset a candle on his desk, by which several papers containing minutes of many years' experiments, were destroyed. On perceiving this irreparable loss, he exclaimed, “Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!” (Diffusion of Useful Knowledge: Life of Newton, p. 25, col.

Huygens, 1694, referring to this accident says: “Newtonum incidisse in phrenitin abhinc anno ac sex mensibus. An ex nimia studii assiduitate, an dolore infortunii, quod in incendio laboratorium chemicum et scripta quædam amiserat.”

Diamond Hammer

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A hammer or pick for “whetting” millstones. The diamond hammer is provided with several sharp—pointed teeth to give a uniform roughness to the surface of the stone. Also to a steel pick with diamond—shaped point at each extremity, to recut grooves in stone.

Diamond Jousts

(The). Jousts instituted by King Arthur, “who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize.” Ere he was king, he came by accident to a glen in Lyonesse, where two brothers had met in combat. Each was slain; but one had worn a crown of diamonds, which Arthur picked up, and when he became king offered the nine diamonds as the prize of nine several jousts, “one every year, a joust for one.” Lancelot had won eight, and intended to present them all to the queen “when all were won.” When the knight laid them before the queen, Guinevere, in a fit of jealousy, flung them out of the palace window into the river which ran below. (Idylls of the King; Elaine).

Diamond Necklace

(The) (1785). A necklace presented, through Mme. de Lamotte, by Cardinal de Rohan (as he supposed) to Marie Antoinette. The cardinal, a profligate churchman, entertained a sort of love passion for the queen; and the Countess de Lamotte induced him to purchase for the queen, for £85,000, a diamond necklace, made for Mme. Dubarry. The cardinal handed the necklace to the countess, who sold it to an English jeweller and kept the money. When the time of payment arrived Boehmer, the jeweller, sent his bill in to the queen, who denied all knowledge of the matter. A trial ensued, which lasted nine months, and created immense scandal.

Diamond Sculls

(The), or “The Diamond Challenge Sculls” of the Henley Royal Regatta, are a pair of crossed silver sculls not quite a foot in length, surmounted by an imitation wreath of laurel, and having a pendant of diamonds. They lie in a box lined with velvet, which contains also the names of all the winners. The prize is rowed for every year, and the sculls pass from winner to winner; but each winner receives a silver cup, which becomes his own absolute property. Established 1844 by the Royal Regatta Committee.

Diamonds.

(See Black Diamonds.)

Diana

(3 syl.). The temple of Diana at Ephesus, built by Dinochares, was set on fire by Herostratos, for the sake of perpetuating his name. The Ionians decreed that any one who mentioned his name should be put to death, but this very decree gave it immortality. The temple was discovered in 1872 by Mr. Wood.

Diana of Ephesus

This statue, we are told, fell from heaven. If so, it was an aerolite; but Minucius says he saw it, and that it was a wooden statue (second century, A.D.). Pliny, a contemporary of Minucius, tells us it was made of ebony. Probably the real “image” was a meteorite, and in the course of time a wooden or ebony image was substituted.

The palladium of Troy, the sacred shield of the Romans, the shrine of our Lady of Loretto, and other similar religious objects of veneration, were said to have been sent from heaven. The statute of Cybele (3 syl.) “fell from heaven”; and Elagabalas, of Syro—Phoenicia, was a great conical stone which fell from heaven.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

Nothing like leather; self—interest blinds the eyes. Demetrios was a silversmith of Ephesus, who made gold and silver shrines for the temple of Diana. When Christianity was preached in the city, and there was danger of substituting the simplicity of the Gospel for the grandeur of idolatry, the silversmiths, headed by Demetrios, stirred the people to a riot, and they cried out with one voice for the space of two hours, “Great is Diana of the Ephesians!” (Acts xix. 24—28.)

Dian's Worshippers

Midnight revellers. So called because they return home by moonlight. Dian means the moon.

Dianora

was the wife of Gilberto of Friuli, but was passionately beloved by Ansaldo. In order to get rid of his importunity, she told him she would never grant his suit and prove untrue till he made her garden at midwinter as full of flowers and odours as if it were midsummer. By the aid of a magician, Ansaldo accomplished this, and claimed his reward. Dianora went to meet him, and told him she had obeyed the command of her husband in so doing. Ansaldo, not to be outdone in courtesy, released her; and Gilberto became the firm friend of Ansaldo from that day to the end of his life. (Boccaccio Decameron, day x. 5.) (See Dorigen.)

Diapason

Dryden says —

“From harmony, from heavenly harmony

The universal frame began;

From harmony to harmony

Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran,

The diapason closing full in man.”

Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

According to the Pythagorean system, the world is a piece of harmony, and man the full chord.

Diaper

A sort of cloth, a corruption of D'Ypres, where it is largely manufactured. Similarly we have calico from Calicut; nankeen from Nankin; worsted from Worsted, in Norfolk; and half a score other similar words. The French diapré, variegated, seems far more likely to be the source of this word, for diaper is cloth variegated with flowers, etc., like damask.

Diavolo

(Fra). Michele Pozza, an insurgent of Calabria (1760—1806). Scribe wrote a libretto on this hero for Auber.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dibs

or Dibbs. Money. (Compare tips, gifts to schoolboys; and diobolus. Compare also dot with tot, jot, and yod.)

The huckle—bones of sheep used for gambling purposes are called dibbs; and Locke speaks of stones used for the same game, which he calls dibstones.

Dicers' Oaths

False as dicers' oaths. Worthless or untrustworthy, as when a gambler swears never to touch dice again. (Shakespeare: Hamlet, iii. 4.)

Dicilla

(in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her chastity.

Dick

That happened in the reign of Queen Dick — i.e. never; there never was a Queen Richard.

Dick's Hatband

(Richard Cromwell, 1626—1712.) (1) Dick's hatband, which was made of sand. His regal honours were “a rope of sand.” (2) As fine as Dick's hatband. The crown of England would be a very fine thing for anyone to get. (3) As queer as Dick's hatband. Few things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of the Protector's son.

(4) As tight as Dick's hatband. The hatband of Richard Cromwell was the crown, which was too tight for him to wear with safety.

Dick

= Richard. The diminutive “Dicky” is also common.

“Jockey of Norfolk [Lord Howard], be not too bold,

For Dicky [or Dickon], thy master, is bought and sold.” Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3. (Dickey or Dickon is Richard III.)

Dickens

(See Boz.)

Dickens is a perverted oath corrupted from “Nick.” Mrs. Page says —

“I cannot tell what the dickens his name is.” —

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor,

iii. 2.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The three poets who express a conflagration are “Dickens! How—itt, Burns!”

Dickey

or Dicky. A donkey; anciently called a Dick—ass, now termed Jack—ass. It is a term of endearment, as we call a pet bird a dicky—bird. The ass is called Dick—y (little Richard), Cuddy (little Cuthbert), Neddy (little Edward), Jack—ass, Moke or Mike, etc.

Dickey.

The rumble behind a carriage; also a leather apron, a child's bib, and a false shirt or front. All these are from the same root. (Dutch, dekken; German, decken; Anglo—Saxon, thecan; Latin, tego, to cover.)

Dicky

(A), in George III.'s time, meant a flannel petticoat. It was afterwards applied to what were called false shirts — i.e. a shirt front worn over a dirty shirt, or in lieu of a shirt. These half—shirts were first called Tommies.

“A hundred instances I soon could pick ye —

Without a cap we view the fair,

The bosom heaving also bare,

The hips ashamed, forsooth, to wear a dicky.” Peter Pindar: Lord Auckland's Triumph.

So again: —

“And sister Peg, and sister Joan,

With scarce a flannel dicky on ...”

Middlesex Election, letter iv.

(Hair, whalebone, or metal vestments, called dress—improvers, are hung on women's backs, as a “dicky” is hung on a coach behind.)

Dicky Sam

A native—born inhabitant of Liverpool, as Tim Bobbin is a native of Lancashire.

Dictator of Letters

François Marie Arouet de Voltaire, called the Great Pan. (1694—1778.)

Didactic Poetry

is poetry that teaches some moral lesson, as Pope's Essay on Man. (Greek, didasko, I teach.)

Diddle

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(To). To cheat in a small way, as “I diddled him out of ...” Edgar Allan Poe has an article on the art of “Diddling.” Rhyming slang is very common. (See Chivy.) Fiddle and diddle rhyme. “Fiddle” is slang for a sharper, and “diddle” is the act of a sharper. The suggestive rhyme was “Hi diddle diddle!

The cat and the fiddle.”

“A certain portion of the human race

Has certainly a taste for being diddled.”

Hood: A Black Job, stanza 1.

Diddler

(Jeremy). An artful swindler; a clever, seedy vagabond, borrowing money or obtaining credit by his wit and wits. From Kenny's farce called Raising the Wind.

Diderick

(See Dietrich .)

Dido It was Porson who said he could rhyme on any subject; and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, gave this couplet —

“When Dido found Æneas would not come,

She mourned in silence, and was Di—do dum(b).”

In the old Eton Latin grammar the three gerunds are called —di, —do, —dum. In modern school primers they are —dum, —di, —do.

When Dido saw Æneas needs must go,

She wept in silence, and was dum(b) Di—do.

E. C. B.

Dido was queen of Carthage, who fell in love with Æneas, driven by a storm to her shores. After abiding awhile at Carthage, he was compelled by Mercury to leave the hospitable queen. Dido, in grief, burnt herself to death on a funeral pile. (Virgil from Æneid, i. 494 to iii. 650.)

Die

The die is cast. The step is taken, and I cannot draw back. So said Julius Caesar when he crossed the Rubicon.

“I have set my life upon the cast,

And I will stand the hazard of the die.”

Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 4.

Die

Whom the gods love die young. This is from Menander's fragments (Hon hoi theoi philousin apothneskei neos). Demosthenes has a similar apophthegm. Plautus has the line, "Quem Di diligunt adolescens moritur." (See Byron: Don Juan, canto iv. 12.) Those who die young are "taken out of the miseries of this sinful life" into a happy immortality.

Die—hards

The 57th Foot. Their colonel (Inglis) in the battle of Albuera (1811), addressing his men, said, "Die hard, my lads; die hard!" And they did die hard, for their banner was pierced with thirty bullets. Only one officer out of twenty—four survived, and only 168 men out of 584. This fine regiment is now called the West Middlesex; the East Middlesex (the Duke of Cambridge's own) is the old 77th.

Diego

(San). A corruption of Santiago (St. James), champion of the red cross, and patron saint of Spain.

Dies Alliensis

(See Alliensis .)

Dies Iræ

A famous mediæval hymn on the last judgment, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. Sir Walter Scott has introduced the former part of it into his Lay of the Last Minstrel.

"Dies iræ, dies illa,

Solvat sæclum in favilla,

Teste David cum Sibylla."

On that day, that wrathful day,

David and the Sibyl say,

Heaven and earth shall melt away.

E. C. B.

Dies Non

A non—business day. A law phrase, meaning a day when the courts do not sit, as on Sundays; the Purification, in Hilary term; the Ascension, in Easter term; St. John the Baptist, in Trinity term; and All Saints, with All Souls, in Michaelmas term. A contracted form of "Dies non juridicus," a non—judicial day.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dies Sanguinis The 24th March, called Bellona's Day, when the Roman votaries of the war—goddess cut themselves and drank the sacrificial blood to propitiate the deity.

Dietrich

(2 syl.), of Berne or Verona, a name given by the German minnesängers (minstrels) to Theodoric the Great, king of the Ostrogoths. One of the liegemen of King Etzel. In the terrible broil stirred up by Queen Kriemhild in the banquet—hall of the Hunnish king, after the slaughter of Sir Rudiger, his friend Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in taking prisoners the only two surviving Burgundians, kings Gunther and Hagan, whom he handed over to Kriemhild, praying that she would set them free, but the angry queen cut off both their heads with her own hands. (The Nibelungen—Lied.)

Dieu

Dieu et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I. at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. As the French were signally beaten, the battle—word was adopted as the royal motto of England.

Difference

Ophelia says to the queen. “You may wear your rue with a difference.” In heraldry differences or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family.

(1) The eldest son, during the lifetime of his father, bears a label (or lambel), i.e. a piece of silk, stuff, or linen, with three pendants, broader at the bottom than at the top.

(2) The second son bears a crescent.

(3) The third, a mullet (or star with five points).

(4) The fourth, a martlet.

(5) The fifth, an annulet.

(6) The sixth, a fleur—de—lis.

(7) The seventh, a rose.

(8) The eighth, a cross—moline.

(9) The ninth, a double quatre foil.

Ophelia says both she and the Queen are to wear rue, the one as the affianced of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king; the other as the wife of Claudius his brother, and the cadet branch. The latter was to have a “difference,” to signify it was a cadet branch. “I [says Ophelia] shall wear the rue, but you [the Queen] must now wear it with a `difference.’ “

Digest

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). The collection of all the laws of Rome compiled by Tribonian and sixteen assistants, by order of Justinian. It amounted to 2,000 volumes, and was finished in three years (A.D. 533). (See Pandects.)

Diggings

Come to my diggings. To my rooms, residence, office, sanctum. A word imported from California and its gold diggings.

“My friend here wants to take diggings; and as you were complaining that you would get someone to go halves with you, I thought I had better bring you together.” — A. C. Doyle: A Study in Scarlet, chap. i.

Diggory

A barn labourer, taken on grand occasions for butler and footman to Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle. He laughs and talks while serving, and is as gauche as possible. (Goldsmith. She Stoops to Conquer.)

Digit

The first nine numerals; so called from the habit of counting as far as ten on the fingers. (Latin, digitus, a finger.)

Dignitary

(A). A clergyman who holds preferment to which jurisdiction is annexed, as bishops, deans, archdeacons, canons, etc.

Dignus Vindice Nodus (Latin). A knot or difficulty worthy of such hands to untie. Literally, a knotty point worthy to be made a civil action. The person who brought a civil action was called in Roman law a vindex, and the action was called a vindicatio. If the rightful possessor was a matter of dispute, the question became a lis vindiciarum, and was referred to the praetor to determine. A knotty point referred to the praetor was a “dignus vindice nodus. “

Dii Penates

(Latin). Household gods; now used for such articles of furniture or decoration as the lady of the house especially prizes.

Dilemma

The horns of a dilemma. “Lemma” means a thing taken for granted (Greek, lambano, to take). “Dilemma” is a double lemma, a two—edged sword which strikes both ways, or a bull which will toss you whichever horn you lay hold of. A young rhetorician said to an old sophist, “Teach me to plead, and I will pay you when I gain a cause.” The master sued for payment, and the scholar pleaded, “If I gain the cause I shall not pay you, because the judge will say I am not to pay, and if I lose my cause I shall not be required to pay, according to the terms of our agreement.” To this the master replied, “Not so; if you gain your cause you must pay me according to the terms of our agreement; and if you lose your cause the judge will condemn you to pay me.”

Dilettante

(Italian). An amateur of the fine arts, in opposition to a professor. Plural, dilettanti.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“These gentlemen are to be judged, not as dilettanti, but as professors.” — Athenæum.

Diligence

is that energy and industry which we show when we do what we like (Latin, diligo, I like); but indolence is that listless manner with which we do what thoroughly vexes us. (Latin, in, intensive; dolco, to grieve.)

Diligence

A four—wheeled stage—coach, drawn by four or more horses. Common in France before the introduction of railroads. The pun is well known.

Si vis placere magistro, utere diligentia (i.e. his diligence).

Dilly

(plural, Dillies). Stage—coaches. They first began to run in 1779. An abbreviation of the French word diligence (q.v.). “Derby dilly.”

Dim and Distant Future

(The). In November, 1885, Mr. W. E. Gladstone said that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Anglican Church were questions in “the dim and distant future.”

Dimanche

(Monsieur). A dun. The term is from Molière's Don Juan, and would be, in English, Mr. Sunday. The word damanche is a corruption and contraction of dies Domanica (the Lord's day).

Dimetæ

The ancient Latin name for the inhabitants of Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimissory

A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him. (Latin, di—matto, to send away.)

Dimity

A cloth said to be so called from Damietta, in Egypt, but really from the Greek di—mitos (double—thread). (See Samite.)

Dinah

(Aunt), in Sterne's Tristram Shandy. She leaves Mr. Walter Shandy £1,000, which he fancies will enable him to carry out all the wild schemes that enter into his head.

Dinde (1 syl.). The French for a turkey is poulet d'Inde (an Indian fowl). This is an error as the bird comes from America unless indeed the whole Western continent with all its contiguous islands be called by the name of West Indies. Our word “turkey” is no better if indeed it means a native of Turkey.

Dine

(To).

Qui dort dine.

The seven sleepers and others required no food till they woke from their long sleep. The same may be said of all hibernating animals.

To dine with Democritos.

To be cheated out of one's dinner. Democritos was the derider or philosopher who laughed at men's folly.

To dine with Sir Thomas Gresham.

To go without one's dinner; to be dinnerless; Sir Thomas Gresham founded the Royal Exchange which was a favourite lounge for those who could not afford to provide themselves with a dinner.

To dine with Duke Humphrey. (See Humphrey.) To dine with Mahomet. To die and dine in paradise. To dine with the cross—legged knights. (See next column Dinnerless.)

Dine Out

(To). To be dinnerless to go without a dinner.

Ding

(A). A blow. To ding it in one's ears. To repeat a subject over and over again; to teach by repetition.

To ding.

To strike. (Anglo—Saxon dencg [an] to knock strike beat.) Hence “ding—dong” as “They were at it ding—dong.”

“The butcher's axe like great Achilles' bat

Dings deadly downe ten—thousand—thousand flat.” Taylor: Works (1630).

Ding—dong

They went at it ding—dong. Fighting in good earnest. To ding is to beat or bruise (Saxon dencgan) dong is a responsive word. One gives a ding and the other a dong.

Din is the Anglo—Saxon dyn—ian to make a din; dinung a dinning noise.

Dingley Dell

The home of Mr. Wardle and his family, and the scene of Tupman's love adventure with Miss Rachel. (Dickens. Pickwick Papers.)

D

Dinner

(Waiting for). The “mauvais quart d'heure. “

Dinnerless

Their hosts are the cross—legged knights. That is, the stone effigies of the Round Church. In this church at one time lawyers met their clients, and here a host of vagabonds used to loiter about all day, under the hope of being hired as witnesses. Dining with the cross—legged knights meant much the same thing as dining with duke Humphrey (q.v.).

Dinos (See Horse .)

Dint

By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking (Anglo—Saxon, dynt) whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow.

Diocletian

The Roman Emperor, noted for his fierce persecution of the Christians, 303. The Emperor Constantine, on the other hand, was the “nursing father” of the Church.

“To make the Church's glory shine

Should Diocletian reign not Constantine.” Crabbe: Borough.

Diocletian

was the king, and Erastus the prince, his son, in the Italian version of the Seven Wise Masters (q.v.).

Diogenes

(4 syl. g=j). The cynic philosopher is said to have lived in a tub.

“The whole world was not half so wide

To Alexander when he cried

Because he had but one to subdue

As was a paltry narrow tub to Diogenes.” Butler Hudibras i. 3.

Diogenes.

Romanus IV. emperor of the East (1067—1071).

Diomed's Horses

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dinos (dreadful) and Lampon (bright-eyed). (See Horse.)

Diomedean Swop

An exchange in which all the benefit is on one side. This proverbial expression is founded on an incident related by Homer in the Iliad. Glaucus recognises Diomed on the battle—field, and the friends change armour.

“For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,

For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price), He [Glaucus] gave his own, of gold divinely wrought, An hundred beeves the shining purchase bought.” Pope Iliad vi.

Diomedes

or Diomed. King of Ætolia, in Greece, brave and obedient to authority. He survived the siege of Troy; but on his return home found his wife living in adultery, and saved his life by living an exile in Italy. (Homer: Iliad.)

Dione

(3 syl.). Venus, who sprang from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated body of Uranus (the sky) had been thrown there by Saturn.

“So young Dione, nursed beneath the waves

And rocked by Nereids in their coral caves ... Lisperd her sweet tones, and tried her tender smiles.” Darwin: Economy of Vegetation, ii.

Dionysius

(the younger) being banished a second time from Syracuse, retired to Corinth, where he turned schoolmaster for a living. Posterity called him a tyrant. Byron, in his Ode to Napoleon, alludes to these facts in the following lines —

“Corinth's pedagogue hath now

Transferred his byword to thy brow.”

That is, Napoleon is now called tyrant like Dionysius.

Dionysos

The Greek name of Bacchus (q.v.).

Father

: Zeus (Jupiter).

Feasts

of Bacchus in Rome, Bromalia or Brumalia, in March and September. Mother: Semele, daughter of Cadmus

Nurse: Brisa.

Owls

were his aversion.

Panthers

drew his chariot. Rams were the most general sacrifices offered to him. Wife: Ariadne.

The most famous statue of this god was by Praxiteles.

Attalus gave above £18,000 for a painting of the god by Aristides.

Diophantine Analysis

Finding commensurate values of squares, cubes, triangles etc. or the sum of a given number of squares which is itself a square; or a certain number of squares etc. which are in arithmetical progression. The following examples will give some idea of the theory:

1. To find two whole numbers, the sum of whose squares is a square;
2. To find three square numbers which are in arithmetical progression;
3. To find a number from which two given squares being severally subtracted, each of the remainders is a square.

Diophantus was an Alexandrian Greek (5th cent. A.D.)

Dioscuri

Castor and Pollux. (Greek, Dios kouros, young men of Zeus; dios is gen. of Zeus.)

The horses of the Dioscuri.

Cyllaros and Harpagos. (See Horse.)

Diotrephes

One who loves to have the pre—eminence among others. (3 John 9.)

“Neither a desperate Judas, like the prelate Sharpe [archbishop of St. Andrew's who was murdered], that's gone to his place; nor a sanctuary—breaking Holofernes, like the bloody—minded Claverhouse; nor an ambitious Diotrephes, like the lad [Lord] Evandale ... shall resist the arrows that are whetted and the bow that is bent against you.” — Sir W. Scott Old Mortality chap.xiv.

Dip

(A). A tallow—chandler, one who makes or sells candles or “dips.” These candles are made by dipping into melted tallow the cotton which forms the wick. (Anglo—Saxon dippan to dip.)

Diphthera

The skin of the goat Amalthe'a on which Jove wrote the destiny of man. Diphtheria is an infectious disease of the throat so called from its tendency to form a false membrane.

Diploma

literally means something folded (Greek). Diplomas used to be written on parchment, folded, and sealed. The word is applied to licences given to graduates to assume a degree, to clergymen, to physicians, agents, and so on.

Diplomacy

The tact, negotiations, privileges, etc. of a diplomatist, or one who carries a diploma to a foreign court to authorise him to represent the Government which sends him out.

Diplomatic Cold (A). An excuse to get over a disagreeable engagement. Mr. Healy M.P. (1885) said that Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone had “diplomatic colds,” when they pleaded indisposition as an excuse for not giving addresses at public meetings in which they were advertised to speak. The day after the meetings both gentlemen were “much better.”

Diplomatics

The science of palæography — that is, deciphering old charters, diplomas, titles; investigating their authenticity and genuineness, and so on. Papebröch, the Bollandist, originated the study in 1675; but Mabillon, another Bollandist, reduced it to a science in his work entitled De re Diplomatica, 1681. Toustain and Tassin further developed it in their treatise entitled Nouveau Traité de Diplomatie, 1750—1760.

Diptych

[diptik]. A register folded into two leaves, opening like our books, and not like the ancient scrolls. The Romans kept in a book of this sort the names of their magistrates, and the Roman Catholics employed the word for the registers in which were written the names of those bishops, saints, and martyrs who were to be specially commemorated when oblations were made for the dead. (Greek, diptuchos, folded in two.)

“The Greeks executed small works of great elegance as may be seen in the diptychs or ivory covers to consular records or sacred volumes used in the church service.” — T. Flaxman Lectures on Sculpture iii. p. 98.

Dircæ'an Swan

Pindar; so called from Dirce, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace (B.C. 518—442).

Direct Tax

is one collected directly from the owner of property subject to the tax, as when the tax—gatherer goes direct to the owner of a house and demands five, ten, or twenty pounds, as it may be, for Government uses. Indirect taxes are taxes upon marketable commodities, such as tea and sugar, the tax on which is added to the article taxed, and is paid by the purchasers indirectly.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Directory

The French constitution of 1795, when the executive was vested in five persons called directors, one of whom retired every year. After a sickly existence of four years, it was quashed by Napoleon Bonaparte. An alphabetical list of the inhabitants, etc., of a given locality, as a "London Directory."

Dirleton

Doubting with Dirleton, and resolving those doubts with Stewart. Doubting and answering those doubts, but doubting still. It applies to law, science, religion, morals, etc. Sir John Nisbett of Dirleton's Doubts on points of law, and Sir James Stewart's Doubts Resolved, are works of established reputation in Scotland, but the Doubts hold a higher place than the Solutions.

Dirlos

(Count). A Paladin, the beau—ideal of valour, generosity, and truth. The story says he was sent by Charlemagne into the East, where he conquered Aliarde, a great Moorish prince. On his return he found his young wife, who thought he was dead, betrothed to Celinos, another of Charlemagne's peers. The matter being set right, the king gave a grand banquet. Dirlos is D'Yrlos.

Dirt

is matter in the wrong place. (Lord Palmerston.) This is not true: a diamond or sovereign lost on a road is matter in a wrong place, but certainly is not dirt.

Throw plenty of dirt and some will be sure to stick.

Scandal always leaves a trail behind. Dirt cheap. Very low—priced. Dirt is so cheap that persons pay others to take it away. To eat dirt is to put up with insults and mortification. An Eastern method of punishment.

"If dirt were trumps what a capital hand you would hold!" — Charles Lamb to Martin Burney.

Dirty Half—Hundred

The 50th Foot, so called from the men wiping their faces with their black cuffs. Now called "The Queen's Own."

Dirty Lane

Now called Abingdon Street, Westminster.

Dirty Shirts

(The). The 101st Foot, which fought at Delhi in their shirt—sleeves (1857). Now called "The Royal Bengal Fusileers."

Dis Pluto.

"Proserpine gathering flowers,

Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis

Was gathered.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

iv 270.

Disaster

is being under an evil star (Greek, dus—aster, evil star). An astrological word.

“The stars in their courses fought against Sisera.” —Judges v. 20.

Disastrous Peace

(La Paix Malheureuse). It followed the battle of Gravelines (2 syl.), and was signed at Cateau — Cambresis. By this treaty Henri II. renounced all claim to Genoa, Naples, Milan, and Corsica (1559).

Disbar

(To). To deprive a barrister of his right to plead. The bar is the part barred off in courts of law and equity for barristers or pleaders.

Discard

To throw out of one's hands such cards as are useless.

Discharge Bible

(The), 1806. “I discharge [charge] thee before God.” (1 Tim. v. 21.)

Discipline

(A). A scourge used by Roman Catholics for penitential purposes.

“Before the cross and altar a lamp was still burning, and on the floor lay a small discipline or penitential scourge of small cord and wire, the lashes of which were stained with recent blood.” — Sir W Scott: The Talisman. chap. iv means severance of hearts (Latin, discorda). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by another which is disagreeable to a musical ear. (See Apple.)

Discord

Discount

At a discount. Not in demand; little valued; less esteemed than formerly; less than their nominal value. (Latin dis—computo, to depreciate.)

Discuss

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To discuss a bottle. To drink one with a friend. Same as “crush” or “crack a bottle.” (Discuss is the Latin dis—quatio; French, casser. The Latin quassa're vasa is to break a drinking—vessel.)

“We all ... drew round the table, an austere silence prevailing, while we discussed our meal.”—

E. Brontë: Wuthering Heights, chap. ii.

Disease

meaning discomfort, want of ease, mal aise, as

“In the world ye shall have disease.” —Wyclif: John xvi. 33.

Dished

(1 syl.). I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, some one else contrived to obtain it. A contraction of disherit. The heir is dish't out of his inheritance when his father marries again and leaves his property to the widow and widow's family.

“Where's Brummel? Dished!”

Byron: Don Juan.

Dish—washer (A). A scullery—maid.

Dismal

Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham.

“No sooner was Dismal among the Whigs ... but Lady Char[lot]te is taken knitting in St.James's Chapel [i.e. Lady Charlotte Finch, his daughter].” — Examiner, April 20—24th, 1713, No.44.

Dismas

(St.). The penitent thief. [DYSMAS.]

Disney Professor

The Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1851 by John Disney, Esq., of the Hyde, Ingatestone.

Disorder

says Franklin, “breakfasts with Plenty, dines with Poverty, sups with Misery, and sleeps with Death.”

Dispensation

The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between Himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the Gospel dispensation is that explained in the Gospels. (Latin, dis—penso, to spread forth, unroll, explain, reveal.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A dispensation from the Pope.

Permission to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded by the law of the Church, as distinct from the moral law.

“A dispensation was obtained to enable Dr. Barrow to marry.” — Ward.

Dispute

(2 syl.) means, literally, to “lop down” (Latin, dis—puto); debate means to “knock down” (French, débattre); discuss means to “shake down” (Latin, dis—quatio); object' is to “cast against” (Latin, ob—jacio); contend is to “pull against” (Latin, contendo); quarrel is to throw darts at each other (Welsh, cwarel, a dart); and wrangle is to strain by twisting (Swedish, vränga; Anglo—Saxon, wringan).

Dissolute

is one that runs loose, not restrained by laws or any other bonds. (Latin, dissolvo, like horses unharnessed.)

Distaff

A woman. Properly the staff from which the flax was drawn in spinning. The allusion is to the ancient custom of women, who spun from morning to night. (See Spinster.)

“The crown of France never fails to the distaff.” — Kersey.

To have tow on the distaff. To have work in hand. Froissart says, “Il aura en bref temps autres estoupes en sa quenouille.”

“He haddë more tow on his distaf

Than Gerveys knew.”

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.

3.772.

St. Distaff's Day.

The 7th of January. So called because the Christmas festival terminated on Twelfth Day, and on the day following the women returned to their distaffs or daily occupations. It is also called Rock Day, a distaff being called a rock. “In old times they used to spin with rocks.” (Aubrey, Wilts.)

“Give St. Distaff all the right,

Then give Christmas sport good night,

And next morrow every one

To his own vocatiön.” (1657)

“What! shall a woman with a rock drive thee away?

Fye on thee, traitor' "

Digby: Mysteries,

p.11.

Distaffina

To whom Bombastes Furioso makes love. (Thomas Barnes Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso.)

Distemper

means an undue mixture. In medicine a distemper arises from the redundancy of certain secretions or morbid humours. The distemper in dogs is an undue quantity of secretions manifested by a running from the eyes and nose. (Latin, dis—tempero, to mix amiss.)

Applied to painting, the word is from another source, the French détremper (to soak in water), because the paints, instead of being mixed with oil, are mixed with a vehicle (as yolk of eggs or glue) soluble in water.

Distinguished Member of the Humane Society

The name of this dog was Paul Pry. Landseer says, "Mr. Newman Smith was rather disappointed when his dog appeared in character rather than `the property of Newman Smith, Esq., of Croydon Lodge.'" (Notes and Queries, March 21st, 1885, p. 225.)

Distraction

An excellent example of how greatly the meaning of words may change. To "distract" means now, to harass, to perplex; and "distraction" confusion of mind from a great multiplicity of duties; but in French to "distract" means to divert the mind, and "distraction" means recreation or amusement (Latin, dis—traho). (See Slave.)

Distrait

(French). Absent—minded.

Dithyrambic

The father of dithyrambic poetry. Arion of Lesbos.

Dittany

When Godfrey was wounded with an arrow, an "odoriferous panacy" distilled from dittany was applied to the wound, whereupon the arrow—head fell out, and the wound healed immediately. (Tasso. Jerusalem Delivered, book xi.)

Ditto

(See Do .)

Dittoes

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A suit of). Coat, waistcoat, and trousers all alike, or all ditto (the same).

Divan'

(Arabic and Persian, diwan) means a register kept on a white table exactly similar to our board. Among the Orientals the word is applied to a council—chamber or court of justice; but in England we mean a coffee—house where smoking is the chief attraction.

Divers Colours

[in garments]. We are told, in 2 Sam. xiii. 18, that kings' daughters were arrayed in a garment of divers colours, and Dr. Shaw informs us that only virgins wore drawers of needle—work; so that when the mother of Sisera (Judges v. 30) says, “Have they not sped? Have they not divided the spoil? To Sisera a prey of divers colours, of divers colours of needlework?” she means — is not the king's daughter allotted to Sisera as a portion of his spoil? (See Coat Of Many Colours.)

Divert

To turn aside. Business is the regular walk or current of our life, but pleasure is a diversion or turning aside for a time from the straight line. What we call diversion is called in French distraction, drawing aside. (Latin, di—verto, to turn aside; dis—traho, to draw aside.)

Dives

(1 syl.), Divs or Deevs. Demons of Persian mythology. According to the Koran, they are ferocious and gigantic spirits under the sovereignty of Eblis.

“At Lahore, in the Mogul's palace, are pictures of Dews and Dives with long horns, staring eyes, shaggy hair, great fangs, ugly paws, long tails, and such horrible deformity, that I wonder the poor women are not frightened.” — William Finch: Purchas' Pilgrims, vol. i.

Dives

(2 syl.). The name popularly given to the rich man in our Lord's parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke xvi.). The Latin would be Dives et Lazarus.

Divide

(2 syl.). When the members in the House of Commons interrupt a speaker by crying out divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote — i.e. let the ayes divide from the noes, one going into one room or lobby, and the others into another.

Divide and Govern Divide a nation into parties, or set your enemies at loggerheads, and you can have your own way. A maxim of Machiavelli, a noted political writer of Florence (1469—1527).

“Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand.” — Matthew xii. 25.

Divination

There are numerous species of divination referred to in the Bible. The Hebrew word is added in italics.

JUDICIAL ASTROLOGY (Meonen).

AUGURY (Menachesch).

WITCHCRAFT (Mecascheph).

ENCHANTMENT (Ithoberon).

CASTING LOTS (Indeoni).

BY INTERROGATING SPIRITS.

BY NECROMANCY (1 Sam. xxviii. 12).

BY RHABDOMANCY (Hosea iv. 12).

BY TERAPHIM or household idols.

BY HEPATOSCOPY or inspecting the liver of animals. BY DREAMS and their interpretations.

Divination by fire, air, and water; thunder, lightning, and meteors; etc. The Urim and Thummin was a prophetic breastplate worn by the High Priest. (Consult: Gen. xxxvii. 5 — 11; xl. xll.; 1 Sam. xxviii. 12; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6; Prov. xvi. 33; Ezek. xxi. 21; Hosea iii. 4, 5, etc.)

Divine

The divine right of kings. The notion that kings reign by divine right, quite independent of the people's will. This notion arose from the Old Testament Scriptures, where kings are called "God's anointed," because they were God's vicars on earth, when the Jews changed their theocracy for a monarchy.

"The right divine of kings to govern wrong."

Pope.

Divine

(The). Ferdinand de Herrera, a Spanish poet (1516—1595). Raphael, the painter, il Divino (1483—1520).

Luis Morales, Spanish painter, el Divino (1509—1586).

Divine Doctor

Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic (1294—1381).

Divine Pagan

(The). Hypatia, who presided over the Neoplatonic School at Alexandria. She was infamously torn to pieces (A.D. 415) by a Christian mob, not without the concurrence of the Archbishop Cyril.

Divine Plant

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). Vervain, called by the Romans Herba Sacra (q.v.).

Divine Speaker

(The). So Aristotle called Tyrtamos, who therefore adopted the name of Theophrastos (B.C. 370—287).

Divining Rod

A forked branch of hazel, suspended by the two prongs between the balls of the thumbs. The inclination of the rod indicates the presence of water—springs, precious metal, and anything else that simpletons will pay for. (See Dousterswivel.)

Divinity in Odd Numbers

Falstaff tells us (in the Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 1) that this divinity affects “nativity, chance, and death.” A Trinity is by no means confined to the Christian creed. The Brahmins represent their god with three heads; the Greeks and Romans had three Graces, three Fates, three Furies, and a three—fold Hecate. Jupiter had his three thunderbolts, Neptune his trident, and Pluto his three—headed dog. The Muses were three times three. Pythagoras says God is threefold — “the beginning, middle, and end of all things.” Then, again, there are five features, five parts to the body, five vowels, five lines in music, five acts to a play, etc.; seven strings to a harp, seven planets (anciently, at any rate), seven musical notes, etc.

Chance.

There's luck in odd numbers “Numero Deus impre gaudet” (Virgil: Eclogue viii. 75). The seventh son of a seventh son was always held notable. Baalam would have seven altars, and sacrificed on them seven bullocks and seven rams. Naaman was commanded to dip seven times in Jordan, and Elijah sent his servant seven times to look out for rain. Climacteric years are seven and nine with their multiples by odd numbers.

Death.

The great climacteric year of life is 63 (i.e. 7×9), and Saturn presides over all climacteric years.

Divino Lodovico

Ariosto, author of Orlando Furioso, an epic poem in twenty—four books. (1474—1533.)

Division

The sign \div for division was invented by John Pell of Cambridge in 1668.

Divorcement

A writing, or bill of divorcement. “Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement” (Matt. v. 31). Adalet tells in the Nineteenth Century (July, 1892, p. 137):

“A woman [in Turkey] divorced from her husband is not treated with contumely ... and often marries again ... A man simply states to his wife that he has divorced her, on which she will go away; and the man, having repeated the same to the cadi, will receive an act of divorce written, which he will send to her. If it is the first or second time that this has occurred, he may take her back again without any formality ensuing, but, after a third divorce, she will be lost to him for ever. Seeing the ease with which this may be done, it is not surprising if men abuse the licence, and sometimes divorce their wives for [a very small] fault ... as a badly—cooked dinner, or a button unsewed, knowing very well that if he repents of it he can have her back before evening. I know a lady who has been divorced from five husbands, and is now living with a sixth.”

Divus

in Latin, attached to a proper name, does not mean divine, but simply deceased or canonised; excellently translated in Notes and Queries (May 21st, 1892, p. 421), “of blessed memory.” Thus, Divus Augustus means Augustus of blessed memory, not divine Augustus. Of course, the noun “divus” opposite to a proper noun = a god, as in Horace, 3 Odes v. 2, “Praesens divus habebitur Augustus.” While living, Augustus will be accounted a god. Virgil (Ecl. i. 6) says, “Deus nobis hæc otia fecit;” the “deus” was Augustus.

Dixie Land

Nigger land. Mason and Dixon drew a line which was to be the northern limit of slavery. In the third quarter of the 19th century the southern part of this line was called Dixie or nigger land.

Dizzy

A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield) (1805—1881).

Djinnestan'

The realm of the djinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do

A contraction of ditto, which is the Italian détto (said), Latin dictus.

How do you do? i.e.

How do you fare? It should be, How do you du (Anglo—Saxon, dug—an = valere); in Latin, Quomodo vales.

Well to do.

This, again, is not the transitive verb (facere) but the intransitive verb (valere), and means “well to fare.” (Anglo—Saxon. dug—an = valere.)

To do him, i.e.

cheat or trick a person out of something I have done the Jew, i.e. over—reached him. The same as outdo = excel.

Do (to rhyme with go). The first or tonic note of the solfeggio system of music.

Do, re, mi, fa, sol, la,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Italian; ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, French. The latter are borrowed from a hymn by Paulus Piaconus, addressed to St. John, which Guido, in the eleventh century, used in teaching singing:

“Ut queant laxis, Re —sonare fibris,

Mi

—ra gestorum Fa —muli tuorum, Sol —ve pollutis La —biis reatum.” Sanctë Joannës.

Ut

—tered be thy wondrous story, Re —prehensive though I be,

Me make mindful of thy glory, Fa —mous son of Zacharee;

Sol

—ace to my spirit bring, La —bouring thy praise to sing. E.C.B.

(See WEIZIUS in Heortologio, p. 263.) Le Maire added si (seventeenth century). (See Aretinian Syllables.)

Do for

I'll do for him. Ruin him; literally, provide for him in a bad sense. “Taken in and done for,” is taken in and provided for; but, jocosely, it means “cheated and fleeced.”

Do up

(To). To set in order; to make tidy. “Dup the door.” (See Dup.)

Doab

(Indian). A tract of land between two rivers. (Pronounce du'—ab.)

Dobbin

A steady old horse, a child's horse. Dobby, a silly old man. Dobbies, house—elves similar to brownies. All these are one and the same word. The dobbies lived in the house, were very thin and shaggy, very kind to servants and children, and did many a little service when people had their hands full.

“Sober Dobbin lifts his clumsy heel.”

Bloomfield: Farmer's Boy.

(Winter, stanza 9.)

Dobbins

(Humphrey). The valet—de—chambre and factotum of Sir Robert Bramble, of Blackbury Hall, in the county of Kent. A blunt, rough—spoken old retainer, full of the milk of human kindness, and most devoted to his master. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Dobby's Walk

The goblin's haunt or beat. Dobby is an archaic word for a goblin or brownie. (See Washington Irving's Bracebridge Hall, ii. 183—6.) Dobby also means an imbecile old man.

“The Dobby's walk was within the inhabited domains of the Hall.” — Sir W Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap.x.

Docetes

(3 syl.). An early heretical sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was only God, and that His visible form was merely a phantom; that the crucifixion and resurrection were illusions. (The word is Greek, and means phantomists.)

Dock—Alfar

The dark Alfs whose abode is underground. They are in appearance blacker than pitch. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dock—side Lumper

(A). One engaged in delivering and loading ships' cargoes.

“Judging of my histrionic powers by my outward man, he probably thought me more fit for a dock—side lumper than an actor.” — C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 191.

Dock Warrant

(A). An order authorising the removal of goods warehoused in the dock.

Doctor A seventh son used to be so dubbed from the notion of his being intuitively skilled in the cure of agues, the king's evil, and other diseases.

“Plusieurs croyent qu'en France les septièmes garçons, nez de legitimes mariages (sans que la suite des sept ait, esté interrompue par la naissance d'aucune fille) peuvent aussi guerir des fievres tierces, des fievres quartes, et mesme des ecrouelles, après avoir jeûne trois ou neuf jours avant que de toucher les malades.” — Jean Baptiste. Thiers: Traité des Superstitions, etc., i. p. 436.

Doctor

(The). The cook on board ship, who “doctors” the food. Any adulterated or doctored beverage; hence the mixture of milk, water, nutmeg, and a little rum, is called Doctor; the two former ingredients being “doctored” by the two latter.

Doctor

(The). Brown sherry, so called because it is concocted from a harsh, thin wine, by the addition of old boiled mosto stock. Mosto is made by heating unfermented juice in earthen vessels, till it becomes as thick and sweet as treacle. This syrup being added to fresh “must” ferments, and the luscious produce is used for doctoring very inferior qualities of wine. (Shaw: On Wine.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To doctor the wine.

To drug it, or strengthen it with brandy. The fermentation of cheap wines is increased by fermentable sugar. As such wines fail in aroma, connoisseurs smell at their wine. To doctor wine is to make weak wine stronger, and “sick” wine more palatable.

Doctored Dice

Loaded dice.

To doctor the accounts.

To falsify them. They are ill (so far as you are concerned) and you falsify them to make them look better. The allusion is to drugging wine, beer, etc., and to adulteration generally.

Dr. Diafoirus

in Molière's Malade Imaginaire. A man of fossilised ideas, who, like the monk, refused to change his time—honoured mumpsimus (q.v.), for the new—fangled sumpsimus. Dr. Diafoirus used to say, what was good enough for his forefathers was good enough for their posterity, and he had no patience with the modern fads about the rotundity of the earth, its motion round the sun, the circulation of the blood, and all such stuff.

Dr. Dove

The hero of Southey's Doctor.

Dr. Fell

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell. A correspondent of Notes and Queries says the author was Tom Brown, who wrote Dialogues of the Dead, and the person referred to was Dr. Fell, Dean of Christchurch

(1625—1686), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if he translated the thirty—third Epigram of Martial:

“Non amo te, Zabidi, nec possum dicere quare;

Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.”

“I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,

The reason why I cannot tell;

But this I know, I know full well,

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.” T.Brown.

Doctor Mirabilis

Roger Bacon (1214—1292).

Doctor My—Book

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dr. John Abernethy, so called because he used to say to his patients, "Read my book" — on Surgical Observations. (1765—1830.)

Dr. Rezio or Pedro Rezio of Agüero. The doctor of Barataria, who forbade Sancho Panza to taste any of the meats set before him. Roasted partridge was forbidden by Hippocrates; podrida was the most pernicious food in the world; rabbits are a sharp-haired diet; veal is prejudicial to health; but the governor might eat a "few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince." (Don Quixote, part ii. book iii. chap. 10.)

Dr. Sangrado

of Valladolid, a tall, meagre, pale man, of very solemn appearance, who weighed every word he uttered, and gave an emphasis to his sage dicta. "His reasoning was geometrical, and his opinions angular." He said to the licentiate Sedillo, who was sick, "If you had drunk nothing else but pure water all your life, and eaten only such simple food as boiled apples, you would not now be tormented with gout." He then took from him six porringers of blood to begin with; in three hours he repeated the operation; and again the next day, saying: "It is a gross error to suppose that blood is necessary for life." With this depletion, the patient was to drink two or three pints of hot water every two hours. The result of this treatment was death "from obstinacy." (Gil Blas, chap. ii.)

Doctor Slop

An enthusiast, who thinks the world hinges on getting Uncle Toby to understand the action of a new medical instrument. (Sterne: Tristram Shandy.)

A nickname given by William Hone to Sir John Stoddart, editor of the New Times. (1773—1856.)

Doctor Squintum

George Whitefield, so called by Foote in his farce entitled The Minor. (1714—1770.) Theodore Hook applied the same sobriquet to the Rev. Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes. (1792—1834.)

Doctor Syntax

A simple-minded, pious henpecked clergyman, very simpleminded, but of excellent taste and scholarship, who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told in eight-syllable verse in The Tour of Dr. Syntax, by William Combe. (See Duke Combe.)

Dr. Syntax's horse.

Grizzle, all skin and bone. (See Horse.)

Doctors

False dice, which are doctored, or made to turn up winning numbers.

"`The whole autechamber is full, my lord — knights and squires, doctors and dicers.'

"`The dicers with their doctors in their pockets,

I presume.'` — Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap.

xxviii.

“Or chaired at White's, amidst the doctors sit.”

Dunciad,

book i. 203.

Doctors

The three best doctors are Dr. Quiet, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Merryman.

“Si tibi deficient medici, medici tibi fiant

Hæc tria: Mens—læta, Requies, Moderata—Diæta.”

Doctors' Commons

A locality near St. Paul's, where the ecclesiastical courts were formerly held, and wills preserved. To “common” means to dine together; a term still used at our universities. Doctors' Commons was so called because the doctors of civil law had to dine together four days in each term. This was called eating their terms.

Doctors Disagree

Who shall decide when doctors disagree. When authorities differ, the question sub judice must be left undecided. (Pope: Moral Essays, epistle iii. line 1.)

Doctor's Stuff Medicine; stuff sent from the doctor.

Doctored Wine

(See To Doctor .)

Doctour of Phisikes Tale

in Chaucer, is the Roman story of Virginius, given by Livy. There is a version of this tale in the Roman de la Rose, vol. ii. p. 74; and another, by Gower, in his Confessio Amantis, book vii.

Doctrinists

or Doctrinaires. A political party which has existed in France since 1815. They maintain that true liberty is compatible with a monarchical Government; and are so called because they advocate what is only a doctrine or dream. M. Guizot was one of this party.

Dodge

(1 syl.). An artful device to evade, deceive, or bilk some one. (Anglo—Saxon, deogian, to conceal or colour.)

The religious dodge.

Seeking alms by trading on religion.

The tidy dodge.

To dress up a family clean and tidy so as to excite sympathy, and make passers—by suppose you have by misfortune fallen from a respectable state in society.

Dodge About

(To), in school phrase, is to skip about and not go straight on through a lesson. A boy learns a verb, and the master does not hear him conjugate it straight through, but dodges him about. Also in class not to call each in order, but to pick a boy here and there.

Dodger

A “knowing fellow.” One who knows all the tricks and ways of London life, and profits by such knowledge.

Dodger

The Artful Dodger. John Dawkins, a young thief, up to every artifice, and a perfect adept in villainy. A sobriquet given by Dickens to such a rascal, in his Oliver Twist, chap. viii.

Dodington

whom Thomson invokes in his Summer, was George Bubb Dodington, Lord Melcomb—Regis, a British statesman, who associated much with the wits of the time. Churchill and Pope ridiculed him, while Hogarth introduced him in his wig into his picture called the Orders of Periwigs.

Dodipoll

As wise as Dr. Dodipoll (or) Doddipole — i.e. not wise at all; a dunce. (Doddy in dodi—poll and doddy—pate is probably a variant of totty, small, puny. Doddy—poll, one of puny intellect.)

Dodman

or Doddiman. A snail. A word still common in Norfolk; but Fairfax, in his Bulk and Selvedge (1674), speaks of “a snayl or dodman.”

“Doddiman, doddiman, put out your horn,

Here comes a thief to steal your corn.”

Norfolk rhyme.

Dodona

A famous oracle in Epiros, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus (Jupiter), and situate in the village of Dodona.

The tale is, that Jupiter presented his daughter Thebe with two black pigeons which had the gift of human speech. Lemprière tells us that the Greek word peleiai (pigeons) means, in the dialect of the Eperots, old women; so that the two black doves with human voice were two black or African women. One went to Libya, in Africa, and founded the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the other went to Epirus and founded the oracle of Dodona. We are also told that plates of brass were suspended on the oak trees of Dodona, which being struck by thongs when the wind blew, gave various sounds from which the responses were concocted. It appears that this suggested to the Greeks the phrase Kalkos Dodones (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbler, or one who talks an infinite deal of nothing.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dods

(Meg). The old landlady in Scott's novel called St. Ronan's Well. An excellent character, made up of consistent inconsistencies; a mosaic of oddities, all fitting together, and forming an admirable whole. She was so good a housewife that a cookery book of great repute bears her name.

Dodson and Fogg

The lawyers employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick," in the Pickwick Papers, by Charles Dickens.

Doe

(1 syl.). John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names used at one time to save certain "niceties of law;" but the clumsy device was abolished in 1852. Any mere imaginary persons, or men of straw. John Doe, Richard Roe, John o' Noakes, and Tom Styles are the four' sons of "Mrs. Harris," all bound apprentices to the legal profession.

Doeg

(2 syl.), in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Elkanah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for his great rival. Doeg was Saul's herdsman, who had charge of his mules and asses. He told Saul that the priests of Nob had provided David with food; whereupon Saul sent him to put them to death, and eighty—five were ruthlessly massacred. (1 Sam. xxi. 7; xxii. 18.)

"Doëg, though without knowing how or why,

Made still a blundering kind of melody ... Let him rail on; let his invective Muse

Have four—and—twenty letters to abuse,

Which if he jumbles to one line of sense,

Indict him of a capital offence."

Absalom and Achitophel,

part ii.

Doff

is do—off, as “Doff your hat.” So don is do—ou, as “Don your clothes.” Dup is do—up, as “Dup the door” (q.v.).

“Doff thy harness, youth.

And tempt not yet the brushes of the war.” Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 3.

Dog

This long article is subdivided into eleven parts: 1. Dogs of note.

2. Dogs of noted persons.

3. Dogs models of their species.

4. Dogs in phrases.

5. Dogs used metaphorically, etc.

6. Dogs in Scripture language.

7. Dogs in art.

8. Dogs in proverbs and fables

9. Dogs in superstitions.

10. Dogs the male of animals.

11. Dogs inferior plants.

(1) DOGS of Note:

Barry. The famous mastiff of Great St. Bernard's, in the early part of the present century instrumental in saving forty human beings. His most memorable achievement was rescuing a little boy whose mother had been destroyed by an avalanche. The dog carried the boy on his back to the hospice. The stuffed skin of this noble animal is kept in the museum of Berne.

Gelert (q.v.).

Tonton.

The dog which was enclosed in an acorn. Tray — i.e. Trag = runner, or else from the Spanish traér, to fetch.

(2) DOGS of noted persons:

Actæon's fifty dogs.

Alce(strength), Amarynthos (from Amarythia, in Eubæa), Asbolos (soot—colour), Banos, Boreas, Canache(ringwood), Chediætros, Cisseta, Coran (cropped, crop—eared), Cyllo (halt), Cyllopotes (zig—zag runner), Cyprios (the Cyprian), Draco (the dragon), Dromas (the courser), Dromios (seize—'em), Echnobas, Eudromos (good—runner), Harpale(voracious), Harpiea (tear—'em),

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Ichnobate (track—follower), Labros (furious), Lacæna (lioness), Lachne (glossy—coated), Lacon (Spartan), Ladon (from Ladon, in Arcadia), Lælaps (hurricane), Lampos (shining—one), Leucos (grey), Lycisca, Lyncea, Machimos (boxer), Melampe (black), Melanchete (black—coat), Melanea (black), Menelea, Molossos (from Molossos), Napa (begotten by a wolf), Nebrophonos (fawn—killer), Ocydroma (swift—runner), Oresitrophos

(mountain—bred), Oribasos (mountain—ranger), Pachytos (thick—skinned), Pamphagos (ravenous), Paemenis

(leader) Pterelas (winged), Stricta (spot), Theridamas (beast—tamer or subduer), Theron (savage—faced), Thoös (swift), Uranis (heavenly—one).

Several modern names of dogs are of Spanish origin, as Ponto (pointer), Tray (fetch), etc.

King Arthur's favourite hound.

Cavall.

Aubry's dog.

Aubry of Montdidier was murdered, in 1371, in the forest of Bondy. His dog, Dragon, showed a most unusual hatred to a man named Richard of Macaire, always suarling and ready to fly at his throat whenever he appeared. Suspicion was excited, and Richard of Macaire was condemned to a judicial combat with the dog. He was killed, and in his dying moments confessed the crime.

Belgrade,

the camp—sutler's dog: Clumsy.

Browning's (Mrs.) little dog Flush, on which she wrote a poem.

Lord Byron's favourite dog.

Boatswain, buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey. Catherine de Medici's favourite lapdog was named Phoebé.

Cathullin's hound was named Luath (q.v.).

Douglas's hound was named Luffra or Lufra (q.v.). Elizabeth of Bohemia's dog was named Apollon.

Fingal's dog was named Bran.

“‘Mare Bran, is e a brathair' (If it be not Bran, it is Bran's brother) was the proverbial reply of Maccombich.”
— Waverley, chap. xlv.

Frederick of Wales had a dog given him by Alexander Pope, and on the collar were these words —

“I am his Highness' dog at Kew;

Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?”

Géryon's dogs.

Gargittios and Orthos. The latter was the brother of Cerberos, but had one head less. Hercules killed both these monsters.

Icarios's dog.

Maera (the glistener). Icarios was slain by some drunken peasants, who buried the body under a tree. His daughter Erigone searching for her father, was directed to the spot by the howling of Maera, and when she discovered the body she hung herself for grief. Icarios became the constellation Boötes, Erigone the constellation Virgo, and Maera the star Procyon, which rises in July, a little before the Dog—star. (Greek, pro—kuon.)

Kenneth's (Sir) famous hound was called Roswal. (Sir W. Scott: The Talisman.)

Lamb's (Charles) dog was named Dash.

Landor's (Savage) dog was named Giallo. Landseer's greyhound was named Brutus. "The Invader of the Larder." Llewellyn's greyhound was named Gelert' (q.v.).

Ludlam's dog.

(See Lazy.)

Lurgan's (Lord) greyhound was named Master M'Grath, from an orphan boy who reared it. It won three Waterloo Cups, and was presented at Court by the express desire of Queen Victoria, the very year it died (1866—1871).

Neville's dog.

It ran away whenever it was called. In the corresponding Italian proverb the dog is called that of the Vicar Arlotto. (See Chien.)

Mauthe dog.

(See Mauthe.)

Sir Isaac Newton's,

Diamond (q.v.).

Dog of, Montargis. The same as Aubry's dog. A picture of the combat was for many years preserved in the castle of Montargis. (See Aubry's Dog.)

Orion's dogs were Arctophonos (bearkiller), and Ptoophagos (Ptoon—glutton.) (Ptoon is in Boaotia.) Pope's dog was named Bounce.

Punch's dog is Toby.

Richard II.'s greyhound was named Mathe. It deserted the king and attached itself to Bolingbroke. Roderick the Goth's dog was named Theron.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Rupert's (Prince) dog, killed at Marston Moor, was named Boy. Scott's (Sir Walter) dogs: his favourite deerhound was named Maida; his jet—black greyhound was called Hamlet. He also had two Dandy Dinmont terriers.

Seven Sleepers (Dog of the). This famous dog, admitted by Mahomet to heaven, was named Katmir. The seven noble youths that fell asleep for 309 years had a dog, which accompanied them to the cavern in which they were walled up. It remained standing for the whole time, and neither moved from the spot, ate, drank, nor slept. (Sale's Koran, xviii., notes.)

Tristran's dog was named Leon or Lion.

Ulysses' dog, Argos, recognised him after his return from Troy, and died of joy. (3) DOGS, models of their species:

Argoss (a Russian terrier); Baroness Cardiff (a Newfoundland); Black Prince (a mastiff); Bow—wow (a schipperke); Corney (a bull—terrier); Countess of Warwick (a great Dane); Dan O'Connor (an Irish water—spaniel); Dude (a pug); Fascination (a black cocker—spaniel); Fritz (a French poodle); Judith (a bloodhound); Kilcree (a Scotch terrier); King Lud (a bulldog); King of the Heather (a dandie—dinmont); Mikado (a Japanese spaniel); Olga (a deerhound); Romeo (a King Charles spaniel); Royal Krueger (a beagle); Scottish Leader (a smooth—coated St. Bernard); Sensation (a pointer); Sir Bedivere (a rough—coated St. Bernard); Spinaway (a greyhound); Toledo Blade (an English setter); Woodmansterne Trefoil (a collie).

(4) DOG in phrases:

A dog in a doublet. A bold, resolute fellow. In Germany and Flanders the boldest dogs were employed for hunting the wild boar, and these dogs were dressed in a kind of buff doublet buttoned to their bodies. Rubens and Sneyders have represented several in their pictures. A false friend is called a dog in one's doublet.

Between dog and wolf.

The hour of dusk. “Entre chien et loup.” “St. Roch and his dog.” Two inseparables. “Toby and his dog.” One is never seen without the other. They lead a cat and dog life. Always quarrelling.

To lead the life of a dog.

To live a wretched life, or a life of debauchery. (5) DOG, used metaphorically or symbolically:

The dog.

Diogenes, the Cynic (B.C. 412—323). When Alexander went to see him, the young King of Maceonia introduced himself with these words: “I am Alexander, surnamed the Great,” to which the philosopher replied: “And I am Diogenes, surnamed the Dog.” The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted by a dog. (See Cynic.)

Dog of God.

So the Laplanders call the bear. The Norwegians say it “has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve.” They never presume to speak of it by its proper appellation, guouztija, lest it should revenge the insult on their flocks and herds, but they call it Möddaaigja (the old man with a fur cloak).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A dead dog.

Something utterly worthless. A phrase used two or three times in the Bible. (See (6).) A dirty dog. In the East the dog is still held in abhorrence, as the scavenger of the streets. "Him that dieth in the city shall the dogs eat" (1 Kings xiv. 11). The French say, Crotté comme un barbet (muddy or dirty as a poodle), whose hair, being very long, becomes filthy with mud and dirt. Generally speaking, "a dirty dog" is one morally filthy, and is applied to those who talk and act nastily. Mere skin dirt is quite another matter, and those who are so defiled we call dirty pigs.

A surly dog.

A human being of a surly temper, like a surly dog. Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? (2 Kings viii. 12, 13). Hazael means, "Am I such a brute as to set on fire the strongholds of Israel, slay the young men with the sword, and dash their children to the ground, as thou, Elijah, sayest I shall do when I am king?"

Sydney Smith being asked if it was true that he was about to sit to Landseer, the animal painter, for his portrait, replied, in the words of Hazael, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

The Thracian dog.

Zoilus.

"Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast,

And feed on scraps refused by every guest: From the old Thracian dog they learned the way To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey." Pitt: To Mr. Spence.

Dogs of war. The horrors of war, especially famine, sword, and fire.

"And Caesar's spirit, ranging for revenge,

With Até by his side, come hot from hell. Shall in these confines, with a monarch's voice, Cry `Havoc,' and let slip the dogs of war." Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

(6) DOG (in Scripture language, whether dead or living, is a most degrading expression: "After whom is the King of Israel come out? After a dead dog?" (1 Sam. xxiv. 14.) "Beware of dogs" (Phil. iii. 2), i.e. sordid, noisy professors. Again, "Without are dogs" (Rev. xxii. 15), i.e. false teachers and sinners, who sin and return to their sins (2 Peter ii. 21).

There is no expression in the Bible of the fidelity, love, and watchful care of the dog, so highly honoured by ourselves.

(7) DOG in art.

Dog, in mediaeval art, symbolises fidelity.

A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. Bernard, St. Benignus, and St. Wendelin; as licking the wounds of St. Roch; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. Dominic.

Dogs in monuments.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The dog is placed at the feet of women in monuments to symbolise affection and fidelity, as a lion is placed at the feet of men to signify courage and magnanimity. Many of the Crusaders are represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as a dog follows the footsteps of his master.

(8) DOG in proverbs, fables, and proverbial phrases:

Barking dogs seldom bite. (See Barking.)

Dog don't eat dog.

Ecclesia ecclesiam non decimat; government letters are not taxed; church lands pay no tithes to the church.

A black dog has walked over him.

Said of a sullen person. Horace tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen. (See Black Dog.)

A dog in the manger.

A churlish fellow, who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use. The allusion is to the well-known fable of a dog that fixed his place in a manger, and would not allow an ox to come near the hay.

Every dog has his day.

In Latin, "Hodie mihi, cras tibi." "Nunc mihi, nunc tibi, benigna" [fortuna]. In German, "Heute mir, morgen dir." You may crow over me to-day, but my turn will come by—and—by. The Latin proverb, "Hodie mihi," etc., means, "I died to-day, your turn will come in time." The other Latin proverb means, fortune visits every man once. She favours me now, but she will favour you in your turn.

"Thus every dog at last will have his day —

He who this morning smiled, at night may sorrow;
The grub to-day's a butterfly to-morrow."

Peter Pindar: Odes of Condolence.

Give a dog a bad name and hang him.

If you want to do anyone a wrong, throw dirt on him or rail against him.

Gone to the dogs.

Gone to utter ruin; impoverished. He has not a dog to lick a dish. He has quite cleared out. He has taken away everything. He who has a mind to beat his dog will easily find a stick. In Latin, "Qui vult caedere canem facile invenit fustem." If you want to abuse a person, you will easily find something to blame. Dean Swift says, "If you want to throw a stone, every lane will furnish one."

"To him who wills, ways will not be wanting." "Where there's a will there's a way."

Hungry dogs will eat dirty pudding.

Those really hungry are not particular about what they eat, and are by no means dainty. When Darius in his flight from Greece drank from a ditch defiled with dead carcasses, he declared he had never drunk so pleasantly before.

It was the story of the dog and the shadow — i.e.

of one who throws good money after bad; of one who gives certa pro incertis. The allusion is to the well-known fable.

“Illudit species, ac dentibus aëra mordit.”

(Down sank the meat in the stream for the fishes to hoard it.)

Love me love my dog. “Qui m'aime aime mon chien,” or “Qui aime Bertrand aime son chien. “ Old dogs will not learn new tricks. People in old age do not readily conform to new ways.

To call off the dogs.

To break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase, if the dogs are on the wrong track, the huntsman calls them off. (French, rompre les chiens.)

Throw it to the dogs.

Throw it away, it is useless and worthless. What! keep a dog and bark myself! Must I keep servants and myself do their work? You are like Neville's dog, which runs away when it is called. (See Chien.)

(9) DOG, DOGS, in Superstitions:

Dogs howl at death. A wide—spread superstition.

“In the rabbinical book it saith

The dogs howl when, with icy breath,

Great Sammaël, the angel of death,

Takes thro' the town his flight.”

Longfellow: Golden Legend, iii.

The hair of the dog that bit you.

When a man has had a debauch, he is advised to take next morning “a hair of the same dog,” in allusion to an ancient notion that the burnt hair of a dog is an antidote to its bite.

(10) DOG, to express the male of animals, as dog—ape, dog—fox, dog—otter.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(11) DOG, applied to inferior plants: dog—brier, dog—berry, dog—cabbage, dog—daisy, dog—fennel, dog—leek, dog—lichen, dog—mercury, dog—parsley, dog—violets (which have no perfume), dog—wheat.

(See below, Dog—Grass, Dog—Rose.)

Dog and Duck A public—house sign, to announce that ducks were hunted by dogs within. The sport was to see the duck dive, and the dog after it. At Lambeth there was a famous pleasure—resort so called, on the spot where Bethlehem Hospital now stands.

Dog—cheap

A perversion of the old English god—chepe (a good bargain). French, bon marché (good—cheap or bargain).

“The sack ... would have bought me lights as good—cheap at the dearest chandler's in Europe.” — Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., iii. 3.

Dog—days

Days of great heat. The Romans called the six or eight hottest weeks of the summer caniculares dies. According to their theory, the dog—star or Sirius, rising with the sun, added to its heat, and the dog—days bore the combined heat of the dog—star and the sun. (July 3rd to August 11th.)

Dog—fall

(in wrestling), when both wrestlers fall together.

Dog—grass

(triticum repens). Grass eaten by dogs when they have lost their appetite; it acts as an emetic and purgative.

Dog—head

(in machinery). That which bites or holds the gun—flint.

Dog—headed Tribes

of India. Mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerino Meschino.

Dog—Latin

Pretended or mongrel Latin. An excellent example is Stevens' definition of a kitchen: As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is “camera necessaria pro usus cookare; cum saucepannis, stewpannis, scullero, dressero, coalholo, stovis, smoak—jacko; pro rostandum, boilandum, fryandum, et plum—pudding—mixandum ...”

A Law Report

(Daniel v. Dishclout).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dog—leech

(A). A dog — doctor. Formerly applied to a medical practitioner; it expresses great contempt.

Dog—rose

Botanical name, Cynorrhodos — i.e. Greek Kuno—rodon, dog—rose; so called because it was supposed to cure the bite of a mad dog (Rosa Canina, wild briar).

“A morsu vero [i.e. of a mad dog] unicum remedium oraculo quodam nuper repertum, radix sylvestris rosæ. quæ cynorrhodos appellatur.” —

Pliny: Natural History,

viii. 63; xxv. 6.

Dog—sick

Sick as a dog. We also say “Sick as a cat.” The Bible speaks of dogs “returning to their vomit again” (Prov. xxvi. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 22).

Dog—sleep

(A). A pretended sleep. Dogs seem to sleep with “one eye open.”

Dog—star

The brightest star in the firmament. (See Dog—Days .)

Dog—vane

(A). A cockade.

“Dog—vane is a term familiarly applied to a cockade.” — Smyth: Sailors' Word—book.

Dog—watch

A corruption of dodgewatch: two short watches, one from four to six, and the other from six to eight in the evening, introduced to dodge the routine, or prevent the same men always keeping watch at the same time. (See Watch.)

Dog—whipper

(A). A beadle who whips all dogs from the precincts of a church. At one time there was a church officer so called. Even so recently as 1856. Mr. John Pickard was appointed “dog—whipper” in Exeter Cathedral, “in the room of Mr. Charles Reynolds, deceased.” (Exeter Gazette.)

Dog—whipping Day

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

October 18th (St. Luke's Day). It is said that a dog once swallowed the consecrated wafer in York Minster on this day.

Dogs

(a military term). The 17th Lancers or Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers. The crest of this famous cavalry regiment is a Death's Head and Cross—bones, OR GLORY, whence the acrostic Death Or Glory

(D.O.G.).

The Spartan injunction, when the young soldier was presented with his shield, was, "With this, or On this," which meant the same thing.

Dogs

in Stock—Exchange phraseology, means Newfoundland Telegraph shares — that is, Newfoundland dogs. (See Stock—Exchange Slang.)

Dogs

Isle of Dogs. When Greenwich was a place of royal residence, the kennel for the monarch's hounds was on the opposite side of the river, hence called the "Isle of Dogs."

Dogs

(Green). Extinct like the Dodo. Brederode said to Count Louis, "I would the whole race of bishops and cardinals were extinct, like that of green dogs." (Motley: Dutch Republic, part ii. 5.)

Dogs'—ears

The corners of leaves crumpled and folded down.

Dogs'—eared.

Leaves so crumpled and turned up. The ears of many dogs turn down and seem quite limp.

Dogs'—meat

Food unfit for consumption by human beings.

Dogs'—meat and cats'—meat.

Food cheap and nasty.

Dog's—nose

Gin and beer.

"`Dog's—nose, which is, I believe, a mixture of gin and beer.'

"`So it is,' said an old lady." — Pickwick Papers.

D

Dogged

He dogged me, i.e. followed me about like a dog; shadowed me.

Dogged

(2 syl.). Sullen, snappish, like a dog.

Dogaressa

(g = j). The wife of a doge.

Dogberry

An ignorant, self—satisfied, overbearing, but good—natured night—constable in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing.

Doge

(1 syl., g = j). The chief magistrate in Venice while it was a Republic. The first duke or doge was Anafesto Paoluccio, created 697. The chief magistrate of Genoa was called a doge down to 1797, when the Republican form of Government was abolished by the French. (Latin, dux, a “duke” or “leader.”

“For six hundred years ... her [Venice's] government was an elective monarchy, her ... doge possessing, in early times at least, as much independent authority as any other European sovereign.” —Ruskin: Stones of Venice, vol. i. chap. i.p. 3.

Doge.

The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was instituted in 1174 by Pope Alexander III., who gave the doge a gold ring from off his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istria over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the Pope's quarrel. When his Holiness gave the ring he desired the doge to throw a similar one into the sea every year on Ascension Day, in commemoration of the event. (See Bucentaur.)

Dirty dog.

(See under DOG, No. 5.) This alludes more to the animal called a dog, but implies the idea of badness.

Dogget

Dogget's coat and badge. The first prize in the Thames rowing—match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalled the accession of George I. to the throne by giving a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize. The race is from the “Swan” at London Bridge to the “Swan” at Chelsea.

Doggerel

Inferior sort of verse in rhymes.

Dogma

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Greek). A religious doctrine formally stated. It now means a statement resting on the ipse dixit of the speaker. Dogmatic teaching used to mean the teaching of religious doctrines, but now dogmatic means overbearing and dictatorial. (Greek dogma, gen. dogmatos, a matter of opinion; verb dokeo, to think, whence dogmatizo.)

Dogmatic Facts

(1) The supreme authority of the Pope of Rome over all churches. (2) His right to decide arbitrarily all controversies.

(3) His right to convoke councils at will.

(4) His right to revise, repeal, or confirm decrees.

(5) His right to issue decrees bearing on discipline, morals and doctrine. (6) The Pope is the centre of communion, and separation from him is excommunication. (7) He has ultimate authority to appoint all bishops.

(8) He has power to depose any ecclesiastic.

(9) He has power to judge every question of doctrine, and pronounce infallibly what the Church shall or shall not accept.

Dogmatic School of Medicine Founded by Hippocrates, and so called because it set out certain dogmas or theoretical principles which it made the basis of practice.

Dogmatic Theology

is that which treats of the dogmata (doctrines) of religion.

Doiley

(See Doyley .)

Doit

(1 syl.). Not a doit. The doit was a Scotch silver coin = one—third of a farthing. In England the doit was a base coin of small value prohibited by 3 Henry V. c.1.

“When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian.” — Shakespeare: The Tempest, ii.2.

Dolabra

A Roman axe.

Dolabra fossoria.

The pickaxe used by miners and excavators. Dolabra pontificalis. The priest's hatchet for slaughtering animals.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dolce far Niente

(Italian). Delightful idleness. Pliny has "Jucundum tamen nihil agere" (Ep. viii. 9).

Doldrums

(The). The name given to that region of the ocean near the equator noted for calms, squalls, and baffling winds, between the N.E. and S.E. tradewinds.

"But from the bluff—head, where I watched to—day.

I saw her in the doldrums."

Byron: The Island,

canto ii. stanza 21.

In the doldrums.

In the dumps.

Dole

lamentation, from the Latin doleo, to grieve.

"He [the dwarf] found the dead bodies, wherefore he made great dole" — S. Lanier: King Arthur, book i. chap. xiv.

Dole

a portion allotted, is the Anglo Saxon dál, a portion.

"Heaven has in store a precious dole."

Keble: Christian Year

(4th Sunday after Trinity).

Happy man be his dole. May his share or lot be that of a happy or fortunate man.

"Wherein, happy man be his dole, I trust that I Shall not speed worst, and that very quickly." Damon and Pythias, i. 177.

Dole—fish

The share of fish allotted to each one of a company of fishermen in a catch. Dole = the part dealt to anyone. (Anglo—Saxon, dál or dæl, from the verb dael—an, to divide into parts.)

Doll Money

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A lady of Duxford left a sum of money to be given away annually in the parish, and to be called Doll Money. Doll is a corruption of dole, Saxon dál (a share distributed).

Dollar

Marked thus $, either scutum or 8, a dollar being a “piece of eight” [reals]. The two lines indicate a contraction, as in lb.

The word is a variant of thaler (Low German, dahler; Danish, daler, and means “a valley,” our dale. The counts of Schlick, at the close of the fifteenth century, extracted from the mines at Joachim's thal (Joachim's valley) silver which they coined into ounce—pieces. These pieces, called Joachim's—thalers, gained such high repute that they became a standard coin. Other coins being made like them were called thalers only. The American dollar equals 100 cents, in English money a little more than four shillings.

Dolly Murrey

A character in Crabbe's Borough, who died playing cards.

“`A vole! a vole!' she cried. `tis fairly won.

This said she, gently, with a single sigh,

Died as one taught and practised how to die.” Crabbe: Borough.

Dolly Shop

A shop where rags and refuse are bought and sold. So called from the black doll suspended over it as a sign. Dolly shops are, in reality, no better than unlicensed pawnshops. A black doll used to be the sign hung out to denote the sale of silks and muslins which were fabricated by Indians.

Dolmen

A name given in France to what we term “cromlechs.” These ancient remains are often called by the rural population devils' tables, fairies' tables, and so on. (Celtic, stone tables.) It consists of a slab resting on unhewn upright stones. Plural dolmens (dol, a table; men, a stone).

“The Indian dolmens ... may be said to be identical with those of Western Europe.” — J. Lubbock: Prehistoric Times, chap.v. p. 129.

Dolopatos

A French metrical version of Sandabar's Parables, written by Hebers or Herbers or Prince Philippe, afterwards called Philippe le Hardi. Dolopatos is the Sicilian king, and Virgil the tutor of his son Lucinien. (See Seven Wise Masters.)

Dolorous Dettie

(The). John Skelton wrote an elegy on Henry Percy, fourth Earl of Northumberland, who fell a victim to the avarice of Henry VII. (1489). This elegy he entitled thus: “Upon the Dolorous Dettie and Much Lamentable Chance of the Most Honorable Earl of Northumberland.”

Dolphin

Called a sea—goose (oie de mer) from the form of its snout, termed in French bec d'oie (a goose's beak). The dolphin is noted for its changes of colour when taken out of the water.

“Parting day

Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues

With a new colour as it gasps away,

The last still loveliest.”

Byron: Childe Harold,

canto iv. stanza 29.

Dolphin

(The), in mediæval art, symbolises social love.

Dom

A title applied in the Middle Ages to the Pope, and at a somewhat later period to other Church dignitaries. It is now restricted to priests and choir monks among the Benedictines, and some few other monastic orders, as Dom Mabillon, Dom Calmet. The Spanish don, Portuguese dom, German von, and French de, are pretty well equivalent to it. (Latin, dominus.)

Dombey

(Florence). A motherless child, hungering and thirsting to be loved, but regarded with frigid indifference by her father, who thinks that sons alone are worthy of his regard. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Mr. Dombey.

A self—sufficient, purse—proud, frigid merchant, who feels satisfied there is but one Dombey in the world, and that is himself. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Dom—Daniel

The abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, somewhere “under the roots of the ocean,” but not far from Babylon. (Continuation of the Arabian Tales.)

“In the Domdaniel caverns

Under the roots of the ocean.” Southey

Domesday Book

consists of two volumes, one a large folio, and the other a quarto, the material of each being vellum. It was formerly kept in the Exchequer, under three different locks and keys, but is now kept in the Record Office.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The date of the survey is 1086.

Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham are not included in the survey, though parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland are taken.

The value of all estates is given, firstly, as in the time of the Confessor; secondly, when bestowed by the Conqueror; and, thirdly, at the time of the survey. It is also called The King's Book, and The Winchester Roll because it was kept there. Printed in facsimile in 1783 and 1816.

Stow says the book was so called because it was deposited in a part of Winchester Cathedral called Domus—dei, and that the word is a contraction of Domus—dei book; more likely it is connected with the previous surveys made by the Saxon kings, and called dom—bocs (libri judiciales), because every case of dispute was decided by an appeal to these registers.

“Then seyde Gamelyn to the Justice ...

Thou hast given domes that bin evil dight, I will sitten in thy sete, and dresen him aright.” Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Cookes Tale).

Domestic

England's domestic poet. William Cowper, author of The Task. (1731—1800.)

Domestic Poultry

in Dryden's Hind and Panther, means the Roman Catholic clergy. So called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel at Whitehall. The nuns are termed “sister partlet with her hooded head.”

Domiciliary Visit

(A). An official visit to search the house.

Dominic

(St.) (1170—1221.) A Spanish priest who founded the Inquisition, and the order called the Dominicans or Preaching Friars. He was called by the Pope “Inquisitor — General,” and was canonised by Gregory IX.

Some say the Inquisition existed in 1184, when Dominic was under fourteen years of age. He is represented with a sparrow at his side, and a dog carrying in its mouth a burning torch. The devil, it is said, appeared to the saint in the form of a sparrow, and the dog refers to a dream which his mother had during pregnancy. She dreamt that she had given birth to a dog, spotted with black and white spots, which lighted the world with a burning torch.

He is also represented sometimes with a city in his hand and a star either on his forehead or on his breast; sometimes also with a sword in his hand and a pile of books burning beside him, to denote his severity with heretics.

Dominical Letters

The letters which denote the Sundays or dies dominica. The first seven letters of the alphabet are employed; so that if A stands for the first Sunday in the year, the other six letters will stand for the other days of the week, and the octave Sunday will come round to A again. In this case A will be the Sunday or Dominical Letter for the whole year.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dominicans

Preaching friars founded by Dominic de Guzman, at Toulouse, in 1215. Formerly called in England Black Friars, from their black dress, and in France Jacobins, because their mother—establishment in Paris was in the Rue St. Jacques.

Dominie Sampson

A village schoolmaster and scholar, poor as a church mouse, and modest as a girl. He cites Latin like a porcus literarum, and exclaims “Prodigious!” (Scott: Guy Mannering.) (See Stilling.)

Dominions

One of the orders of angels, symbolised in Christian art by an ensign.

Domino

(A). A hood worn by canons; a mask.

“Ce nom, qu'on donnait autrefois, par allusion a quelque passage de la liturgie, au camail dont les prêtres se couvrent la tête et les épaules pendant l'hiver, ne désigne aujourd'hui qu'un habit de déguisement pour les bals masqués.” — Bouillet: Dictionnaire des Sciences, etc.

Dominoes

(3 syl.). The teeth; also called ivories. Dominoes are made of ivory.

Domisellus

The son of a king, prince, knight, or lord before he has entered on the order of knighthood. Also an attendant on some abbot or nobleman. The person domiciled in your house. Hence the king's body—guards were called his damoiseaux or damsels.

Froissart styles Richard II. le jeune damoiseil Richart. Similarly Louis VII. (Le Jeune) was called the royal damsel.

“Damoisel ou Damoiseau designait autrefois les fils de chevaliers, de barons, et toutes les jeunes gentilshommes qui n'étaient pas encore chevaliers. On le donnait aussi aux fils des rois qui n'étaient pas encore en état de porter les armes.” — Bouillet: Dict. Universel.

Domisellus and domisella are diminutives of dominus, a lord. In old French we find damoiseau and damoiselle. The word Ma—demoiselle is ma domisella or damoiselle.

Don

is do—on, as “Don your bonnet.” (See Doff, Dup .)

“Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,

And dupp'd the chamber door.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, iv. 5.

Don

A man of mark, an aristocrat. At the universities the masters, fellows, and noblemen are termed dons. (Spanish.)

Don Giovanni

Mozart's best opera. (See Don Juan .)

Don Juan

A native of Seville, son of Don José and Donna Inez, a blue—stocking. When Juan was sixteen years old he got into trouble with Donna Julia, and was sent by his mother, then a widow, on his travels. His adventures form the story of the poem, which is incomplete. (Byron: Don Juan.)

A Don Juan.

A libertine of the aristocratic class. The original of this character was Don Juan Tenorio of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century. The traditions concerning him have been dramatised by Triso de Molina; thence passed into Italy and France. Glück has a musical ballet of Don Juan, and Mozart has immortalised the character in his opera of Don Giovanni (1787).

Don Quixote

(2 syl.). A gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, gentle and dignified, affectionate and simple—minded, but so crazed by reading books of knight—errantry that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world, and actually goes forth to avenge the oppressed and run a tilt with their oppressors. The word Quixote means The cuish—armed. (See Quixotic.)

A Don Quixote.

A dreamy, unpractical man, with a “bee in his bonnet.”

Donation of Pepin

(The). When Pepin conquered Ataulf the ex—archate of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave both the ex—archate and the Republic of Rome to the Pope, and this munificent gift is the famous “Donation” on which rested the whole fabric of the temporal power of the Popes of Rome (A.D. 755).

Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, dispossessed the Pope of his temporal dominions, and added the Papal States to the united kingdom of Italy (1870).

Donatists

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Followers of Donatus, a Numidian bishop who opposed Cecilianus. Their chief dogma is that the outward church is nothing, “for the letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life.” (Founded 314.)

Doncaster

Sigebert, monk of Gemblours, in 1100, derived this word from Thong—ceaster, the “Castle of the thong,” and says that Hengist and Horsa purchased of the British king as much land as he could encompass with a leather thong. The thong was cut into strips, and encompassed the land occupied by the city of Doncaster.

This is the old tale of Dido and the hide, and so is the Russian Yakutsk. (See Bursa.) Of course it means the “City on the river Don.” (Celtic, Don, that which spreads.)

Dondasch'

An Oriental giant contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, as he could destroy anything by the mere force of his arms.

Done Brown

He was done brown. Completely bamboozled or made a fool of. This is a variety of the many expressions of a similar meaning connected with cooking, such as “I gave him a roasting,” “I cooked his goose,” “I cut him into mince—meat,” “I put him into a pretty stew,” “I settled his hash,” “He was dished up,” “He was well dressed” [drubbed], “He was served out,” etc. (See Cooking.) or Regularly done for. Utterly ruined. This “for” is the adverb=thoroughly, very common as a prefix.

Done For

Done Up

Thoroughly tired and wearied out. Up means ended, completed, as the “game is up” (over, finished), and adverbially it means “completely,” hence to be “done up” is to be exhausted completely.

Donegild

(3 syl.). The wicked mother of Alla, King of Northumberland. Hating Cunstance because she was a Christian, she put her on a raft with her infant son, and turned her adrift. When Alla returned from Scotland and discovered this cruelty of his mother, he put her to death. (Chaucer: Man of Lawes Tale.)

The tradition of St. Mungo resembles the Man of Lawes Tale in many respects.

Donkey

An ass. It was made to rhyme with “monkey,” but is never now so pronounced. The word means a little tawny or dun—coloured animal.

Donkey.

The cross of the donkey's back is popularly attributed to the honour conferred on the beast by our Lord, who rode on an ass in “His triumphant entry” into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. (See Christian Traditions.)

The donkey means one thing and the driver another.

Different people see from different standpoints, their own interest in every case directing their judgment. The allusion is to a fable in Phædrus, where a donkey—driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack—saddles. “No,” says the man. “Then,” replies the donkey, “what care I whether you are my master or someone else?”

To ride the black donkey.

To be pigheaded, obstinate like a donkey. Black is added, not so much to designate the colour, as to express what is bad.

Two more, and up goes the donkey — i.e.

two pennies more, and the donkey shall be balanced on the top of the pole or ladder. It is said to a braggart, and means — what you have said is wonderful, but if we admit it without gainsaying we shall soon be treated with something still more astounding.

Who ate the donkey?

When the French were in their flight from Spain, after the battle of Vittoria, some stragglers entered a village and demanded rations. The villagers killed a donkey, and served it to their hated foes. Next day they continued their flight, and were waylaid by the villagers, who assaulted them most murderously, jeering them as they did so with the shout, “Who ate the donkey?”

Who stole the donkey?

This was for many years a jeer against policemen. When the force was first established a donkey was stolen, but the police failed to discover the thief, and this failure gave rise to the laugh against them.

Who stole the donkey?

Answer: “The man with the white hat.” It was said, in the middle of the nineteenth century, that white hats were made of the skins of donkeys, and that many donkeys were stolen and sold to hatters.

Donkey Engine

(A). A small engine of from two to four horse—power.

Dony

Florimel's dwarf. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book iii. canto 5.)

Donzel

(Italian). A squire or young man of good birth.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“He is esquire to a knight—errant, donzel to the damsels.”— Butler: Characters.

Doolin

of Mayence. The hero of a French romance of chivalry, and the father of Ogier the Dane.

Doolin's Sword.

Merveilleuse (wonderful). (See Sword.)

Doom

The crack of doom. The signal for the final judgment.

Doom Book

(dom—boc) is the book of dooms or judgments compiled by King Alfred. (See Domesday Book.)

Doom—rings or Circles of Judgment. An Icelandic term for circles of stones resembling Stonehenge and Avebury.

Doomsday Sedgwick

William Sedgwick, a fanatical prophet and preacher during the Commonwealth. He pretended to have had it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.

Doomstead

The horse of the Scandinavian Nornes or Fates. (See Horse .)

Door

(Greek, thura; Anglo—Saxon, dora.)

The door must be either shut or open.

It must be one way or the other. This is from a French comedy called Le Grondeur, where the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open. The servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds: “Do you wish it shut?” — “No.” — “Do you wish it open?” —

“No.” — “Why,” says the man, “it must be either shut or open.” He laid the charge at my door. He accused me of doing it. Next door to it. As, if not so, it was next door to it, i.e. very like it, next—door neighbour to it. Sin lieth at the door (Gen. iv. 7). The blame of sin lies at the door of the wrong—doer, and he must take the consequences.

Door Nail

(See Dead .) Scrooge's partner is “dead as a door—nail.” (Dickens. Christmas Carol, chap. i.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Door—opener

(The). So Crates, the Theban, was called, because every morning he used to go round Athens and rebuke the people for their late rising.

Door—tree

(A) The wooden bar of a door to secure it at night from intruders. Also a door—post.

Doors

[house]. As, come indoors, go indoors. So Virgil: “Tum foribus divæ ... [Dido]... resedit.” (Then Dido seated herself in the house or temple of the goddess.) (Æneid, i. 505.)

Out of doors.

Outside the house; in the open air.

Doorm

An earl called “the Bull,” who tried to make Enid his handmaid; but, when she would neither eat, drink, nor array herself in bravery at his bidding, “he smote her on the cheek;” whereupon her lord and husband, Count Geraint, starting up, slew the “russet—bearded earl” in his own hall. (Tennyson Idylls of the King; Enid.)

Dora

The first wife of David Copperfield; she was a child—wife, but no help—meet. She could do nothing of practical use, but looked on her husband with idolatrous love. Tennyson has a poem entitled Dora.

Dorado

(El). (See El Dorado .)

Dorax

A Portuguese renegade, in Dryden's Don Sebastian — by far the best of all his characters.

Dorcas Society

A society for supplying the poor with clothing. So called from Dorcas, mentioned in Acts ix.

39.

Dorchester As big as a Dorchester butt. Very corpulent, like the butts of Dorchester. Of Toby Filpot it is said:

“His breath—doors of life on a sudden were shut,

And he died full as big as a Dorchester butt.”

O'Keefe: Poor Soldier.

Doric

The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the Grecian orders of architecture. So called from Doris, in Greece, or the Dorians who employed it. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. The former stands on the pavement without fillet or other ornament and the flutes are not scalloped. The Roman column is placed on a plinth, has fillets, and the flutings, both top and bottom, are scalloped.

Doric Dialect

The dialect spoken by the natives of Doris, in Greece. It was broad and hard. Hence, any broad dialect.

Doric Land

Greece, Doris being a part of Greece.

“Through all the bounds

Of Doric laud.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, book 1. 510.

Doric Reed

Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste, and solid. The Dorians were the pastoral people of Greece, and their dialect was that of the country rustics. Our own Bloomfield and Robert Burns are examples of British Doric.

“The Dorie reed once more

Well pleased. I tune.”

Thomson Autumn. 3—4.

Doricourt

A sort of Tremain of the eighteenth century, who, having over—refined his taste by the “grand tour,” considers English beauties insipid. He falls in love with Letitia Hardy at a masquerade, after feeling aversion to her in her assumed character of a hoyden. (Mrs. Cowley The Belle's Stratagem.)

Dorigen

A lady of high family, who married Arviragus out of pity for his love and meekness. She was greatly beloved by Aurelius, to whom she had been long known. Aurelius, during the absence of Arviragus, tried to win the heart of the young wife; but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to him till the rocks that beset the coast of Britain are removed “and there n'is no stone yseen.” Aurelius, by the aid of a young magician of Orleans, caused all the rocks to disappear, and claimed his reward. Dorigen was very sad, but her husband insisted that she should keep her word, and she went to meet Aurelius. When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and heard what Arviragus had counselled, he said he would rather die than injure so true a wife and noble a gentleman. So she returned to her husband happy and untainted. (See Dianora.) (Chaucer: Franklines Tale.)

Dorimant

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Drawn from the Earl of Rochester; a witty, aristocratic libertine, in Etherege's Man of Mode.

Dorinda

in the verses of the Earl of Dorset, is Catherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester, mistress of James

II.

Dormer Window

The window of an attic standing out from the slope of the roof. (O. French, dormeor = a sleeping room formerly fitted with windows of this kind.)

“Thatched were the roofs, with dormer windows.”

Longfellow: Evangeline,

part i. stanza 1.

Dornock

Stout figured linen for tablecloths; so called from a town in Scotland, where it was originally made.

Dorothea

(St.), represented with a rose—branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side; sometimes with an angel carrying a basket with three apples and three roses. The legend is that Theophilus, the judge's secretary, scoffingly said to her, as she was going to execution, “Send me some fruit and roses, Dorothea, when you get to Paradise.” Immediately after her execution, while Theophilus was at dinner with a party of companions, a young angel brought to him a basket of apples and roses, saying,

“From Dorothea, in Paradise,” and vanished. Theophilus, of course, was a convert from that moment.

Dorset

Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves Dwr—trigs (water—dwellers). The Romans colonised the settlement, and Latinised Dwr—trigs into Duro—triges. Lastly came the Saxons, and translated the original words into their own tongue, dor—sætta (water—dwellers).

Dorsetian Downs

The Downs of Dorsetshire.

“Spread the pure Dorsetian downs in boundless prospect.”

Thomson: Autumn.

Dositheans

A religious sect which sprang up in the first century; so called because they believed that Dositheus had a divine mission superior to that of prophets and apostles.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Doson

A promise—maker and a promise—breaker. Antigonos, grandson of Demetrios the besieger, was so called.

Doss

A hassock stuffed with straw; a bed — properly, a straw bed; whence the cant word for a lodging—house is a dossingken. Dossel is an old word for a bundle of hay or straw, and dosser for a straw basket. These words were common in Elizabeth's reign. The French dossier means a “bundle.”

Doss—house

(A). A cheap lodging—house where the poorer classes sleep on bundles of straw. (See above.) In the New Review (Aug., 1894) there is an article entitled “In a Woman's Doss—house,” which throws much light on the condition of the poor in London.

Dosser

One who sleeps in a low or cheap hired dormitory. The verb doss = to sleep.

Do—the—Boys' Hall

A school where boys were taken in and done for by a Mr. Squeers, a puffing, ignorant, over—bearing brute, who starved them and taught them nothing. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.)

It is said that Mr. Squeers is a caricature of Mr. Shaw, a Yorkshire schoolmaster; but Mr. Shaw was a kind—hearted man, and his boys were well fed, happy, and not ill—taught. Like Squeers he had only one eye, and like Squeers he had a daughter. It is said that his school was ruined by Dickens's caricature.

Dot and go One

(A). An infant just beginning to toddle; one who limps in walking; a person who has one leg longer than the other.

Dotterel

or Dottrel. A doting old fool; an old man easily cajoled. The bird thus called, a species of plover, is said to be so fond of imitation that any one who excites its curiosity by strange antics may catch it.

To dor the dotterel.

Dor is an archaic word meaning to trick or cheat. Whence the phrase to “dor the dotterel” means to cheat the simpleton.

Douay Bible The English translation of the Bible sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church. The Old Testament was published by the English college at Douay, in France, in 1609; but the New Testament was published at Rheims in 1582. The English college at Douay was founded by William Allen (afterwards cardinal) in 1568. The Douay Bible translates such words as repentance by the word penance, etc., and the whole contains notes by Roman Catholic divines.

Double

(To). To pass or sail round, as “to double the cape.” The cape (or point) is twice between the ship and the land. (French, doubler; Latin, duoplico.)

“What capes he doubled, and what continent,

The gulfs and straits that strangely he had past.” Dryden: Ideas, stanza 1.

Double Dealing

Professing one thing and doing another inconsistent with that promise.

“[She] was quite above all double—dealing. She had no mental reservation.” — Maria Edgeworth.

Double Dutch

Gibberish, jargon, or a foreign tongue not understood by the hearer. Dutch is a synonym for foreign; and double is simply excessive, in a twofold degree.

Double—edged Sword

Literally, a sword which cuts either way; metaphorically, an argument which makes both for and against the person employing it, or which has a double meaning.

“`Your Delphic sword,' the panther then replied, `Is double—edged, and cuts on either side.'” Dryden: Hind and Panther, part iii. 191—2.

Double Entendre

(English—French for Un mot a double entente, or à deux ententes). Words which secretly express a rude or coarse covert meaning, generally of a licentious character. “Entendre” is the infinitive mood of a verb, and is never used as a noun.

Double First

(A). In the first class both of the classical and mathematical final examination in the Oxford University; or of the classical and mathematical triposes of the University of Cambridge.

Double—headed Eagle

(The). The German eagle has its head turned to our left hand, and the Roman eagle to our right hand. When Charlemagne was made “Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire,” he joined the two heads together, one looking east and the other west.

Double—tongued

One who makes contrary declarations on the same subject at different times; deceitful.

“Be grave, not double—tongued.” — 1 Tim. iii.8.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Double up

(To). To fold together. “To double up the fist” is to fold the fingers together so as to make the hand into a fist.

I doubled him up. I struck him in the wind, so as to make him double up with pain, or so as to leave him “all of a heap.”

Double X

(See XX.)

Double or Quits

The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw he pays nothing, and neither player loses or wins anything. This is often done when the stake is 3d., and the parties have no copper: if the loser loses again, he pays 6d.; if not, the winner does not claim his 3d.

Doubles

or Double—walkers. Those aerial duplicates of men or women who represent them so minutely as to deceive those who know them. We apply the word to such persons as the Dromio brothers, the Corsican brothers, and the brothers Antipholus. The “head centre Stephens” is said to have had a double, who was perpetually leading astray those set to hunt him down.

Doubting Castle

The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called “Promise.” (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress.)

Douceur'

(French.) A gratuity for service rendered or promised.

Douglas

The tutelary saint of the house of Douglas is St. Bridget. According to tradition, a Scottish king in 770, whose ranks had been broken by the fierce onset of the Lord of the Isles saw, the tide of battle turned in his favour by an unknown chief. After the battle the king asked who was the “Du—glass” chieftain, his deliverer, and received for answer Sholto Du—glass (Behold the dark—grey man you inquired for). The king then rewarded him with the Clydesdale valley for his services.

“`Let him not cross or thwart me.' said the page; `for I will not yield him an inch of way, had he in his body the soul of every Douglas that has lived since the time of the Dark Gray Man.'” — Scott: The Abbot, chap. xxviii.

Black Douglas,

introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Castle Dangerous, is James, eighth Lord Douglas, who twice took Douglas Castle from the English by stratagem. The first time he partly burnt it, and the second time he utterly razed it to the ground. The castle, says Godscroft, was nicknamed the hazardous or dangerous, because every one who attempted to keep it from the “gud schyr James” was in constant jeopardy by his wiles.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The Good Sir James, the dreadful blacke Douglas'

That in his dayes so wise and worthie was,

Wha here and on the infidels of Spain,

Such honour, praise, and triumphs did obtain.” Gordon.

The person generally called “Black Douglas” is William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died in 1390. It was of this Douglas that Sir W. Scott said —

“The name of this indefatigable chief has become so formidable, that women used, in the northern counties, to still their froward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas.” — History of Scotland, chap. xi.

Douglas Tragedy

(The). A ballad in Scott's Border Minstrelsy. Lord William steals away Lady Margaret Douglas, but is pursued by her father and two brothers. Being overtaken, a fight ensues, in which the father and his two sons are sore wounded. Lord William, wounded, creeps to his mother's house, and there dies; the lady before sunrise next morning dies also.

Douse the Glim

Put out the light; also knock out a man's eye. To douse is to lower in haste, as “Douse the top—sail” Glim, gleam, glimmer, are variants of the same word.

“`And so you would turn honest, Captain Goffe, agrazing, would ye,' said an old weather—beaten pirate who had but one eye; `what though he ... made my eye dowse the glim

... he is an honest man' ...” — The Pirate, chap. xxxiii.

Dousterswivel

A German swindler, who obtains money under the promise of finding buried wealth by a divining rod. (Scott: Antiquary.)

Dout

A contraction of do—out, as don is of do—on, doff of do—off, and dup of do—up. In Devonshire and other southern counties they still say Dout the candle and Dout the fire. In some counties extinguishers are called douters.

“The dram of base

Doth all the noble substance dout.”

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 4.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dove

— i.e. the diver—bird; perhaps so called from its habit of ducking the head. So also columba (the Latin for dove) is the Greek kolumbis (a diver).

Dove

(The). The dove, in Christian art, symbolises the Holy Ghost. In church windows the seven rays proceeding from the dove signify the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolises the human soul, and as such is represented coming out of the mouth of saints at death.

A dove with six wings is emblematic of the Church of Christ. The seven gifts of the Holy Ghost are: (1) counsel, (2) the fear of the Lord, (3) fortitude, (4) piety, (5) understanding, (6) wisdom, and (7) knowledge.

Doves

or pigeons not eaten as food in Russia. (See Christian Traditions.) Doves or pigeons. The clergy of the Church of England are allegorised under this term in Dryden's Hind and Panther, part iii. 947, 998—1002.

“A sort of doves were housed too near the hall ... [i.e. the private chapel at Whitehall]

Our pampered pigeons, with malignant eyes,

Beheld these inmates [the Roman Catholic clergy].

Tho' hard their fare, at evening and at morn,

A cruse of water and an ear of corn,

Yet still they grudged that modicum.”

Soiled doves.

Women of the demi—monde.

Doves' Dung

In 2 Kings vi. 25, during the siege of Samaria, “there was a great famine ... and ... an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung [hariyonim] for five pieces of silver.” This “hariyonim” was a plant called chickpea, a common article of food still sold to pilgrims on their way to Mecca.

“In Damascus there are many tradesmen whose sole occupation is preparing [hariyonim] for sale. They have always been esteemed as provision meet for a lengthy journey, and are a necessary part of the outfit of all who travel in the remote parts of Syria and Asia Minor.”— Bible Flowers, p. 71.

Dover

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(A). A réchauffé or cooked food done over again. In the professional slang of English cooks a resurrection dish is still called a dover (do over again).

Dover

When Dover and Calais meet — i.e. never.

A jack of Dover.

A “jack” is a small drinking vessel made of waxed leather, and a “jack of Dover” is a bottle of wine made up of fragments of opened bottles. It is customary to pour the refuse into a bottle, cork it up, and sell it as a fresh bottle. This is called dovering, a corruption of do—over, because the cork is done over with wax or resin.

“Many a jack of Dover hast thou sold.”

Chaucer: Coke's Prologue.

Dovers

(Stock Exchange term). The South—Eastern railway shares. The line runs to Dover. (See Claras; Stock Exchange Slang.)

Dovercot

or Dovercourt. A confused gabble; a Babel. According to legend, Dover Court church, in Essex, once possessed a cross that spoke; and Foxe says the crowd to the church was so great “that no man could shut the door.” The confusion of this daily throng gave rise to the term.

“And now the rood of Dovercot did speak,

Confirming his opinions to be true.”

Collier of Croydon.

Dovetail

Metaphorically, to fit on or fit in nicely; to correspond. It is a word in carpentry, and means the fitting one board into another by a tenon in the shape of a dove's tail, or wedge reversed.

Dowgate Ward

(London). Some derive it from Dour (water), it being next to the Thames, at the foot of the hill; others say it is “Down—gate,” the gate of the down, dune, or hill, as Brighton Downs (hills),

South—downs, etc.

Dowlas

(Mr.). A generic name for a linendraper, who sells dowlas, a coarse linen cloth, so called from Doulens in Picardy, where it is manufactured.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dowling

(Captain). A character in Crabbe's Borough; a great drunkard, who died in his cups.

“ ‘Come, fill my glass.’ He took it and he went” (i.e. died). Letter xvi.

Down

He is quite down in the mouth. Out of spirits; disheartened. When persons are very sad and low—spirited, the corners of the mouth are drawn down. “Down in the jib” is a nautical phrase of the same meaning.

Down in the Dumps

Low—spirited.

Down on Him

(To be). I was down on him in a minute. I pounced on him directly; I detected his trick immediately. Also to treat harshly. The allusion is to birds of prey.

Down on his Luck

In ill—luck.

“ ‘I guess, stranger, you'll find me an ex—president down on his luck.’ ” — A. Egmont Hake: Paris Originals (Professors of Languages).

Down to the Ground

That suits me down to the ground. Entirely.

Down — hearted

Without spirit; the heart prostrated.

Down Town

I am going down town, i.e. to the business part of the town.

Down the country

properly means down the slope of the land, or as the rivers run. We say “I am going up to town” when we mean out of the country into the chief city.

Down—trodden

Despised, as one trodden under foot.

“I will lift

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The down—trod Mortimer as high i' the air As this ungrateful king.”

Shakespeare:

1 Henry IV., i. 3.

Downfall

(A). A heavy shower of rain; a loss of social position.

Downing Professor

The Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1800 by Sir George Downing, Bart.

Downing Street

(London). Named after Sir George Downing, who died 1684. He was elected M.P. for Morpeth in 1661.

Downpour

(A). A very heavy shower of rain. “A regular downpour.”

Downright

Thoroughly, as “downright honest,” “downright mad”; outspoken; utter, as a “downright shame.” The word means from top to bottom, throughout.

Downright Dunstable

Very blunt, plain speaking. The present town of Dunstable is at the foot of the Chiltern Hills, in Bedfordshire. There was somewhere about the same site a Roman station called Magionium or Magintum, utterly destroyed by the Danes, and afterwards overgrown by trees. Henry I. founded the present town, and built there a palace and priory.

“If this is not plain speaking, there is no such place as downright Dunstable.” — Sir W. Scott:Redgauntlet, chap. xvii.

Downstairs

Stairs leading from a higher to a lower floor; on the lowest floor, as “I am downstairs.”

Downy

(The). Bed. Gone to the downy, gone to bed. Bed being stuffed with down.

Downy Cove

(A). A knowing fellow, up to every dodge. On the “lucus a non lucendo” principle, contraries are often substituted in slang and facetious phrases. (See Lucus A Non Lucendo .)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dowsabell

Daughter of Cassamen, a knight of Arden, who fell in love with a shepherd. The two make love with Arcadian simplicity, and vow eternal fidelity.

“With that she bent her snow—white knee,

Down by the shepherd kneeléd she,

And him she sweetly kist.

With that the shepherd whooped for joy

Quoth he, `There's never shepherd boy

That ever was so blist.' “

Drayton: Dowsabell (a ballad).

Dowse on the Chops

(A). A ding or blow on the face. “A dowse on the blubber—chops of my friend the baronet” means a setting down, a snubbing.

Doxy

A baby; a plaything; a paramour. In the West of England babies are called doxies.

Doyleys

Now means a small cloth used to cover dessert plates; but originally it had a much wider meaning. Thus Dryden speaks of “doyley petticoats;” and Steele, in No. 102 of the Tatler, speaks of his “doiley suit.” The Doyleys were linen—drapers, No. 346, east corner of Upper Wellington Street, Strand, from the time of Queen Anne to the year 1850.

Dozen

(See Baker's Dozen .)

D. P or Dom. Proc. The House of Lords. (Latin, Domus Procerum.)

Drac

A sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice women and children bathing, and when they attempt to catch the prize drag them under water. (South of France mythology.)

Fare le drac,

same as “Faire le diable.” Irish, “Play the Puck;” English, “Play the deuce.”

“Belomen qu'yeu fare le Drac

Se jamay trebi dins un sac

Cinc ô siés milante pistolos

Espessos como de redolos.”

Goudelin: Castle en L'Ayre.

Drachenfels

(Dragon—rocks). So called from the legendary dragon killed there by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen—Lied.

“The castled crag of Drachenfels

Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine, Whose breast of waters broadly swells

Between the banks which bear the vine.”

Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 55.

<Draconian Code One very severe. Draco was an Athenian law—maker. As every violation of a law was made in this code a capital offence, Demades the orator said “that Draco's code was written in human blood.”

Draft

The Druids borrowed money on promises of repayment after death (Patricius). Purchas tells us of some priests of Pekin, who barter with the people in bills of exchange, to be paid in heaven a hundredfold.

Draft on Aldgate

(A), or A draft on Aldgate pump. A worthless note of hand; a fraudulent draft or money order. The pun is between draft or draught of drink, and draft a money order on a bank.

Drag in, Neck and Crop or To drag in, head and shoulders. To introduce a subject or remark abruptly. (See A Propos De Bottes.)

Draggle—tail

A slut; a woman who allows her petticoats to trail in the dirt. The word should be “daggie—tail” (q.v.), from the Scotch dag (dew on the grass), daggie (wet with the grassdew), like the Latin collutulo irroro.

Dragoman

(plural, Dragomans). A ciceronë; a guide or interpreter to foreigners. (Arabic targuman, an interpreter; whence targum.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“My dragoman had me completely in his power, and I resolved to become independent of all interpreters.” —
Baker: Albert Nyanza, chap. i. p. 3.

Dragon

The Greek word drakon comes from a verb meaning “to see,” to “look at,” and more remotely “to watch” and “to flash.”

The animal called a dragon is a winged crocodile with a serpent's tail; whence the words serpent and dragon are sometimes interchangeable.

From the meaning a watcher we get the notion of one that watches; and from the meaning “to flash,” we connect the word with meteors.

“Swift, swift, ye dragons of the night: — that dawning

May bare the raven's eye.”

Shakespeare: Cymbeline,

ii. 2.

Dragon.

This word is used by ecclesiastics of the Middle Ages as the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular. The metaphor is derived from Rev. xii. 9, where Satan is termed “the great dragon.” In Ps. xci. 13 it is said that the saints “shall trample the dragon under their feet.” In the story of the Fall, Satan appeared to Eve in the semblance of a serpent, and the promise was made that in the fulness of time the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head.

Another source of dragon legends is the Celtic use of the word for “a chief.” Hence pen—dragon (summus rex), a sort of dictator, created in times of danger. Those knights who slew a chief in battle slew a dragon, and the military title soon got confounded with the fabulous monster. Dragon, meaning “quicksighted,” is a very suitable word for a general.

Some great inundations have also been termed serpents or dragons. Hence Apollo (the sun) is said to have destroyed the serpent Python (i.e. dried up the overflow). Similarly, St. Romanus delivered the city of Rouen from a dragon, named Gargouille (waterspout), which lived in the river Seine.

From the idea of watching, we have a dragon placed in the garden of the Hesperides; and a duenna is poetically called a dragon:

“In England the garden of beauty is kept

By a dragon of prudery placed within call; But so oft the unamiable dragon hath slept, That the garden's but carelessly watched after all.”

T. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. 2 (“We may roam through this world,” etc.).

A spiteful, violent, tyrannical woman is called a dragoness.

The blind dragon,

the third party who plays propriety in flirtations.

“This state of affairs was hailed with undisguised thankfulness by the rector, whose feeling for harmony had been rudely jarred by the necessity of his acting the blind dragon” — J.

O.Hobbes: Some Emotions and a Moral, chap. iv.

Dragon in Christian art symbolises Satan or sin. In the pictures of St. Michael and St. Margaret it typifies their conquest over sin. Similarly, when represented at the feet of Christ and the Virgin Mary. The conquest of St. George and St. Silvester over a dragon means their triumph over paganism. In the pictures of St. Martha it means the inundation of the Rhone, spreading pestilence and death; similarly, St. Romanus delivered Rouen from the inundation of the Seine, and Apollo's conquest of the python means the same thing. St. John the Evangelist is sometimes represented holding a chalice, from which a winged dragon is issuing.

Ladies guarded by dragons.

The walls of feudal castles ran winding round the building, and the ladies were kept in the securest part. As adventurers had to scale the walls to gain access to the ladies, the authors of romance said they overcame the serpent—like defence, or the dragon that guarded them. Sometimes there were two walls, and then the bold invader overcame two dragons in his attempt to liberate the captive damsel. (See Enchanted Castles.)

A flying dragon.

A meteor.

The Chinese dragon.

In China, the drawing of a five—clawed dragon is not only introduced into pictures, but is also embroidered on state dresses and royal robes. This representation is regarded as an amulet.

The Green Dragon.

A public—house sign in compliment to St. George. The Red Dragon. A public—house sign in compliment to Henry VII., who adopted this device for his standard at Bosworth Field. It was the ensign of Cadwallader, the last of the British kings, from whom the Tudors descended.

Dragon Slayers

(1) St. Philip the Apostle is said to have destroyed a huge dragon at Hierapolis, in Phrygia. (2) St. Martha killed the terrible dragon called Tarasque at Aix (la Chapelle).

(3) St. Florent killed a dragon which haunted the Loire.

(4) St. Cado, St. Maudet, and St. Paul did similar feats in Brittany.

(5) St. Keyne of Cornwall slew a dragon.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(6) St. Michael, St. George, St. Margaret, Pope Sylvester, St. Samson (Archbishop of Dol), Donatus (fourth century), St. Clement of Metz, and many others, killed dragons.

(7) St. Romain of Rouen destroyed the huge dragon called La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine.

Dragon of Wantley

(i.e. Warncliff, in Yorkshire). A monster slain by More, of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes; and, proceeding to the well where the dragon had his lair, kicked it in the mouth, where alone it was vulnerable. Dr. Percy says this dragon was an overgrown, rascally attorney, who cheated some children of their estate, but was made to disgorge by a gentleman named More, who went against him, “armed with the spikes of the law,” after which the dragon attorney died of vexation. (Reliques.)

Dragon's Hill

(Berkshire) is where the legend says St. George killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, and there the blood of the dragon ran out.

In Saxon annals we are told that Cedric, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, slew there Naud, the pendragon, with 5,000 men. This Naud is called Natan—leod, a corruption of Naudan ludh (Naud, the people's refuge).

Dragon's Teeth

Subjects of civil strife; whatever rouses citizens to rise in arms. The allusion is to the dragon that guarded the well of A'res. Cadmus slew it, and sowed some of the teeth, from which sprang up the men called Spartans, who all killed each other except five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Those teeth which Cadmus did not sow came to the possession of Æe'tes, King of Colchis; and one of the tasks he enjoined Jason was to sow these teeth and slay the armed warriors that rose therefrom.

“Citizens rising from the soil, richly sown with dragon's teeth, for the rights of their several states.” — The Times.

To sow dragons' teeth. To foment contentions; to stir up strife or war. The reference is to the classical story of Jason or that of Cadmus, both of whom sowed the teeth of a dragon which he had slain, and from these teeth sprang up armies of fighting men, who attacked each other in fierce fight. Of course, the figure means that quarrels often arise out of a contention supposed to have been allayed (or slain). The Philistines sowed dragons' teeth when they took Samson, bound him, and put out his eyes. The ancient Britons sowed dragons' teeth when they massacred the Danes on St. Bryce's Day.

Dragonades (3 syl.). A series of religious persecutions by Louis XIV., which drove many thousand Protestants out of France. Their object was to root out “heresy;” and a bishop, with certain ecclesiastics, was sent to see if the heretics would recant; if not, they were left to the tender mercies of the dragoons who followed these “ministers of peace and goodwill to man.”

“France was drifting toward the fatal atrocities of the dragonade.” — F. Parkman: The Old Regime, chap. ix. p.167.

Dragoons

So called because they used to be armed with dragons, i.e. short muskets, which spouted out fire like the fabulous beast so named. The head of a dragon was wrought on the muzzle of these muskets.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Drake

means the “duck—king.” The old English word end means a duck, and end—ric becomes 'dric, drake. Similarly the German tauber—rich is a male dove, and ganse—rich, a male goose, or gander.

Drama

Father of the French drama. Etienne Jodelle (1532—1573). Father of the Greek drama. Thespis (sixth century B.C.) Father of the Spanish drama. Lope de Vega (1562—1635).

Drama of Exile

(A). A poem by Elizabeth Barret Browning (1844). The exile is Eve, driven out of Paradise into the wilderness. Lucifer, Gabriel, and Christ are introduced into the poem, as well as Adam and Eve.

Dramatic Unities

(The three). One catastrophe, one locality, one day. These are Aristotle's rules for tragedy, and the French plays strictly follow them.

The French have added a fourth, one style. Hence comedy must not be mixed with tragedy. Addison's Cato is a good example. Unity of style is called the Unity of Uniformity. Shakespeare disregards all these canons.

Dramatis Personæ

The characters of a drama, novel, or actual transaction.

“The dramatis personæ were nobles, country gentlemen, justices of the quorum, and custodes rotulorum [keepers of the rolls].” — The Times.

Drap

One of Queen Mab's maids of honour. (Drayton.)

Drapier's Letters

A series of letters written by Dean Swift to the people of Ireland, advising them not to take the copper money coined by William Wood, by patent granted by George I. These letters crushed the infamous job, and the patent was cancelled.

Dean Swift signed himself M. B. Drapier in these letters.

Drat 'em!

A variant of Od rotem! The first word is a minced form of the word God, as in “Od's blood!” “Od zounds!”=God's wounds, “Od's bodikins,” etc. See Odd's. A correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests “[May] God out—root them!” but we have the words drattle and throttle (to choke) which would better account for the a and the o, and which are also imprecations.

Draught of Thor

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The). The ebb of the sea. When Asa Thor visited Jötunheim he was set to drain a bowl of liquor. He took three draughts, but only succeeded in slightly reducing the quantity. On leaving Jötunheim, the king, Giant Skrymir, told him he need not be ashamed of himself, and showed him the sea at low ebb, saying that he had drunk all the rest in his three draughts. We are told it was a quarter of a mile of sea—water that he drank.

Draupnir

Odin's magic ring, from which every ninth night dropped eight rings equal in size and beauty to itself.

Draw To draw amiss. To follow scent in the wrong direction. Fox—hunting term, where to draw means to follow scent.

To draw a furrow.

To plough or draw a plough through a field so as to make a furrow. To draw a person out. To entice a person to speak on any subject, often with the intention of ridiculing his utterances.

Draw it Mild

(To). We talk of remarks being highly flavoured, of strong language, of piquant remarks, of spicy words; so that to “draw it mild” refers to liquor; let it be mild, not too highly—flavoured, not too spicy and strong.

Draw the Long Bow

(To). To exaggerate. Some wonderful tales are told of Robin Hood and other foresters practised in the long bow. (See BOW.)

Drawback

Something to set against the profits or advantages of a concern. In commerce, it is duty charged on goods paid back again when the goods are exported.

“It is only on goods into which dutiable commodities have entered in large proportion and obvious ways that drawbacks are allowed.” — H. George: Protection or Free Trade: chap ix.

p.92

Drawcansir

A burlesque tyrant in The Rehearsal, by G. Villiers, Duke of Buckingham (1672). He kills every one, “sparing neither friend nor foe.” The name stands for a blustering braggart, and the farce is said to have been a satire on Dryden's inflated tragedies. (See Bayes, Bobadil.)

“[He] frights his mistress, snubs up kings, baffles armies, and does what he will, without regard to numbers, good sense, or justice.” — Bayes: The Rehearsal.

Drawing—room

A room to which ladies withdraw or retire after dinner. Also a levée where ladies are presented to the sovereign.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Drawing the Cork

Giving one a bloody nose. (See Claret.)

Drawing the King's

(or Queen's) Picture. Coining false money.

Drawing the Nail

i.e. absolving oneself of a vow. In Cheshire, two or more persons would agree to do something, or to abstain from something, say drinking beer; and they would go into a wood, and register their vow by driving a nail into a tree, swearing to keep their vow as long as that nail remained in the tree. If they repented of their vow, some or all of the party went and drew out the nail, whereupon the vow was cancelled.

Drawlatches

Thieves, robbers, wasters, and roberdsmen (5 Edward III. c. 14). About equal to door—openers and shop—lifters.

Drawn

Hanged, drawn, and quartered, or Drawn, hanged, and quartered. The question turns on the meaning of drawn. The evidence seems to be that traitors were drawn to the place of execution, then hanged, then

“drawn” or disembowelled, and then quartered. Thus the sentence on Sir William Wallace was that he should be drawn (detrahatur) from the Palace of Westminster to the Tower, etc., then hanged (suspendatur), then disembowelled or drawn (devaletur), then beheaded and quartered (decolletur et decapitetur). (See Notes and Queries, August 15th, 1891.)

If by “drawn” is meant conveyed to the place of execution, the phrase should be “Drawn, hanged, and quartered;” but if the word is used as a synonym of disembowelled, the phrase should be “Hanged, drawn, and quartered.”

“Lord Ellenborough used to say to those condemned. `You are drawn on hurdles to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged, but not till you are dead; for, while still living, your body is to be taken down, your bowels torn out and burnt before your face; your head is then cut off, and your body divided into four quarters.” — Gentleman's Magazine, 1803, part i. pp. 177,275.

Drawn Battle A battle in which the troops on both sides are drawn off, neither combatants claiming the victory.

Dreadnought

The Seaman's Hospital Society; a floating hospital.

Dream Authorship

It is said that Coleridge wrote his Kubla Khan, a poem, in a dream. Coleridge may have dreamt these lines, but without doubt Purchas's Pilgrimage haunted his dreams, for the resemblance is indubitable.

Dreamer

The Immortal Dreamer. John Bunyan (1628—1688).

Dreng

A servant boy, similar to the French garçon and Latin puer. A Danish word, which occurs in Domesday Book.

Dress your Jacket

(or hide). I'll dress your jacket for you. I'll give you a beating. I'll give you a dressing, or a good dressing. To dress a horse is to curry it, rub it, and comb it. To dress ore is to break it up, crush it, and powder it in the stamping mill. The original idea of dressing is preserved, but the method employed in dressing horses, ore, etc., is the prevailing idea in the phrases referred to.

Dresser

A kitchen dresser, the French dressoir, a sideboard, verb dresser, to raise, set up.

“The pewter plates on the dresser.”

Longfellow: Evangeline,

i. 2.

Drink

Anacharsis said: “The first cup for thirst, the second for pleasure, the third for intemperance, and the rest for madness.”

Drink Deep

Drink a deep draught. The allusion is to the peg tankards. Those who drank deep, drank to the lower pegs. (See Peg.)

“We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.”

—Shakespeare: Hamlet. i. 2.

Drinke and Welcome

One of the numerous publications of John Taylor, the Water Poet (1637). The subject is thus set forth. “The famous Historie of the most parts of Drinks in use now in the Kingdomes of G. Britaine and Ireland; with an especiall declaration of the potency, vertue, and operation of our English Ale. With a description of all sorts of Waters, from the Ocean—sea to the Teares of a Woman. As also the causes of all sorts of weather, faire or foule, sleet, raine, haile, frost, snow, fogges, mists, vapours, clouds, stormes, windes, thunder, and lightning. Compiled first in High Dutch Tongue by the painefull and industrious Huldricke van Speagle, a grammatical brewer of Lubeck, and now most learnedly enlarged, amplified, and translated into English verse and prose, by John Taylor, the Water Poet.”

Drink like a Fish

(To). To drink abundantly. Many fish swim with their mouths open.

Drinking Healths

was a Roman custom. Thus, in Plautus, we read of a man drinking to his mistress with these words: “Bene vos, bene nos, bene te, bene me, bene nostrum etiam Stephanium” (Here's to you, here's to us all, here's to thee, here's to me, here's to our dear —). (Stich. v. 4.) Persius (v. 1, 20) has a similar verse “Bene mihi; bene vobis, bene amicæ nostræ” (Here's to myself, here's to you, and here's to I shan't say who). Martial, Ovid, Horace, etc., refer to the same custom.

The ancient Greeks drank healths. Thus, when Theramenes was condemned by the Thirty Tyrants to drink hemlock, he said “Hoc pulcro Critiæ’ — the man who condemned him to death. The ancient Saxons followed the same habit, and Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Hengist invited King Vortigern to a banquet to see his new levies. After the meats were removed, Rowena, the beautiful daughter of Hengist, entered with a golden cup full of wine, and, making obeisance, said, “Lauerd kining, wacht heil’

(Lord King, your health). The king then drank and replied, “Drinc heil’ (Here's to you). (Geoffrey of Monmouth, book vi. 12.) Robert de Brunne refers to this custom:

“This is ther custom and hev gest

When they are at the ale or fest;

Ilk man that levis gware him drink

Salle say `Wosseille' to him drink,

He that biddis sall say `Wassaile,'

The tother salle say again `Drinkaille.'

That says `Woisseille' drinks of the cup,

Kiss and his felaw he gives it up.”

Robert de Brunne.

In drinking healths we hold our hands up towards the person toasted and say, “Your health . . .” The Greeks handed the cup to the person toasted and said, “This to thee,” “Græci in epulis poculum alicui tradituri, eum nominare solent.” Our holding out the wine—glass is a relic of this Greek custom.

Drinking Song

The oldest in the language is in the second act of Gammer Gurton's Needle, by John Still, called The Jolly Bishop. It begins

“I cannot eat but little meat.

My stomach is not good.”

Drinking at Freeman's Quay

that is, drinking gratis. At one time, all porters and carmen calling at Freeman's Quay, near London Bridge, had a pot of beer given them gratis.

Drive

(Anglo—Saxon drif—an.)

To drive a good bargain.

To exact more than is quite equable.

“Heaven would no bargain for its blessings drive.” Dryden: Astræa Redux, i 137.

To drive a roaring trade.

To be doing a brisk business. The allusion is to a coachman who drives so fast that his horses pant and roar for breath.

To drive the swine through the hanks of yarn.

To spoil what has been painfully done, to squander thrift. In Scotland, the yarn wrought in the winter (called the gude—wife's thrift) is laid down by the burn—side to bleach, and is peculiarly exposed to damage from passing animals. Sometimes a herd of pigs driven along the road will run over the hanks, and sometimes they will stray over them from some neighbouring farm—yard and do a vast amount of harm.

Drive at

(To). What are you driving at? What do you want to prove? What do you want me to infer? We say the “wind drove against the sails,” i.e. rushed or moved violently against them. Falstaff tells us of “four rogues in buckram [who] let drive at him,” where at means against or towards. “What are you driving at?” is, against or towards what object are you driving or moving?

Drive Off

To defer, to procrastinate. The idea is, running away or drawing off from something that ought to be done, with the promise of coming to it at a future time.

Driveller An idiot, an imbecile, whose saliva drivels out of his mouth.

“And Swift expires a driveller and a show.”

Drivelling Dotage

In weak old age saliva drops unconsciously from the mouth.

“This exhibition of drivelling dotage was attended with many other incoherent expressions.” — J. P. Kennedy The Swallow Barn, chap. xivii. p. 463.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Driver of Europe

(Le Cocher de l'Europe). So the Empress of Russia used to call the Duc de Choiseul, minister of Louis XV., because he had spies all over Europe, and thus ruled its political cabals.

Drivers

in the Irish uprising about 1843, were persons engaged by landlords to drive all the live stock of defaulting tenants and lodge them in a pound [like that at Carrickmacross]. They were resisted by the Molly Maguires.

Drives fat Oxen

(Who). Brook, in his Gustavus Vasa, says: "Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free," which Dr. Johnson parodied thus: "Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat." (Boswell's Life, year 1784.)

Driving for Rent

in Ireland, was a summary way of recovering rent by driving cattle to a pound, and keeping them till the rent was paid, or selling them by auction.

"It was determined that I and the bailiffs should go out in a body and `drive for rent.'" — Trench: Realities of Irish Life, chap. v.

Driving Pigs

He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market — i.e. snoring like pigs, whose grunt resembles the snore of a sleeper.

Droit d'Aubaine

In France the king was entitled, at the death of foreign residents (except Swiss and Scots), to all their movable estates; the law was only abolished in 1819. Aubain means "alien," and droit d'aubaine the "right over an alien's property."

"Had I died that night of an indigestion, the whole world could not have suspended the effects of the droits d'aubaine: my shirts and black pair of breeches, portmauteau and all, must have gone to the king of France." — Sterne: Sentimental Journey (Introduction).

Drôle

"C'est un drôle," or "C'est un drôle d'homme" (he is a rum customer). "Un joyeux drôle" means a boon companion. "Une drôle de chose" means a queer thing; something one can make neither head nor tail of.

Dromio

The brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who serve two brothers exactly alike, and the mistakes of masters and men form the fun of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, based on the Menæchmi of Plautus.

Drone

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(1 syl.). The largest tube of a bagpipe; so called because it sounds only one continuous note. (German, drohne, verb, drohnen, to groan or drone.)

A drone.

An idle person who lives on the means of another, as drones on the honey collected by bees; a sluggard. (Anglo—Saxon dræn, a male bee.)

Drop To take a drop. A euphemism for taking what the drinker chooses to call by that term. It may be anything from a sip to a Dutchman's draught.

A drop of the cratur.

In Ireland means a drink of whisky, or "creature—comfort." To take a drop too much. To be intoxicated. If it is the "last feather which breaks the camel's back," it is the drop too much which produces intoxication.

To take one's drops.

To drink spirits in private.

Drop

(To). To drop an acquaintance is quietly to cease visiting and inviting an acquaintance. The opposite of picking up or taking up an acquaintance.

Drop in

(To). To make a casual call, not invited; to pay an informal visit. The allusion is to fruit and other things falling down suddenly, unexpectedly, or accidentally. It is the intransitive verb, not the transitive, which means to "let fall."

Drop off

(To). "Friends drop off," fall away gradually. "To drop off to sleep," to fall asleep (especially in weariness or sickness).

Drop Serene

(gutta serena). An old name for amaurosis. It was at one time thought that a transparent, watery humour, distilling on the optic nerve, would produce blindness without changing the appearance of the eye.

"So thick a `drop serene' hath quenched these orbs." Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 25.

Drown the Miller

(To). To put too much water into grog or tea. The idea is that the supply of water is so great that even the miller, who uses a water wheel, is drowned with it.

Drowned Rat

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

As wet as a drowned rat — i.e. soaking wet. Drowned rats certainly look deplorably wet, but so also do drowned mice, drowned cats, and drowned dogs, etc.

Drowned in a Butt of Malmsey

George, Duke of Clarence, being allowed to choose by what death he would die, chose drowning in malmsey wine (1477). See the continuation of Monstrelet, 196; Fulgosus, ix. 12; Martin du Bellais's Memoirs (year 1514).

Admitting this legend to be an historic fact, it is not unique: Michael Harslob, of Berlin, wished to meet death in a similar way in 1571, if we may credit the inscription on his tomb: —

“In cyatho vini pleno cum musca periret,

Sic, ait Oeneus, sponte perire velim.” ’

“When in a cup of wine a fly was drowned.

So, said Vinarius, may my days be crowned.”

Drowning Men

Drowning men catch at straws. Persons in desperate circumstances cling in hope to trifles wholly inadequate to rescue or even help them.

Drows

or Trows. A sort of fairy race, residing in hills and caverns. They are curious artificers in iron and precious metals. (Zetland superstition.)

“I hung about thy neck that gifted chain, which all in our isles know was wrought by no earthly artist, but by the Drows in the secret recesses of their caverns.” — Scott: The Pirate, chap.x.

Drub, Drubbing

To flog, a flogging. Compare Greek tribo, to rub, bruise; Anglo—Saxon, drepan, to beat.

Drug It is a mere drug in the market. Something not called for, which no one will buy. French drogue = rubbish, as Ce n'est que de la drogue; hence droguet (drugget), inferior carpet—cloth made of rubbish or inferior wool, etc.

Druid

A chief priest (Celtic, der, superior; wydd, priest or instructor). In Taliesin we read, Bûm gwydd yngwarth an (at length I became a priest or wydd). It was after this period that the wydds were divided into two classes, the Der—wydds and the Go—wydds (Druids and Ovidds). Every chief had his druid, and every chief druid was allowed a guard of thirty men (Strabo). The order was very wealthy. (Not derived from the Greek drus, an oak.)

Patricius tells us that the Druids were wont to borrow money to be repaid in the life to come. His words are, “Druidæ pecuniam mutuo accipiebant in posteriore vita reddituri.”

‘Like money the Druids borrowed,

In t’other world to be restoréd.’”

Butler: Hudibras, part iii. canto 1,

Drum

A crowded evening party, a contraction of “drawing—room” (dr’—’oom). Cominges, the French ambassador, writing to Louis XIV., calls these assemblies drerums and driwromes. (See Rout, Hurricane.)

“The Comte de Broglie . . . goes sometimes to the drerums, and sometimes to the driwrome of the Princess of Wales.” —Nineteenth Century: Comte de Cominges; Sept., 1891, p.461.

“It is impossible to live in a drum.” — Lady M. W. Montagu.

John Drum's entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors. The allusion is to drumming a soldier out of a regiment.

Drum Ecclesiastic

The pulpit cushion, often vigorously thumped by what are termed “rousing preachers.”

“When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded

With long—eared rout, to battle sounded;

And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,

Was beat with fist instead of a stick.”

Butler: Hudibras, part i. canto 1.

Drum—head Court—martial

One held in haste; like a court—martial summoned on the field round the big drum to deal summarily with an offender.

Drummers

So commercial travellers are called in America, because their vocation is to drum up recruits or customers.

Drummond Light

The limelight. So named from Captain Thomas Drummond, R.E.

“Wisdom thinks, and makes a solar Drummond Light of a point of dull lime.” — Geikie: Entering on Life (Reading, p.211).

Drumsticks

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Legs. The leg of a cooked fowl is called a drumstick.

Drunk (Anglo—Saxon drinc—an.)

Drunk as a fiddler.

The reference is to the fiddler at wakes, fairs, and on board ship, who used to be paid in liquor for playing to rustic dancers.

Drunk as a lord.

Before the great temperance movement set in, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, those who could afford to drink thought it quite comme il faut to drink two, three, or even more bottles of port wine for dinner, and few dinners ended without placing the guests under the table in a hopeless state of intoxication. The temperate habits of the last quarter of the nineteenth century renders this phrase now almost unintelligible.

Drunk as blazes.

“Blazes” of course means the devil.

Drunk as Chloe.

Chloe, or rather Cloe (2 syl.), is the cobbler's wife of Linden Grove, to whom Prior, the poet, was attached. She was notorious for her drinking habits.

Drunk as David's sow.

(See Davy's Sow.)

Drunkard's Cloak

(A). A tub with holes for the arms to pass through. At one time used for drunkards and scolds by way of punishment.

Drunken Deddington

One dead drunk. The proper name is a play on the word dead.

Drunkenness

The seven degrees: (1) Ape drunk; (2) Lion drunk; (3) Swine drunk; (4) Sheep drunk; (5) Martin drunk; (6) Goat drunk; (7) Fox drunk. (Nash.)

Drunkenness

It is said that if children eat owl's eggs they will never be addicted to strong drinks.

“Tous les oiseaux lui [i.e. to Bacchus]étaient agréable, excepté la chouette dont les oeufs avaient la vertu de rendre les enfans qui les mangeaient ennemis du vin.” — Noel: Dictionnaire de la Fable, vol. i. p.206.

Drupner

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

[the dripper]. A gold ring given to Odin; every ninth night other rings dropped from it of equal value to itself. (The Edda.)

Drury Lane

(London) takes its name from the habitation of the great Drury family. Sir William Drury, K.G., was a most able commander in the Irish wars. Drury House stood on the site of the present Olympic theatre.

Druses

(2 syl.). A people of Syria governed by emirs. Their faith is a mixture of the Pentateuch, the Gospel, the Koran, and Sufism. They offer up their devotions both in mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and yet observe the fast of Ramadan. Their language is pure Arabic. (Hakem, the incarnate spirit, was assisted by Darasi in propounding his religion to these Syrians; and the word Druse is said to be derived from Darasi, shortened onto D'rasi.)

Dry

Thirsty. Hence to drink is to “wet your whistle” (i.e. throat); and malt liquor is called “heavy wet.” (Anglo—Saxon dryg, dry.)

Dry Blow

(A). A blow which does not bring blood.

Dry Goods

(in merchandise), such as cloths, stuffs, silks, laces, and drapery in general, as opposed to groceries.

Dry Lodgings

Sleeping accommodation without board. Gentlemen who take their meals at clubs live in dry lodgings.

“Dry Lodginge of seven weeks, £0 4s. 1d.” — Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (Intr. Rob. Patterson deb. to Margaret Chrystale).

Dry—nurse

When a superior officer does not know his duty, and is instructed in it by an inferior officer, he is said to be dry—nursed. The inferior nurses the superior, as a dry—nurse rears an infant.

Dry Rot

The spontaneous rot of timber or wall—paper, not unfrequently produced by certain fungi attaching themselves thereto. It is called dry rot because the wood is not purposely exposed to wet, although, without doubt, damp from defective ventilation is largely present, and the greenness of wood employed contributes greatly to the decay.

Dry Sea (A). A sandy desert. The camel is the ship of the desert. We read of the Persian sea of sand.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The see that men slepen the gravely see, that is alle gravelle and sond with outen only drope of watre.” — Mandeville: Travels.

Dry Shave

(A). A shave without soaping the face; to scrape the face with a piece of iron hoop; to scratch the face; to box it and bruise it. Sometimes it means to beat and bruise generally; ill usage.

“The fellow will get a dry shave.”

Peter Pindar: Great Cry and Little Wool,

Ep 1. “I’ll shave her, like a punished soldier, dry.” Peter Pindar: The Lousiad, canto ii.

Dry Style

(of writing). Without pathos, without light and shade; dull level, and unamusing.

Dry Wine

Opposed to sweet or fruity wine. In sweet wine some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; in dry wine all the sugar has been converted into alcohol. The doctoring of wine to improve its quality is called dosage.

“Upon the nature and amount of the dosage, the character of the wine (whether it be dry or sweet, light or strong) very much depends.” — Vizetelly: Facts about Champagne, chap. v.

p.59.

Dryads

Nymphs of the trees. (Greek, drus, any forest tree.) They were supposed to live in the trees and die when the trees died. Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus (2 syl.) the poet, was a dryad.

Dryasdust

(Rev. Dr.). A heavy, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary. Sir Walter Scott employs the name to bring out the prefatory matter of some of his novels.

“The Prussian Dryasdust . . . excels all other ‘Dryasdusts’ yet known.” — Carlyle.

Dualism

A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles. It is eminently a Persian doctrine. The Orphic poets made the ultimate principles of all things to be Water and Night, or Time and Necessity. In theology the Manichean doctrine is dualistic. In modern philosophy it is opposed to monism (q.v.), and insists that the creator and creation, mind and body, are distinct entities. That creation is not deity, and that mind is not an offspring of matter. (See Monism.)

Dub

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To make a knight by giving him a blow. Dr. Tusler says, "The ancient method of knighting was by a box on the ear, implying that it would be the last he would receive, as he would henceforth be free to maintain his own honour." The present ceremony is to tap the shoulder with a sword. (Anglo—Saxon, dubban, to strike with a blow.)

Dub Up!

Pay down the money. A dub is an Anglo—Indian coin, hence "down with your dubs," money down. A "doubloon" is a double pistole.

Dublin

(the Irish dubh—linn, the "black pool"). The chief part of the city stands on land reclaimed from the river Liffey or the sea.

True as the Deil is in Dublin city. (Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.)

Probably Burns refers to the Scandinavian name Divelin, which suggested first Divel and then Devil or Deil.

Dubs

in "marbles" is a contraction of double or doublets. Thus, if a player knocks two marbles out of the ring, he cries dubs, before the adversary cries "no dubs," and claims them both.

Ducat A piece of money; so called from the legend on the early Sicilian pieces: Sit tibi, Christe, datus, quem tu regis, istë ducatus (May this duchy [ducat—us] which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ).

Duchesne

(2 syl.). Le père Duchésne. Jacques René Hébert, chief of the Cordelier Club in the French Revolution, the members of which were called Hébertists. He was called "Father Duchésne," from the name of his vile journal. (1755—1794.)

Duchess

The wife or widow of a duke; but an old woman is often jocosely termed an old duchess or a regular old duchess. The longevity of the peers and peeresses is certainly very striking.

Duck

A lame duck. A stock—jobber who will not, or cannot, pay his losses. He has to "waddle out of the alley like a lame duck."

Like a dying duck in a thunderstorm.

Quite chop—fallen.

To get a duck.

A contraction of duck's egg or 0, in cricket. A player who gets no run off his bat is marked down 0.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Duck Lane

A row for old and second-hand books which stood formerly near Smithfield, but has given way to city improvements. It might be called the Holywell Street of Queen Anne's reign.

“Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain

Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck Lane.” Pope: Essay on Criticism.

Duck's Egg

Broke his duck's egg. Took his first school prize. In cricket a “duck's egg” or 0 in a score is broken by a run.

“What a proud and happy day it was to Lucy when little Herbert, in public—school parlance, `broke his duck's egg — otherwise, took his first prize.” — A Fellow of Trinity, chap.i.

Duck's—foot Lane

[City.] A corruption of Duke's Foot Lane; so called from the Dukes of Suffolk, whose manor—house was there.

Ducks and Drakes

The ricocheting or rebounding of a stone thrown from the hand to skim along the surface of a pond or river.

To make ducks and drakes of one's money.

To throw it away as stones with which “ducks and drakes” are made on water. The allusion is to the sport of throwing stones to skim over water for the sake of seeing them ricocheting or rebounding.

“What figured slates are best to make

On watery surface duck and drake.”

Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3.

“Mr. Locke Harper found out, a month after his marriage, that somebody had made ducks and drakes of his wife's money.” — Dinah M. Craik: Agatha's Husband, chap. xxiii.

Duckie

Diminutive of “duck,” a term of endearment = darling or beloved one. (Norwegian and Danish, dukke, a doll, a baby.)

Ducking

(A). A drenching. (German, ducken, to dive under water.)

Duckweed A weed which floats on the surface of stagnant water and forms a harbour for insects which ducks feed on. Its Latin name is “Lemna,” Greek, limne (a stagnant pool).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dude

A masher. One who renders himself conspicuous by affectation of dress, manners, and speech. The word was first familiarised in London in 1881, and is a revival of the old word dudes (clothes). We have several derivations, as dudder, one who sells dress—pieces; duddery, a rag—shop; duddle, to wrap up warmly (Halliwell), etc. It is not of American origin.

“I should just as soon expect to see Mercutio smoke a cigarette, as to find him ambling about the stage with the mincing manners of a dude.” — Jefferson: Century Magazine, January, 1890,

p. 383.

Dudeism

(3 syl.). The tomfoolery of a dude (2 syl.).

Dudgeon

(The). The handle of a dagger, at one time made of box—wood root, called “dudgeon—wood;” a dagger with such a handle. Shakespeare does not say, “and on the blade o’ the dudgeon gouts of blood,” but “on the blade and dudgeon . . .,” both blade and handle.

Dudman and Ramhead

When Dudman and Ramhead meet. Never. Dudman and Ramhead (now spelt Ramehead) are two forelands on the Cornish coast, about twenty miles asunder. (See Never.)

“Make yourself scarce! depart! vanish! or we’ll have you summoned before the mayor of Halgaver, and that before Dudman and Ramhead meet.” — Scott: Kenilworth, iv.

Duds

Old clothes, tattered garments (Gaelic, dud, a rag; Dutch, tod; Italian, tozzi). A dudder or dudsman is a scarecrow, or man of straw dressed in cast off garments to fray birds; also a pedlar who sells duds or gown—pieces. (Compare the Greek duo, to put on [clothes]; Latin, in—duo, to clothe.)

Dudu

A pensive maiden of seventeen, “who never thought about herself at all.” (Byron: Don Juan, vi. vii.)

Duende

(3 syl.). A Spanish goblin or house—spirit. Calderon has a comedy called La Dama Duenda. (See Fairy.)

Duenna

[Lady]. The female of don. The Spanish don is derived from the Latin dominus = a lord, a master. A duenna is the chief lady—in—waiting on the Queen of Spain; but in common parlance it means a lady who is half companion and half governess, in charge of the younger female members of a nobleman’s or gentleman’s family in Portugal or Spain.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“There is no duenna so rigidly prudent and inexorably decorous as a superannuated coquette.”— W. Irving: Sketch—Book (Spectre Bridegroom).

Duergar

(2 syl.). Dwarfs who dwell in rocks and hills; noted for their strength, subtilty, magical powers, and skill in metallurgy. They are the personification of the subterranean powers of nature. According to the Gotho—German myth, the duergar were first maggots in Ymir's flesh, but afterwards assumed the likeness of men. The first duergar was Modsogner, the next Dyrin. N.B. — The Giant Ymir is Chaos. (See Heldenbuch.)

Duessa

(Double—mind or False—faith). Daughter of Falsehood and Shame, who assumes divers disguises to beguile the Red Cross Knight. At one time she takes the name of Fidessa, and entices the knight into the Palace of Pride (Lucifera). The knight having left the palace, is overtaken by Duessa, and drinks of an enchanted fountain, which paralyses him, in which state he is taken captive by the giant Orgoglio. Prince Arthur slays the giant and rescues the knight; Duessa, being stripped of her gorgeous disguise, is found to be a hideous hag, and flees into the wilderness for concealment. She appears again in book ii. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book i. 2—7; v. 9.)

Dufarge

Jacques and Madame Dufarge are the presiding genii of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and chief instigators of many of the crimes committed by the Red Republicans in Dickens's Tale of Two Cities.

Duffer (A) now means a person easily bamboozled, one of slow wit; but originally it meant one who cheated or bamboozled. To duff = to cheat. Persons who sell inferior goods as “great bargains,” under the pretence of their being smuggled, are duffers; so are hawkers generally. At the close of the eighteenth century passers of bad money were so called. Now the word is applied to persons taken in, and by artists to inferior pictures.

“Robinson a thorough duffer is.”

Alexander Smith: Summer Idyll.

Duglas

the scene of four Arthurian battles. It is a river which falls into the Ribble. Mr. Whittaker says, “six cwt. of horse—shoes were taken up from a space of ground near the spot during the formation of a canal.”

Duke

The Great Duke. The Duke of Wellington, called “the Iron Duke.” (1769—1852.)

Duke Coombe

William Coombe, author of Dr. Syntax, The Devil upon Two Sticks, etc., who in the days of his prosperity was noted for the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment. Having spent all his money he turned author, but passed the last fifteen years of his life in the King's Bench. (1743—1823.)

Duke Ernest

(See Ernest.)

Duke Humphrey

(See Humphrey.)

Duke Street

(Strand), so named from George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

Duke and Duchess

in Don Quixote, who play so many tricks on the Knight of the Woeful Countenance, were Don Carlos de Borja, Count of Ficallo, who married Donna Maria of Aragon, Duchess of Villahermosa, in whose right the count had extensive estates on the banks of the Ebro; among others he had a country seat called Buenavia, which was the place Cervantes referred to.

Duke of Exeter's Daughter

(The). A rack in the Tower of London, so called from a minister of Henry VI., who sought to introduce it into England.

Duke or Darling

Heads or tails; pitch and toss. When the scandals about the Duke of York and Mrs. Clarke were the common talk of the town, the street boys, instead of crying Heads or tails, used to say Duke or Darling. (Lord Colchester: Diary, 1861.)

Duke's

A fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was situate in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was named from its great patron, James, Duke of York, afterwards James II. The modern Duke's theatre.

Duke's Walk

To meet one in the Duke's Walk. An invitation to fight a duel. In the vicinity of Holyrood House is a place called the Duke's Walk, from being the favourite promenade of the Duke of York, afterwards James

II., during his residence in Scotland. This walk was the common rendezvous for settling affairs of honour, as the site of the British Museum was in England.

“If a gentleman shall ask me the same question, I shall regard the incivility as equivalent to an invitation to meet him in the Duke's Walk.” — Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, chap.xxxiv.

Dukeries

A district in Nottinghamshire, so called from the number of ducal residences in the vicinity, including Welbeck Abbey, Thoresby, Clumber, Worksop, Kiveton Hall, etc.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dulcarnon The horns of a dilemma. (or Syllogismum cornutum); at my wits' end; a puzzling question. Dulcarnein is the Arabic dhulkarnein (double—horned, having two horns). Hence the 47th proposition of the First Book of Euclid is called the Dulcarnon, as the 5th is the pons asinorum. Alexander the Great is called Iscander Dulcarnein, and the Macedonian era the era of Dulcarnein. Chaucer uses the word in Troilus and Cryseyde, book iii. 126, 127.

The horns of the 47th proposition are the two squares which contain the right angle.

To be in Dulcarnon.

To be in a quandary, or on the horns of a dilemma. To send one to Dulcarnon. To daze with puzzles.

Dulce Domum

The holiday song of Winchester school. Mr. Brandon says it was composed by a boy of St. Mary's College, Winchester, who was confined for misconduct during the Whitsun holidays, "as report says, tied to a pillar." On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, "the master, scholars, and choristers of the above college walk in procession round the 'pillar,' chanting the six stanzas of the song." In the March number of the Gentleman's Magazine, 1796, a translation, signed "J.R.," was given of the song; and Dr. Milner thinks the original is not more than a century old. It is rather remarkable that the author has made "domum" a neuter noun. (See Adeste Fideles.)

CHORUS:

"Domum, domum, dulce domum!

Domum, domum, dulce domum;

Dulce, dulce dulce domum!

Dulce domum resonemus."

Home, home, joyous home!

Home, home, joyous home!

Joyous, joyous, joyous home!

Hurrah for joyous home! E.C.B.

Dulce est Desipere in Loco

It is delightful to play the fool occasionally; it is nice to throw aside one's dignity and relax at the proper time. (Horace: 4 Odes, xii. 28.)

Dulce et Decorum est pro Patria Mori

(Latin). It is sweet and becoming to die on our country's behalf, or to die for one's country.

Dulcimer

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Italian dolcimello), according to Bishop (Musical Dictionary, p. 45), is “a triangular chest strung with wires, which are struck with a little rod held in each hand;” but the word “symphonia,” translated dulcimer in Daniel iii. 5, was a species of bagpipe. Fürst deduces it from the Hebrew smpn (a pipe).

“The sound of cornet, flute, harp, sackbut psaltery, [symphony] or dulcimer, and all kinds of music.” — Dan. iii. 5.

Dulcinea

A lady—love. Taken from Don Quixote's amie du coeur. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcinea del Toboso.

“I must ever have some Dulcinea in my head — it harmonises the soul.” — Sterne.

Dulcinists

Heretics who followed the teaching of Dulcin, who lived in the fourteenth century. He said that God reigned from the beginning to the coming of Messiah; and that Christ reigned from His ascension to the fourteenth century, when He gave up His dominion to the Holy Ghost. Dulcin was burnt by order of Pope Clement IV.

Duli'a An inferior degree of worship or veneration, such as that paid by Roman Catholics to saints and angels; Hyper—dulia is a superior sort of veneration reserved for the Virgin; but that worship which is paid to God alone is called latri'a. “Dulia” means that sort of veneration which slaves pay to their lords (Greek, doulos, a slave); “Latria” means that sort of veneration which mortals pay to the gods (Greek, latreu'o, to worship the gods).

Dull as a Fro

A frow or fro is a kind of wedge for splitting wood. It is not a sharp—edged instrument like a chisel, but a blunt or dull one.

Dull as Ditch—water

Uninteresting; ditch—water is stagnant and has no go in it.

Dulness

King of dulness. Colley Cibber, poet laureate after Eusden.

“`God save king Cibber!' mounts in every note . . .

So when Jove's block descended from on high . . . Loud thunder to the bottom shook the bog,

And the hoarse nation croaked, `God save king Log!’“ Pope: Dunciad, book i.

Dum Sola

(Latin). While single or unmarried.

Dum Spiro, Spero

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

While I live, I hope; or, While there's life, there's hope. Hope while you live, for who would care to cope

With life's three foes, unpanoplied with hope?

Hope against hope, while fed with vital breath.

Hope be your anchor in the hour of death

E.C.B.

Dum Vivimus, Vivamus

(Latin). While we live, let us enjoy life. The motto of Dr. Doddridge's coat of arms, which he converted into the subjoined epigram —

“`Live, while you live,' the epicure would say, `And seize the pleasures of the present day.'

`Live, while you live,' the sacred preacher cries, `And give to God each moment as it flies.' Lord, in my views let each united be;

I live in pleasure, when I live to thee.”

Dumachus

The impenitent thief, called Dysmus in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus. In Longfellow's Golden Legend Dumachus and Titus were two of a band of robbers who attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, “Let these good people go in peace,” but Dumachus replied, “First let them pay for their release.” Upon this Titus gave his fellow—robber forty groats, and the infant Jesus said —

“When thirty years shall have gone by,

I at Jerusalem shall die . . .

On the accursèd tree.

Then on my right and my left side,

These thieves shall both be crucified;

And Titus thenceforth shall abide

In Paradise with me.”

Dumb—barge

(A). A barge without sails, used for a pier, and not for conveying merchandise up and down a river.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Dumb—bell Nebula

(The). A still condensing mass; so called from being of the shape of a dumb—bell.

Dumb—bells

A corruption of Dumpels or Duples, the same word as Dumplings, and meaning heavy (weights). (German and Danish, dumm heavy, dull, insipid; dumpling, a heavy, insipid pudding; dumps, heavy, stupid moroseness.) (See Dump.)

Dumb—bells

In New College, Oxford, there still is an apparatus for developing the muscles similar to that which sets church—bells in motion. It consists of a fly—wheel with a weight attached, and the gymnast is carried by it up and down to bring his muscles into play. The present apparatus was substituted for it, and answers a similar purpose, though the name is greatly obscured.

Dumb—bidding

A sale by auction effected thus: The owner fixes an upset—price on an article, writes it on a slip of paper, and covers the slip up. The article is then offered to the bidders, and withdrawn unless some bid reaches the upset price.

Dumb—cow

(To). To brow—beat; to cow. (Anglo—Indian.)

Dumb Crambo

(See Crambo .)

Dumb Dog

(A). One who remains silent when he ought to speak.

Dumb Ox of Cologne

(The). Thomas Aquinas (1224—1274), known afterwards as “the Angelic Doctor” or “Angel of the Schools.” Albertus Magnus, the tutor of the “dumb ox,” said of him: “The dumb ox will one day fill the world with his lowing.” He was born at Naples, but was a student in the monastery of Cologne.

Dumb—waiter

A piece of dining—room furniture, fitted with shelves, to hold glasses, dishes, and plate. So called because it answers all the purposes of a waiter, and is not possessed of an insolent tongue; a lift for carrying food from a kitchen to the dining—room, etc.

Dummy

In three—handed whist the exposed hand is called dummy.

Dummies

(2 syl.). Empty bottles or drawers in a druggist's shop; wooden heads in a hairdresser's shop; lay figures in a tailor's shop; persons on the stage who appear before the lights, but have nothing to say. These all are dumb, actually or figuratively.

Dump

A Brazilian copper coin, worth about 2 1/2d.; also a round flat lump of lead used on board ship for playing quoits and chuck—penny. Hence dumpy or dumpty (squat or small). An egg is called a humpty—dumpty in the nursery verses beginning with “Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall,” etc.

“Death saw two players playing cards,

But the game was not worth a dump.”

Hood: Death's Ramble, stanza 14.

Dumps

To be in the dumps. Out of spirits; in the “sullens.” According to etymological fable, it is derived from Dumops, King of Egypt, who built a pyramid and died of melancholy. Gay's Third Pastoral is Wednesday, or the Dumps. (German, dumm, stupid, dull.)

“Why, how now, daughter Katharine? in your dumps?” — Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew,

ii. 1.

Dun

One who importunes for payment of a bill (Anglo—Saxon, dunan, to din or clamour). The tradition is that it refers to Joe Dun, a famous bailiff of Lincoln in the reign of Henry VII. The British Apollo says he was so active and dexterous in collecting bad debts that when anyone became “slow to pay” the neighbours used to say to the creditors, “Dun him” (send Dun after him).

“An Universitie dunne ... is an inferior creditor of some ten shillings or downewards, contracted for horse—hire, or perchance drinke, too weake to be put in suite.” — Bishop Earle: Microcosmographia (1601—1695).

Squire Dun.

The hangman between Richard Brandin and Jack Ketch.

“And presently a halter got,

Made of the best strong hempen teer;

And, ere a cat could lick his ear,

Had tied him up with as much art,

As Dun himself could do for's heart.”

Cotton: Virgil Travestied, book iv.

Dun Cow

The dun cow of Dunsmore heath was a savage beast slain by Sir Guy, Earl of Warwick. A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Harwich Castle as one of the horns of the dun—cow. (See Guy.)

The fable is that this cow belonged to a giant, and was kept on Mitchell Fold (middle fold), Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible; but one day an old woman who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also. This so enraged the cow, that she broke loose from the fold and wandered to Dunsmore heath, where she was slain by Guy of Warwick.

Isaac Taylor, in his Words and Places (p. 269), says the dun cow is a corruption of the Dena Gau or Danish settlement in the neighbourhood of Warwick. Gau, in German, means region, country. If this explanation is correct, the great achievement of Guy was a victory over the Danes, and taking from them their settlement near Warwick.

Dun in the Mire

To draw Dun out of the mire. To lend a helping hand to one in distress. The allusion is to an English game, explained by Mr. Gifford in his edition of Ben Jonson, vii. 283. A log of wood is brought into a room. The log, called Dun, is supposed to have fallen into the mire, and the players are to pull him out. Every player does all he can to obstruct the others, and as often as possible the log is made to fall on someone's toes. Constant allusion is made to this game.

“Sires, what? Dun is in the mire.” — Chaucer: Prologue to Maunciples Tale.

“If thou art dun we'll draw thee from the mire.”

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet,

i. 4.

“Well done, my masters, lend's your hands;

Draw Dun out of the ditch,

Draw, pull, helpe all. So, so; well done.”

Duchesse of Suffolke (1631).

Dunce

A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Duns Scotus, the learned schoolman and great supporter of the immaculate conception. His followers were called Dunsers. Tyndal says, when they saw that their hair—splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, “the old barking curs raged in every pulpit” against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

“He knew what's what, and that's as high

As metaphysic wit can fly ...

A second Thomas, or at once

To name them all, another Dunse.”

Butler: Hudibras, i. 1.

Dunce.

(See Abderitan, Arcadian, Boeotian.)

Dunciad

The dunce—epic, a satire by Alexander Pope. Eusden, the poet laureate, being dead, the goddess of Dulness elects Colley Cibber to be his successor. The installation is celebrated by games, the most important being the proposal to read, without sleeping, two voluminous works — one in verse and the other in prose; as everyone falls asleep, the games come to an end. King Cibber is now taken to the temple of Dulness, and is lulled to sleep on the lap of the goddess; and, during his slumber, sees in a vision the past, present, and future triumphs of the empire. Finally, the goddess, having destroyed order and science, establishes her kingdom on a firm basis; and, having given directions to her several agents to prevent thought and keep people to foolish and trifling pursuits, Night and Chaos are restored, and the poem ends. (See Dennis.)

Dunderhead

A blockhead, or, rather, a muddle—headed person. Dunder, is the less or dregs of wine, etc., more correctly, the overflow of fermented liquors (yeast). (Spanish, re—dundar, to overflow or froth over.)

“The use of Dunder in the making of rum answers the purpose of yeast in the fermentation of flour.” —
Edwards: West Indies.

Dundreary

(Lord) (3syl.). The impersonation of a good—natured, indolent, blundering, empty—headed swell. The chief character in Tom Taylor's dramatic piece called Our American Cousin. Mr. Sothorn created the character of Lord Dundreary by the power of his conception and the genius of his acting. (See Brother Sam.)

Dungaree

A coarse blue cloth worn by sailors; coarse and vulgar. Dungaree is the Wapping of Bombay.

Dunghill!

Coward! Villain! This is a cockpit phrase; all cocks, except gamecocks, being called dunghills.

“Out, dunghill! darst thou brave a nobleman?”

Shakespeare: King John,

iv 3.

That is, Dare you, a dunghill cock, brave a thoroughbred gamecock?

Dunghill

Thou hast it, ad dunghill, at thy fingers' ends. To this Holofernes replies: "Oh, I smell false Latin; `dunghill' for 'unguem.'" (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. I.)

Dunkers

(See Tunkers.)

Dunmow

To eat Dunmow bacon. To live in conjugal amity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The allusion is to the institution of Robert Fitzwalter. Between 1244 and 1772 eight claimants have been admitted to eat the fitch. Their names merit immortality.

1445. Richard Wright, labourer, Bauburgh, near Norwich.

1467 Steven Samuel, of Little Ayston, Essex.

1510. Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.

1701. William and Jane Parsley, butcher, Much—Easton, Essex. Same year, John and Ann Reynolds, Hatfield Regis.

1751. Thomas Shakeshaft, wool—comber, Weathersfield, Essex.

1763. Names unknown !!

1772. John and Susan Gilder, Tarling, Essex.

The attempt to revive this "premium for humbug" is a mere "get—up" for the benefit of the town.

"Ah, madam: cease to be mistaken;

Few married fowl peck Dunmow bacon."

Prior: Turtle and Sparrow,

233.

Dunmow Fitch

The oath administered was in the doggerel subjoined:

"You shall swear, by the custom of our confession

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

That you never made any nuptial transgression Since you were married man and wife,

By household brawls or contentious strife:

Or, since the parish clerk said `Amen.'

Wished yourselves unmarried again;

Or, in a twelvemonth and a day,

Repented not in thought any way.

If to these terms, without all fear,

Of your own accord you will freely swear, A gammon of bacon you shall receive,

And bear it hence with our good leave.

For this is our custom at Dunmow well known — The sport is ours, but the bacon your own.”

Duns Scotus

A schoolman, called Duns from Dunc in Berwickshire. (1265 — 1308.) Not John Scotus, Erigena, the schoolman, who died A.D. 875.

Dunstable

Bailey, as if he actually believed it, gives the etymology of this word Dun's stable; adding Duns or “Dunus was a robber in the reign of Henry I., who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way.” (Dunes or duns tavell, our table — i.e. the table—land or flat of the hills.)

Downright Dunstable.

(See Downright.) Plain as the road to Dunstable, or, as Shakespeare says, “Plain as way to parish church.” The road leading to Dunstable is the confluence of many leading to London, but the play is on the word dunce.

Dunstan

(St.). Patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in gold. He is represented generally in pontifical robes, but carrying a pair of pincers in his right hand. The pontificals refer to his office as Archbishop of Canterbury, and the pincers to the legend of his holding the Devil by the nose till he promised never to tempt him again.

St. Dunstan and the devil.

Dunstan was a painter, jeweller, and blacksmith. Being expelled from court, he built a cell near Glastonbury church, and there he worked at his handicrafts. It was in this cell that tradition says the Devil had a gossip with the saint through the lattice window. Dunstan went on talking till his tongs were red hot, when he turned round suddenly and caught his Satanic Majesty by the nose. One can trace in this legend the notion that all knowledge belonged to the Black Art; that the “saints” are always more than conquerors over the spirits of evil; and the singular cunning which our forefathers so delighted to honour.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Duodecimo

A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each. This word, which differs from both the Italian and French, is from the Latin duodecim (twelve). It is now called twelvemo, from the contraction 12mo. The term is still applied to books that are the same size as the old duodecimo, irrespective of the number of leaves into which the sheet is folded.

A man in duodecimo is a dwarf.(See Decimo.)

Duomo

(The). The cathedral.

“The supreme executive of Florence suspended Savonarola from preaching in the Duomo.” — Symonds: Renuissance in Italy.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says, in one of her snatches, he “dupt the chamber door,” i.e. did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might “let in the maid” (Hamlet, iv. 1). A portcullis and some other doors were lifted up or duffed.

“Iche weene the porters are drunk. Will they not dup the gate to—day.” — Edwards: Damon and Pithias (1571).

Dupes

(See Day of The Dupes)

Durandana

or Durindana. Orlando's sword, given him by his cousin Malagigi. It once belonged to Hector, and was made by the fairies. It could cleave the Pyrenees at a blow. N. B. — In French romance Orlando is called Roland, Malagigi Mangis, and the sword durandal or durindal (See Sword.)

“Nor plaited shield, nor tempered casque defends,

Where Durindana's trenchant edge descends.” Hoole: Orlando Furioso, book v

Durandarte

A knight who fell at Roncesvalles, cousin to Montesinos. The tale says he loved Belerma, whom he served seven years, at the expiration of which time he was slain. In his last breath he told Montesinos to take his heart and give it to Belerma. He is described by Lewis as “Sweet in manners, fair in favour,

Mild in temper, fierce in fight.”

Durante

Durante bene placito (Latin). During pleasure.

Durante minore ætate

(Latin). During minority. Durante viduitate (Latin). During widowhood. Durante vita (Latin). For life.

Durbar

(Indian word). A levée.

“Durbars which might rival in splendour of colour and jewelled bravery the glories of the court of Byzantium.” — McCarthy: England under Gladstone, chap. iv. p. 60.

Durden

(Dame). A notable housewife. Dame Durden, of the famous English song, kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and also kept five serving men to use the spade and flail. The five men loved the five maids.

“ ‘Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and

Dorothy Draggletail;

And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.” Anon.

Dürer

(Albert), of Nürnberg, called by his countrymen “the prince of artists,” and by many the “Chaucer of painting.” (1471—1528.)

Dürer's portraits of Charlemagne and other emperors are unrivalled; but Lucas Kranach's (1472—1553) portraits of Luther and other reformers are said to run them very close in merit.

Duresley

You are a man of Duresley, i.e. a great liar and cheat. Duresley is a market—town in Gloucestershire, famous for its broadcloth manufactory. Now called Dursley. (See Fuller: Worthies.) The word “cabbage,” connected with tailors, seems to confirm the notion that our forefathers had no very high opinion of their honesty.

Durham Book

By Eadfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in 721, one of the most splendid examples of illumination in the world.

Durham Mustard

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

So called from the residence of Mrs. Clements, who first conceived the idea of grinding mustard in a mill, instead of pounding it in a mortar. George I. stamped it with his approval, hence the pots labelled “Durham mustard” bear the royal initials in a medallion.

Dus

or Deuce. The chief god of the Brigantians, one of whose altars, bearing an inscription, was discovered at Grestland. (Camden: Britannia.)

Dusiens

The name given by the Gauls to those demons that produce nightmares.

“Dæmones quos `duscios' Galli nuncupant”—

St. Augustine: De Civitate Dei, chap. xxiii.

Dust

Money; so called because it is made of gold—dust. It is said that Dean Swift took for the text of a charity sermon, “He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord.” Having thrice repeated his text, he added, “Now, brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust.” That ended his sermon.

Dust.

The wild Irish peasantry believe that dust is raised on roads by fairies on a journey, and raise their hats to it, saying, “God speed you, gentlemen.” The Arabs think the whirlwind and waterspout are caused by evil jinns.

I'll dust your jacket for you.

Give you a good beating. The allusion is to dusting carpets, etc., by beating them with a stick.

To raise a dust, To kick up a dust.

To make a commotion or disturbance. To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to a Mahometan practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of “confounding” the enemies of the faith. This was done by Mahomet on two or three occasions, as in the battle of Honein; and the Koran refers to it when it says, “Neither didst thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them.” But the following incident will suffice: One day the Koreishites surrounded the house of Mahomet, resolved to murder him. They peeped through the crevice of his chamber—door, and saw him lying asleep. Just at this moment his son—in—law Ali opened the door silently and threw into the air a handful of dust. Immediately the conspirators were confounded. They mistook Ali for Mahomet, and Mahomet for Ali; allowed the prophet to walk through their midst uninjured, and laid hands on Ali. No sooner was Mahomet safe, than their eyes were opened, and they saw their mistake.

“When the English king pursued the Imaum who had stolen the daughter of Allah, Allah threw dust in his eyes to check his pursuit.” — Legend at Gori (respecting the beauty of the Georgians).

Dustman has arrived

D

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(The), or “The sandman is about.” It is bedtime, for the children rub their eyes, as if dust or sand was in them.

Dusty

Well, it is none so dusty, or Not so dusty. I don't call it bad; rather smart. Here dusty is the opposite of neat, and neat = spruce. “None so dusty” or “Not so dusty” means therefore, Not so unspruce, or rather smart.

Dusty—foot

(See Pie Poudre .)

Dutch

The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when anyone tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bess (or Queen Anne) is dead; the Ark rested on Mount Ararat; etc.

Dutch Auction

An “auction” in which the bidders decrease their bids till they come to the minimum price. Dutch gold is no gold at all; Dutch courage is no real courage; Dutch concert is no music at all, but mere hubbub; and Dutch auction is no auction, or increase of bids, but quite the contrary.

Dutch Clocks

i.e. German clocks, chiefly made in the Black Forest. As many as 180,000 are exported annually from Friburg. (German, Deutsch, German.)

“A woman, that is like a German clock.

Still a—repairing, ever out of frame,

And never going aright.”

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iii.1.

Dutch Comfort

‘Tis a comfort it was no worse. The comfort derivable from the consideration that how bad soever the evil which has befallen you, a worse evil is at least conceivable.

Dutch Concert

A great noise and uproar, like that made by a party of Dutchmen in sundry stages of intoxication, some singing, others quarrelling, speechifying, wrangling, and so on.

Dutch Courage

The courage excited by drink; pot valour.

“In the Dutch wars (in the time of Charles II.), ...the captain of the Hollander man—of—war, when about to engage with our ships, usually set ... a hogshead of brandy abroach before the mast, and bid the men drink ...

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable and our men felt the force of the brandy to their cost.” — Notes and Queries (Oct. 15, 1892, p. 304).

Dutch Gleek

Tippling. Gleek is a game, and the phrase means the game loved by Dutchmen is drinking.

“Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer except it were the liquid part of it, which they call ‘Dutch Gleek.’” — Gayton.

Dutch Gold

Deutsche or German gold. An alloy of copper and zinc, invented by Prince Rupert of Bavaria.

Dutch Nightingales

Frogs. Similarly, Cambridgeshire nightingales; Liège nightingales, etc.

Dutch School

of painting is a sort of “pre—Raphaelite” exactness of detail without selection. It is, in fact, photographing exactly what appears before the artist, as faithfully as his art will allow. The subjects are generally the lower classes of social life, as pothouse scenes, drunken orgies, street groups, Dutch boors, etc., with landscapes and still—life. The greatest of the Dutch masters are: for portraits, Rembrandt, Bol, Flinck, Hals, and Vanderhelst; for conversation pieces, Gerhard Douw, Terburg, Metz, Mieris, and Netscher; for low life, Ostade, Brower, and Jan Steen; for landscapes, Ruysdael, Hobbema, Cuyp, Vanderneer, Berchem, and A. Both; for battle scenes, Wouvermans and Huchtenburg; for marine pieces, Vanderveelde and Bakhuizen; for still—life and flowers, Kalf, A. Van Utrecht, Van Huysum, and De Heem.

Dutch Toys

chiefly made in Meiningen, part of the duchy of Coburg—Gotha. (Dutch, i.e. Deutsch, German.)

Dutch Uncle

I will talk to you like a Dutch uncle. Will reprove you smartly. Uncle is the Latin notion of patruus, “an uncle,” “severe guardian,” or “stern castigator.” Hence Horace, 3 Od. xii. 3, “Metuentes patruæ verbera linguæ” (dreading the castigations of an uncle's tongue); and 2 Sat. iii. 88, “Ne sis patruus mihi”

(Don't come the uncle over me).

Dutchman

I'm a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the rivalry between England and Holland, the word Dutch was synonymous with all that was false and hateful, and when a man said, “I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask me,” he used the strongest term of refusal that words could express.

If not, I'm a Dutchman,

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

means, I will do it or I will call myself a Dutchman. Well, I'm a Dutchman! An exclamation of strong incredulity.

Duty

means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. Thus obedience is the debt of citizens to rulers for protection, and service is the debt of persons employed for wages received.

“Strictly considered, all duty is owed originally to God only; but ... duties to God may be distributed ... into duties towards self, towards manhood, and towards God.” — Gregory: Christian Ethics, part ii. division i. p. 172.

Duumvirs

(3 syl.) or Duumviri. Certain Roman officers who were appointed in pairs, like our London sheriffs. The chief were the two officers who had charge of the Sibylline books, the two who had the supervision of the municipal cities, and the two who were charged with naval matters.

Dwarf

(The). Richard Gibson, painter (1615—1690), a page of the backstairs in the court of Charles I. He married Anne Shepherd, a dwarf also, and the King honoured the wedding with his presence. Each measured three feet ten inches.

“Design or chance makes others wive,

But Nature did this match contrive.”

Waller.

The Black Dwarf. A fairy of the most malignant character; a genuine northern Duergar, and once held by the dalesmen of the border as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called, in which the “black dwarf” is introduced under the aliases of Sir Edward Mauley; Elshander, the recluse; Cannie Elshie; and the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor.

Dwarf Alberich

(in the Nibelungen Lied) is the guardian of the famous “hoard” won by Siegfried from the Nibelungs. The dwarf is twice vanquished by the hero, who gets possession of his Tarn—kappë (cloak of invisibility). (See Elberich.)

Dwarf Peter

(das Peter Manchen). An allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle spectre that advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid productive of trouble. The dwarf represents that corrupt part of human nature called by St. Paul the “law in our members which wars against the law of our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin.”

Dwarfs

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(under the three feet in height).

ANDROMEDA, 2 ft. 4 in. One of Julia's free maids. (See below, gonopas.) ARISTRATOS, the poet, was so small that Athenæos says, "no one could see him." BEBE, or Nicholas Ferry, 2 ft. 9 in. A native of France (1714—1737). He had a brother and sister, both dwarfs. BORUWLASKI (Count Joseph), 2 ft. 4 in. at the age of twenty. (1739—1837).

BUCKINGER (Matthew), a German, born 1674. He was born without hands, legs, or feet. Facsimiles of his writing are amongst the Harleian MSS.

CHE—MAH (a Chinese), 2 ft. 1 in., weight 52 lbs. Exhibited in London in 1880. COLOBRI (Prince) of Sleswig, 2 ft. 1 in., weight 25 lbs. at the age of 25 (1851). CONOPAS, 2 ft. 4 in. One of the dwarfs of Julia, niece of Augustus. (See above, ANDROMEDA.) COPPERNIN, the dwarf of the Princess of Wales, mother of George III. The last court dwarf in England. CRACH'AMI' (Caroline). Born at Palermo; 1 ft. 8 in. at death. (1814—24.) Exhibited in Bond Street, London, 1824.

DECKER or DUCKER (John), 2 ft. 6 in. An Englishman (1610). FAIRY QUEEN (The), 1 ft. 4 in., weight 4 lbs, Exhibited in Regent Street, London, 1850. Her feet were less than two inches.

GIBSON (Richard), a good portrait painter. His wife's maiden name was Anne Shepherd. Each measured 3 ft. 10 in. Waller sang their praises. (In the reign of Charles I.)

HUDSON (Sir Jeffrey). Born at Oakham, Rutlandshire; 1 ft. 6 in. at the age of thirty (1619—78). J ARVIS (John), 2 ft. Page of honour to Queen Mary (1508—56).

LOLKES (Wybrand), 2 ft. 3 in., weight 57 lbs. Exhibited at Astley's in 1790. LUCIUS, 2 ft., weight 17 lbs. The dwarf of the Emperor Augustus.

MARINE (Lizzie), 2 ft. 9 in., weight 45 lbs.

MIDGETS, THE. Lucia Zarate, the eldest sister, 1 ft. 8 in., weight 4 3/4 lbs at the age of eighteen. Her sister was a little taller. Exhibited in London, 1881.

MILLER (Miss), of Virginia, 2 ft. 2 in.

MITE (General), 1 ft. 9 in. (weight 9 lbs.) at the age of seventeen. Exhibited in London, 1881. PAAP (Simon). A Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in., weight 27 lbs.

TERESIA (Madame). A Corsican, 2 ft. 10 in., weight 27 lbs. Exhibited in London 1773. TOM THUMB (General), whose name was Charles S. Stratton, born at Bridgeport in Connecticut, U.S., 2 ft. 1 in., weight 25 lbs, at the age of twenty—five. (1838—83.) Exhibited first in London in 1844. In 1863 he married

Betsy Bump (Lavina Warren).

TOM THUMB, a Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in, at the age of eighteen. WANMER (Lucy), 2 ft. 6 in., weight 45 lbs. Exhibited in London, 1801, at the age of forty—five. WARREN (Lavina), married to General Tom Thumb in 1863, was also a dwarf, and in 1885 she married another dwarf, Count Primo Magri, who was 2 ft. 8 in.

WORMBERG (John), 2 ft. 7 in at the age of thirty—eight (Hanoverian period). XIT was the dwarf of Edward VI.

ZARATE (Lucia), 1 ft. 3 in. An excellent linguist of Shigaken Osara (b. 1851). Nicephorus Galistus tells us of an Egyptian dwarf not bigger than a partridge. The names of several infants are known whose heads have not exceeded in size an ordinary billiard ball. The son of D. C. Miller, of Candelaria, born October 27th, 1882, weighed only 8 $\frac{3}{3}$ oz. A silver dollar would entirely hide its face, and its mouth was too small to admit an ordinary lead pencil.

The head of the son of Mrs. Charles Tracy, of Kingsbridge, N.Y., was not bigger than a horse—chestnut, and the mouth would hardly grasp a goose—quill. The mother's wedding ring would slip easily up its legs and thighs.

The head of Mr. Marion Poe's child was not so big as a billiard ball, and the mother's ring would slip up the arm as high as the shoulder. Mr. Poe stands over six feet in height.

I have a list of several other babies of similar dimensions.

Dwile

or Dwyel. A house—flannel for cleaning floors, common in Norfolk, and called in the piece “dwyeling.” (Dutch, dweil, a clout or swab.)

Dwt

is D—wt., i.e. denarius—weight (penny—weight). (See Cwt.)

Dyed Beards

The dyeing of beards is mentioned by Strabo, and Bottom the Weaver satirises the custom when he undertakes to play Pyramus, and asks, “what beard were I best to play it in?”

“I will discharge it in either your straw—colour beard, your orange—tawny beard, your purple—in—grain beard, or your French—crown—colour beard (your perfect yellow).” — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 2.

The French couronne = twenty—five francs, was a gold piece, and therefore the French—crown colour was a golden yellow; but the word French—crown also means baldness brought on by licentiousness. Hence the retort “some of your `French—crowns' have no hair at all.”

Dyeing Scarlet

Drinking deep. Drinking dyes the face scarlet.

“They call drinking deep, dyeing scarlet.” —

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV

ii. 4.

Dying Sayings

(real or traditional):

ADAMS (President): “Independence for ever.” ADAMS (John Q.): “It is the last of earth. I am content.”

BYRON: “I must sleep now.”

CAESAR (Julius): “Et tu, Brute?” (This he said to Brutus, his most intimate friend, when he stabbed him.)

CAMERON (Colonel James): “Scots, follow me!” (He was killed at Bull—Run, 21st July, 1861.)

CASTLEREAGH: “Bankhead, let me fall into your arms. It is all over.” (Said to Dr. Bankhead.) CATESBY (one of the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot): “Stand by me, Tom, and we will die together.”

CHARLEMAGNE: “Lord, into Thy hand I commend my spirit.” (See Columbus and Tasso.)

CHARLES I. (of England, just before he laid his head on the block, said to Juxon, Archbishop of Canterbury): “Remember.”

CHARLES II. (of England): “Don't forget poor Nell,” or “Don't let poor Nell starve” (meaning Nell Gwynne)

CHARLES V.: “Ah! Jesus.”

CHARLES VIII. (of France): “I hope never again to commit a mortal sin, nor even a venial one, if I can help it.” (With these words in his mouth, says Cominges, he gave up the ghost.)

CHARLES IX. (of France, in whose reign occurred the Bartholomew slaughter): “Nurse, nurse, what murder! what blood! Oh! I have done wrong: God pardon me.”

CHARLOTTE (The Princess): “You make me drunk. Pray leave me quiet. I feel it affects my head.”

CHESTERFIELD (Lord): “Give Dayrolles a chair.”

CHRIST (Jesus): “It is finished!” (John xix. 30.)

CHRYSOSTOM: “Glory to God for all things. Amen.” CICERO (to his assassins): “Strike!”

COLIGNY: “Honour these grey hairs, young man.” (Said to the German who assassinated him.)

COLUMBUS: “Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit.” (See Charlemagne and Tasso.)

CONDE (Duc d'Enghien): “I die for my king and for France.” (Shot by order of Napoleon I. in 1804.)

COPERNICUS: “Now, O Lord, set thy servant free.” (See Luke ii. 29.)

CORDAY (Charlotte): “One man have I slain to save a hundred thousand.” CRANMER (Archbishop of Canterbury): “That unworthy hand! That unworthy hand!” (This he said, according to a popular tradition as he held in the flames his right hand which had signed his apostasy.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

CROMBE (John): “O Hobbema, Hobbema, how I do love thee!” CROMWELL: “My design is to make what haste I can to be gone.” CUVIER: (to the nurse who was applying leeches). “Nurse, it was I who discovered that leeches have red blood.”

DANTON (to the executioner): “Be sure you show the mob my head. It will be a long time ere they see its like.”

DEMONAX (the philosopher): “You may go home, the show is over” (Lucian). (See Rabelais.) DERBY (Earl of): “Douglas, I would give all my lands to save thee.”

DICKENS (said in reply to his sister—in—law, who urged him to lie down): “Yes, on the ground.” DIDEROT: “The first step towards philosophy is incredulity.”

DIOGENES (requested that his body should be buried, and when his friends said that his body would be torn to pieces be replied): “Quid mihi nocebunt ferarum dentes nihil sentienti.”

DOUGLAS (Earl): “Fight on, my merry men.”

EDWARDS (Jonathan): “Trust in God, and you need not fear.” ELDON (Lord): “It matters not where I am going whether the weather be cold or hot.” ELIZABETH (Queen): “All my possessions for a moment of time.”

ELIZABETH (sister of Louis XVI., on her way to the guillotine, when her kerchief fell from her neck): “I pray you, gentlemen, in the name of modesty, suffer me to cover my bosom.”

ELPHEGE (Archbishop of Canterbury): “You urge me in vain. I am not the man to provide Christian flesh for Pagan teeth, by robbing my flock to enrich their enemy.”

EPAMINONDAS (wounded; on being told that the Thebans were victorious): “Then I die happy.” (See Wolfe.) ETTY: “Wonderful! Wonderful this death!”

EULER: “I am dying.”

FARR (M.D.): “Lord, receive my spirit.”

FELTON (John): “I am the man” (i.e. who shot the Duke of Buckingham). FONTENELLE: “I suffer nothing, but I feel a sort of difficulty of living longer.” FRANKLIN: “A dying man can do nothing easily.”

FREDERICK V. (of Denmark): “There is not a drop of blood on my hands.” (See Pericles.)

GAINSBOROUGH: “We are all going to heaven, and Vandyke is of the company.” (See Crome.) GARRICK: “Oh, dear!”

GASTON DE FOIX (called “Phoebus” for his beauty): “I am a dead man! Lord, have mercy upon me!”

GEORGE IV.: “Watty, what is this? It is death, my boy. They have deceived me.” (Said to his page, Sir Wathen Waller.)

GIBBON: “Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!”

GOETHE: “More light.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

GOLDSMITH: "No, it is not." (Said in reply to Dr. Turton, who asked him if his mind was at ease.) GRANT (General): "I want nobody distressed on my account."

GREGORY VII.: "I have loved justice and hated iniquity, therefore I die in exile." (He had embroiled himself with Heinrich IV., the Kaiser, and had retired to Salerno.)

GREY (Lady Jane): "Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." (See Charlemagne.) GROTIUS: "Be serious."

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS: "My God!"

HALLER: "My friend, the pulse has ceased to beat." (This was said to his medical attendant.) HANNIBAL: "Let us now relieve the Romans of their fears by the death of a feeble old man." HARRISON (W.H.): "I wish you to understand the true principles of government. I wish them carried out, and ask nothing more."

HAYDN died singing "God preserve the emperor!"

HAZLITT: "I have led a happy life."

HENRY II. (of England). "Now let the world go as it will; I care for nothing more." (This he said when he was told that his favourite son John was one of those who were conspiring against him. (Shakespeare makes Macbeth say.

"I 'gin to be a weary of the sun,

And wish th' estate o' the world were now undone."

) HENRY III. "I am Harry of Winchester." (These can hardly be called his dying words, but only the last recorded. They were spoken on the field of battle when a man was about to slay him. The battle of Evesham was fought August 4th, 1265, but Henry III, died November 16th, 1272.)

HENRY VII.: "We heartily desire our executors to consider how behoofful it is to be prayed for." HENRY VIII.: "All is lost! Monks, monks, monks!"

HENRY (Prince): "Tie a rope round my body, pull me out of bed, and lay me in ashes, that I may die with repentant prayers to an offended God."

HERBERT (George): "Now, Lord, receive my soul."

HOBBS: "Now I am about to take my last voyage — a great leap in the dark." HOFER (Andreas): "I will not kneel. Fire!" (Spoken to the soldiers commissioned to shoot him.) HOOD: "Dying, dying."

HOOPER: "Lord, receive my spirit."

HUMBOLDT: "How grand these rays! They seem to beckon earth to heaven." HUNTER (Dr. William): "If I had strength to hold a pen, I would write down how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die."

IRVING (Edward): "If I die, I die unto the Lord. Amen."

JACKSON (surnamed "Stonewall"): "Send Hill to the front." JAMES V. (of Scotland): "It [the crown of Scotland] came with a lass and will go with a lass." (This he said when told that the queen had given birth to a daughter — the future Mary Queen of Scots.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

JEFFERSON (of America): “I resign my spirit to God, my daughter to my country.” JEROME (of Prague): “Thou knowest, Lord, that I have loved the truth.”

JESUS (See Christ).

JOAN OF ARC: “Jesus! Jesus! Jesus! Blessed be God.” JOHNSON (Dr.): “God bless you, my dear” (to Miss Morris). JOSEPHINE (the divorced wife of Napoleon I.) “L'île d'Elbe! Napoleon!” JULIAN (called the “Apostate”): “Vicisti, O Galileë.”

KEATS: “I feel the flowers growing over me.”

KEN (Bishop): “God's will be done.”

KNOX: “Now it is come.”

LAMB (Charles): “My bed—fellows are cramp and cough — we three all in one bed.” LAMBERT (the Martyr): “None but Christ! None but Christ!” (This he said as he was pitched into the flames.) LAVOISIER, being condemned to die, asked for a respite of two weeks that he might complete some experiments in which he was engaged. He was told that the Republic was in no need of experiments. (See above, ARCHIMEDES.)

LAWRENCE (St.) Said to have been broiled alive on a gridiron, A.D. 258.

“This side enough is toasted, so turn me, tyrant, eat,

And see whether raw or roasted I make the better meat.” <Foxe: Book of Martyrs.

LISLE (Sir George): “Ay! but I have been nearer to you, my friends, many a time, and you have missed me.” LOCKE (John): “Oh! the depth of the riches of the goodness and knowledge of God. Cease now.” (This was said to Lady Masham, who was reading to him some of the Psalms.)

LOUIS I.: “Huz! huz!” (Bouquet says, “He turned his face to the wall, twice cried huz! huz! [out; out!] and then died.)

LOUIS IX.: “I will enter now into the house of the Lord.”

LOUIS XI.: “Notre dame d'Embrun, ma bonne maltresse, aidez moi.” LOUIS XIV.: “Why weep you? Did you think I should live for ever? I thought dying had been harder.”

LOUIS XVI. (on the scaffold): “Frenchmen, I die guiltless of the crimes imputed to me. Pray God my blood fall not on France!”

LOUIS XVIII.: “A king should die standing.” (See Vespasian and Siward.) MADISON (James): “I always talk better lying down.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

MAHOMET or MOHAMMED: "O Allah! be it so! Henceforth among the glorious host of Paradise."
MALESHERBES (to the priest): "Hold your tongue! your wretched chatter disgusts me."

MARAT (stabbed in his bath by Charlotte Corday): "Help! help me, my dear!" (To his housekeeper.)
MARGARET (of Scotland, wife of Louis XI. of France): "Fi de la vie! qu'on ne m'en parle plus."

MARIE ANTOINETTE: "Farewell, my children, for ever. I am going to your father." MARTIN (St.): "What dost thou here, thou cruel beast?" (Said to the devil). (St. Sulpicius: Epistle to Bassula.) MARTINUZZI (Cardinal), the Wolsey of Hungary. He was assassinated uttering the words, "Jesu, Maria!"

MARY (Queen of England): "You will find the word Calais written on my heart." MASANIELLO: "Ungrateful traitors!" (To his assassins.)

MATHEWS (Charles): "I am ready."

MAXIMILLIAN (Emperor of Mexico): "Poor Carlotta!" (Referring to his wife.) MELANCTHON (in reply to the question, "Do you want anything?"): "Nothing but heaven." MIRABEAU: "Let me fall asleep to the sound of delicious music." (See Leopold.)

MONICA (St.): "In peace I will sleep with Him and take my rest." (St. Augustin: Confessions.) MOODY (the actor):

"Reason thus with life:

If I do lose thee, I do lose a thing

That none but fools would keep."

(The same is said of Paterson, an actor in the Norwich Company.) MOORE (Hannah): "Patty, Joy."

MOORE (Sir John): "I hope my country will do me justice."

MORE (Sir Thomas): "For my coming down, let me shift for myself." MOZART: "You spoke of a refreshment, Emilie; take my last notes, and let me hear once more my solace and delight."

MURAT (King of Naples): "Soldiers, save my face; aim at my heart. Farewell." (Said to the men appointed to shoot him.)

NAPOLEON I.: "Mon Dieu! La nation Francaise. Tête d'armée!" NAPOLEON III.: "Were you at Sedan?" (To Dr Conneau.)

NELSON: "I thank God I have done my duty. Kiss me, Hardy." NERO: "Qualis artifex perio."

PALMER (the actor): "There is another and a better world." (This he said on the stage. It is a line in the part he was performing — The Stranger.)

PASCAL: "My God, forsake me not."

PER'ICLES (of Athens): "I have never caused any citizen to put on mourning on my account." (See FREDERICK)

V.)

PITT (William): “Alas, my country!”

PIZARRO: “Jesu!”

POMPADOUR (Mdme. de): “Stay a little longer, M. le Curé, and we will go together.” PONLATOWSKI (after the bridge over the Pliesse was blown up): “Gentlemen, it behoves us now to die with honour.”

POPE: “Friendship itself is but a part of virtue.”

RABELAIS: “Let down the curtain, the farce is over.” (See Demonax.) RALEIGH: “It matters little how the head lies.” (Said on the scaffold where he was beheaded.) RENAN: “We perish, we disappear, but the march of time goes on for ever.”

RICHARD I. (of England): “Youth, I forgive thee!” (This was said to Bertrand de Gourdon, who shot him with an arrow at Chalus.) Then to his attendants he added, “Take off his chains, give him 100 shillings, and let him go.”

RICHARD III. (of England): “Treason! treason!” (At Bosworth, where his best men deserted him and joined the army of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII.)

ROBESPIERRE (taunted with the death of Danton): “Cowards! Why did you not defend him?” (This must have been before his jaw was broken by the shot of the gendarme the day before he was guillotined.)

ROCHEJAQUELEIN (the Vendean hero): “We go to meet the foe. If I advance, follow me; if I retreat, slay me; if I fall, avenge me.”

ROLAND (Madame): “O liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name!” SALADIN: “When I am buried, carry my winding—sheet on the point of a spear, and say these words: Behold the spoils which Saladin carries with him! Of all his victories, realms, and riches, nothing remains to him but this.” (See Severus.)

SAND (George): “Laissez la verdure.” (That is, leave the plot green, and do not cover the grave with bricks or stone.)

SCARRON: “Ah, my children, you cannot cry for me so much as I have made you laugh.” SCHILLER: “Many things are growing plain and clear to my understanding.”

SCOTT (Sir Walter): “God bless you all. I feel myself again.” (To his family.) SERVE'TUS (at the stake): “Christ, Son of the eternal God, have mercy upon me.” (Calvin insisted on his saying, “the eternal Son of God,” but he would not, and was burnt to death.)

SEVE'RUS: “I have been everything, and everything is nothing. A little urn will contain all that remains of one for whom the whole world was too little.” (See Saladin.)

SEYMOUR (Jane): “No, my head never committed any treason; but, if you want it, you can take it.” (As Jane Seymour died within a fortnight of the birth of her son Edward — the cause of unbounded delight to the king — I cannot believe that this traditionary speech is correct.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

SHARPE (Archbishop): "I shall be happy."

SHERIDAN: "I am absolutely undone."

SIDNEY (Algernon): "I know that my Redeemer liveth. I die for the good old cause." (He was condemned to death by Judge Jeffries as an accomplice in the Rye House plot.)

SIDNEY (Sir Philip): "I would not change my joy for the empire of the world." SIWARD (the Dane): "Lift me up that I may die standing, not lying down like a cow." (See Louis XVIII, and Vespasian.)

SOCRATES: "Crito, we owe a cock to Æsculapios."

STAEL (Madame de): "I have loved God, my father, and liberty." STEPHEN (the first Christian martyr): "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." SWEDENBORG: "What o'clock is it?" (After being told, he added). "Thank you, and God bless you." TALMA: "The worst is, I cannot see." (But his last word was) "Voltaire."

TASSO: "Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." (See Charlemagne, and Columbus.) TAYLOR (General Zachary): "I have tried to do my duty, and am not afraid to die. I am ready." TENTERDEN (Lord Chief Justice): "Gentlemen of the jury, you may retire."

THERAMENES (the Athenian, condemned by Critias to drink hemlock, said as he drank the poison): "This to the fair Critias."

THIEF (The Penitent): "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom." THURLOW (Lord): "I'll be shot if I don't believe I'm dying."

TYLER (Wat): "Because they are all under my command, they are sworn to do what I bid them." VANE (Sir Harry): "It is a bad cause which cannot bear the words of a dying man."

VESPASIAN: "A king should die standing" (See Louis XVIII. and Siward); but his last words were, "Ut puto, deus fio" (referring to the fact that he was the first of the Roman emperors who died a natural death, if, indeed, Augustus was poisoned, as many suppose).

VICARS (Hedley): "Cover my face."

VOLTAIRE: "Do let me die in peace."

WASHINGTON: "It is well. I die hard, but am not afraid to go."

WESLEY: "The best of all is, God is with us."

WILBERFORCE (His father said to him, "So He giveth His beloved sleep"; to which Wilberforce replied): "Yes, and sweet indeed is the rest which Christ giveth." (Saying this, he never spoke again.)

WILLIAM I.: "To my Lady, the Holy Mary, I commend myself; that she, by her prayers, may reconcile her beloved Son to me."

WILLIAM II.: "Shoot, Walter, in the devil's name!" (Walter Tyrrell did shoot, but killed the king.) WILLIAM III.: "Can this last long?" (To his physician. He suffered from a broken collarbone.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

WILLIAM (of Nassau): "O God, have mercy upon me, and upon this poor nation." (This was just before he was shot by Balthasar Gerard.)

WILSON (the ornithologist): "Bury me where the birds will sing over my grave." WOLFE (General): "What! do they run already? Then I die happy." (See Epaminondas.) WOLSEY (Cardinal): "Had I but served my God with half the zeal that I have served my king, He would not have left me in my grey hairs."

WORDSWORTH: "God bless you! Is that you, Dora?"

WYATT (Thomas): "What I then said [about the treason of Princess Elizabeth] I unsay now; and what I now say is the truth." (This was said to the priest who waited on him on the scaffold.)

ZISKA (John): "Make my skin into drum—heads for the Bohemian cause." Many of these sayings, like all other history, belong to the region of Phrase and Fable, but the collection is interesting and fairly exhaustive.

Dymphna

The tutelary saint of those stricken in spirit. She was a native of Britain, and a woman of high rank. It is said that she was murdered, at Geel, in Belgium, by her own father, because she resisted his incestuous passion. Geel, or Gheel, has long been a famous colony for the insane, who are sent thither from all parts of Europe, and are boarded with the peasantry.

Dynamite

(3 syl.). An explosive compound consisting of some absorbent (as infusorial earth) saturated with nitroglycerine. (Greek, dunamis, power.)

Dynamite Saturday

January 24th, 1885, when great damage was done to the Houses of Parliament and the Tower of London by explosions of dynamite. The Law—Courts and some other public buildings were to have been attacked by the dynamiters, but happily were well guarded. (See Clan—Na—Gael.)

Dyot Street

Bloomsbury Square, London; now called George Street, St. Giles. Made familiar by a well—known song in Bombastes Furioso:

"My lodging is in heather lane,

A parlour that's next to the sky ..."

Rhodes.

Dyser

The deities who conduct the souls of the deceased to the palace of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dyvour

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The debtor's badge in Scotland (French, devoir, to own). Bankrupts were compelled to wear an upper garment, half yellow and half brown, with a parti — coloured cap. This law was abolished in the reign of William IV.

Dyzemas Day

Tithe day. (Portuguese, dizimas, tithes; Law Latin, decimæ.)

E

E. This letter represents a window; in Hebrew it is called he (a window).

E.G.

or e.g. (Latin for exempli gratia). By way of example; for instance.

E Pluribus Unum

(Latin). One unity composed of many parts. The motto of the United States of America.

Eager

or eagre. Sharp, keen, acid; the French aigre. (Latin, crude form, acr— “acer,” sharp.)

“It doth posset

And curd, like eager droppings into milk.” Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

“Vex him with eager words.”

Shakespeare: Henry VI.,

ii. 4.

Eagle

(in royal banners). It was the ensign of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and Seleucides. The Romans adopted it in conjunction with other devices, but Marius made it the ensign of the legion, and confined the other devices to the cohorts. The French under the Empire assumed the same device.

Eagle

(in Christian art) is emblematic of St. John the Evangelist, because, like the eagle, he looked on “the sun of glory”; the eagle was one of the four figures which made up the cherub (Ezek. i. 10).

Eagle

(in funerals). The Romans used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor. Dryden alludes to this custom in his stanzas on Oliver Cromwell after his funeral, when he says, “Officious haste did let too soon the sacred eagle fly.”

Eagle

(in heraldry) signifies fortitude.

Eagle

(for lecterns in churches). The eagle is the natural enemy of the serpent. The two Testaments are the two outspread wings of the eagle.

Pliny in his Natural History (book x. chap. 3) enumerates six kinds of eagles: (1) Melænactos, (2) Pygargus, (3) Morphnos, which Homer (Iliad, xxiv. 316) calls perknos, (4) Percnopterus, (5) Gnesios, the royal eagle, and (6) Haliæetos, the osprey.

Eagle

(in phrases).

Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's

(Ps. ciii. 5). This refers to the superstition feigned by poets that every ten years the eagle soars into the “fiery region,” and plunges thence into the sea, where, moulting its feathers, it acquires new life.

“She saw where he upstarted brave

Out of the well. ...

As eagle fresh out of the ocean wave,

Where he hath lefte his plumes all hory gray, And decks himself with fethers youthly gay.” Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. ll, 34.

Eagle

a public—house sign, is in honour of Queen Mary, whose badge it was. She put it on the dexter side of the shield, and the sun on the sinister — a conjugal compliment which gave great offence to her subjects.

The Golden Eagle

and the Spread Eagle are commemorative of the crusades; they were the devices of the emperors of the East.

Eagle

The spread eagle. A device of the old Roman or Eastern Empire, brought over by the crusaders.

Eagle of the doctors of France.

Pierre d'Ailly, a French cardinal and great astrologer, who calculated the horoscope of our Lord, and maintained that the stars foretold the great deluge. (1350—1425.)

Eagle of Brittany.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Bertrand Duguesclin, Constable of France. (1320—1380.) Eagle of Meaux [mo]. Jacques Bénigne Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, the grandest and most sublime of the pulpit orators of France. (1627—1704.)

Eagle

The two-headed eagle. Austria, Prussia (representing Germany), and Russia have two-headed eagles, one facing to the right and the other to the left. The one facing to the west indicates direct succession from Charlemagne, crowned the sixty-ninth emperor of the Romans from Augustus. In Russia it was Ivan Basilovitz who first assumed the two-headed eagle, when, in 1472, he married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Palæologus, and niece of Constantine XIV., the last Emperor of Byzantium. The two heads symbolise the Eastern or Byzantine Empire and the Western or Roman Empire.

Eagle—stones or Aetites Yellow clay ironstones supposed to have sanative and magical virtues. They are so called because they are found in eagles' nests. Epiphanius says, "In the interior of Scythia there is a valley inaccessible to man, down which slaughtered lambs are thrown. The small stones at the bottom of the valley adhere to these pieces of flesh, and eagles, when they carry away the flesh to their nests, carry the stones with it." The story of Sindbad in the Valley of Diamonds will occur to the readers of this article (Epiphanius: De duodecim gemmis, etc., p. 30; 1743).

It is said that without these stones eagles cannot hatch their eggs.

Ear

(Anglo—Saxon, eáre.)

A deaf ear.

One that refuses to listen; as if it heard not.

Bow down Thine ear.

Condescend to hear or listen. (Ps. xxxi. 2.) By ear. To sing or play by ear means to sing or play without knowledge of musical notes, depending on the ear only.

Give ear to

... Listen to; give attention to. I am all ear. All attention.

"I was all ear,

And took in strains that might create a soul Under the ribs of death."

Milton: Comus,

574.

I'll send you off with a flea in your ear.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

With a cuff or box of the ear. The allusion is to domestic animals, who are sometimes greatly annoyed with these “tiny torments.” There seems also to be a pun implied — flea and flee.

The French equivalent is “Mettre la puce à l'oreille, ' to give one a good jobation.

In at one ear, and out at the other.

Forgotten as soon as heard.

No ear.

A bad ear for musical intonations; “ear—blind” or “sound—blind.” Dionysius's Ear. A bell—shaped chamber connected by an underground passage with the king's palace. Its object was that the tyrant of Syracuse might over—hear whatever was passing in the prison.

Ear—finger

The little finger, which is thrust into the ear if anything tickles it.

Ear—marked

Marked so as to be recognised. The allusion is to marking cattle and sheep on the ear, by which they may be readily recognised.

“The increase [of these wild cattle] were duly branded and ear—marked each year.” — Nineteenth Century (May, 1893), p. 789.

“The late president [Balmaceda] took on board a large quantity of silver, which had been ear—marked for a particular purpose.” — Newspaper paragraph, Sept. 4, 1891.

Ear—shot

Within ear—shot. Within hearing. The allusion is palpable.

Ears

About one's ears. Causing trouble. The allusion is to a house falling on one, or a hornet's nest buzzing about one's head.

Bring the house about your ears.

Set the whole family against you.

If your ears burn, people say some one is talking of you. This is very old, for Pliny says, “When our ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence.” Shakespeare, in Much Ado About Nothing (iii. 1), makes Beatrice say, when Ursula and Hero had been talking of her, “What fire is in mine ears?” Sir Thomas Browne ascribes this conceit to the superstition of guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable, and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

“One ear tingles; some there be

That are snarling now at me.”

Herrick: Hesperides.

Little pitchers have large ears. (See Pitchers.)

Mine ears hast thou bored.

Thou hast accepted me as thy bond—slave for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bring him to the doorpost, and bore his ear through with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude. (Exod. xxi. 6.)

Over head and ears

(in love, in debt, etc.). Wholly, desperately.

“He is over head and ears in love with the maid. He loves her better than his own life.” — Terence in English.

To give's one's ears [to obtain an object]. To make a considerable sacrifice for the purpose. The allusion is to the ancient practice of cutting off the ears of those who loved their own offensive opinions better than their ears.

To have itching ears.

Loving to hear news or current gossip. (2 Tim. iv. 3.) To prick up one's ears. To listen attentively to something not expected, as horses prick up their ears at a sudden sound.

“At which, like unbacked colts, they pricked their ears.”

Shakespeare: The Tempest,

iv. 1.

To set people together by the ears.

To create ill—will among them; to set them quarrelling and pulling each other's ears.

“When civil dudgeon first grew high,

And men fell out, they knew not why;

When hard words, jealousies, and fears,

Set folks together by the ears.”

Butler: Hudibras

(The opening).

To tickle the ears.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To gratify the ear either by pleasing sounds or flattering words. Walls have ears. Things uttered in secret get rumoured abroad. Chaucer says, "That field hath eyen, and the wood hath ears." (Canterbury Tales, v. 1,524.)

Ears to ear Bible

(The). (1810.) "Who hath ears to ear, let him hear." (Matt. xiii. 43.) (See Bible.)

Earing

Ploughing. (Anglo—Saxon, erian, to plough; Latin, aro.)

"And yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest." — Genesis xiv. 6.

"In earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest." — Exodus xxxiv. 21.

Earl (Anglo—Saxon, eorl, a man of position, in opposition to ceorl, a churl, or freeman of the lowest rank; Danish, jarl). William the Conqueror tried to introduce the word Count, but did not succeed, although the wife of an earl is still called a countess.

"The sheriff is called in Latin vice—comés, as being the deputy of the earl or comés, to whom the custody of the shire is said to have been committed." — Blackstone: Commentaries, book

i. chap. ix. p. 339.

Earl of Mar's Grey Brecks

The 21st Foot are so called because they wore grey breeches when the Earl of Mar was their colonel. (1678—1686.)

The 21st Foot is now called the "Royal Scots Fusiliers."

Early to Bed

"Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise."

"Lever à cinq, diner à neuf,

Souper à cinq, coucher à neuf,

Font vivre d'ans nonante neuf." (The older of the two.)

"Lever à six, diner à dix,

Super à six, coucher à dix,

Fait vivre l'homme dix fois dix."

Earth

To gather strength from the earth. The reference is to Antæos, son of Poseidon and Ge, a giant and wrestler of Libya (Africa). So long as he touched the earth his strength was irresistible. Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tingis, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man, and called The hill of Antæos. Tradition says it is the wrestler's tomb. (See Maleger.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Earthmen

(The). Gnomes and fairies of the mines: a solemn race, who nevertheless can laugh most heartily and dance most merrily.

“We [earthmen] work at the mines for men; we put the ore in readiness for the miners.” — Besant and Rice: Titania's Farewell.

Earthquakes

According to Indian mythology, the world rests on the head of a great elephant, and when, for the sake of rest, the huge monster refreshes itself by moving its head, an earthquake is produced. The elephant is called “Muha—pudma.”

“Having penetrated to the south, they saw the great elephant ‘Muha—pudma,’ equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with its head.” — The Ramayuna (section xxxiii.).

The Lamas say that the earth is placed on the back of a gigantic frog, and when the frog stretches its limbs or moves its head, it shakes the earth. Other Eastern mythologists place the earth on the back of a tortoise.

Greek and Roman mythologists ascribe earthquakes to the restlessness of the giants which Jupiter buried under high mountains. Thus Virgil (Æneid, iii. 578) ascribes the eruption of Etna to the giant Enceladus.

Earwig

A corruption of the Saxon ear—wicga (ear—insect); so called because the hind wings resemble in shape the human ear. The word has engendered the notion that these insects are apt to get into our ears.

An earwig, metaphorically, is one who whispers into our ears all the news and scandal going, in order to curry favour; a flatterer.

“Court earwigs banish from your ears.” Political Ballads.

Ease

(Anglo—Saxon, eath; Latin, oti—um)

At ease.

Without pain or anxiety.

Ill at ease.

Uneasy, not comfortable, anxious. Stand at ease A command given to soldiers to rest for a time. The “gentlemen stood at ease” means in an informal manner.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To ease one of his money or purse.

To steal it. (See Little Ease.)

Ease

(Chapel of). (See Chapel .)

Ease Her!

A command given on a steamer to reduce speed. The next order is generally “Stop her!” — i.e. the steamboat.

East

The custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is to express the belief that Christ is the Day—spring and Sun of Righteousness. The altar is placed at the east end of the church to remind us of Christ, the “Day—spring” and “Resurrection”; and persons are buried with their feet to the east to signify that they died in the hope of the Resurrection.

The ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the face upwards, looking towards heaven; and the feet turned to the east or the rising sun, to indicate that the deceased was on his way to Elysium, and not to the region of night or the inferno. (Diogenés Laertius: Life of Solon, in Greek.)

East Indies

(1) He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He encountered many dangers of great magnitude, but was at last killed where he thought himself secure.

(2) To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To crush a fly on a wheel. To send to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a penny postage—stamp.

Easter

April was called Ostermonath — the month of the Ost—end wind (wind from the east). Easter is therefore the April feast, which lasted eight days. Our Easter Sunday must be between March 21st and April 25th. It is regulated by the paschal moon, or first full moon between the vernal equinox and fourteen days afterwards. (Teutonic, ostara; Anglo—Saxon, eastre.)

Easter.

The Saxon goddess of the east, whose festival was held in the spring.

Easter—day Sun

It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day. Sir Thomas Browne combats the notion in his Vulgar Errors.

“But oh, she dances such a way,

No sun upon an Easter day

Is half so fine a sight.”

Sir John Suckling.

Easter Eggs

or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re—creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg, for which Ormuzd and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things. It prevailed not only with the Persians, but also among the Jews, Egyptians, and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolise the resurrection, and they colour the eggs red in allusion to the blood of their redemption. There is a tradition, also, that the world was “hatched” or created at Easter—tide.

“Bless, Lord, we beseech thee, this Thy creature of eggs, that it may become a wholesome sustenance to Thy faithful servants, eating it in thankfulness to Thee, on account of the resurrection of our Lord.” — Pope Paul V: Ritual.

Eat

To eat humble pie. (See Humble Pie.)

To eat one out of house and home.

To eat so much that one will have to part with house and home in order to pay for it.

To eat one's words.

To retract in a humiliating manner; to unsay what you have said; to eat your own lick. To eat the mad cow. A French phrase, implying that a person is reduced to the very last extremity, and is willing to eat even a cow that has died of madness; glad to eat cat's meat.

“Il mangea de cette chose inexprimable qu'on appelle de la vache enragée.” — Victor Hugo: Les Misérables.

To eat the leek. (See Leek.)

To eat well.

To have a good appetite. But “It eats well” means that what is eaten is agreeable or flavorful. To “eat badly” is to eat without appetite or too little; not pleasant to the taste.

Eat not the Brain This is the 31st Symbol in the Protrepics of Iamblichus; and the prohibition is very similar to that of Moses forbidding the Jews to eat the blood, because the blood is the life. The brain is the seat of reason and the ruler of the body. It was also esteemed the Divine part — at least, of man.

Eat not the Heart

This is the 30th Symbol in the Protrepics of Iamblichus. Pythagoras forbade judges and priests to eat animal food at all, because it was taking away life. Other persons he did not wholly forbid this food, but he restricted them from eating the brain (the seat of wisdom) and the heart (the seat of life).

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Eat One's Heart Out

(To). To fret or worry unreasonably; to allow one grief or one vexation to predominate over the mind, tincture all one's ideas, and absorb all other emotions.

Eats his Head Off

(The horse). Eats more than he is worth, or the work done does not pay for the cost of keeping. A horse which stands in the stable unemployed eats his head off.

Eating One's Terms

To be studying for the bar. Students are required to dine in the Hall of the Inns of Court at least three times in each of the twelve terms before they are "called" [to the bar]. (See Doctors' Commons.)

Eating Together

To eat together in the East was at one time a sure pledge of protection. A Persian nobleman was once sitting in his garden, when a man prostrated himself before him, and implored protection from the rabble. The nobleman gave him the remainder of a peach which he was eating, and when the incensed multitude arrived, and declared that the man had slain the only son of the nobleman, the heart—broken father replied, "We have eaten together; go in peace," and would not allow the murderer to be punished.

Eau de Cologne

A perfumed spirit, prepared at Cologne. The most famous maker was Jean Maria Farina.

Eau de Vie

Brandy. A French translation of the Latin aqua vitæ (water of life). This is a curious perversion of the Spanish acqua di vitæ (water or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into aqua vitæ instead of aqua vitis, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists' elixir of life. The same error is perpetuated in the Italian acqua vite; the Scotch whisky, which is the Celtic uisce—lyf; and the Irish usquebaugh, which is the Gaelic and Irish uisge—beatha. (See Aqua Vitæ.)

Eaves—dropper

One who listens stealthily to conversation. The derivation of the term is not usually understood. The owners of private estates in Saxon times were not allowed to cultivate to the extremity of their possessions, but were obliged to leave a space for eaves. This space was called the yfes—drype (eaves—drip). An eaves—dropper is one who places himself in the eaves—drip to overhear what is said in the adjacent house or field.

"Under our tents I'll play the eaves—dropper,

To hear if any mean to shrink from me."

Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3.

Ebionism

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The doctrine that the poor only shall be saved. Ebion, plural ebionim (poor).

“At the end of the second century the Ebionites were treated as heretics, and a pretended leader (Ebion) was invented by Tertullian to explain the name.” — Renan: Life of Jesus, chap.

xi.

Ebionites

(4 syl.). A religious sect of the first and second centuries, who maintained that Jesus Christ was merely an inspired messenger, the greatest of all prophets, but yet a man and a man only, without any existence before His birth in Bethlehem. (See above.)

Eblis or Ibleis. A jinn, and the ruler of the evil genii, or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called Azazel or Hharis. When Adam was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Eblis replied, “Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?” God was very angry at this insolent answer, and turned the disobedient fay into a Sheytân (devil), and he became the father of devils.

“His majesty was a hundred feet in height; his skin, striped with red, was covered with small scales, which made it glisten like armour; his hair was so long and curly a snake might have lost its way in it; his flat nose was pierced with a ring of admirable workmanship; his small eyes assumed all the prismatic colours; his ears, which resembled those of an elephant, flapped on his shoulders; and his tail, sixty feet long, terminated in a hooked claw.” — Croquemitaine, ii. 10.

“When he said unto the angels, ‘Worship Adam,’ all worshipped him except Eblis.” — Al Koran, ii.

Ebony

God's image done in ebony. Negroes. Thomas Fuller gave birth to this expression.

Ebu'dæ

The Hebrides. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Ecce Homo

A painting by Correggio of our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as He was shown to the people by Pilate, who said to them, “Ecce homo!” (Behold the man!) (John xix. 5.)

Other conceptions of this subject, either painted or engraved, are by Albert Durer (1471—1528), Titian (1477—1576), Cigoli (1559—1613), Guido (1574—1642), Albani (1578—1660), Vandyck (1599—1641), Rembrandt (1608—1669), Poussin (1613—1675), and some others.

Ecce Signum

See it, in proof; Behold the proof!

“I am eight times thrust through the doublet, four through the hose; my buckler cut through and through; my sword hacked like a handsaw — ecce signum!” — Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV.,

ii. 4.

Eccentric

means deviating from the centre; hence irregular, not according to rule. Originally applied to those planets which wander round the earth, like comets, the earth not being in the centre of their orbit. (Latin, ex centrum.)

Eccentric Sensation

The sensations of the brain transferred to objects without. For example: we see a tree; this tree is a reflection of the tree on the retina transferred to the brain; but the tree seen is the tree without, not the tree in the brain. This transferred perception is called an "Eccentric Sensation."

Eccentric Theory (The) in astronomy. A theory which uses an eccentric instead of an epicycle in accounting for the sun's motion.

Ecclesiastes

(5 syl.). One of the books in the Old Testament, arranged next to Proverbs, generally ascribed to Solomon, because it says (verse 1), "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." This seems, so far, to confirm the authorship to Solomon; but verse 12 says, "I, the Preacher, was king over Israel, in Jerusalem," which seems to intimate that he was once a king, but was so no longer. If so, it could not be Solomon, who died king of the twelve tribes. "Son of David" often means a descendant of David, Christ himself being so called.

Ecclesiastical

The father of ecclesiastical history. Eusebius of Cæsare'a (264—340).

Ecclesiasticus

is so called, not because the writer was a priest, but because the book (in the opinion of the fathers) was the chief of the apocryphal books, designated by them Ecclesiastici Libri (books to be read in churches), to distinguish them from the canonical Scriptures.

Echidna

(E—kid'—na). Half—woman, half—serpent. She was mother of the Chimæra, the many—headed dog Orthos, the hundred—headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberos, Scylla, the Gorgons, the Lernæan hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean lion.

(Hesiod.)

"[She] seemed a woman to the waist, and fair

But ended foul in many a scaly fold,

Voluminous and vast."

Milton: Paradise Lost,

book ii. 650—2.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Echo

The Romans say that Echo was a nymph in love with Narcissus, but her love not being returned, she pined away till only her voice remained. We use the word to imply similarity of sentiment: as You echo my ideas; That is an echo to my opinion.

“Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen

Within thy airy shell,

By slow Meänder's margent green ...

Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair

That likest thy Narcissus are?”

Milton: Comus, 230, etc.

Echo

(Gr., eko; verb, ekeo, to sound.)

To applaud to the echo.

To appland so loudly as to produce an echo.

Eckhardt

A faithful Eckhardt, who warneth everyone (German). Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of Maundy Thursday to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two—legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectics

Ancient philosophers, who selected what they thought best in all other systems, and made a patchwork therefrom. There is the eclectic school of painters, of which Paul Delaroche was the founder and best exponent; the eclectic school of modern philosophy, founded by Victor Cousin; the eclectic school of architecture; and so on. (Greek, ek—lego, to pick out.)

Eclectics

or Modern Platonists. A Christian sect which arose in the second century. They professed to make truth their sole object of inquiry, and adopted from existing systems whatever, in their opinion, was true. They were called Platonists because they adopted Plato's notions about God and the human soul.

Eclipses were considered by the ancient Greeks and Romans as bad omens. Nicías, the Athenian general, was so terrified by an eclipse of the moon, that he durst not defend himself from the Syracusans; in consequence of which his whole army was cut to pieces, and he himself was put to death.

The Romans would never hold a public assembly during an eclipse. Some of their poets feign that an eclipse of the moon is because she is gone on a visit to Endymion.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A very general notion was and still is among barbarians that the sun or moon has been devoured by some monster, and hence the custom of beating drums and brass kettles to scare away the monster.

The Chinese, Laps, Persians, and some others call the evil beast a dragon. The East Indians say it is a black griffin.

The notion of the ancient Mexicans was that eclipses were caused by sun and moon quarrels, in which one of the litigants is beaten black and blue.

Ecliptic

The path apparently described by the sun in his annual course through the heavens. Eclipses happen only when the moon is in or near the same plane.

Eclogue

(2 syl.). Pastoral poetry not expressed in rustic speech, but in the most refined and elegant of which the language is capable. (Greek, meaning “elegant extracts,” “select poetry.”)

Ecnephia

A sort of hurricane, similar to the Typhon.

“The circling Typhon, whirled from point to point, ...

And dire Ecnephia reign.”

Thomson: Summer.

Ecole des Femmes

Molière borrowed the plot of this comedy from the novelletti of Ser Giovanni, composed in the fourteenth century.

Economy

means the rules or plans adopted in managing one's own house. As we generally prevent extravagant waste, and make the most of our means in our own homes, so the careful expenditure of money in general is termed house—management. The word is applied to time and several other things, as well as money. (Greek, oikos nomos, house—law.)

Animal economy.

The system, laws, and management whereby the greatest amount of good accrues to the animal kingdom.

“Animal ... economy, according to which animal affairs are regulated and disposed.” — Shaftesbury: Characteristics.

Political economy. The principles whereby the revenues and resources of a nation are made the most of. Thus: Is Free Trade good or bad economy? Articles are cheaper, and therefore the buying value of money is increased; but, on the other hand, competition is increased, and therefore wages are lowered.

Vegetable economy.

The system, laws, and management, whereby the greatest amount of good is to be derived by the vegetable kingdom.

The Christian Economy.

The religious system based on the New Testament. That is, what is the best economy of man, taking into account the life that now is, and that which is to come? The answer is thus summed up by Christ: "What is a man profited though he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? For what should a man give in exchange for his soul?"

The Mosaic economy.

The religious system taught by God: that is, the system whereby man obtains the greatest amount of value for his conduct, whether by serving God or living for this life only. Also called "The Jewish Economy."

Economy is a great income.

"No alchemy like frugality." "Ever save, ever have." The following also are to a similar effect: "A pin a day is a groat a year." "Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves." "Many a little makes a mickle." "Frae saving, comes having." "A penny saved is a penny gained." "Little and often fills the purse."

Latin:

"Non intelligunt homines quam magnum vectigal sit parsimonia" (Cicero). "Sera in fundo est parsimonia" (Seneca).

French:

"Plusieurs Peu font un Beaucoup." "Denier sur denier bâtit la maison." German: "Die sparsamkeit ist ein grosser zyll" (Parsimony is a great income).

Economy of Nature

(The). The laws of nature, whereby the greatest amount of good is obtained; or the laws by which the affairs of nature are regulated and disposed.

Ecorcheurs

Freebooters of the twelfth century, in France; so called because they stripped their victims of everything, even their clothes. (French, écorcher, to flay.)

Ecstasy

(Greek ex—stasis from ex—istemi, to stand out of [the body or mind]). To stand out of one's mind is to lose one's wits, to be beside oneself. To stand out of one's body is to be disembodied. St. Paul refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, "whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell" (2 Cor. xii. 2—4). St. John also says he was "in the spirit" — i.e. in an ecstasy — when he saw the apocalyptic vision (i. 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was very general in former ages, and is still the belief of many. (See Ecstatici.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Ecstatic Doctor

(The). Jean de Ruysbrock, the mystic (1294—1381).

Ecstatici

(The). A class of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who used to lie in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they had seen while they were “out of the body.” (Greek, ex—istemi.)

Ector

(Sir). The foster—father of King Arthur.

Edda

There are two religious codes, so called, containing the ancient Scandinavian mythology. One is in verse, composed in Iceland in the eleventh century by Sæmund Sigfusson, the Sage; and the other in prose, compiled a century later by Snorri Sturleson, who wrote a commentary on the first edda. The poetical edda contains an account of creation, the history of Odin, Thor, Freyr, Balder, etc., etc. The prose one contains the exploits of such conquerors as Voelsung, Sigurd, Attle, etc., and is divided into several parts. The first part contains historical and mythological traditions; the second a long poetical vocabulary; and the third Scandinavian prosody, or the modes of composition adopted by the ancient Skalds. The poetical compilation is generally called Sæmund's Edda, and the prose one Snorri's Edda.

Eden

Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. ii. 15). The word means delight, pleasure.

Eden Hall

The luck of Eden Hall. An old painted drinking—glass, supposed to be sacred. The tale is that the butler once went to draw water from St. Cuthbert's Well, in Eden Hall garden, Cumberland, when the fairies left their drinking—glass on the well to enjoy a little fun. The butler seized the glass, and ran off with it. The goblet is preserved in the family of Sir Christopher Musgrave. Longfellow wrote a poem on the subject. The superstition is —

“If that glass either break or fall,

Farewell the luck of Eden Hall.”

Readers of the Golden Butterfly, by Besant and Rice, will remember how the luck of Gilead P. Beck was associated with a golden butterfly.

Edinburgh

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

i.e. Edwin's burgh. The fort built by Edwin, king of Northumbria (616—633). Dun Eden or Dunedin, is a Saxon form; Edina a poetical one.

Edgar

or Edgardo. Master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucy Ashton (Lucia di Lammermoor). While absent in France on an important embassy, the lady is led to believe that her lover has proved faithless to her, and in the torrent of her indignation consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but stabs him on the wedding—night, goes mad, and dies. In the opera Edgardo stabs himself also; but in the novel he is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies—Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy. (Donizetti's opera of "Lucia di Lammermoor"; Sir Walter Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor.")

Edge

(Anglo—Saxon, ecg.)

Not to put too fine an edge upon it.

Not to mince the matter; to speak plainly.

“He is, not to put too fine an edge upon it, a thorough scoundrel.” — Lowell.

To be on edge. To be very eager or impatient.

To set one's teeth on edge.

To give one

the horrors; to induce a tingling or grating sensation in one's teeth, as from acids or harsh noises.

“I had rather hear a brazen canstick turned,

Or a dry wheel grate on the axle—tree;

And that would set my teeth nothing on edge, Nothing so much as mincing poetry.”

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., iii. 1.

Edge Away

(To). To move away very gradually, as a ship moves from the edge of the shore. Often called egg. (Anglo—Saxon, ecg, an edge; ecg—clif, is a sea cliff.)

Edge—bone

(See Aitch—Bone .)

Edge on

(See Egg on .)

Edge of the Sword

To fall by the edge of the sword. By a cut from the sword; in battle.

Edgewise

One cannot get in a word edgewise. The [conversation is so engrossed by others] that there is no getting in a word.

Edged Tools

It is dangerous to play with edged tools. It is dangerous to tamper with mischief or anything that may bring you into trouble.

Edhilingi

The aristocratic class among the Anglo—Saxons; the second rank were termed the Frilingi; and the third the Lazzi. (Anglo—Saxon, ædele or edele, noble; free—ling, free—born. Ricardo says of the third class, they were the “unwilling to work, the dull” — quos hodie lazier dicimus.)

Edict of Milan Proclaimed by Constantine, after the conquest of Italy (313), to secure to Christians the restitution of their civil and religious rights.

Edict of Nantes

An edict published by Henri IV. of France, granting toleration to his Protestant subjects. It was published from Nantes in 1598, but repealed in 1685 by Louis XIV.

Eddie Ochiltree

In Scott's Antiquary.

“Charles II. would be as sceptical as Eddie Ochiltree about the existence of circles and avenues, altar—stones and cromlechs.” — Knight: Old England.

Edify

is to build a house (Latin, ædes—facio); morally, to build instruction in the mind methodically, like an architect. The Scripture word edification means the building—up of “believers” in grace and holiness. St. Paul says, “Ye are God's building,” and elsewhere he carries out the figure more fully, saying —

“All the building [or body of Christians], fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord.” — Eph. ii. 21.

Ediles

(2 syl.). Roman officers who had charge of the streets, bridges, aqueducts, temples, and city buildings generally. We call our surveyors city ediles sometimes. (Latin, ædes, a house.)

Edith

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

called the Maid of Lorn (Argyleshire), was about to be married to Lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce, tempest—tossed, sought shelter at the castle. Edith's brother recognised the Bruce, and being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued, in the course of which the abbot arrived, but refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord. Edith fled, and, assuming the character of a page, passed through divers adventures. At length Robert Bruce won the battle of Baunockburn, and when peace was restored Ronald married the "Maid of Lorn." (Scott: Lord of the Isles.) in Roxburghshire, near the Tweed, where Thomson, the author of The Seasons, was born.

Ednam

"The Tweed, pure parent—stream,

Whose pastoral banks first heard my Doric reed." Autumn (888—9).

Edobe

(2 syl.). Edobe cottages are those made of sun—dried bricks, like the buildings of ancient Egypt. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, i. 16.)

The present and proper form of this word is Adobe (Spanish, adobar, plaster).

"They make adobes, or sun—dried bricks, by mixing ashes and earth with water, which is then moulded into large blocks and dried in the sun." — Bancroft: Native Races, vol. i. p. 535.

Edward

Edward the Confessor's sword. Curtana (the cutter), a blunt sword of state, emblematical of mercy.

The Chevalier Prince Charles Edward.

The Young Pretender. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Redgauntlet, first as "Father Buonaventura," and afterwards as Pretender to the Crown. Again in Waverley.

Edwidge

Wife of William Tell. (Rossini's opera of Guglielmo Tell.)

Edwin

The hero of Beattie's Minstrel.

"And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy;

Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye,

Dainties he heeded not, nor gaud, nor toy,

Save one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy;

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Silent when glad; affectionate, though shy. And now his look was most demurely sad; And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why. The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad; Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad." Canto i. 16.

Edyrn

Son of Nudd; called the "Sparrowhawk." He ousted the Earl of Yniol from his earldom, and tried to win E'nid, the earl's daughter, but failing in this, became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Being overthrown in a tournament by Prince Geraint', he was sent to the court of King Arthur, where his whole nature was completely changed, and "subdued to that gentleness which, when it weds with manhood, makes a man."

(Idylls of the King; Enid.)

Eel

A nickname for a New Englander.

"The eels of New England and the corncrackers of Virginia." — Haliburton: Clockmaker.

Eel

A salt eel. A rope's end, used for scourging. At one time eelskins were used for whips.

"With my salt eele, went down in the parler, and there got my boy and did beat him." — Pepys' Diary (April 24th).

Eel

(Anglo—Saxon, oel.)

Holding the eel of science by the tail.

That is, to have an ephemeral smattering of a subject, which slips from the memory as an eel would wriggle out of one's fingers if held by the tail.

"Cauda tenes anguillam, in eos apte dicitur, quibus res est cum hominibus lubrica fide, perflidisque, aut qui rem fugitivam atque incertam aliquam habent, quam tueri diu non possint." — Erasmus: Adagia, p. 324. (1629.)

To get used to it, as a skinned eel, i.e.

as an eel is used to being skinned. It may be unpleasant at first, but habit will get the better of such annoyance.

"It ain't always pleasant to turn out for morning chapel, is it, Gig—lamps? But it's just like the eels with their skinning: it goes against the grain at first, but you soon get used to it." — Cuthbert Bede [Bradley]: Verdant Green, chap. vii.

To skin an eel by the tail is to do things the wrong way.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Eelchance Tables

The celebrated calculation of Nazir' u Dien, the Persian astronomer, grandson of Zenghis Khan, brought out in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Effendi

A Turkish title, about equal to our “squire,” given to emirs, men of learning, and the high priests of mosques. The title is added after the name, as Ali effendi (Ali Esquire).

Effigy

To burn or hang one in effigy. To burn or hang the representation of a person, instead of the person himself, in order to show popular hatred, dislike, or contempt. The custom comes from France, where the public executioner used to hang the effigy of the criminal when the criminal himself could not be found.

Effrontery

Out—facing, rude persistence, and overbearing impudence. (Latin, ef—frons, i.e. ex—frons, out—face.)

Egalité Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, father of Louis—Philippe, King of the French, was so called because he sided with the revolutionary party, whose motto was “Liberty, fraternity, and equality.” Philippe Egalité was guillotined in 1793.

Egeria

The nymph who instructed Numa in his wise legislation. Numa used to meet her in a grove near Aricia.

Egg. Eggs

(Anglo—Saxon, æg.)

A bad egg.

A bad speculation; a man who promises, but whose promises are pie—crust. A duck's egg, in cricket. (See Duck.)

Golden eggs.

Great profits. (See Goose.)

“I doubt the bird is flown that laid the golden eggs.” — Scott: The Antiquary.

The mundane egg. The Phoenicians, and from them the Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese, and many other ancient nations, maintained that the world was hatched from an egg made by the Creator. Orpheus speaks of this egg.

Eggs of Nuremberg.

(See Nuremberg.) Pasch eggs. (See Easter Eggs.)

The serpent's egg of the Druids.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

This wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents, and was buoyed into the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed, to avoid being stung to death; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest or combat, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of these eggs, and that it was about as large as a moderate—sized apple.

PHRASES AND PROVERBS:

Don't put all your eggs in one basket.

Don't venture all you have in one speculation; don't put all your property in one bank. The allusion is obvious.

From the egg to the apples.

(Latin, “ab ovo usque ad mala.”) From first to last. The Romans began their “dinner” with eggs, and ended with fruits called “mala.”

I have eggs on the spit.

I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again; the eggs were then drawn on a “spit,” and roasted. As this required both despatch and constant attention, the person in charge could not leave them. It must be remembered that the word “spit” had at one time a much wider meaning than it has now. Thus toasting—forks and the hooks of a Dutch oven were termed spits.

“I forgot to tell you, I write short journals now; I have eggs on the spit.” — Swift.

I got eggs for my money means I have valuable money, and received instead such worthless things as eggs. When Wolsey accused the Earl of Kildare for not taking Desmond prisoner, the Earl replied, “He is no more to blame than his brother Ossory, who (notwithstanding his high promises) is glad to take eggs for his money,” i.e. is willing to be imposed on. (Campion: History of Ireland, 1633.)

Like as two eggs.

Exactly alike.

“They say we are almost as like as eggs.” — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

Sure as eggs is eggs.

Professor de Morgan suggests that this is a corruption of the logician's formula, “x is x.” (Notes and Queries.)

Teach your grandmother to suck eggs.

Attempting to teach your elders and superiors. The French say, “The goslings want to drive the geese to pasture” (Les oisons veulent mener les ois paître).

There is reason in roasting eggs.

Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than in some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being “ill—roasted, all on one side,” as Touchstone says (As You Like It, iii. 2).

“One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg;

The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.” Pope: Epistles, ii.

To tread upon eggs.

To walk gingerly, as if walking over eggs, which are easily broken. Will you take eggs for your money? “Will you allow yourself to be imposed upon? Will you take kicks for half—pence?” This saying was in vogue when eggs were plentiful as black—berries.

“My honest friend, will you take eggs for money?” — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

Egg Feast

In Oxford the Saturday preceding Shrove Tuesday is so called; it is also called Egg—Saturday, because pasch eggs are provided for the students on that day.

Egg—flip, Egg—hot, Egg—nog

Drinks composed of warm spiced ale, with sugar, spirit and eggs; or eggs beaten up with wine, sweetened and flavoured, etc.

Egg—on or Edge—on. A corruption of the Saxon eggian (to incite). The Anglo—Saxon ecg, and Scandinavian eg, means a “sharp point” — hence edge—hog (hedgehog), a hog with sharp points, called in Danish pin—swin (thorny swine), and in French porc—épic, where épic is the Latin spicula (spikes).

Egg Saturday

(See above, Egg—Feast .)

Egg—trot

A cautious, jog—trot pace, like that of a good housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers.

Egil

Brother of Weland, the Vulcan of Northern mythology. Egil was a great archer, and a tale is told of him the exact counterpart of the famous story about William Tell: One day King Nidung commanded Egil to shoot an apple off the head of his son. Egil took two well—selected arrows from his quiver, and when asked by the king why he took two, replied (as the Swiss peasant to Gessler), “To shoot thee, O tyrant, with the second, if I fail.”

Egis

(See Ægis .)

Eglantine

(3 syl.). Daughter of King Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine, the brother of Orson. She soon died. (Valentine and Orson.)

Madame Eglantine.

The prioress in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Good—natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her courtly manners, and noted for her partiality to lap—dogs, her delicate oath, “by saint Eloy,” her “entuning the service swetely in her nose,” and her speaking French “after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe.”

Ego

and Non—Ego. “Ego” means I myself; “Non—ego” means the objective world. They are terms used by Fichté (1762—1814) to explain his Idealism. According to this philosopher, the Ego posits or embraces the Non—ego. Take an example: A tree is an object out of my personality, and therefore a part of the Non—ego. I see a tree; the tree of my brain is a subjective tree, the tree itself is an objective tree. Before I can see it, the objective tree and the subjective tree must be like the two clocks of a telegraphic apparatus; the sender and reader must be in connection, the reader must “posit,” or take in the message sent. The message, or non—ego, must be engrafted into the ego. Applying this rule generally, all objects known, seen, heard, etc., by me become part of me, or the ego posits the non—ego by subjective objectivity.

Egoism The theory in Ethics which places man's summum bonum in self. The correlative of altruism, or the theory which places our own greatest happiness in making others happy. Egoism is selfishness pure, altruism is selfish benevolence. “Egoist,” a disciple of egoism.

“To say that each individual shall reap the benefits brought to him by his own powers ... is to enunciate egoism as an ultimate principle of conduct.” — Spencer: Data of Ethics, p. 189.

Egotism

The too frequent use of the word I; the habit of talking about oneself, or of parading one's own doings. “Egotist,” one addicted to egotism.

Egypt

in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means France.

“Egypt and Tyrus [Holland] intercept your trade,

And Jebusites [Papists] your sacred rites invade.” Part i. 705—6.

Egyptian Crown

(The). That of Upper Egypt was a high conical white cap, terminating in a knob. That of Lower Egypt was red. If a king governed both countries he wore both crowns (that of Lower Egypt outside the other). This double crown was called a pschent.

Egyptian Days

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The last Monday in April, the second Monday of August, and the third Monday of December. So called because Egyptian astrologers marked them out.

“Three days there are in the year which we call Egyptian Days.” — Saxon MS. (British Museum).

Egyptian Festivals

(The). The six great festivals of the ancient Egyptians were — 1. That of Bubastis (= Diana, or the moon);
2. That of Busiris, in honour of Isis;
3. That of Saïs (= Minerva, Hermes, or Wisdom);
4. That of Heliopolis, in honour of the sun;
5. That of Butis, or Buto, the goddess of night; and
6. That of Papremis (= Mars or Ares, the god of War).

Eider—down

The down of the eider duck. This duck is common in Greenland, Iceland, and the Islands north and west of Scotland. It is about the size of a goose, and receives its distinctive name from the river Eider, in Denmark.

Eikon Basilike

[Portraiture of the King]. A book attributed to Charles I., but claimed by John Gauden, Bishop of Exeter. “The is wholly and only my invention.” (Gauden; Letter to the Lord Chancellor.)

Eisell Wormwood wine. Hamlet says to Laertes, Woul't drink up eisell — i.e. drink wormwood wine to show your love to the dead Ophelia? In the Troy Book of Ludgate we have the line “Of bitter eysell and of eager [sour] wine.” And in Shakespeare's sonnets;

“I will drink

Potions of eysell, gainst my strong infection No bitterness that I will bitter think,

Nor double penance to correct correction.” Sonnet cxi.

Eisteddfod

The meetings of the Welsh bards and others, now held annually, for the encouragement of Welsh literature and music. (Welsh, “a sessions,” from eistedd, to sit.)

Either

(Greek, hekater'; Irish, ceachtar; Saxon, ægther. Ceach', our “each,” and ægther, our “either.”)

Ejusdem Farinæ

(Latin). Of the same kidney; of the same sort.

“Lord Hartington, Lord Derby, Mr Childers, and others ejusdem farinae.” — Newspaper paragraph, November, 1885.

El Dorado

Golden illusion; a land or means of unbounded wealth. Orellana, lieutenant of Pizarro, pretended he had discovered a land of gold (el dorado) between the rivers Orinoco and Amazon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guiana as the spot indicated, and published a highly—coloured account of its enormous wealth. Figuratively, a source of wit, wealth, or abundance of any kind.

The real “land of gold” is California, and not Guiana. (See Balnibarbi.)

“The whole comedy is a sort of El Dorado of wit.” — T. Moore

El Dorado (masculine), “the gilt one,” can hardly refer to a country; it seems more likely to refer to some prince; and we are told of a prince in South America who was every day powdered with gold—dust blown through a reed. If this is admitted, no wonder those who sought a golden country were disappointed.

El Infante de Antequera is the Regent Fernando, who took the city of Antequera from the Moors in 1419.

El Islam

The religion of the Moslems. The words mean “the resigning one's—self to God.”

El Khidr

One of the good angels, according to the Koran.

Elagabalus

A Syro—Phœnician sun—god, represented under the form of a huge conical stone. The Roman emperor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, was so called because in childhood he was priest of the Sun—god. Of all the Roman emperors none exceeded him in debauchery and sin. He reigned about four years (B.C. 218—222), and died at the age of eighteen.

This madman invited the principal men of Rome to a banquet, and smothered them in a shower of roses.

Elaine

(2 syl.). The “lily maid of Astolat” (Guildford, in Surrey), who loved Sir Lancelot “with that love which was her doom.” Sir Lancelot, being sworn to celibacy, could not have married her, even if he had been willing; and, unhappily, what little love he had was bestowed on the queen. Elaine felt that her love was a vain thing, and died. According to her last request, the bed on which she died was placed on a barge, and on it was laid her dead body, arrayed in white, a lily in her right hand, and a letter avowing her love in the left. An old dumb servitor steered and rowed the barge up the river, and when it stopped at the palace staith, King Arthur

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

ordered the body to be brought in. The letter being read, Arthur directed that the maiden should be buried like a queen, with her sad story blazoned on her tomb. The tale is taken from Sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur, part iii. Tennyson turned it into blank verse. (Idylls of the King; Elaine.)

Elasmotherium

(Greek, the metalplate beast). An extinct animal, between the horse and the rhinoceros.

Elberich

The most famous dwarf of German romance. He aided the Emperor Otnit (who ruled over Lombardy) to gain for wife the Soldan's daughter. (The Heldenbuch.)

Elbow

(Anglo—Saxon, el—boga, el = an ell, boga = a bow.)

A knight of the elbow.

A gambler. At one's elbow. Close at hand. To elbow one's way in. To push one's way through a crowd; to get a place by hook or crook. To elbow out, to be elbowed out. To supersede; to be ousted by a rival.

Up to one's elbow

[in work]. Very busy, or full of work. Work piled up to one's elbows.

Elbow Grease

Perspiration excited by hard manual labour. They say "Elbow grease is the best furniture oil."

Elbow Room

Sufficient space for the work in hand.

Elbows

Out at elbows. Shabbily dressed (applied to men only), metaphorically, short of money; hackneyed; stale; thus, we say of a play which has been acted too often that it is worn out at elbows. It is like a coat which is no longer presentable, being out at the elbows.

Elden Hole

Elden Hole needs filling. A reproof given to great braggarts. Elden Hole is a deep pit in Derbyshire Peak, said to be fathomless. (See Sir W. Scott Peveril of the Peak, ch. iii.)

Elder—tree

Sir John Maundeville, speaking of the Pool of Siloe, says, "Fast by is the elder—tree on which Judas hanged himself. when he sold and betrayed our Lord." Shakespeare, in Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2, says, "Judas was hanged on an elder" (See Fig—Tree.)

“Judas he japed

With Jewish siller,

And sithen on an elder tree

Hanged himself ... when”

Piers Plowman: Vision.

Eleanor Crosses

Eleatic Philosophy

Founded by Xenophanes of Elea about B.C. 530. The Ionic school believed there was but one element; the Eleatics said there were four or six, as heat and cold, moisture and dryness, odd and even, from the antagonisms of which visible objects sprang: Thus, Fire is heat acting on dryness, Air is heat acting on moisture; Water is cold acting on moisture; and Earth is cold acting on dryness. (See below.)

The New Eleatic School

was founded by Leucippos of Elea, a disciple of Zeno. He wholly discarded the phantasmagoric theory, and confined his attention to the physical properties of the visible world. He was the father of the Atomic System, in which the agency of chance was again revived.

Elecampane and Amrida

Sweetmeats which confer immortality (Latin, helenium campana) or inula campana) Pliny tells us the plant so called sprang from Helen's tears. The sweetmeat so called is a coarse sugar—candy. There was also an electuary so called, said to cure wounds given in fight.

“Here, take this essence of elecampane;

Rise up, Sir George, and fight again.”

Miracle Play of St. George.

Elector

A prince who had a vote in the election of the Emperor of Germany. Napoleon broke up the old German empire, and the college of electors fell asunder.

The Great Elector.

Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620—1688).

Electricity

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(from the Greek elektron, amber). Thales (B.C. 600) observed that amber when rubbed attracted light substances, and this observation followed out has led to the present science of electricity.

“Bright amber shines on his electric throne.”

Darwin: Economy of Nature,

i. 2.

Negative and positive electricity.

Two opposite conditions of the electric state of bodies. At one time electricity was considered a fluid, as heat was thought to be caloric. Everybody was thought to have a certain quantity. If a body contained more than its normal quantity it was said to be positive, if less, it was said to be negative in this respect. Another theory was that there were two different electric fluids, which neutralised each other when they came in contact. Electricity is now supposed to be a mere condition, like heat and motion; but its energy is set in action by some molecular disturbance, such as friction, rupture, and chemical action. The old terms are still retained.

Electro—Biology

The science of electricity as it is connected with the phenomena of living beings. Also the effect of “animal magnetism” on living creatures, said to produce sleep, stupor, anesthesia, etc.

Electro—Chemistry

That branch of chemistry which treats of electricity as an energy affecting chemical changes.

Electuary

Something to be licked up, a medicine made “thick and slab,” which cannot be imbibed like a liquid nor bolted like a pill, but which must be licked up like honey. (Greek, ek—leicho.)

Eleemosynam

Eleemosynam sepulcri patris tui (Alms on your father's grave). (See Meat.)

Elegant Extracts

The 85th Foot, remodelled in 1813, after the numerous court—martials which then occurred. The officers of the regiment were removed, and officers drafted from other regiments were substituted in their places. The 85th is now called the “Second Battalion of the Shropshire Light Infantry.” The first battalion is the old 23rd.

At the University of Cambridge, in the good old times, some few men were too good to be plucked and not good enough for the poll: a line was drawn below the poll—list, and these lucky unfortunates, allowed to pass, were nick—named the Elegant Extracts. There was a similar limbo in the honour—list, called the Gulf, in allusion to a Scripture passage well known and thus parodied, “Between them [in the poll] and us [in the honour—lists] there is a great gulf fixed,” etc.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Elements

according to Aristotle. Aristotle maintained that there are four elements — fire, air, water, and earth, and this assertion has been the subject of very unwise ridicule. Modern chemists maintain the same fact, but have selected four new words for the four old ones, and instead of the term “element,” use “material forms.” We say that matter exists under four forms: the imponderable (caloric), the gaseous (air), the liquid (water), and the solid (earth), and this is all the ancient philosophers meant by their four elements or elemental forms. It was Empedocles of Sicily who first maintained that fire, air, earth, and water are the four elements; but he called them Zeus, Hera, Goea, and Poseidon. (Latin, eleo for oleo. Vossius says: ab ant. eleo pro oleo, i.e. cresco, quod omnia crescant ac nascantur.” Latin, elementum. to grow out of.)

“Let us the great philosopher [Aristotle] attend. . . .

His elements, `Earth, Water, Air, and Fire; . . . Tell why these simple elements are four;

Why just so many; why not less or more?”

Blackmore: Creation, v.

The first of these forms — viz. “Caloric,” or the imponderable matter of heat, is now attributed to a mere condition of matter, like motion.

Elephant

The elephant which supports the world is called “Muha—pudma,” and the the tortoise which supports the elephant is called “Chukwa.” In some of the Eastern mythologies we are told that the world stands on the backs of eight elephants, called “Achtequedjams.”

Elephant

(The). Symbol of temperance, eternity, and sovereignty. (See White Elephant.)

“L'eternité est désignée sur une médaille de l'empereur Philippe, par un elephant sur lequel est monté un petit garçon armé de flèches.” — Noel: Dictionnaire de la Fable, vol. i. p. 506.

Elephant

(See White Elephant .)

Only an elephant can bear an elephant's load.

An Indian proverb: Only a great man can do the work of a great man; also, the burden is more than I can bear; it is a load fit for an elephant.

Elephant Paper

A large—sized drawing—paper, measuring 20 inches by 23. There is also a “double elephant paper,” measuring 40 inches by 26 3/4.

Elephant and Castle

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A public—house sign at Newington, said to derive its name from the skeleton of an elephant dug up near Battle Bridge in 1714. A flint—headed spear lay by the remains, whence it is conjectured that the creature was killed by the British in a fight with the Romans. (The Times.)

There is another public—house with the same sign in St. Pancras, probably intended to represent an elephant with a howdah.

Elephanta

in Bombay, is so called from a stone elephant, which carried a tiger on its back, and formerly stood near the landing—place on the south side of the island. It has now nearly disappeared. The natives call it Gahrapooree (cave town), from its cave, 130 feet long. (Chow—chow.)

Elephantine

(4 syl.). Heavy and ungainly, like an elephant. In Rome, the registers of the senate, magistrates, generals, and emperors were called elephantine books, because they were made of ivory. In geology, the elephantine period was that noted for its numerous large thick—skinned animals. The disease called elephantiasis is when the limbs swell and look like those of an elephant more than those of a human being.

Eleusinian Mysteries

The religious rites in honour of Demeter or Ceres, performed at Eleusis, in Attica.

Elevation of the Host

(The). The celebrant lifting up the “consecrated wafers” above his head, that the people may see the paten and adore “the Host” while his back is turned to the congregation.

Eleven (Anglo—Saxon, aendlefen, aend = ain, lefen = lef, left). One left or one more after counting ten (the fingers of the two hands). Twelve is Twa lef (two left); all the other teens up to 20 represent 3, 4, 5, etc. + ten. It would seem that at one time persons did not count higher than twelve, but in a more advanced state they required higher numbers, and introduced the “teen” series, omitting eleven and twelve, which would be enteen and twateen.

Eleven Thousand Virgins

Ursula being asked in marriage by a pagan prince, fled towards Rome with her eleven thousand virgins. At Cologne they were all massacred by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour “their bones” are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall. Maury says that Ursula's handmaid was named Undecimella, and that the legend of her eleven thousand virgins rose out of this name. (Légendes Pieuses.)

Eleventh Hour

(At the). Just in time (Matt. xx. 1).

Elf

(plural, Elves, Anglo—Saxon, oelf). Properly, a mountain fay, but more loosely applied to those airy creatures that dance on the grass or sit in the leaves of trees and delight in the full moon. They have fair golden hair, sweet musical voices, and magic harps. They have a king and queen, marry and are given in marriage. They impersonate the shimmering of the air, the felt but indefinable melody of Nature, and all the little prettinesses which a lover of the country sees, or thinks he sees, in hill and dale, copse and meadow, grass and tree, river and moonlight. Spenser says that Prometheus called the man he made "Elfe," who found a maid in the garden of Adonis, whom he called "Fay," of "whom all Fayres spring."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

"Of these a mighty people shortly grew,

And puissant kings, which all the world war rayd, And to themselves all nations did subdue.", Faërie Queene, ii. 9, stanza 70, etc.

Elf and Goblin,

as derived from Guelf and Ghibelline, is mentioned in Johnson (article GOBLIN), though the words existed long before those factions arose. Heylin (in his Cosmography, p. 130) tells us that some supported that opinion in 1670. Skinner gives the same etymology.

Red Elf.

In Iceland, a person gaily dressed is called a red elf (raud âlfr), in allusion to a superstition that dwarfs wear scarlet or red clothes. (Nial's Sagas.) Black elves are evil spirits; white elves, good ones.

Elf—arrows

Arrow—heads of the neolithic period. The shafts of these arrows were reeds, and the heads were pieces of flint, carefully sharpened, and so adjusted as to detach themselves from the shaft and remain in the wounded body. At one time they were supposed to be shot by elves at people and cattle out of malice or revenge.

"There every herd by sad experience knows

How, winged with fate, their elf—shot arrows fly, When the sick ewe her summer food forgoes, Or stretched on earth the heart—smit heifers lie." Collins: Popular Superstitions.

Elf—fire

The ignis — fatuus. The name of this elf is Will o' the Wisp, Jack o' lanthorn, Peg—a—lantern, or Kit o' the canstick (candlestick).

Elf—land

The realm ruled over by Oberon, King of Faëry. King James says: "I think it is liker Virgilis Campi Elysii nor anything that ought to be believed by Christians." (Dæmonology, iii. 5.)

Elf—locks

Tangled hair. It is said that one of the favourite amusements of Queen Mab is to tie people's hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman, "he elfs all his hair in knots." (Lear, ii. 3.)

"This is that very Mab

That plats the manes of horses in the night, And bakes [? cakes] the elf—locks in foul sluttish hairs." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

Elf—marked

Those born with a natural defect, according to the ancient Scottish superstition, are marked by the elves for mischief. Queen Margaret called Richard III. —

“Thou elfish—marked, abortive, rooting hog!” —

Shakespeare: Richard III.,

i. 3.

Elf—shot

Afflicted with some unknown disease, and supposed to have been wounded by an elfin arrow. The rinderpest would, in the Middle Ages, have been ascribed to elf—shots. (See Elf—Arrows.)

Elfin

The first fairy king. He ruled over India and America. (Middle Age Romance.)

Elgin Marbles

A collection of ancient bas—reliefs and statutes made by Lord Elgin, and sent to England in 1812. They are chiefly fragments of the Parthenon at Athens, and were purchased by the British Government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum (1816). (Elgin pronounced `gin,' as in begin.)

Elia

A nom de plume adopted by Charles Lamb. (Essays of Elia.)

“The adoption of this signature was purely accidental. Lamb's first contribution to the London Magazine was a description of the old South—Sea House, where he had passed a few months' novitiate as a clerk, ... and remembering the name of a gay light—hearted foreigner, who fluttered there at the time, substituted his name for his own.” — Talfourd.

Eliab

in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington. Eliab was one of the chiefs of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag. (1 Chron. xii. 9.)

“Hard the task to do Eliab right;

Long with the royal wanderer [Charles II.] he roved, And firm in all the turns of fortune proved.” Absalom and Achitophel, part ii. 986—8.

Eliakim

Jehoiakim, King of Judah. (B.C. 635, 610—598.)

Elidure

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.). A legendary king of Britain, advanced to the throne in place of his elder brother, Arthgallo, supposed by him to be dead. Arthgallo, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidure resigned to him the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Eligibles

and Detrimentials. Sons which are socially good and bad parties, to be introduced to daughters with a view of matrimony.

“The County Families of the United Kingdom is useful to all who are concerned with questions of precedence, and especially useful to mothers who desire to distinguish between ‘eligibles’ and ‘detrimentials.’” — Notes and Queries, February 1st, 1886, p. 119.

Elijah's Melons

Certain stones on Mount Carmel are so called. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palestine.) Similar formations are those called “The Virgin Mary's Peas” (q.v.). Compare also the Bible story of Lot's wife.

The story is that the owner of the land refused to supply the wants of the prophet, and consequently his melons were transformed into stones.

Eliminate

(4 syl.). To turn out of doors; to turn out of an equation everything not essential to its conditions. (Latin, e limine, out of doors.)

Eliot

(George). A nom de plume of Marian Evans (Mrs. Cross), author of Adam Bede, etc. (1820—1880).

Eliott's Tailors

The 15th Hussars, now the 15th [King's] Hussars, previously called the 15th, or king's own royal light dragoon guards. In 1759 Lieutenant—Colonel Eliott enlisted a large number of tailors on strike into a cavalry regiment modelled after the Prussian hussars. This regiment so highly distinguished themselves, that George III. granted them the honour of being called “the king's royal.”

Elissa

Dido, Queen of Carthage. A Phoenician name signifying heroic, brave.

“Nec me meminisse pigebit Elissæ.”

Virgil: Æneid,

iv. 335.

Dido was the niece of the Bible Jezebel. Ithobal I., king of Tyre (1 Kings xvi. 13), had for children Belus, Margenus, and Jezebel. Of these Belus was the father of Pygmalion and Dido. Hence Jezebel was Dido's aunt.

Elissa

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(deficiency or parsimony; Greek, ellipsis). Step—sister of Medina and Perissa, but they could never agree upon any subject. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book ii.)

Elivager

(4 syl.). A cold venomous stream which issued from Niflheim, and in the abyss called the Ginnunga Gap, hardening into layer upon layer of ice. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Elixir of Life

A ruby, supposed by the alchemists to prolong life indefinitely. The tincture for transmuting metals was also called an elixir. (Arabic, el or al iksir, the iksir (? coction).) (See Amrita.)

“He that has once the Flower of the Sun,

The perfect ruby which we call Elixir ...

Can confer honour, love, respect, long life, Give safety, valour, yea, and victory,

To whom he will. In eight—and—twenty days I'll make an old man of fourscore a child.

Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, ii. 1.

Elizabeth

had pet names for all her favourite courtiers; q.e.:

The mother of Sir John Norris she called “My own Crow.” Burghley was her “Spirit.”

Mountjoy she termed her “Kitchenmaid in Ireland.”

Elizabeth

has given more variants than any other Christian name: Eliza, Isa, Isabel, Lizzy, Elizabeth, Elisabetta, Betty, Bettina, Bess, Bessy, etc.

Elizabeth of Hungary

(St.). Patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. (1207—1231.)

Elizabethan

After the style of things in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Elizabethan architecture is a mixture of Gothic and Italian, prevalent in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

Ell

(Anglo—Saxon eln, an ell). It is said that the English ell was the length of Henry I.'s arm, but the ordinary length of a man's arm is about a yard.

Give him an inch, and he'll take an ell.

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Give him a little licence, and he will take great liberties, or make great encroachments. The ell was no definite length. The English ell was 45 inches, the Scotch ell only 37 inches, while the Flemish ell was three—quarters of a yard and a French ell a yard and a half. This indefinite measure expresses the uncertainty of the length to which persons will go to whom you give the inch of liberty. Some will go the French ell; while others of more modesty or more limited desires will be satisfied with the shorter measures.

Ell—wand

(The King's). The group of stars called “Orion's Belt.”

“The King's Ellwand, now foolishly termed the `Belt of Orion.'” — Hogg: Tales, etc.

Ella

or Alla. King of Northumberland, who married Cunstance. (Chaucer: Man of Lawes Tale.) (See Cunstance.)

Elliot

In the Black Dwarf, by Sir Walter Scott, are seven of that name, viz. Halbert or Hobbie Elliot, of the Heugh—foot (a farmer); Mrs. Elliot, his grandmother; John and Harry, his brothers; and Liliass, Jean, and Arnot, his sisters.

Ellyllon

The souls of the ancient Druids, which, being too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven, are permitted to wander upon earth till the judgment day, when they will be admitted to a higher state of being

(Welsh mythology.)

Elmo's Fire

(St.). Comazants, or electric lights occasionally seen on the masts of ships before and after a storm; so called by the Spaniards because St. Elmo is with them the patron saint of sailors. (See Castor And Pollux.)

“Sudden, breaking on their raptured sight,

Appeared the splendour of St. Elmo's light.” Hoole: Orlando Furioso, book ix.

Elohim

The genus of which ghosts, Chemosh, Dagon, Baal, Jahveh, etc., were species. The ghost or spectre which appeared to Saul (1 Sam. xxviii. 14—20) is called Elohim. “I see Elohim coming up out of the earth,” said the witch; and Saul asked, “What is HE like?” (Huxley: Nineteenth Century, March, 1886.)

“The word Elohim is often applied in the Bible to the gods of the Gentiles.” — Lenormant: Beginnings of History, chap. vii.

In theology, Elohim (the plural of Eloah) means the “Lord of Hosts,” or Lord of all power and might. Jehovah signifies rather the God of mercy and forgiveness. Hence, Elohim is used to express the God of creation, but Jehovah the God of the covenant of mercy.

“Elohim designates the fulness of Divine power.” — Religious Encyclopaedia.

Elohistic

and Jehovistic Scriptures. The Pentateuch is supposed by Bishop Colenso and many others to have been written at two widely different periods, because God is invariably called Elohim in some paragraphs, while in others He is no less invariably called Jehovah. The Elohistic paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, are said to be the older; while the Jehovistic paragraphs indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are altogether of a more elaborate character. Those who maintain this theory think that some late transcriber has compiled the two Scriptures and combined them into one, much the same as if the four Gospels were collated and welded together into a single one. To give one or two examples: — Gen. i. 27, it is said, “So God (Elohim) created man in His own image, (both) male and female”; whereas, in the next chapter (21—24), it is said that God (Jehovah) caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam, and that He then took from the sleeping man a rib and made it a woman; and therefore (says the writer) a man shall cleave unto his wife, and the two be considered one flesh. Again (Gen. vi. 19) Elohim tells Noah, “Two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, a male and a female”; and (vii. 9) “There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God (Elohim) commanded Noah.” In Gen. vii. 2 Jehovah tells Noah he is to make a distinction between clean and unclean beasts, and that he is to admit the former by sevens and the latter by twos. In the first example, the priestly character is indicated by the moral, and in the latter by the distinction made between clean and unclean animals. We pass no opinion on this theory, but state it as fairly as we can in a few lines.

Eloi

(St.). Patron saint of artists and smiths. He was a famous worker in gold and silver, and was made Bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dagobert. Probably the St. Eloi of Chaucer's Prioress was St. Louis (St. 'Loy)

“Ther was also a nonne, a prioresse,

That of hire smylyng was ful symple and coy! Hire grettest ooth was but by Seynt Loy.”

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, Prol. 18—20.

We find reference to “Seynt Loy” again in verse 7143.

Eloquent

The old man eloquent. Isocrates, the Greek orator. When he heard that Grecian liberty was extinguished by the battle of Chærone'a, he died of grief.

“That dishonest victory

At Chæronea, fatal to liberty,

Killed with report that old man eloquent.”

Milton: Sonnets (To Lady Margaret Ley).

The eloquent doctor. Peter Aureolus, Archbishop of Aix, a schoolman.

Elshender

or Cannie Elshie. The Black Dwarf, alias Sir Edward Mauley, alias the Recluse, alias the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor. (Sir Walter Scott: The Black Dwarf.)

Elsie

The daughter of Gottlieb, a farm tenant of Prince Henry of Hoheneck. The prince was suffering severely from some malady, and was told that he would be cured if any maiden would give her life as a substitute. Elsie vowed to do so, and accompanied the prince from Germany to Salerno. Here Elsie surrendered herself to Lucifer, but was rescued by the prince, who married her. His health was perfectly re—established by the pilgrimage. (Longfellow: The Golden Legend.)

Elves

(See under Elf.)

Elvidna

The hall of the goddess Hel (q.v.).

Elvino

A rich farmer, in love with Amina, the somnambulist. The fact of Amina being found in the bed of Count Rodolpho the day before the wedding, induces Elvino to reject her hand and promise marriage to Liza; but he is soon undeceived — Amina is found to be innocent, and Liza to have been the paramour of another; so Amina and Elvino are wedded under the happiest auspices. (Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula.) (See Liza.)

Elvira (Donna). A lady deceived by Don Giovanni, who deluded her into a liaison with his valet, Leporello. (Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni.)

Elvira.

A lady who loved Ernani, the robber—captain, and head of a league against Don Carlos, afterwards Charles V. of Spain. She was betrothed to Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detested, and Ernani resolved to rescue her; but it so happened that the king himself fell in love with her, and tried to win her. When Silva learned this, he joined the league; but the king, overhearing the plot in concealment, arrested the conspirators. Elvira interceded for them, and the king granted them a free pardon. When Ernani was on the point of wedding Elvira, Ernani, being summoned to death by Silva, stabbed himself. (Verdi's opera of Ernani.) or Elfish. Irritable, peevish, spiteful; full of little mischievous ways, like the elves. Our superstitious forefathers thought such persons were actually “possessed” by elves; and elvish—marked is marked by elves or fairies.

Elvish

“Thou elvish—marked, abortive, rooting hog.”

Shakespeare: Richard III.,

i. 3.

Elysium

Elysian Fields. The Paradise or Happy Land of the Greek poets. Elysian (the adjective) means happy, delightful.

“O'er which were shadowy cast Elysian gleams.” Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i.44.

“Would take the prisoned soul,

And lap it in Elysium.”

Milton: Comus, 261—2.

Elzevir

An edition of a classic author, published and printed by the family of Elzevir, and said to be immaculate. Virgil, one of the master—pieces, is certainly incorrect in some places. (1592—1626.)

Em

The unit of measure in printing. The standard is a pica M; and the width of a line is measured by the number of such M's that would stand side by side in the “stick.” This dictionary is in double columns, each column equals 11 pica M's in width, and one M is allowed for the space between. Some work is made up to 10 1/2, 20 1/2, etc., ems; and for the half—em printers employ the letter N, which is in width half a letter M. As no letter is wider than the M, and all narrower letters are fractions of it, this letter forms a very convenient standard for printing purposes.

Embargo

To lay an embargo on him or it is to impose certain conditions before you give your consent. It is a Portuguese and Spanish word, meaning an order issued by authority to prevent ships leaving port for a fixed period.

Embarras de Richesse

More matter than can be used; overcrowded with facts or material. A publisher or editor who is overwhelmed with MSS., or contributions; an author who has more incidents or illustrations in support of his theory than he can produce, etc., have an embarras de richesse.

Ember Days

are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Ember Weeks (q.v.).

Ember Weeks

A corruption of quatuor tempora, through the Dutch quatemper and German quatember. The four times are after Quadragesima Sunday, Whit Sunday, Holyrood Day (September), and St. Lucia's Day (December). The supposition that persons sat in embers (or ashes) on these days is without foundation.

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Emblem is a picture with a hidden meaning, the meaning is “cast into” or “inserted in” the visible device. Thus, a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty. (Greek, en—ballo, which gives the Greek emblema.) (See Apostles, Patron Saints.)

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian Church are —

A chalice.

The eucharist. The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle. To denote the co—equality and co—eternity of the Trinity. A cross. The Christian's life and conflict; the death of Christ for man's redemption.

A crown.

The reward of the perseverance of the saints. A dove. The Holy Ghost.

A hand from the clouds.

To denote God the Father. A lamb, fish, pelican, etc., etc. The Lord Jesus Christ. A phoenix. The resurrection.

Emblems of the Jewish Temple

(See Exod. xxv. 30—32; Rev. i. 12—20.)

Golden candlestick.

The Church. Its seven lights, the seven spirits of God. (Rev. iv. 6.) The shewbread. The twelve loaves the twelve tribes of Israel. Represented in the Gospel by the twelve apostles.

The incense of sweet spices. Prayer, which rises to heaven as incense. (Rev. viii. 3, 4.) The Holy of Holies. The nation of the Jews as God's peculiar people. When the veil which separated it from the temple was “rent in twain,” it signified that thenceforth Jews and Gentiles all formed one people of God.

Embryo means that which swells inside something (Greek, en—bru'o, which gives the Greek embruon); hence the child in the womb; the rudiment in a plant before it shows itself in a bud; an idea not developed, etc.

Emelye

The sister—in—law of “Duke Theseus,” beloved by the two knights, Palamon and Arcyte, the former of whom had her to wife. It is of this lady the poet says, “Up roos the sun, and up roos Emelye” (v. 2275).

“This passeth yeer by yeer, and day and day,

Till it fel oonës in a morne of May,

That Emelie, that fairer was to scene

Than is the lillie on hire stalkës grene,

And fresscher than the May with flourës newe ... Er it was day, as sche was wont to do,

Sche was arisen.”

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Knight's Tale).

Emerald Isle

Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. Drennan (1754—1820), in the poem called Erin. Of course, it refers to the bright green verdure of the island.

“An emerald set in the ring of the sea.”

Cushlamachree.

“Nor one feeling of vengeance presume to defile

The cause or the men of the Emerald Isle.”

E. J. Drennan: Erin.

Emeralds

According to tradition, if a serpent fixes its eyes upon an emerald it becomes blind. (Ahmed ben Abdalaziz: Treatise on Jewels.)

Emergency

A sudden emergency is something which starts suddenly into view, or which rises suddenly out of the current of events. (Latin, e—mergo, to rise out of “the water.”)

Emergency Man (An). One engaged for some special service, as in Irish evictions.

Emeute

(French). A seditious rising or small riot. Literally, a moving—out. (Latin, e—moveo.)

Emile

(2 syl.). The French form of Emilius. The hero of Jean Jacques Rousseau's novel of the same name, and his ideal of a perfectly educated young man.

Emilia

(in Shakespeare's Othello). Wife of Iago. She is induced by her husband to purloin Desdemona's handkerchief, which Iago conveys to Cassio's chamber, and tells the Moor that Desdemona had given it to the lieutenant as a love—token. At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who, till then, never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the fact, and Iago kills her.

Emilia.

The sweetheart of Peregrine Pickle, in Smollett's novel.

Emilie

(The divine), to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Madame Châtelet, with whom he lived at Ciry for ten years.

Emmet

contracted into Ant thus, Em't, ent, ant (Anglo—Saxon, æmete).

“A bracelet made of emmets' eyes.”

Drayton: Court of Fairies.

Emne

Your emne Christen (Bosworth), i.e. your even or fellow Christian. Shakespeare (Hamlet, v. 1) has “your even Christian.” (Anglo—Saxon, Emne—cristen, fellow—Christian.)

Emolument

Literally, that which comes out of the mill. (Latin, e—mola.) It originally meant toll on what was ground. (See Grist.)

Emotion

Literally, the movement of the mind brought out by something which affects it. The idea is this. The mind, like electricity, is passive till something occurs to affect it, when it becomes roused; the active state thus produced is its emotion, and the result thereof is passion or affection. (Latin, e—moveo.)

Empanel

or Impanel is to write the names of a jury on a panel, or piece of parchment. (French, panneau, i.e. pan ds peau, piece of skin.)

Empannel

To put the pack—saddle on a beast of burden.

“Saddle Rozinante, and empannel thine ass.” —

Don Quixote,

ii. 326.

Empedocles

(4 syl.) of Sicily. A disciple of Pythagoras According to Lucian, he threw himself into the crater of Etua, that persons might suppose he was returned to the gods, but Etna threw out his sandal, and destroyed the illusion. (Horacc Ars Poetica, 404.) (See Cleombrotos.)

“He who, to be deemed

A god, leaped fondly into Etna flames,

Empedocles.”

Milton: Paradise Lost,

iii. 471

Emperor

Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of Hadrian, the Roman emperor (117—138).

Emperor of Believers

Omar I., father—in—law of Mahomet, and second caliph of the Mussulmans (581—644).

Emperor of the Mountains

king of the woods, and lord of the highways from Florence to Naples. A title assumed by Peter the Calabrian, a famous bandit—chief (1812).

Empire City

(The). New York, the great commercial city of the United States.

Empire of Reason; the Empire of Truth etc., i.e. reason or truth as the governing principle. Empire is the Latin imperium, a jurisdiction, and an emperor is one who holds command.

Empirics

Quacks. A school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria, who contended that it is not necessary to obtain a knowledge of the nature and functions of the body in order to treat diseases, but that experience is the surest and best guide. They were opposed to the Dogmatics (q.v.). (Greek, peirao, to try, which gives the Greek empeiria, experience.)

“We must not

So stain our judgment, or corrupt our hope, To prostitute our past—cure malady

To empirics.

Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well,

ii. 1.

Employe

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(French). One in our employ; such as clerks, shopmen, servants, etc. Employée, a female employed by a master. Employee, either sex.

“In Italy, all railroad employes are subjected to rigorous examination.” — Harlan: Eyesight, v.

64.

“All these employées should be women of character.” — Macmillan's Magazine (July, 1862, p. 257).

Empson

The favourite flageolet—player of Charles II., introduced into Scott's Peveril of the Peak.

“Julian could only bow obedience, and follow Empson, who was the same person that played so rarely on the flageolet.” — Chap. xxx.

Empty as Air

(Ang.—Sax., aemtig.)

“Dead men's cries to fill the empty air”

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI.,

v. 2

Empty Champagne Bottles

Fel. low—commoners at Cambridge used to be so called, their academical dress being a gaudy purple and silver gown, resembling the silver foil round the neck of a champagne bottle. Very few of these wealthy magnates took honours.

The nobleman's gown was silk.

Empty Chance

A chance not worth calculating on. The ace of dice was, by the Greeks and Romans, left empty, because the number of dice was equal to the number of aces thrown. As ace is the lowest chance, the empty chance was the least likely to win.

Empyrean

According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure elemental fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (from the Greek en—pur, in fire). (See Heaven.)

“Now had the Almighty Father from above,

From the pure empyrean where He sits

High throned above all height, bent down his eye.” Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 56—58.

And again, book vi. 833:

“The steadfast empyrean shook without.”

En Evidence

(French). To the fore.

“Mr. — has been much en evidence of late in the lobby; but as he has no seat, his chance of being in the ministry is very problematical.” — Newspaper paragraph, February, 1886.

En Garcon

As a bachelor. “To take me en garcon,” without ceremony, as a bachelor fares in ordinary life.

En Masse

The whole lot just as it stands; the whole.

En Rapport

In harmony with; in sympathetic lines with.

En Route

On the way; on the road or journey

Enalio—saurians

(Greek, sea—lizards). A group of fossil saurians, including the Ichthyosâur, Plesiosaur, Sauropterygy, etc., etc.

Encelados

The most powerful of the giants that conspired against Zeus (Jupiter). The king of gods and men cast him down, and threw Mount Etna over him. The poets say that the flames of this volcano arise from the breath of this giant. The battle—field of his contest was Phlegra, in Macedonia.

“So fierce Enceladus in Phlegra stood.”

Hoole: Jerusalem Delivered.

“I tell you, younglings, not Encelados,

With all his threatening band of Typhon's brood ... Shall seize this prey out of his father's hands.” Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, iv. 2.

Enchanted Castles

De Saint Foix says that women and girls were subject to violence whenever they passed by an abbey quite as much as when they approached a feudal castle. When these victims were sought for and demanded back, the

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

monks would sustain a siege rather than relinquish them; and, if close pressed, would bring to the walls some sacred relic, which so awed the assailants that they would desist rather than incur the risk of violating such holy articles. This, he says, is the origin of enchanter, enchantments, and enchanted castles. (Historical Essays.) is one who sings incantations. (Latin, in—canto, to sing over or against some one.)

Enchanter

Encomium

The Greek komos is a revel in honour of [Bacchus], in which the procession marches from komi to it kome: i.e. village to village. En—komion is the hymn sung in these processions in honour of Bacchus; hence, praise, eulogy

Encore

(French). Our use of this word is unknown to the French, who use the word bis (twice) if they wish a thing to be repeated. The French, however, say encore un tasse (another cup), encore une fois (still once more). It is strange how we have perverted almost every French word that we have naturalised. (See English French.)

Encratites

(4 syl.). A sect of the second century, who condemned marriage, forbade eating flesh or drinking wine, and rejected all the luxuries and comforts of life as “things sinful.” The sect was founded by Tatian, a heretic of the third century, who compiled from four other books what he called a Diatessaron — an heretical gospel. (See Eusebius, book iv. chap. xxix.) (Greek, egcrates, self—mastery.)

This heretic must not be confounded with Tatian the philosopher, a disciple of Justin Martyr, who lived in the second century.

Encroach

means literally to put on a hook, or to hook on. Those who hook on a little here and a little there. (French, en croc, on a hook.)

End

(Ang.—Sax, ende, verb endian.)

At my wits' end.

At a standstill how to proceed farther; at a non—plus. He is no end of a fellow. A capital chap; a most agreeable companion; an A 1 [A one] (q.v.). He is an “all round” man, and therefore has no end.

To be [one's] end.

The cause or agent of [his] death.

This apoplexie will be his end.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV.,

iv. 4.

To begin at the wrong end.

To attempt to do something unmethodically. This is often done in education, where children are taught grammar before they are taught words. No one on earth would teach his child to talk in such a manner. First talk anyhow, and when words are familiar, teach the grammar of sentences. The allusion may be to thread wound on a card or bobbin; if anyone attempts to unwind it at the wrong end, he will entangle the thread and be unable to unwind it.

To come to the end of one's tether.

To do all that one has ability or liberty to do. The allusion is to an animal tied to a rope; he can graze only so far as his tether can be carried out.

To have it at my finger's end.

To be perfectly au fait; to remember perfectly, and with ease; tanquam unguis scire. The allusion is to work done with the fingers (such as knitting), which needs no thought after it has become familiar.

To have it on

[or at] the tip of my tongue. (See Tip Of My Tongue.) A rope's end. A short length of rope bound at the end with thread, and used for punishing the refractory. A shoemaker's end. A length of thread pointed with a bristle, and used by shoemakers.

My latter end.

At the close of life. "At the latter end," towards the close.

"At the latter end of a dinner."

Shakespeare: All's Well, etc.,

ii. 5.

On end. Erect.

To put an end to.

To terminate or cause to terminate. West end, East end, etc. The quarter or part of a town east or west of the central or middle part.

End—irons

Two movable iron cheeks or plates, still used in cooking—stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself, but must not be mistaken for andirons or "dogs."

End Paper

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The blank fly—leaves of a book.

End of the World

(The). According to rabbinical mythology, the world is to last six thousand years. The reasons assigned are (1) because the name Jehova contains six letters; (2) because the Hebrew letter m occurs six times in the book of Genesis; (3) because the patriarch Enoch, who was taken to heaven without dying, was the sixth generation from Adam (Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch); (4) because God created the world in six days; (5) because six contains three binaries — the first 2000 years were for the law of nature, the next 2000 years the written law, and the last 2000 the law of grace.

Seven would suit this fancy quite as well: there are seven days in a week; Jehovah contains seven letters; and Enoch was the seventh generation of the race of man; and the first two binaries were not equal periods.

Ends

To burn the candle at both ends. To be like a man on double business found, who both neglects. Of course, no candle could burn at both ends, unless held horizontally, as the lower end would be extinguished by the melted wax or tallow.

To make two or both ends meet.

To make one's income cover expenses; to keep out of debt. The allusion is to a belt somewhat too tight. The French say joindre les deux bouts.

Endemic

Pertaining to a locality. An endemic disease is one common to a particular district, from which it shows no tendency to spread. Thus intermittent fevers are endemic in marshy places.

Endorse

I endorse that statement. I accept it; I fully accord with it. The allusion is to the commercial practice of writing your name on the back of a bill of exchange or promissory note if you choose to make yourself responsible for it. (Latin, in—dorsum, on the back.)

Endymion

in Greek mythology, is the setting sun with which the moon is in love. Endymion was condemned to endless sleep and everlasting youth, and Selene kisses him every night on the Latmian hills.

“The moon sleeps with Endymion,

And would not be awaked.”

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

Enemy

How goes the enemy? or What says the enemy? What o'clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behind time.

Enfant Terrible

(An) [lit., a terrible child]. A moral or social nuisance.

Enfield Rifle So called from the factory at Enfield where it is made.

Enfilade

(French) means literally to spin out; to put thread in [a needle], as enfiler une aiguille; to string beads by putting them on a thread, as enfiler des perles. Soldiers being compared to thread, we get the following metaphors: to go through a place as thread through a needle — to string artillery by placing it in a line and directing it against an enemy; hence, to scour or rake with shot.

England

Verstegan quaintly says that Egbert was “chiefly moved” to call his kingdom England “in respect of Pope Gregory's changing the name of Engelisce into Angellyke.” And this “may have moved our kings upon their best gold coins to set the image of an angel.” (Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities concerning ... the English Nation, p. 147.)

The Angles migrated from the east of the Elbe to Schleswig (between the Jutes and the Saxons). They passed over in great numbers to Britain during the 5th century, and in time established the kingdoms of the heptarchy.

England Expects that Every Man will do his Duty

The parole signalled by Horatio Nelson to his fleet before the battle of Trafalgar.

England's Darling

Hereward the Wake, in the time of William the Conqueror. The “Camp of Refuge” was established in the Isle of Ely, and the Earl of Morcar joined it in 1071. It was blockaded for three months by William, and Hereward (3 syl.) with some of his followers escaped.

Englentyne

(3 syl.). The Nonne or Prioress of Chaucer's pilgrims. An admirable character sketch. (Canterbury Tales; Prologue, 118—164.) (See Eloi.)

English French

A kind of perversity seems to pervade many of the words which we have borrowed from the French. Thus curate (French vicaire); Vicar (French curé).

Encore (French bis).

Epergne (French surtout); Surtout (French pardessus). Screw (French vis), whereas the French écrou we call a nut; and our vice is étau in French. Some still say à l'outrance (French à outrance).

We say double entendre, the French à deux ententes.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The reader will easily call to mind other examples.

Englishman

The national nickname of an Englishman is “a John Bull.” The nation, taken in the aggregate, is nicknamed “John Bull.” The French nickname for an Englishman is “Godam.” (See Bull.)

Englishman's Castle

His house is so called, because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. It is not so in Scotland.

E'nid

The daughter and only child of Yniol, and wife of Prince Geraint, one of the Knights of the Round Table. Ladies called her “Enid the Fair,” but the people named her “Enid the Good.” (Idylls of the King; Geraint and Enid.)

Englightened Doctor

(The). Raymond Lully, of Palma, one of the most distinguished men of the thirteenth century. (1234—1315.)

Enniskillens

The 6th Dragoons; instituted 1689, on account of their brave defence of the town of Enniskillen, in favour of William III.

This cavalry regiment must not be confounded with the Inniskillings or Old 27th Foot, now called the “1st battalion of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers,” which is a foot regiment.

Ennius The Chaucer or father of Roman poets. (B.C. 239—169.)

The English Ennius.

Layamon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of Wace's Brute. The French Ennius. Guillaume di Lorris (1235—65), author of the Romance of the Rose, called the Iliad of France. Sometimes Jehan de Meung (1260—1320), who wrote the continuation of the same romance, is so called.

The Spanish Ennius.

Juan de Mena, born at Cordova. (1412—56.)

Enough

(Anglo—Saxon, genoh or genog. Enough! Stop now, you have said all that is needful.

Enough is as good as a feast.

Latin:

“Illud satius est, quod satis est.”

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

French: “On est assez riche, quand on a le nécessaire.” At one time Enow was used for numbers reckoned by tale, as: There are chairs enow, nails enow, men enow, etc.; but now enough does duty for both words, and enow is archaic.

Ensconce

(2 syl.). To hide; to put under cover. Literally, to cover with a sconce, or fort. (German, schanze, a fort; Danish, schans; Swedish, skans; Latin, abscondo, to hide.)

Ensemble

The tout ensemble. The general effect; the effect when the whole is regarded. (French.)

Ensign

(French, enseigner.)

Of ancient Athens.

An owl.

America.

The Stars and Stripes.

The British Navy. The Union Jack (q. v.). The white ensign (Royal Navy) is the banner of St. George with the Jack cantoned in the first quarter. The red ensign is that of the merchant service.

The blue ensign is that of the navy reserve.

China.

A dragon.

Ancient Corinth.

A flying horse — i.e. Pegasus. Ancient Danes. A raven.

Ancient Egypt.

A bull, a crocodile, a vulture. England (in the Tudor era). St. George's cross. Ancient France. The cape of St. Martin; then the oriflamme. The Franks (Riparian). A sword with the point upwards. The Franks (Salian). A bull's head.

The Gauls.

A wolf, bear, bull, cock. The ancient Lacedemonians. The Greek capital letter L (lambda). The ancient Messenians. The Greek letter mu (M).

The ancient Persians.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A golden eagle with outstretched wings on a white field; a dove; the sun. The Paisdadian dynasty of Persia. A blacksmith's apron. (See Standard.)

The ancient Romans.

An eagle for the legion; a wolf, a horse, a boar, etc. Romulus. A handful of hay or fern (manipulus).

The ancient Saxons.

A trotting horse. The ancient Thebans. A sphinx.

The Turks.

Horses' tails. The ancient Welsh. A dragon.

Ensilage

A method of preserving green fodder by storing it in mass under pressure in deep trenches cut in a dry soil.

Entail'

An entail is an estate cut from the power of a testator. The testator cannot bequeath it; it must go to the legal heirs. (French, en—tailler.)

Entangle

The Anglo—Saxon tan means a twig, and twigs smeared with birdlime were used for catching small birds, who were “en—tangled” or twigged.

Entelechy

The kingdom of Queen Quintessence in the famous satirical romance of Rabelais called the History of Gargantua and Pantagruel'. Pantagruel and his companions went thither in search of the Holy Bottle. It may be called the city of speculative science.

The word is used to express the realisation of a beau ideal. Lovers have preconceived notions of human perfections, and imagine that they see the realities in the person beloved, who is the entelechy of their beau ideal.

“O lumiere! enrichie

D'un feu divin, qui m'ard si vivement,

Pour me donner l'etre et le movement,

Etes—vous pas ma seul entelechie.”

Ronsard: sonnet 68 (1524—35).

Enter a House right Foot fore most

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Petronius). It was thought unlucky to enter a house or to leave one's chamber left foot foremost. Augustus was very superstitious on this point. Pythagoras taught that it is necessary to put the shoe on the right foot first. "When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot" (Protreptics of Iamblichus, symbol xii.). Iamblichus tells us this symbolised that man's first duty is reverence to the gods.

Entering Short

When bills are paid into a banker's hands to receive the amount when due, it is called "entering them short." In this case, if the banker fails, the assignees must give them up. Bills in the hands of factors may be so entered.

Enthusiast

is one who believes that he himself is in God, or that God is in him (Greek, en theos). Our word inspired is very similar, being the Latin in spiritu (in the spirit).

Entire

Ale, in contradistinction to "cooper," which is half ale and half porter. As Calvert's entire, etc.

Entre Nous

(French). Between you and me; in confidence. N.B. — One of the most common vulgarisms of the better class is "Between you and I."

Entrée (To have the). To be eligible for invitations to State balls and concerts.

Entremets

[arn—tre—may]. Sweet foods or kickshaws served at table between the main dishes, courses, or removes; literally, entre—mets (French), things put between. We now use two words, entrées and entremets, the former being subordinate animal foods handed round between the main dishes, and the latter being sweet made dishes.

Eolian

An Eolian harp. A box fitted with strings, like a fiddle. The strings, however, are not sounded by a bow, but by a current of air or wind passing over them.

"Awake, Eolian harp, awake,

And give to rapture all thy trembling strings." Gray: Progress of Poetry, lines 1, 2.

Eolus

God of the winds. (Roman mythology.)

Epact

The excess of the solar over the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days, and the latter of 354, or eleven days fewer. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the 1st of the following January. (Greek, epactos, feminine epacte, adscititious.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Epergne

(2 syl.). A large ornamental stand placed in the middle of a dining—table. It is generally said to be a French word, but the French call such an ornamental stand a surtout, strangely adopted by us to signify a frock—coat, which the French call a pardessus. The nearest French word is épargne, saving, as caisse d'épargne,

a savings bank; verb épargner, to spare or save. (See English French.)

Ephebi

Youths between the age of eighteen and twenty were so called at Athens. (Greek, arrived at puberty.)

Ephesian

A jovial companion; a thief; a roysterer. A pun on the verb to pheeze — A — pheeze—ian. Pheeze is to flatter.

“It is thine host, thine Ephesian, calls.”

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor,

iv. 5.

Ephesian Letters

Magic characters. The Ephesians were greatly addicted to magic. Magic characters were marked on the crown, cincture, and feet of Diana; and, at the preaching of Paul, many which used curious [magical] books burnt them. (Acts xix. 19.)

The Ephesian poet.

Hipponax, born at Ephesus in the sixth century B.C.

Ephialtes

(4 syl.). A giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Ephialtes

(4 syl.). The nightmare. (Greek, ephialtes, an incubus; from epihallomai, to leap upon.)

“Feverish symptoms all, with which those who are haunted by the night—hag, whom the learned call Ephialtes, are but too well acquainted.” — Sir W Scott: The Antiquary, chap. x.

Ephori

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

or Ephors. Spartan magistrates, five in number, annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control even over the kings and senate.

Epic

Father of epic poetry. Homer (about 950 B.C.), author of the Iliad and Odyssey. Celebrated epics are the Iliad, Odyssey, Aeneid, Paradise Lost.

The great Puritan epic.

Milton's Paradise Lost.

“Speaking of M. Doré’s performances as an illustrator of the great Puritan epic.” — The Times.

Epicure

(3 syl.). A sensualist; one addicted to good eating and drinking. So called from Epicurus (q.v.).

Sir Epicure.

A worldly sensualist in The Alchemist, by Ben Jonson. His surname is “Mammon.”

Epicurean

Carnal; sensual; pertaining to good eating and drinking. (See Epicurus.) T. Moore has a prose romance entitled The Epicurean.

“Epicurean cooks

Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite.”

Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.

Epicurus

(Latin form, Epicurus.) The Greek philosopher who founded the Epicurean school. His axiom was that “happiness or enjoyment is the summum bonum of life.” His disciples corrupted his doctrine into “Good living is the object we should all seek,” or, according to the drinking song, “Who leads a good life is sure to live well.”

“Blest be the day I `scaped the wrangling crew,

From Pyrrho's [q.v.] maze and Epicurus' sty.” Beattie: Minstrel.

The Epicurus of China. Tao—tse, who commenced the search for the “elixir of life.” Several of the Chinese emperors lost their lives by drinking his “potion of immortality” (B.C. 540).

Epi—demic

is from the two Greek words epi—demos (upon the people), a disease that attacks a number of people at once, either from bad air, bad drainage, or other similar cause.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Epigram

A short pointed or antithetical poem, or any short composition happily or antithetically expressed.

Epilepsy

was called by the Romans the Comitial or Congress sickness (morbus comitialis), because the polling for the comitia centuriata was null and void if any voter was seized with epilepsy while the votes were being taken.

Epimenides

(5 syl.). A philosopher of Crete, who fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake again for fifty—seven years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom. (Pliny: Natural History.) (See Rip Van Winkle.)

“Like Epimenides, I have been sleeping in a cave; and, waking, see those whom I left children are bearded men.” — Bulwer Lytton (Lord Lytton).

Epiphany

The time of appearance, meaning the period when the star appeared to the wise men of the East. The 6th January is the Feast of the Epiphany

The word is not special to Christianity. One of the names of Zeus was Epiphanes (the manifest one), and festivals in his honour were called “Epiphanies.” (Greek, epi—phaino, to shine upon, to be manifest [in creation].)

Episemon in Greek numerals, is a sign standing for a numeral. Thus, episemon bau generally called Fau, Episemon, stands for 6, and iota—episemon for 16. There are two other symbols — viz. koppa for 90, and sampi [san—pi] for 900. The reason is this: The Greek letters were used for numerals, and were ranged in three columns of nine figures each; but 24 letters will not divide by 9, so the 3 symbols, episemon, koppa, and sampi were added to make up 3×9 . Col. 1, from 1 to 20; col. 2, from 20 to 100; col. 3, from 100 to 1,000.

Bau and Fau are identical, the B or F being the dijamma. Thus oinos (wine) was pronounced Foinos, called in Latin Vinum, and öon (an egg) was pronounced Ofon, in Latin Ovum.

A dash under a letter multiplied it a hundredfold. Thus, = 1, but =000. For intermediate figures between full tens a mark was made above the unit. Thus (iota = 10; but = 10 + 1 = 11, = 10 + 2 = 12; = 10 + 3 = 13, and so on.

Episode

(3 syl.) is the Greek epieis—odos (coming in besides — i.e. adventitious), meaning an adventitious tale introduced into the main story.

In music, an intermediate passage in a fugue, whereby the subject is for a time suspended.

“In ordinary fugues ... it is usual to allow a certain number of bars to intervene from time to time, after which the subject is resumed. The intervening bars ... are called Episodes.” — Ouseley: Counterpoint, xxii. 169.

Epistle

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable is something sent to another. A letter sent by messenger or post. (Greek, epi—stello.)

Epi—zootic

is epi—zoon (upon the herds and flocks). Zoology is used to signify a treatise on animals, but we generally except man; so epi—zootic is used, demos (man) not being included.

Epoch

means that which bounds in or holds in hand. The starting—point of a sequence of events harnessed together like a team of horses; also the whole period of time from one epoch to another. Our present epoch is the Birth of Christ; previous to this epoch it was the Creation of the World. In this latter sense the word is synonymous with era. (Greek, epi—echo.)

“The incarnation of Christ is the greatest moral epoch in the universe of God.” — Stevens: Parables Unfolded (“The Lost Sheep,” p. 104).

Epode

(2 syl.). In the Greek epode the chorus returned to their places and remained stationary. It followed the strophe (2 syl.).

Father of choral epode.

Stesichoros of Sicily (B.C. 632—552).

Epsom Races

Horse races held in May, and lasting four days. They are held on Epsom Downs, and were instituted by Charles I. The second day (Wednesday) is the great Derby day, so called from Lord Derby, who instituted the stakes in 1780. The fourth day (Friday) is called the Oaks, so called from “Lambert’s Oaks.” The “Oaks Estate” passed into the Derby family, and the twelfth Earl of Derby established the stakes.

The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger (held at Doncaster) are called the Three Classic Races. N.B. — There are other races held at Epsom besides the great four—day races mentioned above — for instance, the City Suburban and the Great Metropolitan (both handicap races).

Epsom Salts

A salt formerly obtained by boiling down the mineral water in the vicinity of Epsom, but now chemically prepared. It is the sulphate of magnesia.

Equal—to in mathematics. The symbol (=), two little parallel lines, was invented by Robert Recorde, who died 1558.

“As he said, nothing is more equal than parallel lines.”

Equation of Time

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The difference between mean and apparent time — i.e. the difference between the time as shown by a good clock and that indicated by a sundial. The greatest difference is in November, at the beginning of which month the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes too slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September when the sun and the clocks agree.

Eques Auratus

A knight bachelor, called auratus because he was allowed to gild his armour — a privilege confined to knights.

Equipage

(3 syl.). Tea equipage. A complete tea—service. To equip means to arm or furnish, and equipage is the furniture of a military man or body of troops. Hence camp equipage (all things necessary for an encampment); field equipage (all things necessary for the field of battle); a prince's equipage, and so on.

Equity

(See Astræa .)

Eraclius

the emperor, condemned a knight to death because the companion who went out with him returned not. “Thou hast slain thy fellow,” said the emperor, “and must die. Go,” continued he, to another knight, “and lead him to death.” On their way they met the knight supposed to be dead, and returned to Eraclius, who, instead of revoking his sentence, ordered all three to be put to death — the first because he had already condemned him to death; the second because he had disobeyed his orders; and the third because he was the real cause of the death of the other two. Chaucer tells this anecdote in his Sompnoures Tale. It is told of Cornelius Piso by Seneca in his De Ira, lib. i. 16; but in the Gesta Romanorum it is ascribed to Eraclius.

Erastians

The followers of Thomas Lieber, Latinised into Erastus, a German “heretic” of the sixteenth century. (1524—1583.)

Erastianism

State supremacy or interference in ecclesiastical affairs. Thus the Church of England is sometimes called “Erastian,” because the two Houses of Parliament can interfere in its ritual and temporalities, and the sovereign, as the “head” of it, appoints bishops and other dignitaries thereof.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Erebus

Darkness. The gloomy cavern underground through which the Shades had to walk in their passage to Hades. "A valley of the shadow of death."

"Not Erebus itself were dim enough

To hide thee from prevention."

Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, ii. 1.

Eretrian

The Eretrian bull. Menedemos of Eretria, in Euboea; a Greek philosopher of the fourth century B.C. and founder of the Eretrian school which was a branch of the Socratic. He was called a "bull" from the bull—like gravity of his face.

Erigena

John Scotus, called "Scotus the Wise," who died 886. He must not be confounded with Duns Scottus the schoolman, who lived some four centuries after him (1265—1308).

Erin

Ireland (q.v.).

Erinnys

or Erinys. The goddess of vengeance, one of the Furies. (Greek mythology.)

Eriphila

The personification of avarice, who guards the path that leads to pleasure, in Orlando Furioso, vi.

61.

Erix

son of Goliah (sic) and grandson of Atlas. He invented legerdemain. (Duchat: OEuvres de Rabelais; 1711.)

Erl—king

King of the elves, who prepares mischief for children, and even deceives men with his seductions. He is said to haunt the Black Forest.

Ermeline

(Dame). Reynard's wife, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Ermienes

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(4 syl.). A renegade Christian, whose name was Clement. He was entrusted with the command of the caliph's "regal host," and was slain by Godfrey. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.) or Hermine. Littré derives the word from Armenia, and says it is the "Pontic rat" mentioned by Pliny; if so, the better spelling would be "Armine." Prof. Skeat derives the word from the French hermine, through harmo, the ermine, stoat, or weazel. The ermine is technically called the Mustela erminea.

Ermine

Ermine Street

One of the four great public ways made in England by the Romans. The other three are Watling Street, Ikenild Street, and the Fosse. Germanicus derives Ermin from Hermës, whence Irmingsull (a column of Mercury), because Mercury presided over public roads. This is not correct; Irmingsul, or rather Ermingsul, is the Scandinavian Odin, not a "Column of Mercury" at all; and Erming Street really means Odin's Street.

"Fair weyes many on ther ben in Englonde,

But four most of all ben zunderstond ...

Fram the south into the north takit Erming—strete; Fram the east into the west goeth Ikenild—strete; Fram south—est [east] to North—west (that is sum del grete) Fram Dorer [Dover] into Chestre go'th Watling—strete; The forth is most of all that tills from Totëneys —

Fram the one end of Cornwall anon to Catenays [Caithness] — Fram the south to North—est into Englonde end

Fosse men callith thisk voix."

Robert of Gloucester.

Erminia

The heroine of Jerusalem Delivered. When her father, the King of Antioch, was slain at the siege of Antioch, and Erminia fell captive into the crusader's hands, Tancred gave her her liberty, and restored to her all her father's treasures. This generous conduct quite captivated her heart, and she fell in love with the Christian prince. Aladine, King of Jerusalem, took charge of her. When the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, she dressed herself in Clorinda's armour to go to Tancred, but, being discovered, fled, and lived awhile with some shepherds on the banks of the Jordan. Meeting with Vafrino, sent as a secret spy by the crusaders, she revealed to him the design against the life of Godfrey, and, returning with him to the Christian camp, found Tancred wounded. She cured his wounds, so that he was able to take part in the last great day of the siege. We are not told the ultimate fate of this fair Syrian.

Ernani

The bandit—captain, Duke of Segorbia and Cardona, Lord of Aragon, and Count of Ernani, in love with Elvira, who is betrothed to Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

V. of Spain also loves her, and tries to win her. Silva, finding that the king has been tampering with his betrothed, joins the league of Ernani against the king. The king in concealment overhears the plotters, and, at a given signal, they are arrested by his guards, but, at the intercession of Elvira, are pardoned and set free. Ernani is on the point of marrying Elvira, when a horn is heard. This horn Ernani had given to Silva when he joined the league, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ernani will cease to live." Silva insists on the fulfilment of the compact, and Ernani stabs himself. (Verdi's opera of Ernani.)

Ernest

(Duke). A poetical romance by Henry of Veldig (Waldeck), contemporary with Frederick Barbarossa. Duke Ernest is son—in—law of Kaiser Konrad II. Having murdered his feudal lord, he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to expiate his crime, and the poem describes his adventures on the way. It is a mixture of Homeric and Oriental myths, and the tales of crusaders. Duke Ernest fulfilled his pilgrimage, returned to Germany, and received absolution.

Eros

the Greek equivalent to Cupid.

Erostratus

The man who set fire to the temple of Diana in Ephesus, on the day Alexander the Great was born. This he did to make his name immortal. In order to defeat his vainglory, the Ephesians forbade his name to be mentioned, but such a prohibition would be sure to defeat its object.

Erra—Pater

An almanack. William Lilly, the almanack—maker and astrologer, is so called by Butler. It is said to have been the "name" of an eminent Jewish astrologer. (Halliwell: Archaic Dictionary.)

"In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater."

Butler: Hudibras, i. 1.

Erse (1 syl.). The native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland, who are of Irish origin. It is a variant of Irish. Applied by the Scotch Lowlanders to the Highland dialect of Gaelic. In the eighteenth century Scotch was often called Erse, without distinction of Highland and Lowland; and Irish was spoken of as Irish Gaelic. The practice now is to limit the word Erse to Irish, and Gaelic to Scotch Highlanders.

Erudite

Most erudite of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro, a man of vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature. (B.C. 116—27.)

Erythroos

(See Horse .)

Erythynus

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Have no doings with the Erythynus. This is the thirty—third Symbol of the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The Erythynus is a fish called by Pliny (ix. 77) erythrinus, a red fish with a white belly. Pythagoras used this fish as a symbol of a braggadocio, which has a lily liver. Have no doings with those who are tongue—doughty, but have white stomachs (where stomach means true courage).

Escapade

(3 syl.). French. Means literally an escape [from restraint]; hence a spree, lark, or prank. (Spanish, escapar, escapada.)

“His second escapade was made for the purpose of visiting the field of Rullion Green.” — Scott: Guy Mannering, xxxvi.

Esclandre

An event which gives rise to scandal. “By the famous Boulogne esclandre. “

“Since the last `esclandre' he had held little or no communication with her.” — Lady Herbert: Edith, 18.

Escuage

(3 syl.) means “shield service,” and is applied to that obligation which bound a vassal to follow his lord to war at his own private charge. (French, escu, écu, a shield.)

Esculapios

(Latin, Esculapius). A disciple of Esculapius means a medical student. Esculapian, medical. Esculapios, in Homer, is a “blameless physician,” whose sons were the medical attendants of the Greek army. Subsequently; he was held to be the “god of the medical art.”

Escurial

The palace of the Spanish sovereigns, about fifteen miles north—west of Madrid. It is one of the most superb structures in Europe, but is built among rocks, as the name signifies.

Escutcheon of Pretence

(An). That of a wife, either heiress or coheiress, placed in the centre of her husband's shield.

Esingæ

A title given to the kings of Kent, from Ese, their first king, sometimes called Ohta.

Esmond

(Henry). A chivalrous cavalier in the reign of Queen Anne. The hero of Thackeray's novel entitled Esmond.

Esoteric

(Greek, those within). Exoteric, those without. The term originated with Pythagoras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoteric.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Aristotle adopted the same terms, though he did not lecture behind a curtain. He called those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, his exoterics: and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Espiet (Es—pe—a). Nephew of Oriande la Fée. A dwarf, not more than three feet high, with yellow hair as fine as gold, and though above a hundred years old, a seeming child of seven. He was one of the falsest knaves in the world, and knew every kind of enchantment. (Romance of Maugis d'Aygrement et de Vivia son frère.)

Esplandian

Son of Amadis and Oriana. He is the hero of Montalvo's continuation of Amadis, called The Fifth Book.

Esprit de Corps

Fellow—feeling for the society with which you are associated. A military term — every soldier will stand up for his own corps.

Esprit Follet

A bogle which delights in misleading and tormenting mortals.

Esquire

One who carried the escu or shield of a knight. (Latin, scutiger, a shield—bearer.) Copy of a letter from C. H. ATHILL, ESQ., "Richmond Herald": —

"Herald's College, E.C., January 26th 1893.

"The following persons are legally 'Esquires': —

"The sons of peers, the sons of baronets, the sons of knights, the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in perpetuity, the eldest son of the eldest son of a knight, and his eldest son in perpetuity, the kings of arms, the heralds of arms, officers of the Army or Navy of the rank of captain and upwards, sheriffs of counties for life, J.P.'s of counties whilst in commission, serjeants—at—law, Queen's counsel, serjeants—at—arms, Companions of the Orders of Knighthood, certain principal officers in the Queen's household, deputy lieutenants, commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, masters of the Supreme Court, those whom the Queen, in any commission or warrant, styles esquire, and any person who, in virtue of his office, takes precedence of esquires."

Add to these, graduates of the universities not in holy orders.

Essays

Lord Bacon's essays were the first in English that bore the name.

"To write just treatises requireth leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader ... which is the cause which hath made me choose to write certain brief notes ... which I have called essays." — Dedication to Prince Henry.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Essenes

(2 syl.). A sect among the Jews in the time of our Saviour. They were communists who abjured every sort of fleshly indulgence. They ate no animal food, and drank only water. Their sacrifices to God were only fruits of the earth. They kept the Sabbath so strictly that they would not even wash a plate or rinse a cup on that day. They always dressed in white, took no part in public matters, but devoted themselves to contemplative studies. They held the Jewish Scriptures in great reverence, but interpreted them allegorically.

Essex

East seaxē (the territory of the East Saxons).

Essex Lions

Calves, for which the county is famous.

Valiant as an Essex lion

(ironical).

Essex Stile

A ditch. As Essex is very marshy, it abounds in ditches, and has very few stiles.

Est—il—possible A nickname of Prince George of Denmark, given him by James II. The story goes that James, speaking of those who had deserted his standard, concluded the catalogue with these words, "And who do you think besides? Why, little Est—il—possible, my worthy son—in—law." James applied this cognomen to the prince because, when George was told of his father—in—law's abdication, all he did was to exclaim,

"Est—il—possible?" and when told, further, of the several noblemen who had fallen away from him,

"Est—il—possible?" exhausted his indignation.

Estafette

(French; Spanish, estafeta). Military couriers sent express. Their duty is to deliver the dispatches consigned to them to the postillions appointed to receive them.

Estates

Estates of the realm. The powers that have the administration of affairs in their hands. The three estates of our own realm are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons; popularly speaking, the public press is termed the fourth estate. It is a great mistake to call the three estates of England the Sovereign, the Lords, and the Commons, as many do. The word means that on which the realm stands. (Latin, sto, to stand.) (See Fourth Estate.)

"Herod ... made a supper to his ... chief estates." — Mark vi. 21.

"The king and the three estates of the realm assembled in parliament." — Collect for Nov. 5.

Este

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The house of Este had for their armorial bearing a white eagle on an azure shield. Rinaldo, in Jerusalem Delivered, adopted this device; and Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, gives it both to Mandricardo and Rogero, adding that it was borne by Trojan Hector. As the Dukes of Brunswick are a branch of the house of Este, our Queen is a descendant of the same noble family.

D'Este was the surname adopted by the children of the Duke of Sussex and Lady Augusta Murray.

Estotiland

An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalvë, a Pole.

“The snow

From cold Estotiland.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 685.

Estramaçon

(French). A blow or cut with a sword, hence also “estramaçonner,” to play at backsword. Sir Walter Scott uses the word in the sense of a feint or pretended cut. Hence Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf, says: —

“I tripped a hasty morris ... upon the dining table, now offering my sword [to the Duke of Buckingham], and now recovering it, I made ... a sort of estramacon at his nose, the dexterity of which consists in coming mightily near to the object without touching it.” — Pevevil of the Peak, chap. xxxiv.

Estrich Wool

is the soft down of the estrich, called in French, duvet d' autriche. It lies immediately under the feathers of the ostrich.

Estrildis

or Estrild. Daughter of a German king, and handmaid to the mythical King Humber. When Humber was drowned in the river that bears his name, King Loclin fell in love with Estrildis, and would have married her, had he not been betrothed already to Guendoloena; however, he kept Estrildis for seven years in a palace underground, and had by her a daughter named Sabrina. After the death of Loclin, Guendoloena threw both Estrildis and Sabrina into the Severn. (Geoffrey: British History, ii. ch. ii.—v.)

Estuary

Literally, the boiling place; the mouth of a river is so called because the water there seems to seethe and boil. (Latin, oestuo, to boil.)

Eternal City

(The). Rome. Virgil makes Jupiter tell Venus he would give to the Romans imperium sinë finë (an eternal empire). (Aeneid, i. 79.)

Eternal Fitness of Things

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The congruity between an action and the agent.

“Can any man have a higher notion of the rule of right, and the eternal fitness of things?” — Fielding: Tom Jones, book iv. chap. iv.

Eternal Tables

A white pearl, extending from east to west, and from heaven to earth, on which, according to Mahomet, God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come.

Etesian Wind

(An). “Etesia Flabra Aquilorium,” says Lucretius (v. 741). A wind which rises annually about the dog—days, and blows forty days together in the same direction. It is a gentle and mild wind. (Greek, annual.)

“Deem not, good Porteus, that in this my song

I mean to harrow up thy humble mind,

And stay that voice in London known so long; For balm and softness, an Etesian wind.”

Peter Pindar: Nil Admiraro.

Ethnic Plot

The Popish plot. In Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, Charles II. is called David, the royalists are called the Jews, and the Papists Gentiles or Ethnoi, whence “Ethnic plot” means the Gentile or Popish plot.

“Saw with disdain an Ethnic plot begun ... `Gainst form and order they their power employ, Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.” Part i. 518, 532—3.

Ethnophrones

(4 syl.). A sect of heretics of the seventeenth century, who practised the observances of the ancient Pagans. (Greek, ethnos—phren, heathen—minded.)

E'thon

The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of Prometheus.

Etiquette (3 syl.). The usages of polite society. The word means a ticket or card, and refers to the ancient custom of delivering a card of directions and regulations to be observed by all those who attended court. The original use was a soldier's billet. (French, etiquette; Spanish, etiqueta, a book of court ceremonies.)

“Etiquette ... had its original application to those ceremonial and formal observances practised at Court ... The term came afterwards ... to signify certain formal methods used in the transactions between Sovereign States.” — Burke: Works, vol. viii. p. 329.

Etna

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Virgil ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of Enceladus, a hundred-headed giant, who lies buried under the mountain. (Æn. iii. 578, etc.) In Etna the Greek and Latin poets place the forges of Vulcan and the smithy of the Cyclops.

Etrennes

(2 syl.). New-year's gifts are so called in France. Strenia, the Roman goddess, had the superintendence of new-year's gifts, which the Romans called strenæ. Tatius entered Rome on New-year's Day, and received from some augurs palms cut from the sacred grove, dedicated to the goddess Strenia. Having succeeded, he ordained that the 1st of January should be celebrated by gifts to be called strenæ, consisting of figs, dates, and honey; and that no word of ill omen should be uttered on that day

Ettrick Shepherd

James Hogg, the Scotch poet, who was born in the forest of Ettrick, Selkirkshire. (1772—1835.)

“The Ettrick Shepherd was my guide.”

Wordsworth.

Etzel

— i.e. Attila. King of the Huns, a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities; being a widower, he married Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In the Nibelungen—Lied, where he is introduced (part ii.), he is made very insignificant, and sees his liegemen, and even his son and heir, struck down without any effort to save them, or avenge their destruction. He is as unlike the Attila of history as possible.

Eucharis

in Fénelon's Télémaque, is meant to represent Mdlle. de Fontanges.

Eucharist

literally means a thank-offering. Our Lord said, “Do this in remembrance of me” — i.e. out of gratitude to me. The elements of bread and wine in the Lord's supper. (Greek, eu—charistia.)

Euclio

A penurious old hunk in one of the comedies of Plautus (Aulularia).

Eucrates

(3 syl.). More shifts than Eucrates. Eucrates, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of the office.

Eudoxians

Heretics, whose founder was Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. They maintained that the Son had a will independent of the Father, and that sometimes their wills were at variance.

Eugenius

This was John Hall Stephenson, author of Crazy Tales, a relative of Sterne. In Sterne's Tristram Shandy, Eugenius is made the friend and wise counsellor of Yorick.

Eugubine Tables

Seven bronze tables found near Eugubium (Gubbio) in Italy, in 1444. Of the inscriptions, five are Umbrian and Etruscan, and two are Latin.

“The Umbrian, the tongue of north—eastern Italy, is yet more fully represented to us by the Eugubine tablets ... supposed to be as old as the third and fourth centuries before our era.” —

W. D. Whitney: Study of Languages, lecture vi. p. 220.

Eulalie

(St.). Eulalon is one of the names of Apollo; but in the calendar there is a virgin martyr called Eulalie, born at Merida, in Estramadura. When she was only twelve years old, the great persecution of Diocletian was set on foot, whereupon the young girl left her maternal home, and, in the presence of the Roman judge, cast down the idols he had set up. She was martyred by torture, February 12th, 308.

Longfellow calls Evangeline the “Sun—shine of St. Eulalie.”

Eulen—spiegel

(Thyl) or Tyll Owl—glass. The hero of a German tale, which relates the pranks and drolleries, the ups and downs, the freaks and fun of a wandering cottager of Brunswick. The author is said to have been Dr. Thomas Murner (1475—1530).

Eumæ'os

or Eumæus. A swineherd. So called from the slave and swineherd of Ulysses.

“This second Eumæus strode hastily down the forest glade, driving before him ... the whole herd of his inharmonious charge.” — Sir Walter Scott.

Eumenides

[the good—tempered goddesses]. A name given by the Greeks to the Furies, as it would have been ominous and bad policy to call them by their right name, Erinnyes.

Eumnestes

[Memory], who, being very old, keeps a little boy named Anamnestes [Research] to fetch books from the shelves. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, book ii. 9.)

Eunomians

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Heretics, the disciples of Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicum in the fourth century. They maintained that the Father was of a different nature to the Son, and that the Son did not in reality unite Himself to human nature.

Eupatridæ

The oligarchy of Attica. These lords of creation were subsequently set aside, and a democratic form of government established.

Euphemisms

Words or phrases substituted, to soften down offensive expressions.

Place never mentioned to ears polite.

In the reign of Charles II., a worthy divine of Whitehall thus concluded his sermon: "If you don't live up to the precepts of the Gospel ... you must expect to receive your reward in a certain place which 'tis not good manners to mention here" (Laconics). Pope tells us this worthy divine was a dean: —

"To rest the cushion and soft dean invite,

Who never mentioned hell to ears polite." Moral Essays, epist. iv. 49, 50.

"His Satanic majesty;" "light—fingered gentry;" "a gentleman on his travels" (one transported); "she has met with an accident" (has had a child before marriage); "help" or "employé" (a servant); "not quite correct" (a false—hood); "an obliquity of vision" (a squint); "an innocent" (a fool), "beldam" (an ugly woman), and hundreds of others.

Eureka

or rather Heureka (I have found it out). The exclamation of Archimedes, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero's crown. The tale is, that Hiero delivered a certain weight of gold to a workman, to be made into a votive crown, but suspecting that the workman had alloyed the gold with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test the crown. The philosopher went to bathe, and, in stepping into the bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed, and putting his idea to the test, found his surmise to be correct. Now then, for the crown. Silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound—weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound—weight of gold, and being of greater bulk will remove more water. Vitruvius says "When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming, `Heureka! heureka!' and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment." Dryden has mistaken the quantity in the lines —

"The deist thinks he stands on firmer ground,

Cries `Eureka!' the mighty secret's found." Religio Laici, 42. 43

But Byron has preserved the right quantity —

"Now we clap

Our hands and cry `Eureka!' "

Childe Harold, iv. st. 81

The omission of the initial H finds a parallel in our word udometer for “hudometer,” emerods for “hemorrhoids,” erpetology for “herpetology”; on the other hand, we write humble—pie for “umble—pie.”

Eurus

(2 syl.). The east wind. So called, says Buttmann, from eös, the east. Probably it is eos cru'o, drawn from the east. Ovid confirms this etymology: “Vires capit Eurus ab ortu.” Breman says it is a corruption of eoros.

“While southern gales or western oceans roll,

And Eurus steals his ice—winds from the pole.” Darwin: Economy of Vegetation, canto vi.

Eurydice

(4 syl.). Wife of Orpheus, killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to the infernal regions to seek her, and was promised she should return on condition that he looked not back till she had reached the upper world. When the poet got to the confines of his journey, he turned his head to see if Eurydice were following, and she was instantly caught back again into Hades.

“Restore, restore Eurydice to life;

Oh, take the husband or return the wife.”

Pope: Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.

Eustathians

A denomination so called from Eustathius, a monk of the fourth century, excommunicated by the council of Gangra.

Eutychians

Heretics of the fifth century, violently opposed to the Nestorians. They maintained that Jesus Christ was entirely God previous to the incarnation, and entirely man during His sojourn on earth. The founder was Eutyches, an abbot of Constantinople, excommunicated in 448.

Euxine Sea

(The) — i.e. the hospitable sea. It was formerly called Axine (inhospitable). So the “Cape of Good Hope” was called the Cape of Despair. “Beneventum” was originally called Maleventum, and “Dyrrachium” was called Epidamnus, which the Romans thought was too much like damnum to be lucky.

Evangelic Doctor

(The). John Wycliffe, “the morning star of the Reformation.” (1324—1384.)

Evangeline

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(4 syl.). The heroine of Longfellow's poem so called. The subject of the tale is the expulsion of the inhabitants of Acadia (Nova Scotia) from their homes by order of George II.

Evangelist in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, represents the effectual preacher of the Gospel, who opens the gate of life to Christian. (See Wyoming.)

Evangelists

Symbols of the four: —

Matthew.

A man with a pen in his hand, and a scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an angel. This Gospel was the first, and the angel represents the Being who dictated it.

Matthew a man, because he begins his gospel with the descent of Jesus from the man David.

Mark.

A man seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged lion. Mark begins his gospel with the sojourn of Jesus in the wilderness, amidst wild beasts, and the temptation of Satan, “the roaring lion.” (See Lion.)

Luke.

A man with a pen, looking in deep thought over a scroll, and near him a cow or ox chewing the cud. The latter part refers to the eclectic character of St. Luke's Gospel.

John.

A young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity. The more ancient symbols were — for Matthew, a man's face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke, an ox; and for John, a flying eagle, in allusion to the four living creatures before the throne of God, described in the Book of Revelation: “The first ... was like a lion, and the second ... like a calf, and the third ... had a face as a man, and the fourth ... was like a flying eagle” (iv. 7). Irenæus says: “The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf His sacerdotal office; the man's face His incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost.”

Evans

(Sir Hugh). A pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of wondrous simplicity and shrewdness. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Evans

(William). The giant porter of Charles I., who carried about in his pocket Sir Geoffrey Hudson, the king's dwarf. He was nearly eight feet high. (Died 1632.) Fuller speaks of him in his Worthies, and Sir Walter Scott introduces him in Pevekil of the Peak.

“As tall a man as is in London, always excepting the king's porter, Master Evans, that carried you about in his pocket, Sir Geoffrey, as all the world has heard tell.” — Chap. xxxiii.

Evaporate

E

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(4 syl.). Be off; vanish into thin air.

“Bob and Jonathan, with similar meekness, took their leave and evaporated.” — Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, part i. 6.

Events

At all events. In any case; be the issue what it may; “utcumque ceciderit.”

In the event,

as “In the event of his being elected,” means in case, or provided he is elected; if the result is that he is elected.

Ever and Anon

From time to time. (See Anon .)

Ever—sworded

(The). The 29th Regiment of Foot, now called the “Worcestershire Regiment.” In 1746 a part of this regiment, then at St. John's Island, was surprised by the French and massacred, when a command was issued that henceforth every officer, even at meals, should wear his sword. In 1842—1859 the regiment was in the East Indies, and the order was relaxed, requiring only the captain and subaltern of the day to dine with their swords on.

Ever — Victorious Army

(The). Ward's army, raised in 1861, and placed under the charge of General Gordon. By 1864 it had stamped out the Taëping rebellion, which broke out in 1851 (See Chinese Gordon.)

Everlasting Staircase

(The). The treadmill.

Every Man Jack of Them Everyone. The older form of everyone was everichon, often divided into every chone, corrupted first into every—john, then into every Jack, then perverted into every man Jack of 'em.

“I shall them soon vanquish every chone.”

Shepherd's Kalender.

“To have hadde theym ... slayne everye chone.” — More: On the Passion Weeks.

Evidence

(In). Before the eyes of the people; to the front; actually present (Latin). Evidence, meaning testimony in proof of something, has a large number of varieties, as — Circumstantial evidence.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

That based on corroborative incidents. Demonstrative evidence. That which can be proved without leaving a doubt. Direct evidence. That of an eye—witness.

External evidence.

That derived from history or tradition. Internal evidence. That derived from conformity with what is known. Material evidence. That which is essential in order to carry proof. Moral evidence. That which accords with general experience. Presumptive evidence. That which is highly probable.

Prima facie evidence.

That which seems likely, unless it can be explained away. Queen's or King's evidence. That of an accessory against his accomplices, under the promise of pardon. Secondary evidence. Such as is produced when primary evidence is not to be obtained.

Self evidence.

That derived from the senses; manifest and indubitable.

Evil Communications

etc. He who touches pitch must expect to be defiled. A rotten apple will injure its companions. One scabby sheep will infect a whole flock.

French:

Il ne faut qu'une brébis galeuse pour gâter tout un troupeau. Latin: Mala vicini pecoris contagia lædent (Virgil). Tunc tua res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet. Mala consortio bonos mores inquinat. Malorum commercio reddimur deteriores. Hic niger est, hunc tu, Romane, caveto (Horace). Uva conspecta livorem ducit ab uva.

To the same effect is the locution, "C'est une brébis galeuse," and the idea implied is, he must be separated from the flock, or else he will contaminate others.

Evil Eye

It was anciently believed that the eyes of some persons darted noxious rays on objects which they glared upon. The first morning glance of such eyes was certain destruction to man or beast, but the destruction was not unfrequently the result of emaciation. Virgil speaks of an evil eye making cattle lean. (See Mascotte, Jettator.)

"Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos." Ecl. iii. 103.

Evil May Day

(1517). So called because of the riots made on that day by the London apprentices, who fell on the French residents. The ringleaders, with fifteen others, were hanged; and four hundred more of the rioters were carried to Westminster with halters round their necks, but were pardoned by "Bluff Harry the King." The Constable of the Tower discharged his cannon on the mob assembled in tumult in Cheapside Way.

Evil Principle

(See Ahriman, Arimanes, Asalor .)

Evils

“Of two evils, I have chosen the least.” (Prior).

Evolution (Darwinian). Darwin's theory is that different forms of animal and vegetable life are due to small variations, and that natural selection is a main agent in bringing them about. If favourable, these variations are perpetuated, if not they die off.

Spencer's theory is that the present multitude of objects have all sprung from separate atoms originally homogeneous.

“Evolution is the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion, during which the matter passes from an indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity; and during which the retained motion undergoes a parallel transformation.” — Spencer: First Principles, part ii. chap. xvii. p. 396.

Evolution

its process, according to biologists.

Part i.

Assuming the existence of some element, call it protyle (2 syl.), in time we get matter, and motion. From matter and motion proceed cohesion and repulsion, and from cohesion and repulsion we get crystals. Next comes chemical action into play, from which springs primordial protoplasm, or the protoplasmic clot of purely chemical origin.

By further development the chlorophyll cell is formed, with its power to assimilate, and this will account for air, water, and minerals.

By parasitism next comes the proto—bacillus or fungus, living on the green cells. And then will follow the protozoön, the first example of animal life.

Part ii. (1) The Amæba is the lowest of known animals, a mollusc, with the sole power of locomotion. (2) The Syn—amæba is multicellular, with an organism adapted for sensation, digestion, and the power of reproduction.

(3) Then will come the Gastrula, an organised being, with an external mouth.

(4) Next the Hydra or Polyp, which has localised sense—organs and instincts.

(5) Then the Medusa, with nerves, muscles, and nerve functions.

(6) Next come worms, which have special sense organs; and

(7) Then the Himatega, or Sack—worm, which has a rudimentary spinal cord.

Part iii. From the Sack—worm to Man. (1) The larvæ of Ascidiæ.

(2) Lowly—organised fish, like the Lancelet. (3) The Lepidosiren, and other fish.

(4) The Amphibians.

(5) Birds and Reptiles.

(6) Monotremata, which connect reptiles with mammals. (7) Marsupials.

(8) Placental Mammals,

(9) The Lemuridæ.

(10) The Simiadæ.

(11) The Monkey tribe, consisting of the New World monkey (called Platyrrhines), and the Old World monkeys (called Catarrhines, 3 syl.). (12) The Missing Link between the catarrhine monkey and man. The Alali is thought by some to supply this link. It is one of the monkey tribe which approaches nearer to the human species than any other yet discovered.

This is no place to criticise the theory of evolution, but merely to state it as briefly and plainly as possible.

Ewe—lamb

(A). A single possession greatly prized. (2 Sam. xii. 1—14.)

Ex Cathedra (Latin). With authority. The Pope, speaking ex cathedra, is said to speak with an infallible voice — to speak as the successor and representative of St. Peter, and in his pontifical character. The words are Latin, and mean “from the chair” — i.e. the throne of the pontiff. The phrase is applied to all dicta uttered by authority, and ironically to self—sufficient, dogmatical assertions.

Ex Hypothesi

according to what is supposed or assumed.

“The justification of the charge [i.e. the tax for betterment] lies ex hypothesi in an enhanced value of the property in the Betterment area.” — The Property Protection objection against section 37 of the Betterment clause of the Tower Bridge Southern Approach Bill (1894).

Ex Luce Lucellum

To make a gain out of light; to make a cheese—paring from lucifer—matches. When Robert Lowe proposed to tax lucifer—matches, he suggested that the boxes should be labelled Ex luce lucellum.

(Parliamentary Reports, 1871.)

“Lucifer aggreiens ex luce haurire lucellum

Incidit in tenebras; lex nova fumus erat.”

Ex Officio

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(Latin, by virtue of his office). As, the Lord Mayor for the time being shall be ex officio one of the trustees.

Ex Parte

(Latin, proceeding only from one of the parties). An ex—parte statement is a one—sided statement, a partial statement, a statement made by one of the litigants without being modified by the counter—statement.

Ex Ped'e Herculem

From this sample you can judge of the whole. Plutarch says that Pythagoras ingeniously calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules' stadium at Olympia was much longer. Now, says the philosopher, as the stadium of Olympia is longer than an ordinary stadium, so the foot of Hercules was longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. (Varia Scripta.)

Ex Post Facto

(Latin). An ex post facto law. A law made to meet and punish a crime after the offence has been committed.

Ex Professo

(Latin). Avowedly; expressly.

“I have never written ex professo on the subject.” — Gladstone: Nineteenth Century, Nov., 1885.

Ex Uno Omnes

means from the one instance deduced you may infer the nature of the rest. A general inference from a particular example. If one oak—tree bears acorns, all other oak—trees will grow similar fruit.

Exaltation

In old astrology, a planet was said to be in its “exaltation” when it was in that sign of the zodiac in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of Venus is in Pisces, and her “dejection” in Virgo.

“And thus, God wot, Mercry' is desolate'

In Pisces, wher Venus' is exaltate'.”

Chaucer; Canterbury Tales, 6,285.

In chemistry, the refining or subtilising of bodies, or of their qualities, virtues, or strength.

Exaltation of the Cross A feast held in the Roman Catholic Church, on September 14th, to commemorate the restoration of the cross to Calvary in 628. It had been carried away by Khosroes the Persian.

Examination

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Examen is Latin for the needle indicator of a balance. To examine is to watch the indicator, so as to adjust the balance.

Examiners

(Public). The examiners at the universities, and at the examinations for the military, naval, and civil services, etc.

Excalibur

(Ex cal [ce] liber [atus]). Liberated from the stone. The sword which Arthur drew out of the stone, whereby he proved himself to be the king. (See Sword.)

“No sword on earth, were it the Excalibur of King Arthur, can cut that which opposes no steady resistance to the blow.” — Sir Walter Scott.

Excellency

(His). A title given to colonial and provincial governors, ambassadors, and the Lord—Lieutenant of Ireland. (Compare Luke i. 3.)

Excelsior

Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of the New York State, and has been made popular by Longfellow's poem so named. Used also as the synonym of super—excellent.

Exception

To take exception. To feel offended; to find fault with.

“Her manner was so ... respectful, that I could not take exception to this reproof.” — Farjeon.

Exceptions prove the Rule

They prove there is a rule, or there could be no exceptions; the very fact of exceptions proves there must be a rule.

“Exceptio probat regulam.” — Columella.

Exchequer

Court of Exchequer. In the subdivision of the court in the reign of Edward I., the Exchequer acquired a separate and independent position. Its special duty was to order the revenues of the Crown and recover the king's debts. It was denominated Scaccarium, from scaccum (a chess—board), and was so called because a chequered cloth was laid on the table of the court. (Madox: History of the Exchequer.)

Foss, in his Lives of the Judges, gives a slightly different explanation. He says: “All round the table was a standing ledge four fingers broad, covered with a cloth bought in the Easter Term, and this cloth was `black rowed with strekes about a span, like a chess—board. On the spaces of this cloth counters were arranged, marked for checking computations.’ “

Excise

(2 syl.) means literally, a coupon, or piece cut off (Latin, excido). It is a toll or duty levied on articles of home consumption — a slice cut off from these things for the national purse.

“Taxes on commodities are either on production within the country, or on importation into it, or on conveyance or sale within it; and are classed respectively as excise, customs, or tolls.” — Mill: Political Economy, book v. chap. iii. p. 562.

Exclusion

Bill of Exclusion. A bill to exclude the Duke of York from the throne, on account of his being a Papist. Passed by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords, in 1679; revived in 1681.

Excommunication

(1) The greater is exclusion of an individual from the seven sacraments, from every legitimate act, and from all intercourse with the faithful. (2) The lesser excommunication is sequestration from the services of the Church only. The first Napoleon was excommunicated by Pope Pius VII., and the kings of Italy were placed under an anathema by Pius IX. for adding the Papal dominions to the United Kingdom of Italy.

“The person excommunicated: Os, orare, vale, communio, mensa, negatur (The person excommunicated is to be boycotted by the faithful in os (conversation), orare (prayer), communio (communion), mensa (board).” — Professor T. P. Gury: Romish Moral Theology (3rd ed., 1862).

Excommunication by Bell, Book, and Candle. (See Cursing, etc.) Excommunication by the ancient Jews. This was of three sorts — (1) Nidui (separation), called in the New Testament “casting out of the synagogue” (John ix. 22); (2) Cherem, called by St. Paul “delivering over to Satan” (1 Cor. v. 5); (3) Anathema Maranatha (1 Cor. xvi. 22), delivered over to the Lord, who is at hand, to take vengeance. The Sadducees had an interdict called Tetragrammeton, which was cursing the offender by Jehovah, by the Decalogue, by the inferior courts, and with all the curses of the superior courts.

Excruciate

(4 syl.). To give one as much pain as crucifying him would do. (Latin, ex crux, where ex is intensive.)

Excuse

“Qui s'excuse, s'accuse,” or “Tel s'excuse qui s'accuse.”

Exeat

(Latin, he may go out). Permission granted by a bishop to a priest to leave his diocese. In the universities, it is permission to a student to leave college before end of term. Sometimes permission is granted to leave college after the gates are closed.

Execrate

(3 syl.). To many Roman laws this tag was appended, “If any one breaks this law, sacer esto, “i.e. let his body, his family, and his goods be consecrated to the gods. When a man was declared sacer, anyone might kill him with impunity. Anyone who hurt a tribune was held a sacer to the goddess Ceres. Ex in this word is intensitive.

“If anyone hurt a tribune in word or deed, he was held accursed [sacer], and his goods were confiscated.” — Livy, iii. 55; see also Dionysius, vi. 89, and viii. 17.

Exequatur

An official recognition of a person in the character of consul or commercial agent, authorising him to exercise his power. The word is Latin, and means, “he may exercise” [the function to which he has been appointed].

“The Northern Patriotic League (Oporto) has decided to petition the Government to withdraw the Exequatur from the British Consul here.” — Reuter's Telegram, Tuesday, Feb. 11th, 1890.

Exercises

Week—day sermons were so called by the Puritans. Hence the title of Morning Exercises, week—day sermons preached in the morning.

Exeter

The Duke of Exeter's daughter was a sort of rack invented by the Duke of Exeter during the reign of Henry VI. (Blackstone.)

“I was the lad that would not confess one word ... though they threatened to make me hug the Duke of Exeter's daughter.” — Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, xxv.

Exeter Controversy

A controversy raised upon a tract entitled Plain Truth, by the Rev. John Agate, of Exeter, an Episcopalian; replied to by several dissenting ministers, as Withers, Trosse, Pierce, etc. (1707—1715.)

Exeter Domesday

A record containing a description of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall; published by Sir Henry Ellis (in 1816) as a Supplement to the Great Domesday—Book (q.v.). Called “Exon,” either because it was at one time kept among the muniments of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, or because the Bishop of Exeter was commissioned to make the survey.

Exhibition

My son has got an exhibition at Oxford. An allowance of meat and drink; a benefaction for maintenance. (Latin, exhibitio, an allowance of food and other necessaries, “alimentis exhibere aliquem.”)

“They have founded six exhibitions of 15 each per annum, to continue for two years and a half.” — Taylor: History of the University of Dublin, chap. v. p. 198.

“I crave fit disposition for my wife,

Due reference of place, and exhibition.”

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Exhibition

(The Great) was held in Hyde Park, London, and lasted from May 1 to October 15, 1851.

Exies

or Axes. Hysterics; ague fits; any paroxysm.

“Jenny Ritherout has taen the exies, and done naething but laugh and greet ... for twa days successively.” — Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxxv.

Exile

The Neapolitan Exile. Baron Poerio. One of the kings of Naples promised the people a constitution, but broke his word; whereupon a revolution broke out, and the baron, with many others, was imprisoned for many years in a dreadful dungeon near Naples. He was at length liberated and exiled to America, but compelled the captain to steer for Ireland, and landed at Cork, where he was well received.

Exit

(Latin, he goes out). A theatrical term placed at the point when an actor is to leave the stage. We also say of an actor, Exit So—and—so — that is, So—and—so leaves the stage at this point of the drama.

He made his exit.

He left, or died: as, “He made his exit of this life in peace with all the world.” Except in the drama, we say, “made or makes his exit.” (See above.)

“All the world's stage,

And all the men and women merely players; They have their exits and their entrances.” Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Exodus

The Exodus of Israel. The departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the guidance of Moses. We now speak of the Exodus of Ireland — i.e. the departure of the Irish in large numbers for America; the Exodus of the Acadians — i.e. the expulsion of these colonists from Nova Scotia in the reign of George II.; etc. (Greek, exodos, a journey out.)

Exon

Exon of the Guards. Any one of the three certain officers of the day in command of the yeomen of the royal guard; the acting officer who resides at the court; an exempt. Capitaines exempts des gardes du corps. (French, exoine, ex soin, exempt from duty or care.)

Exorbitant

means literally out of the rut (Latin, ex orbita, out of the wheel—rut); out of the track; extravagant (extra—vagrant).

Exoteric

(See Esoteric .)

Expectation Week

Between the Ascension and Whit Sunday, when the apostles continued praying “in earnest expectation of the Comforter.”

Experimental Philosophy

Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and mathematical sciences. Experimental philosophy is also called natural philosophy, and by the French physics.

Experimentum Crucis

(Latin). A decisive experiment. (See Crucial .)

Experto Crede Believe one who has had experience in the matter.

Explosion

means literally, driven out by clapping the hands (Latin, explodo — i.e. ex—plaudo); hence the noise made by clapping the hands, a report made by ignited gunpowder, etc.

Exponent

One who explains or sets forth the views of another. Thus, a clergyman should be the exponent of the Bible and Thirty—nine Articles. (Latin, ex pono, to expose or set forth.)

Exposé

(French). An exposing of something which should have been kept out of sight. Thus we say a man made a dreadful exposé — i.e. told or did something which should have been kept concealed.

Express Train

A fast train between two large towns, with few or no stoppages at intermediate stations.

Expressed Oils

are those which are obtained by pressure. Unlike animal and essential oils, they are pressed out of the bodies which contain them.

Expression

A geographical expression. A term applied to a tract of country with no recognised nationality.

“This territory is to a very great extent occupied by one race ... and yet to the present day Germany is little more than a geographical expression.” — Daily Telegraph (before 1871).

Exquisite

(3 syl.). One sought out; a coxcomb, a dandy, one who thinks himself superlatively well dressed, and of most unexceptionable deportment.

“Exquisites are out of place in the pulpit; they should be set up in a tailor's window.” — Spurgeon: Lectures to my Students. (Lecture viii.)

Extensive

(3 syl.). Rather extensive, that. Rather fast. A slang synonym for a swell.

Exter

That's Exter, as the old woman said when she saw Kerton. This is a Devonshire saying, meaning, I thought my work was done, but I find much still remains before it is completed. “Exter” is the popular pronunciation of Exeter, and “Kerton” is Crediton. The tradition is that the woman in question was going for the first time to Exeter, and seeing the grand old church of Kerton (Crediton), supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. “That's Exter,” she said, “and my journey is over;” but alas! she had still eight miles to walk before she reached her destination.

Extinct Species

[since the time of man]. The dodo, great auk, quagga, sea—cow, and white rhinoceros. Getting very rare: the bison, the Carolina paraket, the giraffe, and the passenger pigeon once common enough.

Extravagantes Constitutiones or Extravagants. The papal constitutions of John XXII., and some few of his successors, supplemental to the “Corpus Juris Canonici.” So called because they were not ranged in order with the other papal constitutions, but were left “outwanderers” from the general code.

Extreme Unction

One of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church, founded on St. James v. 14, “Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.”

Extremes Meet

In French: “Les extrêmes se touchent.”

Extricate Latin, ex, out of, and tricae, fetters. “Tricae” are the hairs, etc., tied round the feet of birds to prevent their wandering. To extricate is to “get out of these tricae or meshes.”

Exult'

(Latin). To leap out. Thus we say, “I am ready to leap out of my skin;” to jump for joy.

Eye

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Latin, oculus; Italian, occhio; Spanish, ojo; Russian, oko; Dutch, oog; Saxon, eáge (where g is pronounced like y); French, oeil.

In my mind's eye.

In my perceptive thought. The eye sees in two ways: (1) from without; and (2) from within. When we look at anything without, the object is reflected on the retina as on a mirror; but in deep contemplation the inward thought "informs the eye." It was thus Macbeth saw the dagger; and Hamlet tells Horatio that he saw his deceased father "in his mind's eye."

In the wind's eye.

Directly opposed to the wind.

In the twinkling of an eye.

Immediately, very soon. "Au moindre clin d'œil." Similar phrases are: "In a brace of shakes," "In the twinkling of a bed—post." (See Bed Post.)

My eye!

or Oh, my eye! an exclamation of astonishment. (See All My Eye.) One might see that with half an eye. Easily; at a mere glance.

The king's eyes.

His chief officers. An Eastern expression.

"One of the seven

Who in God's presence, nearest to the throne
Stand ready at command, and are his eyes
That run thro' all the heavens, or down to earth
Bear his swift errands."

Milton: Paradise Lost,

iii. 652.

To have an eye on.

To keep strict watch on the person or thing referred to. To have an eye to the main chance. To keep constantly in view the profit to arise; to act from motives of policy. (See Main Chance.)

To see eye to eye.

To be of precisely the same opinion; to think both alike.

Eye — service

Superficial service. "Service qu'on rend sous les yeux du maître."

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters ...; not with eye—service, as men pleases; but as the servants of Christ.” — Eph. vi. 5, 6.

Eye—sore

Something that is offensive to the sight. Sore is the Anglo—Saxon sar (painful) or swær (grievous). It is painful or grievous to the eye.

“Mordecai was an eye—sore to Haman.” —

D'Estrange.

Eye—teeth

The canine teeth are so called because their fangs extend upwards nearly to the orbits of the eyes.

To draw one's eye—teeth.

To take the conceit out of a person; to fleece one without mercy; to make one suffer loss without seeing the manoeuvre by which it was effected.

“I guess these Yanks will get their eye—teeth drawn if they don't look sharp.” — W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, vol. i.

Eye of a Needle

Lady Duff Gordon, writing from Cairo, says: “Yesterday I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle — i.e. a low arched door of an enclosure. He must kneel and bow his head to go through, and thus the rich man must humble himself” (Wood: Bible Animals, p. 243). Lord Nugent, in his Travels, informs us that when at Hebron he was directed to go out by the Needle's Eye, or small gate of the city.

Eye of Greece

(The). Athens.

“Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts.”

Milton: Paradise Regained, book iv. 240.

Eye of the Baltic

(The). Gottland, in the Baltic.

Eye of the Storm

An opening between the storm clouds. (See Bull's Eye .)

Eyes

E

The Almond Eyes. The Chinese.

“He will not receive a very warm welcome from the Almond Eyes.” — F. Millar: On the Central Saints' Rest (1891).

Eyes to the blind.

A staff. So called in allusion to the staff given to Tiresias by Athena, to serve him for the eyes of which she had deprived him. (See Tiresias.)

To cast sheep's eyes at one.

To look askant with shyness or diffidence. To make eyes at one. To look wantonly at a person; to look lovingly at another. To rent the eyes with paint (Jer. iv. 30). The ladies of the East tinge the edge of their eyelids with the powder of lead—ore. They dip into the powder a small wooden bodkin, which they draw “through the eyelids over the ball of the eye.” Jezebel is said “to have adjusted her eyes with kohol” (a powder of lead—ore), 2 Kings ix. 30. N.B. — The word “face” in our translation should in both these cases be rendered “eyes.” (Shaw: Travels.)

Your eyes are bigger than your stomach.

You fancied you could eat more, but found your appetite satisfied with less than you expected. “Oculi plus devorbant quam capit venter.”

Eyed

One—eyed people. (See Arimaspians, Cyclops.)

Eyre

Justices in Eyre. A corruption of “Justices in itinere.” At first they made the circuit of the kingdom every seven years, but Magna Charta provided that it should be done annually.

Eyre

(Jane). The heroine of Charlotte Bronte's novel so called. Jane Eyre is a governess, who stoutly copes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately wins the love of a man of fortune. (‘Eyre’ pronounce air.)

Ezour Veda

or Yajûr Veda. The second of the sacred books of the Hindûs. The four are: — (1) The Rig Veda (prayers and hymns in verse);

(2) The Ezour Veda (prayers in prose);

(3) The Sama' (prayers to be chanted); and

(4) The Atharvan Veda (formulas of consecration, imprecation, expiation, etc.).

Ezzelin

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

(3 syl.). Sir Ezzelin recognised count Lara at the table of Lord Otho, and charged him with being Conrad the corsair. A duel was arranged, and Ezzelin was never heard of more. A serf used to tell how one evening he saw a horseman cast a dead body into the river which divided the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the dead body. (Byron: Lara.) (See Conrad.)

F

F F is written on his face. "Rogue" is written on his face. The letter F used to be branded near the nose, on the left cheek of felons, on their being admitted to "benefit of clergy." The same was used for brawling in church. The custom was not abolished by law till 1822.

F Sharp A flea. The pun is F, the initial letter, and sharp because the bite is acute. (See B Flats.) ff

A corrupt way of making a capital f in Old English, and used as low down as 1750; as ffrance for France, ffarrington for Farrington, etc.

F.E.R.T.

The letters of the Sardinian motto.

Either Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenuit, in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by the house of Savoy, 1310;

Or, Fædere et Religione Tenemur, on the gold doubloon of Victor Amadeus I.; Or, Fortitudo Ejus Rempublicam Tenet.

F.O.B.

Free on board; meaning that the shipper, from the time of shipment, is free from all risk.

F's

The three f's. Fixed tenure, Fair rent, Free sale. The platform of the Irish League in 1880.

Fa'

(Scotch). To get; to get a share of; to lay a claim to.

"Where is the laird or belted knight

That best deserves to fa' that?"

Burns: Whom Will Ye Send, stanza i.

Fabian Society

An association of socialists.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“The Fabian Society aims at the reorganisation of society by the emancipation of land and industrial capital from individual and class ownership: and the resting of them in the community for the general benefit.” — H.G. Wilshire: Fabian Essays on Socialism, June, 1891, p. 91.

The name of the society is derived from Quintus Fabius, the Roman general, who won his way against Hannibal by wariness, not by violence, by caution, not by defiance.

“Fabian tactics lie in stealing inches, not in grasping leagues.” — Liberty Review, May 19th, 1894, p. 395, col. 1.

Fabian Soldiers

A complimentary phrase for Roman soldiers, the bravest of the brave.

“Quem [band of trained soldiers] quidem sic omni disciplina militari [Iphicratês] crudivit, ut quemadmodum quondam `Fabiani milites' Romani appellati sunt, sic `Iphicratenses' apud Græcos in summa laude fuerint.” — Nepos: Iphicrates, ii.

Fabian Tactics

or Policy — i.e. delay. “Win like Fabius, by delay.” The Roman general Fabius wearied out Hannibal by marches, counter—marches, ambuscades, and skirmishes, without ever coming to an open engagement. Fabius died B.C. 203.

“Met by the Fabian tactics, which proved fatal to its predecessor.” — The Times.

Fabianism

The system called Collectivism. (See Collectivists .)

“It must be evident that the Fabian Society has a really gigantic task before it, the difficulties of which will not be lightened when the working classes come to understand that small ownership ... and small savings ... are just as strongly condemned by Collectivists as large estates and colossal fortunes.” — Nineteenth Century (November, 1892, p. 686)

Fabila's sad Fate

The king Don Fabila was a man of very obstinate purpose and fond of the chase. One day he encountered a boar, and commanded those who rode with him to remain quiet and not interfere; but the boar overthrew him and killed him. (Chronica Antiqua de España, p. 121.)

Fabius

The American Fabius. Washington (1732—1799), whose military policy was similar to that of Fabius. He wearied out the English troops by harassing them, without coming to a pitched battle. Duguesclin pursued the same policy in France, by the advice of Charles V., whereby all the conquests of Edward and the Black Prince were retrieved.

Fabius of the French.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Anne, Duc de Montmorency, grand constable of France; so called from his success in almost annihilating the imperial army which had invaded Provence, by laying the country waste and prolonging the campaign. (1493—1567.)

Fables

The most famous writers of fables are —

Pilpay, among the Hindus.

Lokman, among the Arabs. Æsop and Babrios, among the Greeks.

Phædrus and Arianus, among the Romans. Faerne, Abstemius, and Casti, among the Italians. The last wrote The Talking Animals. La Fontaine and Florian, among the French.

John Gay and Edward Moore, among our own countrymen. The former is sometimes called “The English Æsop.”

Lessing and Pfeffel, among the Germans.

Krilof, among the Russians.

(See Aesop.)

Fabliaux

The metrical fables of the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The word fable, in this case, is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as Reynard the Fox, but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, all sorts of legends and family traditions. The fabliau of Aucassin and Nicolette is full of interesting incidents, and contains much true pathos and beautiful poetry.

Fabricius

A Roman hero, representative of inflexible purity and honesty. The ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his hereditary farm; how he refused the rich presents offered him by the Samnite ambassadors; and how at death he left no portion for his daughters, whom the senate provided for.

“Fabricius, scorner of all—conquering gold.”

Thomson: Seasons (Winter).

Fabulinus

The god who taught Roman children to utter their first word. It was the god Vagitanus (q.v.) who taught them to utter their first cry. From fari, to speak (Varro).

Fabulous Isles

(See under Islands .)

Face (Latin, facies.)

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A brazen face.

A bold, defiant look. A brazen—faced person means one with an impudent, audacious look, especially in a bad cause. Brass metaphorically is generally used in a bad or deprecatory sense, as “You have plenty of brass” [impudence], “I admire your brass.”

A rebec face

(French, visage de rebec). An ugly, grotesque face, like that which used to be cut on the upper part of a rebec or three—stringed fiddle.

“Dead is the noble Badëbec,

Who had a face like a rebec.”

Rabelais: Pantagruel, book ii. 4.

Badebec was the mother of Gargantua, and died in childbirth. A wry face. The features drawn awry, expressive of distaste. To draw a long face. To look dissatisfied or sorrowful, in which case the mouth is drawn down at the corners, the eyes are dejected, and the face elongated

“Of course, it is all right; if you had not drawn such a long face I should never have doubted.” — Dr. Cupid.

To fly in the face of ... To oppose violently and unreasonably: to set at defiance rashly. To put a good face on the matter. To make the best of a bad matter; to bear up under something disagreeable; “vultu malum dissimulare,” “in adversis vultum secundæ fortunæ gerere.”

To set one's face against [something]. To oppose it; to resist its being done. The expression of the face shows the state of the inclination of a person's mind.

Face to Face

In the immediate presence of each other; two or more persons facing each other. To accuse another “face to face” means not “behind his back” or in his absence, but while present.

Faces

To keep two faces under one hood. To be double—faced; to pretend to be very religious, and yet live an evil life.

“We never troubled the Church ... We knew we were doing what we ought not to do, and scorned to look pious, and keep two faces under one hood.” — Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. ii.

To make faces.

To make grimaces with the face.

Face

To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain without changing colour or hanging down the head.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

To face down.

To withstand with boldness and effrontery.

Faced

With a facing, lining of the cuffs, etc.; also the preterite of the verb “to face.”

Faced

Bare—faced. Impudence unconcealed. A “bare—faced lie” is a lie told shamelessly and without prevarication. Shame—faced. Having shame expressed in the face.

Faced with [silk, etc.]. An inferior article bearing the surface of a superior one, as when cotton—velvet has a silk surface; the “facings” (as the lining of coat—cuffs, etc.) made of silk, etc.

Face—card or Faced—card. A court card, a card with a face on it.

Facilëk; Princeps By far the best; admittedly first.

“But the facilë princeps of all gypsologists is Professor Pott, of Halle.” — Chambers's Cyclopædia.

Facings

To put one through his facings. To examine; to ascertain if what appears on the surface is superficial only.

“The Greek books were again had out, and Grace ... was put through her facings.” — A. Trollope.

Façon de Parler

Idiomatic or usual form of speech, not meant to be offensive. I once told a waiter in Norway that the meat he brought me for breakfast was not sufficiently cooked; and he bluntly told me it was not true

(det er ikke sandt), but he did not intend to be rude. It was the Norwegian “façon de parler.”

Faction

The Romans divided the combatants in the circus into classes, called factions, each class being distinguished by its special colour, like the crews of a boat—race. The four original factions were the leek—green (prasina), the sea—blue (veneta), the white (alba), and the rose—red (rosea). Two other factions were added by Domitian, the colours being golden—yellow (aurata) and purple. As these combatants strove against each other, and entertained a strong esprit de corps, the word was easily applied to political partisans. In the faction riots of Constantinople, A.D. 532, above 30,000 persons were killed. (Latin, factio).

Factor

F

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

An agent; a substitute in mercantile affairs; a commission merchant. (Latin, facio, to do, whence the French facteur, one who does something for an employer.)

“Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,

An honest factor stole a gem away.”

Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. iii. 361.

Thomas Pitt, ancestor of the Earl of Chatham, was appointed by Queen Anne Governor of Fort St. George, in the East Indies, and in 1702 purchased there, for £20,400, a diamond weighing 127 carats, which he sold to the King of France. This gem is still called the Pitt diamond. Pope insinuates that Pitt stole the diamond. This is not exactly true. He obtained it for a price much below its value, and threatened the thief with exposure if he made a fuss about the matter.

Factotum

One who does for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johannes Factotum. Our “Jack—of—all—trades” does not mean a factotum, but one who does odd jobs for anyone who will pay him.

(Latin, facere totum, to do everything required.)

Fad

(A). A hobby, a temporary fancy, a whim. A contraction of faddle in “fiddle—faddle.”

“Among the fads that Charley had taken up for a time was that of collecting old prints.” — Eggleston: Faith Doctor, chap. iii.

Fada

A féé or kobold of the south of France, sometimes called “Hada.” These house—spirits, of which, strictly speaking, there are but three, bring good luck in their right hand and ill luck in their left.

Fadda

Mahomet's white mule.

Fadge

(1 syl.). To suit or fit together, as, It won't fadge; we cannot fadge together; he does not fadge with me. (Anglo—Saxon, fægen, to fit together; Welsh, ffag, what tends to unite.)

“How will this fadge?”

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night,

ii. 2.

Fadge

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

A farthing. A corrupt contraction of fardingal, i.e. farthingale. (See Chivy.)

Fadha

(Al). Mahomet's silver cuirass, confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Medina.

Fadladeen'

The great Nazir', or chamberlain of Aurungze'bë's harem, in Lalla Rookh. The criticism of this self—conceited courtier upon the several tales which make up the romance are very racy and full of humour; and his crest—fallen conceit when he finds out that the poet was the Prince in disguise is well conceived.

“He was a judge of everything — from the pencilling of a Circassian's eyelids to the deepest questions of science and literature; from the mixture of a conserve of rose—leaves to the composition of an epic poem ... all the cooks and poets of Delhi stood in awe of him.” — T. Moore.

Faërie

or Feerie. The land of the fays or faeries. The chief fay realms are Avalon, an island somewhere in the ocean; Oberon's dominions, situate “in wilderness among the holtis hairy;” and a realm somewhere in the middle of the earth, where was Pari Banou's palace.

“For learnèd Colin [Spenser] lays his pipes to gage,

And is to Faëry gone a pilgrimage.”

Drayton: Eclogue,

iii.

Faërie Queene

A metrical romance in six books, by Edmund Spenser (incomplete). It details the adventures of various knights, who impersonate different virtues, and belong to the court of Gloriana, Queen of faërie land.

The first book contains the legend of the Red Cross Knight (the spirit of Christianity), and is by far the best. The chief subject is the victory of Holiness over Error. It contains twelve cantos.

The second book is the legend of Sir Guyon (the golden mean), in twelve cantos. The third book is the legend of Britomartis (love without lust), in twelve cantos. Britomartis is Diana, or Queen Elizabeth the Britoness.

The fourth book is the legend of Cambel and Triamond (fidelity), in twelve cantos. The fifth book is the legend of Artegall (justice), in twelve cantos.

The sixth book is the legend of Sir Calidore (courtesy), in twelve cantos. There are parts of a seventh book — viz. cantos 6 and 7, and two stanzas of canto three. The subject is Mutability.

The plan of the Faërie Queene is borrowed from the Orlando Furioso, but the creative power of Spenser is more original, and his imagery more striking, than Ariosto's. Thomson says of him —

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

“[He] like a copious river, poured his song

O'er all the mazes of enchanted ground.”

The Seasons (Summer), 1574—5.

Fag

One who does, and perseveres in doing. In public schools, it means a little boy who waits upon a bigger one. Probably a contracted form of factor, factotum; Latin, fac—ere, to do.

Fag.

Servant of Captain Absolute, who apes his master in all things. (Sheridan: The Rivals.)

“Even the mendacious Mr. Fag assures us, though he never scruples to tell a lie at his master's command, yet it hurts his conscience to be found out.” — Sir Walter Scott.

Fag—end

(A). The selvedge or coarse end of a piece of cloth. This also is from facio, factum, meaning the part added after the piece is finished. The fag—end of a session means the last few days before dissolution.

Fagged Out

Wearied with hard work. Fatigued contracted into fa'g'ed.

Fagin

An infamous Jew, who teaches boys and girls to rob with dexterity. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Fagot

A badge worn in mediæval times by those who had recanted their “heretical” opinions. It was designed to show what they merited, but had narrowly escaped. (See Fagots.)

Il y a fagots et fagots. There are divers sorts of fagots; every alike is not the same. The expression is in Molière's Le Médecin malgré lui, where Sganarelle wants to show that his fagots are better than those of other persons; “Ay, but those fagots are not so good as my fagots.” (Welsh, ffag, that which unites; Anglo—Saxon, fægan, to unite.)

Sentire les fagots.

To be heretical; to smack of the fagots. In allusion to the custom of burning heretics by surrounding them with blazing fagots.

Fagot Votes

Votes obtained by the nominal transfer of property to a person whose income was not otherwise sufficient to qualify him for being a voter.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The “fagot” was a bundle of property divided into small lots for the purpose stated above. Abolished.

“The object was to prevent the creation of fagot votes.” — The Times.

Fagots

Cakes made of the “insides” of pigs, with thyme, scraps of pork, sage onions, and other herbs, fried together in grease, and eaten with potatoes. (Greek, phago, to eat.)

Fahfah

One of the rivers of Paradise in Mahometan mythology.

Faids

The second class of Druids.

Faience

(2 syl.). Majolica. So called from Faenza, where, in 1299, it was first manufactured. It is termed majolica because the first specimens the Italians saw came from Majorca. In France it now means a fine ware not equal to porcelain.

Faineant

Les Rois Fainéants (the cipher or puppet kings). Clovis II. and his ten successors were the puppet kings of the Palace Mayors. Louis V. (last of the Carolingian dynasty) received the same designation.

“`My signet you shall command with all my heart, madam,' said Earl Philip. ... `I am, you know, a complete Roy Fainéant, and never once interfered with my Maire du Palais in her proceedings.'” — Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xv.

Faint

Faint heart ne'er won fair lady.

“The bold a way will find or make.”

King: Orpheus and Eurydice.

“Faint harts faire ladies neuer win.” (1569.)

Philobiblion Society's Publications

(1827, p. 22).

Faint Hearted

Easily discouraged; afraid to venture.

A great Cheshire family that has long occupied a mansion at Utkinton. (Cheshire expression.)

Fair Geraldine.

(See Geraldine.) Fair Rosamond. (See Rosamond.) To bid fair, as “he bids fair to be a good ...” To give good promise of being ...; to indicate future success or excellence; one de quo bene sperare licet.

Fair as a lily.

(See Similes.)

Fair (Latin feriæ, holidays.)

A day after the fair.

Too late for the fun. “Sero sapiunt Phryges. ” The Phrygians were noted for their obstinacy; hence, Phryx verberatus melior. They were thrice conquered: by Hercules, the Greeks, and the Latins, and were wise “after the events.”

Fair

(Statute). (See Mop .)

Fair City

Perth; so called from the beauty of its situation.

Fair Game

A worthy subject of banter; one who exposes himself to ridicule.

“Bourrienne is fair game; but the whole of his statements are not worthless.” — The Spectator, Feb. 18th, 1888.

Fair Maid

(The).

Fair Maid of Anjou.

Lady Edith Plantagenet, who married David, Prince Royal of Scotland. Fair Maid of February. The snow—drop, which blossoms in February.

Fair Maid of Perth.

Katie Glover, the most beautiful young woman of Perth. Heroine of Scott's novel of the same name.

Fair—star

The Princess Fair—star, in love with Prince Chery, whom she sets to obtain for her “the dancing water,” “the singing apple,” and “the green bird” (q.v.). This tale is borrowed from the fairy tales of Straparola the Milanese. (1550.) Chery and Fair—star, by the Countess d'Aulnoy.

Fair Trade

Smuggling.

“Neither Dirk Hatteraick nor any of his sailors, all well known men in the fair trade, were again seen upon that coast.” — Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. x.

Latterly the phrase has been introduced into politics to signify reciprocity of protection or free—trade. That is, free—trade to those nations that grant free—trade to us, and vice versa.

Fair Way

In a fair way. On the right tack. The “fair way” is the proper track through a channel.

Fair and Square

Honestly, justly, with straightforwardness.

Fair fall you

Good befall you.

Fair Play is a Jewel

As a jewel is an ornament of beauty and value, so fair play is an honourable thing and a “jewel in the crown” of the player.

Fairy Money

Found money. Said to be placed by some good fairy at the spot where it was picked up. “Fairy money” is apt to be transformed into leaves.

Fairy Rings

Circles of rank or withered grass, often seen in lawns, meadows, and grass—plots. Said to be produced by the fairies dancing on the spot. In sober truth, these rings are simply an agaric or fungus below the surface, which has seeded in a circular range, as many plants do. Where the ring is brown and almost bare, the “spawn” is of a greyish—white colour. The grass dies because the spawn envelops the roots so as to prevent their absorbing moisture; but where the grass is rank the “spawn” is dead, and serves as manure to the young grass.

“You demi—puppets, that

By moonshine do the green—sour ringlets make, Whereof the ewe not bites.”

Shakespeare: Tempest,

v. 1.

Fairy Sparks The phosphoric light from decaying wood, fish, and other substances. Thought at one time to be lights prepared for the fairies at their revels.

Fallow Land

Land ploughed, but not sown; so called from its brown or tawny colour. (German, fahl, tawny; Anglo—Saxon, falū or fealo, pale—red; hence, fallow deer, red deer.)

“Break up the fallow land.” — Jer. iv. 3.

False

(The Rule of). A method of solving certain mathematical questions generally done by equations. Suppose the question is this: “What number is that whose half exceeds its third by 12?” Assume any number you like as the supposed answer — say 96. Then, by the question, $96 \div 2 = 96$ i.e. 54, but 48 does not equal 54, the latter is 16 too much. Well, now state by rule of proportion thus, 16: 12:: 96 to the answer, which is 72, the number required.

False Ceiling

The space between the garret—ceiling and the roof.

Dictionary of Phrase and Fable
